And as he let his thoughts drift dangerously along this road there suddenly gathered about him a sickening, panic-stricken fear of life; a fear of life burdened and sharpened by the responsibilities he had incurred in regard to these three women. He felt as though he could lift up in that sweet spring air a howl like the howl of a trapped animal. Why, oh! why had he got himself so miserably entangled? And then, like a bitter undertide, like salt sea water in the midst of an inland river, there swept over him the weight of these different human existences upon which he had so disastrously impinged. Their lives to them were as important as his own to himself; and yet he had presumed, in his blind selfishness, to treat them as he might have treated insensitive, inanimate objects. Oh, he deserved every inch of the iron which now pierced him through his bones! With cold clairvoyance he reviewed the stages of philosophic scepticism, of spiritual disillusionment, that had gradually made him so indifferent to what he did, so indifferent to work, to ambition, to any purpose in things at all. He recognized the fact now that it was this refusal to take the ultimate issues of life seriously that had laid him open to these disasters. Lexie, who was far more materialistic than he was, could never have got entangled so; because he treated life as a work of art, and was consequently sagacious, meticulous, cautious, in spite of his scandalous humour.

With a sigh that came from the depths of his soul the unfortunate man lifted his feet from the spot where the patch of Lords-and-Ladies had seemed to paralyze him, and proceeded to run down the slope of Battlefield, running with a certain rather awkward movement of his long legs, such as used to make Lexie laugh at him and tease him when they were boys together.

Something seemed to be turning a kind of screw inside him with a squeeze and a twinge that scraped upon the very parchment of his soul as a lead pencil upon a slate; and it is likely enough that nothing that Ann or Netta or Nell had ever suffered, or would suffer, because of him, quite equalled the cold, unmitigated misery that hounded him on then, down that hill, like a murderous ice dog!

Arrived at his house he entered it, as was his wont and the wont of his father before him, through the kitchen door. He told Pandie to put on her things and run down to the village to order Twiney and his mare.

“Have you taken up tea yet to Miss Page?” he asked.

Pandie hummed and hawed and hovered, doing the thing that Lexie always described as “standing on one foot.” He saw that she had something on her mind beyond her courage to express, but he cut her short with a gesture.

“Have you taken the tea up yet, or haven’t you?” he asked irritably.

Pandie looked helplessly at the broad back of Mrs. Vabbin, who had ostentatiously occupied herself at the stove, but whose whole figure radiated “eyes and ears.” She muttered something about the door being locked.

“Locked!” he cried. “Well? What then? Haven’t you got knuckles? Haven’t you got a tongue?”

It might almost have been supposed that the wanderer from the county of Somerset had suffered paralysis in all her senses, for she remained rooted to the ground, staring at him as if she were looking at a ghost.

“Oh, be off, then, for heaven’s sake!” he cried. “And make Twiney put his horse in at once and drive you back here. A breath of air may quicken your wits, my good girl!"

He left the kitchen and ran up the great 17th-century staircase, two steps at a time. He had heard enough to fill him with all manner of sinister forebodings.

The door of Netta's room was not locked, but the sight that met his eyes was worse than his worst presentiment. The room, facing south, was flooded with lovely spring sunshine. The window was wide open, and across the garden came the song of an invisible blackbird, that clear-throated gay-wistful song, which always seems to reach the mind from some mysterious pre-natal region, full of something sadder than human tears and happier than human laughter.

But what a travesty, what a farcical travesty of the first romance of a man's life was the figure he found seated by that pleasant window! Netta sat there in her shift. Her hair, banging loose and disordered on each side of her head, betrayed only too many gray streaks in its untidy brown masses; while her right arm, falling limp and inert to the floor, still held in its feeble clutch one of those small glass bottles of French brandy for which the Ashover cellar had formerly been famous!

Her face was flushed and not agreeably flushed, the lines in it being drawn tightly and harshly underneath the skin, while the skin itself was that of a person marked and sealed as belonging pitifully to a nature divested of the natural instincts of human self-respect.

Rook closed the door behind him and turned the lock. "The servants have known this for a long time," he thought to himself.

He crossed the room and stood by her side. Her breath, heavy with liquor, spoiled the scent of that divine air, which floated in upon him as if over thousands of leagues of newly sprouting grass.

He shook her by the shoulder; not roughly but quite without tenderness, for his heart at that moment felt dead within him beneath all the futilities of human existence.

She opened her eyes and stared at him wildly, appearing hardly conscious at first as to where she was. Then, with a natural impulse of concealment, as if — thought Rook bitterly — he had been a policeman in a raid, she pushed the bottle under her chair and made a pitiful movement to adjust her attire to the requirements of conventional modesty.

“So this is how you amuse yourself,” he said. “Perhaps you’d like me to hand you your dressing gown?” he added, with a sarcasm in his tone which was as completely lost upon her as if it had been addressed to the lime tree in the garden.

She took the dressing gown he brought her and, holding out her arms as if she had been a doll, passively allowed him to help her into it. Then she rose unsteadily to her feet, clutching the folds of the garment against her breast with one hand and gathering up her hair with the other.

“Well?” he said in a low bitter tone.

She let her hair fall down again and put out her hand toward him with a helpless, deprecating gesture.

“Don’t you love me at all, Rook?” she murmured huskily.

He disregarded both gesture and words and, stepping past her, closed the window with so much unnecessary violence that its panes rattled. Then he pulled the blind halfway down as if to shut out the unbearable loveliness of that spring day. But the slanting sunshine was kinder than he was, for it threw upon the floor under her feet a pool of yellow light in the midst of which she continued to stand, like a woebegone leaden statue in a fountain of gold.

“I did it for you! I did it for you!” she brought out recklessly, too unhappy under his reproaches and too dazed in her mind to care what inmost secrets she betrayed.

He stared at her in sceptical bewilderment.

“I don’t know what on earth you’re talking about, Netta,” he said; and then, fumbling awkwardly in his pocket for a cigarette, “Oh, do sit down!” he added, crossly and petulantly. “How can I talk to you when you’re standing there like a petrified image?”

“Rook!” she said, moving a step toward him.

Something in her expression touched a chord of remorseful tenderness in him and he took her in his arms; but he had no sooner done this than the overpowering smell of liquor in her breath extinguished the impulse. So as not to hurt her feelings he continued to press her against his shoulder and to let her lean all her weight upon him; but it was with a cold, unhappy, weary eye, without warmth and without pity, that he took in, over her bowed head, the familiar aspects of the room and the great stream of sunlight, full of flickering dust motes, that wavered across the floor.

As he looked at those tiny illuminated specks he thought to himself how likely enough it was that each one of these atoms was itself an enormous world, a world that doubtless at that very beat of time — perhaps a whole year of it — contained many Rook Ashovers in the process of disentangling themselves from many Netta Pages!

And the immense misery and futility of the whole boundless spectacle drove itself into his brain. What suffering! What misunderstanding! What cruel dilemmas! And all issueless and meaningless as that dance of April sun motes!

He registered in his mind a deep, silent vow that he would never, whatever happened to him afterward, forgive the Power that was responsible for this fermenting-vat of misery. No conceivable rearrangements or renewals or redemptions should ever make up, to him, at any rate, for what certain sensitive organisms are compelled to endure while this particular sphere is turning upon its axis!

Though he retorted thus, with all the righteous anger at his command, at the shameless First Cause of human suffering, his own nature was such that it never occurred to him to ask her again what she meant by that obscure cry: “I did it for you! I did it for you!”

And she, recovering now, as she clung passionately to him, both her sobriety and her love, recovered simultaneously with these her original heroic resolution.

In the strength of nothing less than this she extricated herself at last from his embrace, and some blessed principle of chance ordained, in defiance of the malignity of fate, that she should not know how cold and perfunctory, how weary and without human pity, that embrace had been!

No sooner had she recovered her mental balance and moving across to the bed had stretched herself out on it, a natural and touching smile upon her face and her hands clasped behind her neck, than there came the sound of wheels upon the gravel of the front drive. Pandie had been extremely expeditious in her embassy, and Mr. Twiney and his horse were at Rook’s disposal.

Netta was clear-witted enough now to understand from the look upon his face that there was something about the appearance of this conveyance at this moment that agitated and troubled him.

He moved to the window and stood there with his back to her, absorbed in miserable thought. Netta guessed shrewdly enough that he was suffering from the particular situation of all situations which he dreaded most: that of having to make a quick and momentous decision. She resolved to help him to make this mysterious choice at once, whatever the consequences might be.

"You've got an engagement, Rook," she said quietly. "So don't let me keep you. You needn't worry about me any more. I'm all right now. I'll ring for Pandie presently, when I'm dressed, and have my tea. Then I've got a nice story to read till you come back. Or I may go out. That's what I'll do," she added cheerfully and firmly. "I'II go out for a bit! So don't worry. I shall be here; and quite good and quiet, Rook dear, when you come back."

He found it the easiest thing to do at that moment, just to obey her; just to take advantage of the velvet cloak she snatched off her heart and spread out before him, covering the fissures that yawned under their feet, covering the mud, covering everything!

"I'll tell her about Ann and me to-night," he said to himself. "It'll be easier to tell her at night. Her mind is not calm enough yet."

His brain said other things to his heart, too, as he moved irresolutely toward the door, his eyes fixed on her face and his hands fumbling with the buttons of his overcoat. Had not her resolution held firm, with all the power of her love for him tightening the fibres of its cruel strength, had she collapsed again, or appealed to his feelings, or clung to him in the blind pathos of her helplessness, the probability is that he would not have found it in him to go.

But she did none of these things. She forced into her countenance that world-old smile, full of the bitter wisdom of centuries, the smile of Sarah, the smile of Mary, the smile wherewith the sons of men have been at once mocked and protected by the daughters of men since the beginning of the world.

"Good-bye, then," he murmured, something within him surging up in one last wild desire that she should implore him, that she should conjure him to stay with her. “Good-bye, then, Netta dear. Don’t forget to ring for tea as soon as you are ready. See you again soon!”

The door opened, shut upon him, and he was gone.

A minute or two later she heard the sound of wheels upon gravel. He was gone; and she had done what she had taken upon herself to do. He was gone thinking of her like that, like the figure he had seen seated by the window when he first entered the room!

She did not move a muscle now. In exactly the position wherein he had left her, there she remained; but her mind, empty of every other thought, kept hovering round one particular thing: kept wishing that he had kissed her at the very last, just before he had gone, so that her heart could have given him, her cheek against his, its own secret, unrecognized, desperate farewell.

Rook had forgotten that one of the ways to Tollminster was by that very Antiger Lane where he had left his cousin. He remembered it just in time; just at the moment when Mr. Twiney’s gig reduced itself to a walking pace to ascend the long tree-shaded hill known as Friday’s Dip.

Halfway up this hill they came to a lane that left the road at right angles. An old signpost, lichen-covered and weather-stained, pointed a long exhausted arm toward this lane, bearing the single word “Gorm.”

Rook clapped his hand on the driver’s wrist.

“Go the Antiger way, will you, Mr. Twiney?”

“’Tis a deal longer round, Squire,” replied the man. “And there be bad ruts on thik little road. The best way is the nat’ral way as you might ‘spress it.” And he indicated with his whip the long straight ascent before them.

Rook’s next speech was perhaps as much of a surprise to himself as it was to Mr. Twiney.

“I have to pick up Lady Ann,” he said, “at Drool’s. We have an engagement together at Tollminster.”

“Right you be, Squire!” returned the man cheerfully. “I reckon me wold horse can wamble on through more dirt than any dirt these folks have a-known. These roads be nothink to what I’ve a-seed down Stourbridge way. Illigant carriage drives they be, to them parts!’

He turned his mare in the desired direction as he spoke; and Rook, watching the gleaming celandines in the ditch as they jogged along, found himself repeating the word upon the signpost as if it were an incantation.

“What kind of a village is Gorm?” he inquired casually. “I’ve seen that signpost ever since I was a child, but I can’t remember ever having seen any place corresponding to it. I know the hamlets so well, too, between here and Tollminster.”

“‘Tain’t a village at all, Squire,” answered his companion. “’Tis writ on thik signpost and that’s all I do mind. Gippoo Cooper, same as your Dad were smitten wi’, did used to say down to Black Pig that ‘un were a girt devil’s name, writ on thik board for to guide boggles and ghosties. I’ve always been a bit scared-like, in dirty weather, when I’ve a-seed thik sign; and me mare, too, stopped in’s tracks one terrible wet night and turned ‘un’s head right round to I, same as a living Christian might, as much as to say, poor dumb beasty, ‘This place bain’t a place for neither thee nor me, mister!’”

The warm golden afternoon light had deepened to a rich amber tint, falling upon hedge and copse and meadow, by the time they approached Drool’s cottage.

Rook was reminded of that mysterious glow, seeming to come from all quarters of the horizon at once, such as forms the background to the delicate Tuscan leafiness in many an Old Master’s picture. The very cuckoo-flowers in the damp margins of the fields had that curious allegorical look which all fresh spring growths sometimes assume, as if they were painted in the illuminated edges of old breviaries.

Twiney pulled up in front of the little garden, where not so many hours before the cousins had separated, and Rook hurried up to the door. He knocked sharply with the handle of his stick and waited impatiently for an answer.

As he waited the impression came over him, as impressions do on such occasions — our reasoning faculties not having altogether destroyed our intuitions — of something or another being seriously amiss. Made up of an accumulation of many converging little signs — silences where there would naturally be sounds; sounds where there would naturally be silence — there gathers suddenly upon the human heart at such moments a burden of prophetic misgiving.

He opened the door and entered the little entrance hall. As he did so he became aware of two simultaneous sounds, both of them sinister and disturbing. The louder of the two sounds was the high-pitched monotone of the idiot Binnory; and the words uttered by the lad, as Rook listened in breathless amazement, were more extraordinary than the sound itself.

"I do see 'ee! Binnory do see the fine lady what's been brought low! Loowhee! Loowhee! Loowhee! I do see through crack and chink! I do see through hole and cranny! I do see 'ee! Binnory do see 'ee. The fine lady, on the high horse, what our Squire have tumbled and towzled! 'Ee be left, all draggled and scanted, like a fine girt mallard with's wing shot off. And Squire be gone to London town and he'll never come back; never no more at all! And Binnory do see 'ee and do hear 'ee! You mid drive Binnory away but a'll come back. And you mid live now where Uncle Dick did live; and you mid tell Binnory stories and stories, like what Uncle Dick did tell. Loowhee! Loowhee! Binnory knows all that do befall in earth and in sky!"

The second sound that reached Rook's ears, simultaneously with the idiot's babble, was the low persistent crying of a girl in abandoned misery. Could that be his cousin? Could that faint pitiful whimper come from the heart of Lady Ann?

He waited to hear no more but rushed up the little staircase.

He found Binnory clinging to a hole in the wall, which he had evidently made for himself and through which he was peering into the room. Rook was too concerned now to bother about the boy; without even knocking at the door he burst straight in.

Lady Ann was lying with her face on the pillow, having exhausted herself to such a point that her crying was scarcely audible.

"My dear! What's the matter? For God's sake, what's the matter?" And Rook knelt by the bed and pulled the girl over toward him.

"Send him away, Rook! He's there still! Send him away, Rook, or I shall go mad!' And her voice began to rise to something like a scream.

Rook got upon his feet, rushed out into the passage, caught up the idiot under his arm and carrying him downstairs as if he were a bundle of hay, put him out of the front door and locked it from inside.

Then he went into Mrs. Drool's part of the house and locked the other door, too. There was no sign of the gamekeeper or his wife anywhere about the place.

When he returned to the room upstairs he was amazed at the change in Cousin Ann. It was just as if Binnory had really cast a spell over her, and that the moment he was disposed of she came entirely back to her normal self.

She had already got up from the bed and was smoothing out her ruffled hair at Uncle Dick's looking glass. When he entered she turned round to him, smiling; and Rook had his second lesson that day as to the variable nature of women's smiles.

This smile of Cousin Ann's was whimsically penitent, full of the deprecating cajolery of a child. She put her hands on Rook's shoulders and kissed him on the forehead.

"I couldn't help it, my dear," she said. "I was alone in the house with him and he teased me and teased me. I was doing what you told me — making a list of the things — but he wouldn't let me alone. He must have heard those people talking about us. I was feeling upset and I lost my temper. I hit him. It was dreadful of me; but that's what I did. I hit him! And after that he wouldn't go away but kept peeping at me through that hole in the wall. It was awful, Rook! It was like a nightmare. I kept dragging him away from that hole and pushing him downstairs. But he's so strong. He always came back, and then kept jeering at me. But you've locked him out now, have you? Oh, I am so glad!" And she sucked in her breath with a little gurgling sibilance, as if it were all she could do not to burst into a fit of unnatural laughter.

Her mood touched Rook's heart more than she realized. He had always associated her with such complete independence that to see her in this agitated state struck home at him through all his defences.

The vague intention which had formulated itself in his mind at the moment when he saw the word "Gorm" on the signpost now hardened into a definite resolution.

"Get your things on quickly, my dear," he said. "I'm going to take you with me to Tollminster."

More passive and docile than she had ever been in her life, Cousin Ann allowed herself to be led down the stairs, hurried along the little garden path, and lifted into the cart. Rook placed her between himself and Mr. Twiney, and as they rattled through the muddy lanes and through the gathering spring twilight the girl abandoned herself without restraint to a delicious wave of voluptuous contentment which cradled and rocked her and obliterated all doubt and responsibility.

She had fallen into a kind of trance wherein all objects lost their substantiality and became porous and dream-like, when the lighted lamps of the cheerful High Street and the rough cobblestones of the inn yard made her realize that they had reached Tollminster.

Rook gave orders to Peter Twiney to meet them in that same inn yard later in the evening, and he and Cousin Ann made their way through the narrow old-fashioned streets to the lodging of his friend the curate.

The closing of spring days in an ancient country town has a glamour about it of a quality more delicate and penetrating than anything that can be reached in the leafiest and remotest solitudes. The sense of the open roads stretching out from the lighted thoroughfares into the embalmed darkness; the fragrance of lilac bushes from invisible walled gardens; the emerging of the impression of new-leafed greenness from behind the moss-covered gates of church precincts and almshouse precincts; the twilit presence of newly planted pansies and primulas in old Georgian window frames; all these things together, mingled with sudden breaths of mud-scented coolness coming up from river banks, where the great moist marigold buds are swelling and swelling in the darkness, give to the streets of such a town an enchantment that has the power to summon up and embody the rarest memories of our race consciousness.

The curate of Saint Mark’s Church received his visitors with undissembled delight. Full of a youthful idolatry for the Squire of Ashover, in which a natural and innocent snobbishness mingled with a quaint personal hero worship, the young clergyman was quick enough to catch every emotional nuance of this unexpected visit.

“I’m proud to be the one to launch you,” he kept repeating, as he dragged them out again, up Antiger Street, up South Street, until they reached the necessary office.

The place was closed; but the energetic curate, with his knowledge of local ways, was able to follow up the official trail to such excellent effect that when they returned to his lodging the desired special license was safe in Rook’s possession.

What followed was even more dream-like to Lady Ann’s irresponsible and reckless mood than was their drive through the muddy lanes. Mr. Tishmarsh rummaged up his sexton and his verger as witnesses; opened the little postern-gate of the dark Henry the Seventh church with his own private key, slipped on his vestments in the easy familiar manner of a disciple of the Bishop of Oxford, repeated his nervous formula: “I’m proud to be able to launch you!” so unconsciously that it struck the girl as falling into a sort of allotted rhythm amid the austere hieratic injunctions of the fatal service, and finally made them write their names in the parchment-bound book as man and wife, leaving both of them with a queer impression in their minds that they had been hypnotized by a romantic schoolboy.

“Couldn’t have been worked like this for any one but you, Mr. Ashover,” remarked the exultant little cleric as he escorted them toward the yard of the Red Lion. “Nor for any woman but yourself, Lady Ashover!” he hurried to add, fumbling in his confusion over the bride’s new name.

Rook was exceedingly anxious to shake off the little man before they encountered their driver's inquisitive sympathy, but Mr. Tishmarsh had at least this in common with his professional enemy the Devil that, when once he had been made use of, it was not easy to get out of his clutches.

"I must help you into your vehicle, Lady Ashover," the youth announced. "That's only my right, isn't it, as I was the one to launch you?"

Rook found himself damning the kind little priest in his heart with vindictive fury out of all proportion to the slight occasion. His nerves, now the drastic step had actually been taken, were feeling the effects of the unnatural tension of this long day.

They were off at last, but not before Mr. Peter Twiney had thrown a most quizzical and knowing leer in the direction of the curate of Saint Mark's, left bare-headed and excited among the staring ostlers of the Red Lion.

It was nearly eleven o'clock when they reached Ashover House. Rook made Mr. Twiney drive round to the back door, so as not to disturb any one; but it soon appeared that this familiar precaution was, for once in the history of that quiet dwelling, ironically unnecessary.

The whole house was stirring with lights and voices and emotional confusion.

Pandie met them in the doorway; and not only Mr. Twiney, but also, it appeared, his long-necked horse as well, listened with an attention that suggested one of the rarest dramatic sensations in two blameless lives, while the white-faced servant, her apron and cap awry, and her hands waving in the air like the flappers of an unhappy penguin, explained that Miss Page had runned away unbeknown to any one; that in her own opinion, she had drownded herself in Saunders' Hole; while in the opinion of Mrs. Vabbin she had been kidnapped and ravaged by them murdering gippoos.

CHAPTER XIII

IT WAS ALMOST as if the momentous event that had happened to Cousin Ann — that secret victory of the Ashover dust under the chancel floor — had laid a paralyzing finger upon the life-hating pen of William Hastings.

Nell awoke late on the morning after the events just described, awoke with a mysterious sense of some great load having been lifted from her life during her sleep. To her surprise she found a note from her husband, fixed to the pincushion in front of her looking-glass, tellingher that he had had his breakfast and had gone off for the day to Bishop's Forley.

She knew why this had happened. A celebrated theologian from Germany, one of the few modern thinkers whose writings interested this lonely nihilist, had come to stay with an ex-priest there; and it was at the invitation of this man that Hastings had gone.

Brushing her hair before the open window with the scent of the young leaves and the new-grown grass floating in upon her and the songs of thrushes and blackbirds answering each other across the road, the girl abandoned herself to a thrilling current of happiness that seemed composed of every magical sound and every ecstatic scent that the great reservoirs of life held in their hidden springs.

It was as though she could catch, behind the shrill bird notes and the arrowy odours, the very stir and movement of the green sap as it pressed upward to meet the warmth of the generative sun.

Out of the recesses of her nature where they had been so long hidden rose a thousand indescribable memories.

Pale-green cowslip stalks mingled, in these faint evocations, with the transparent lilac of cuckoo-flowers, with the unique thrill of the first purple crocuses against the brown earth mould, with the crimson-tipped petals of innumerable daisies on dew-wet mossy lawns. Sharp birth pangs at once jocund and poignant seemed to answer from the depths of her being the unsealings and unsheathings that were going on in wood and garden and field.

All her buried responses to Nature, responses that had seemed to come to her in the form of pure ecstasies of childish happiness but in reality were associated with quite definite impressions of warmth and coolness, of stalks and leaves, of earth mould and roots and moss, of sun-motes and shadows, now rushed upward to the level of her brain, flooding her with a rapture that was beyond human description.

She tied up her hair, put on her shift, and ran down, bare-armed as she was, to make the preparations for her breakfast, against the moment she should be washed and dressed. There was not much to be done, for Hastings had built up an excellent fire and had put both kettles on the stove.

Hurrying through her ablutions with the impatience of a child, delaying just long enough to open her trunk and take out therefrom a real spring dress, in an incredibly short time she was seated at the kitchen table, with the door into the garden open in front of her, eating bread and butter and drinking tea with a face so radiant that had a sub-human elemental wayfarer lingered on the threshold watching her it would have certainly thought that the lives of the daughters of men were the ones to be envied throughout all space!

It then came over her what she would do when she had washed up the breakfast things, made her bed, and watered the purple and pink hyacinths that were budding now under the south wall. She decided that she would cross the Ashover bridge, skirt the Ashover garden by a little path she knew well, and make her way over the hill to the Antiger Woods. She would not let herself think of an encounter with Rook; in fact, she was by no means sure that she wished to see him that day; but she wished to associate him with her unusual mood; she wished to be near him, to feel the pulses of the spring in the locality haunted by his presence.

She was so impatient to get out of the house that in the end she forgot all about the hyacinths; and it was not until she had reached the entrance to the churchyard that, with a little funny smile on her twisted mouth, she remembered this omission.

Drawn, against her intention and against her will, by the memory of that afternoon in the darkened church, she lingeringly and slowly entered the enclosure and moved round toward the west door.

Her astonishment was great when, turning the corner of the building, she suddenly found herself faced by Rook's mother. Mrs. Ashover was standing by the grave of her husband. Nell got a quick glimpse of her before she was observed and she was amazed at the expression on her face.

The old woman looked like an exultant and malignant witch, who had come to confide some unholy triumph to the responsive bones of a heathen corpse. She showed herself disconcerted and annoyed at the apparition of Nell, but she did not make any effort to conceal the causes of her wicked satisfaction.

"You'd better know at once what has occurred, Mrs. Hastings," she said, "and then you can tell your husband, if Rook hasn't told him already."

Nell's face grew white. What blow was this, then, that had chosen this day of all days to fall upon her head?

"What?" she murmured, her mouth open and her eyes wide. "Has anything happened — to any one?"

“Happened? I should think things have happened! You may be interested to learn that my son and his cousin were married yesterday by special license in Tollminster; and that that woman has run away.”

Mrs. Ashover fixed upon the girl, as she brought this out, a look of such evil exultation that Nell felt as though every secret of her own heart were stripped bare. She could only make a little gasping noise in her throat in response to this overwhelming information and instinctively she pressed her hand upon the late Squire’s head-stone.

“What’s the matter?” said the old lady, laying her gloved hand on the girl’s wrist and retaining it in her nervous clutch. “Come, come. This won’t do! Why, you’re as white as a Wyandotte hen. Come into the church and sit down a minute. No! No! I’m not going to have you fainting here by my John.” And she chuckled with a high-pitched quavering chuckle such as might have emerged from the leathery lungs of an agitated bat.

She dragged the girl with her into the building and they sat down side by side. As the blood began to come back to Nell’s cheeks and she began to make an attempt to visualize Cousin Ann as Rook’s wife, her deeper consciousness was aware of the Ashover tombs and of the difference between the way they looked now and the way they looked on that dark, misty evening.

“Where has Netta Page gone?” she whispered to her companion.

“Gone to the gutter!” was the unspoken response of the old woman. But what she actually said was: “We have no idea, child. Not Rook or any of us! They’ve been scouring the country all night; they’ve been to the police and they’ve been to the railway stations. Not a sign or trace anywhere! The curious thing about it is that she didn’t take anything; nothing but her handbag; and that, from what my son says, must have been practically empty. I think myself that she took money, but Rook says not. If he’s right there, it's because she's gone with someone, with some man or other with whom she's been keeping in touch all the time. You know they're like that! That's what they always do: go back to some lazy bully who takes all their earnings!"

As Nell listened to this tirade her disgust grew greater and greater. If it had not been for those tombs in the chancel, whose presence had never been more emphatic, she would have protested indignantly and rushed away. As it was she just leaned back with half-closed eyes, trying to imagine what Netta must have actually felt as she stole out of that unconscious house with her empty handbag. In her growing sympathy with Netta she began to feel calmer and less hurt under her own personal blow. After all, she had never let her thoughts or feelings wander off beyond the romance of the immediate present. With regard to Lady Ann she felt no individual jealousy; only a sickening weight of troubled concern as to what the whole thing must have meant for Rook.

"I shall leave them alone for a while."

Nell heard the old lady's voice through the thick screen of her own agitation, as if it came to her through a tapestried wall.

"Alone for a while. You can tell your husband that. And if Lady Ann would rather have the place to herself after that, I shall be all right. It'll kill me, very likely, if they find they can't put up with me here; but I shall die happy."

Mrs. Ashover lapsed into silence; and her gaze, as well as that of her youthful companion, wandered from the Voltairean lawyer to the melancholy Cavalier; and from the Cavalier to the austere Crusader.

"It's absolutely all right," she murmured aloud to these exacting spirits of the race she served. "It's absolutely all right."

There was something in the mere fact of Mrs. Ashover's revealing her thoughts in this way to a comparative stranger that startled and astonished the young girl. This insanity of devotion to so impersonal a thing as the survival of a family was so entirely outside Nell's own life illusion that she felt like a person who watches the clash of phantom armies upon a phantom shore. And yet she was intelligent enough not to miss the note of something almost sublime in the old woman's crazy loyalty.

"It'll kill me if they can't put up with me here." That desperate sentence kept repeating itself in the girl's brain like the beat of a drum that outlasts all the other sounds as the mêlée rolls itself away over the muffling hills.

Absorbed, each of them, in their own thoughts, the old woman and the young woman could hardly be expected to be aware of the full power of the occult influences that streamed forth on that enchanted spring day from the mouse-coloured dust underneath those marble slabs. It was as though the rejuvenative stirrings in earth and air had actually pierced through the slow dissolution of the centuries and roused some hidden vital force down there in the darkness, latent and potential, beyond all annihilation.

Some sort of obscure summoning from these tombs of the race she had saved must anyway have carried its exultant vibration into the nerves of the new mistress of Ashover; for, after a long lapse of silence between them, both the women seated there, with a pool of sunshine under their feet and a wavering stream of sunshine falling on their heads, became suddenly conscious that they were no longer alone in the church. They turned round simultaneously. They simultaneously stood up. And there was Lady Ann, erect and bareheaded in the doorway, regarding them with a blank, dazed, inexpressive face, like the face of a noctambulist.

They extricated themselves quickly from the narrow pew and walked down the aisle to meet her. She smiled faintly at Nell and held out her hand, but it was from behind the same impassive mask — the mask of a hypnotized sleepwalker — that she addressed her words to Mrs. Ashover.

“I came to tell you, Aunt, that Rook has got on the track of our lost lady. It appears she was seen, by someone who knew her, in Bishop’s Forley last night. I know there’s a great mass of slums round those glove factories. I’ve seen awful places down there — lodging houses and public houses and that sort of thing where any one of that kind might naturally go.”

Mrs. Ashover glanced at Nell, her instinct as a woman of the world warning her that this was not the moment for any interchange of unholy triumph between herself and her new daughter. But Lady Ann seemed strangely oblivious just then to all the conventions.

“You’re lucky to be able to enjoy a day like this with a clear mind,” she said, looking Nell straight in the face with her formidable gray eyes. “You’re lucky to be free of any contact with our crazy family.”

“William is in Bishop’s Forley to-day,” murmured Mrs. Hastings.

“Perhaps he’ll be the one, then, to find our lost sheep and bring her back!” responded Lady Ann with a joyless laugh. “Rook drove over there hours ago,” she added.

Walking side by side the three women skirted the angle of the church wall and moved toward the gate leading to the road. They walked in silence, the old woman and the young woman on either side of the newcomer, whose personality seemed endowed at that moment with an immense passivity of weight and power, capable of reducing them both to the rôle of irrelevant supernumeraries.

The warm spring sunshine covered them, all three, with its fecund benediction, and gave to their silent association an almost biblical solemnity. It was as if they had been moving, in accordance with some preordained religious rite, from flower-strewn altar to flower-strewn altar!

They seemed, all of them, relegated to subordinate yet essential parts in some vast mystery play, some vernal celebration, complicated and dumb, in honour of Persephone or her mother. The cawings of jackdaws, the chittering of sparrows, the harsh cries of a flock of starlings as they settled for a moment on the edge of the roof, did not disturb, any more than did the bleatings of some distant hurdled ewes, the almost supernatural seriousness with which those three figures moved to the entrance of the churchyard.

Were they subconsciously aware, just then, in that magnetic weather, of the invisible pressure of the countless spirits of the dead, rushing forward through the body of the half-formed nameless one, hid in the womb of a new mother of the generations, forward, forward, into the dim, uncreated future?

If it were so, if the sublime mystery of the continuity of human life, beautiful and terrible, withdrew from these three sensitive female frames on that fatal morning all power of individual resistance, all power of personal choice, it is easy enough to understand how it was that they moved so slowly toward the gate. Such is the clairvoyant link between all women in their knowledge of themselves as living channels between what was and is and is to come it is likely enough that the strange passivity that emanated from the nerves of one of them on this occasion passed insensibly into the nerves of the other two.

No sooner were they out of the consecrated enclosure, however, and on the sunlit road than the whole mental atmosphere about them changed.

“May I come with you as far as the bridle path?” said Nell. “I made up my mind this morning that I would go to Antiger Woods to look for primroses, and I think I shall still do that — unless,” she added with a gentle glance at Cousin Ann, “I can be of any help to any one?”

Rook’s wife and Rook’s mother exchanged a quick significant look.

"I think, my dear," said the latter with a sudden sharp eagerness, "you may be of immense use to us a little later. If my son, for instance, succeeds in finding Miss Page, and brings her back here, as I'm afraid he's only too likely to do, it would be a blessed relief to all of us if you could — perhaps — for just a few days — till other arrangements were made — take her in at the cottage?"

Nell was unable to prevent the blood rushing to her cheeks. Had this aunt-mother and this niece-daughter, with their merciless aristocratic gray eyes, sounded her heart's secret to its uttermost depths? Were they bent upon punishing her for her temerity? Was this extraordinary suggestion their premeditated revenge?

"I am sure William and I will do everything we can to help you, Mrs. Ashover," the girl answered gravely. "I only trust no harm has come to Netta. I can't believe that she went to any of those dreadful places. I expect she just took the night train to Bristol. I know she's got people she knows there. Or she may have gone to London."

Mrs. Ashover had ceased to listen. A new thought had come into her mind.

"Will you walk back with us to the house, Nelly? There is something I'd be most grateful to you if you'd do for me. Something I want to send to Lexie."

The girl permitted herself to be led prisoner by these two dominant spirits and they all three crossed the bridge.

A few minutes later Nell found herself waiting alone in the great chilly unused drawing room whose spacious ceremoniousness seemed to embrace and envelop her as if she were just one more primrose or crocus or snowdrop to be "arranged" in a slender glass vase.

Never did the room look more stately, in its gilt and its whiteness, in its water colours and French prints; but the young visitor felt an intense and increasing hostility to the whole atmosphere there, as if the great room were consciously emphasizing a sort of victory over her and over all the wayward romance she represented.

She moved to the mantelpiece and stood silently regarding a little gold-framed miniature of Rook's father when a young child. The picture fascinated her by its resemblance to Rook, and a wave of overpowering pity for what she knew well enough he was going through during these agitated hours swept over her like a shivering ague fit.

The odd thing was, and she wondered at it herself, that she felt no anger, no bitterness against him. She longed to rise up against them all and do something — she knew not what — to clear his path for him; to make, as the Bible says, "his way smooth." She felt glad that she was to be sent on a message to Lexie. She wondered how much Lexie had been told of all that was happening. Had Lady Ann found time to send him news of her marriage, news of Netta's disappearance? What an irony if this "something" that she was to take to him were nothing less than this double-edged piece of overpowering intelligence!

She looked at the marble and gilt clock. It was already nearly one. Would she be forced to stay and eat lunch with this mother and this daughter?

The idea of such a thing was utterly repulsive to her. It would have been like eating with two judges while the executioner was at work upon the condemned!

A sudden sound of the opening and shutting of doors in the rear of the house made her stand transfixed on the faded hearthrug, her eyes hypnotized by its convoluted pattern, her ears listening, listening —— In a moment she lifted her head and made one irrepressible movement toward the door. She had heard a familiar voice outside, engaged in a hurried low-toned dialogue with Pandie. Then there came his step in the passage and the door of the drawing room was flung open.

Nell stared at him for a moment in speechless dismay. He might have served, save for his English clothes, for a picture of Hamlet rushing in upon Ophelia. His clothes were muddy and untidy, his boots unpolished, his chin unshaven, his eyes bloodshot and sunk deep in their sockets as if after many nights of sleeplessness.

He shut the door with studied precaution and fixed a long nervous look upon the girl as if expecting some angry outburst from her. Then, advancing a step or two, he threw down his hat and stick upon the rosewood table and looked wildly round him like a hunted criminal seeking sanctuary.

Nell's paralyzed dismay melted into infinite tenderness when she saw how broken he was. She went straight up to him and threw her arms round his neck.

His face felt cold and clammy to her kiss, as if it had been something carved out of the pith of elder-wood, and the unshaven hairs upon his chin pricked her cheek.

"Hush," he whispered nervously. "Hush, for God's sake! They haven't any idea that I'm here. They're upstairs. Pandie told me you were alone. I've come back for money and my shaving things. Twiney's waiting for me in the road. I wouldn't let him drive up. Pandie's gone to my room to get everything. She won't breathe a word. So you mustn't either, my sweet Nell! Oh! I shall find her; I shall find her; or never come back here again!"

The young girl released his neck but clung still to his shoulders, gazing up into his face.

"You will find her, Rook dear. I know you'll find her! I never believed it for a moment when they said she'd gone to that dreadful place."

He took her hands gently from his shoulders and held her at arm’s length away from him. In his excitement the grip of his fingers was so powerful that he bruised her flesh.

“You don’t know what it is to feel as I feel, Nell,” he muttered huskily. “It’s like being a murderer.”

“It was not your fault, Rook darling,” she whispered. “It was not your fault. I know all about it. I saw it all happening; but what could I do? Oh, Rook, my dear, dear love, what could I do?”

“It’s like being a murderer, Nell,” he repeated, gripping her thin arms so tightly that she could not refrain from a little smothered cry. “It’s just as if I had deliberately killed her! And she was so good! Oh! Nell, I was all she had. And she was so dear and good!”

He loosed her arms and uttered a sigh that shook his bony frame to its centre.

“You will find her, Rook dear! You will find her!” the girl kept repeating; and then, feeling suddenly faint with the tension of this encounter, she sank down on one of the tall, embroidered, Louis Quatorze chairs, heart-shaped and gilded.

He fell on his knees at her side and taking her face in his hands kissed her pitifully and blindly. Under his kisses her colour came back and she leaned forward, her hands clasping his head.

“Rook, dear, dear Rook, you’ll find her!” she chanted, in a kind of crooning monotone, swaying a little as if rocking an infant. “You’ll find her, Rook. Have no fear! Something tells me that you and she will meet again.”

He rose to his feet and glanced nervously at the door.

“If I do, Nell,” he whispered, “you’ll be my friend, won’t you, and help me through with all this?”

She never knew what he really meant by this last appeal, for with a quick tap at the door Pandie put her head into the room and beckoned to him.

"I'm with you, Pandie," he cried. "Good-bye, Nell!"

And before she had found the strength to get up from the rose-embroidered chair with the stiff gilded arms, he had got out of the room and the door was shut.

Once upon her feet she felt her normal strength coming back; and with that strength she felt a certain strange deep happiness stirring in her heart, a happiness that was different from the happiness she had experienced earlier that morning, and yet was not, it may be, altogether remote from that! She bent down over a great shallow vase of primroses that stood in the middle of the table where Rook had thrown his hat and stick, and she buried her face in those pale virginal blooms.

She approached the verge, as she inhaled that penetrating sweetness, of nothing less than the open secret which "many prophets and kings" have died without knowing, namely, that when love passes a certain subjective barrier and flows outward over the life of the person loved, it liberates itself for that moment at least from the sting that is "cruel as the grave."

She was still smelling these flowers when Mrs. Ashover came in; carrying in her hand a folded note.

"Will you take this to Lexie for me, my dear?" she said. "I would have loved to keep you to lunch with us, but as you can see, everything is at sixes and sevens!"

For no reason at all except from an inherent and invincible capriciousness in the very texture of all terrestrial happenings, it was this silly phrase "sixes and sevens" rather than anything that any other human being had said to her that day that kept teasingly and mechanically forming itself upon her lips as she recrossed the two bridges over the river, on her way to be the first messenger to inform Lexie Ashover that his historic name was in less danger than it had been, two days ago, of disappearing altogether from the face of the earth!

CHAPTER XIV

EMERGING FROM THE ex-priest’s house at Bishop’s Forley, the Reverend William Hastings, his head throbbing from the excitement of his metaphysical arguments with the German visitor, found himself walking, about six o’clock in the evening, through a street completely unknown to him in the poorer district of the rambling overcrowded town.

He had walked all the ten miles to the place that morning and when he left his confrères he announced his intention of walking all the way home; but the agitation of the arguments they had had in this singular meeting had left him so exhausted that he began to think he would give up all thought of getting back that night.

This point being settled he felt half inclined to return to his heretical colleague and ask for hospitality; but the memory of the wretchedly meagre quarters the man lived in, combined with a vision of the abnormal physical size of the foreign guest, made him shrink from such a step. He decided to dispatch a telegram to his wife and find a room in some lodging house or inn.

The hum and stir in his brain, reverberating and richocheting with dark and disturbing oracles, had driven him blindly on so far from the centre of the town that now, when he came to his senses and looked round for any sign of what he wanted, he found himself as much lost and confused as if he were in a completely strange country.

The sun had disappeared behind a bank of clouds, the edges of which wore that peculiar crimson zig-zag, so portentous and menacing, such as long ago the hawk-like eyes of Dante must have lit upon, as appropriate to the dusky walls of Dis!

This jagged torch flare in the west gave a yet more threatening and lurid aspect to the narrow poverty-stricken streets, abutting upon blackened sheds and upon desolate open spaces. There were shallow pools of rain water in some of these open spaces, pools whose metallic surface, livid and motionless, reflected this sunset glow.

Across the path of the sunset rose up certain dilapidated groups of melancholy and lamentable dwellings, from which a tall broken chimney here and a projected roof-corner there isolated themselves from their surroundings and stood out, black and ominous, against what looked like a vast bleeding wound in the ribs of the world.

Vaguely moving in the direction of the sunset, and falling back, as he went, so deeply into his wild cosmic speculations that he became oblivious of everything around him, it was not until he was right under the wall of a hideously recognizable building that he grew conscious once again of his human identity.

It was the Bishop's Forley Workhouse which he now was skirting, feeling obscurely aggrieved, even as a philosopher, at the rubbish heaps and smouldering rubble mounds that made of this place a sort of Golgotha. One particular spot struck with a vibration of horror the tough nerves of this lover of Nothingness.

It was a sort of local potter's field or pauper burying-ground, and it was entirely surrounded by iron railings some ten feet high. A fresh instalment of young nettles had come back with the coming of spring, but the old ones were there, too, interspersed with anonymous oblong mounds and with rusty tins and rain-drenched newspapers.

The look of the nettles between those tall iron railings presented itself to the mind of William Hastings in a sudden bleak objective light that was unusual with him. He stood still and stared in front of him.

On one side of the enclosure rose the blank wall of the Workhouse. There was only one iron-barred window in that forlorn expanse, and this window had caught from the afterglow in the western sky a certain greenish phosphorescent tint such as may be observed on the flesh of corpses.

On the other side of the enclosure were the roofless walls of a ruined factory: walls from which emanated that peculiar ghastliness of futility which only the work of men's hands, when it has fallen into desuetude, is able to evoke.

What came over the mind of the heretic priest at that moment was a certain day, years and years ago, when, in the wretched playground of a second-rate preparatory school, he had watched a couple of his companions throwing handfuls of cinders taken from a galvanized iron ash bin at the body of a dead rat. He had been the laughing stock of the school even before that day for his inability to conform to their standards, but after that day his loathing for every aspect of youthful high spirits hardened into a misanthropic mania.

His mind recalled the loveliness of the country through which he had passed on his way to this town. It recalled the elaborate patient defence of a certain "hope against hope" advocated by the man from Germany. And there arose in him a ferocious wish that he could take this abomination of desolation, standing here so real and tangible in the twilight, and plant it down among the gracious meadows and the plausible arguments, so that none should escape its terrible significance.

His thoughts were interrupted by the sound of approaching footsteps and he turned his back to the iron railings and waited, listening.

The steps came drifting along slowly, uneven spasmodic, shuffling, and stumbling. When they came round the corner by the ruined factory he saw that the figure bearing down upon him was that of a woman. She came up to him, muttering as she came, one hand dragging after her a torn umbrella and one clinging tenaciously to a black bag that swung half-open against her side.

When she reached him she stopped short and looked him straight in the face with a long, puzzled, half-understanding stare. Hastings knew her at once. His own mind was so wrought upon by what he had been feeling that it was with something less than a startled shock and yet something more than a casual comprehension that he recognized her and realized what her state implied.

"I've left that place — I'm never going back," she said hurriedly; and then with a pitiable and almost infantile intonation: "You won't tell them, will you? You won't tell any one, will you?"

He sighed and made an awkward gesture as if shrugging his shoulders. The sight of her standing there with that wretched open bag and that trailing umbrella was something he had to deal with, to get into focus, to be drastic and practical about.

Like a slowly retreating wave, leaving only wisps of scattered spindrift behind it, to be blown at random hither and thither, his metaphysical thoughts fell back, fell away, displaying him, as the outside world generally found him, a quiet, self-controlled country priest.

What was this woman doing in the slums of Bishop's Forley? And since he had encountered her there what did it behove him to do? For the flicker of a second his instinct was just to bolt, just to leave her as she was; but a kind of aloof, weary pity, mixed with the mechanical habit of his trade, kept him from such an extreme of callousness.

"I can't take her back to Ashover to-night," he thought. "I suppose I must take her to some lodging house." He stood looking at her, as she let her vacant stare wander away from his face and drift along the wall of the Workhouse and over the Paupers' Cemetery.

"Will she come with me?" he wondered, "and if she does, will she behave properly and stay in the room I find for her? She looks as if she might refuse to remain in any one place to-night." And the man began to recall the various hopeless experiences he had had with women in this state.

While he hesitated and wondered what to do, Netta turned away from him and began to shuffle off down the road. This decided him. He stepped quickly after her and offered her his arm. She leaned upon it at once with a hopeless docility like that of some dazed and bewildered animal that has lost all power of individual decision. She even permitted him to take from her the black bag, which he at once proceeded to shut, and then to retain in the same hand with which he held his stick.

He did not dare reverse the direction she was following, knowing by experience that such interference with a person's obscure desires is apt to cause any sort of outbreak or collapse. As a philosopher he let the whole thing take what course it would. As a clergyman he automatically assumed a kind of professional responsibility that remained on the alert for each new crisis as it might happen to arise.

They were soon outside the limits of the town. The deepening of the twilight about the solitary roadway, bordered by forlorn allotment patches and broken wooden palings, seemed rather to intensify than to diminish the dilemma of the exploited misanthrope.

It was Netta herself, as it happened, who was the first to bring them back to practical urgencies. The effect of whatever it was that she had been drinking began to wear off in the effort of physical movement and in the impact of the chilliness of approaching night.

“Where are we going?” she said suddenly, bringing him to a pause by a field gate through which they could see the dim shapes of a hurdled flock and catch the smell of turnips and damp straw and sheep’s excrement.

“Do ‘ee ask the dear gentleman where he be taking of ‘ee?” came a startling voice out of the hedge.

Netta pressed instinctively closer to the clergyman’s side; for the figure that followed the voice, from what seemed the very depths of a watery ditch, was strange enough to scare the most preoccupied mind.

It was that of a woman so old as to be almost beyond human recognition. Her face was not so much the colour of ashes as the colour of the inside of a white eggshell that has been exposed on the top of a rubbish heap for many weeks. Out of this face looked forth a pair of ghastly sunken eyes, colourless now in the darkness, but possessed of some kind of demonic vitality that made both Hastings and Netta shrink and draw back, as if from the presence of something malignant and dangerous.

“Betsy must have known ‘ee was coming, dearie! What else was I nursing my old bones for on way home from town? ’Twas so when the gentleman from London brought his sweetheart this way fifteen years agone. These things be writ in the stars, sweet lady; they be writ in the stars. What else was it that made old Betsy bide in ditch for best of an hour, and her with her partners waiting for she at home? Well! Well! Ye’ve a-come, ye’ve a-come; and since this be so and partners be waiting, I reckon Betsy’ll be getting home-along before ’tis dark.”

She pulled out of the ditch as she spoke a heavy pedlar’s basket upon which apparently she had been sitting. Netta still clung with obvious dismay to Hastings’s arm and this seemed to arrest the crone’s attention. Her sunken eyes, like those of a hundred-year-old weasel, examined every detail in the appearance of the two intruders. There was nothing in any casual inspection of William Hastings to suggest his profession. He was wearing a dark overcoat and a black cloth cap drawn low over his forehead. He might have been a land agent or a doctor or a well-to-do commercial traveller.

"Be the gentleman nice to 'ee, dearie?" said the woman, moving a little nearer.

Conscious of Netta's discomposure Hastings waved her off.

"Where do you live, granny?" he asked.

The question evidently put a new idea into the old trot's head.

"Me partners be waiting for I," she murmured; and then in a shrill eager voice, "But you mid come and see where old Betsy do bide. You mid come and see! Betsy'll tell the sweet lady's fortune and bring down wagonloads o' luck on both your pretty heads. So come along wi' I, young folk; and me and my partners will show you Cimmery Land in the girt wold crystal stone!"

Hastings and Netta looked at each other in the darkness. He could see she was expecting him to make a curt refusal to this apparition's suggestion. It was on his lips to do so and lead her away, but then he imaged to himself the long dreary road they had followed, the hopelessness of hunting for shelter in a district of the town completely unknown to him, and the possibility that even if he did find a lodging of some sort Netta would not settle down in it. The old woman's words suggested that the escape from their present uncertainty which she offered was not far to seek.

He cast his eyes round them. All was silent. All was obscure and dark. His philosophy was authentic enough to make it easy for him to be led, at a moment like this, by any chance-blown straw. It did not really matter! He was tired and hungry. His companion was near the end of her tether. Why not just resign themselves and see what happened?

He looked at Netta with a little shrug of his shoulders. She, too, was beginning to feel her powers of volition ebbing and sinking.

"Very well, Mother," he said to the old woman. "Let's see where you live."

The issue was more propitious than he could have hoped. Their guide led them forward not more than a few hundred paces, and while they were still, both of them, in a sort of exhausted daze, they found themselves clambering up the steps of a stationary caravan; and in an incredibly short while after that it seemed almost a natural thing in their bewilderment that they should be drinking better tea out of better cups and saucers than any that Hastings, at any rate, was accustomed to enjoy under his Nell's housekeeping!

The interior of the caravan was spotlessly clean and the old woman herself under the yellow lamplight presented a much less sinister appearance than when she had first materialized, like an evil spirit, at the gate by the sheepfold.

There was one moment when Netta began nervously looking round, as she stirred her tea, as if desirous of something else, that might have had an unfortunate issue; for Hastings, catching the look, enquired of their entertainer if she could give the girl a taste of brandy.

"Not if she askit me till Judgment Day!" cried the woman. "I bain't a soft-heart and I bain't one for blunt knives or silver bullets, but I be afeard of liquor as if it were a burning lake of adder's gall."

Netta had coloured with pitiful shamefacedness under the exposure of her companion's remark, but she exchanged a quick glance with him now.

"Why are you afraid of liquor, Granny?" said William Hastings.

“Because of they in there! Because of me partners!” answered the old woman.

Her repeated references to “partners” had already disturbed Netta’s mind and she now looked with much uneasiness at a large Paisley shawl which hung down from an extended rope, concealing a corner of the caravan from view.

No more was said, however, until the gipsy’s guests had finished their meal and the table had been dragged aside against the bed leaving a space in the centre of this curious interior empty and clear.

Then the old woman, with a furtive look at her visitors and a queer sort of inarticulate caressing murmur, such as a person might make to soothe the fears of some species of wild animal, drew aside a piece of the shawl and stood there, holding the fabric in her hand and clicking with her tongue. At first there was no response except a feeble scuffling in the darkness. Then to the horror of Netta and to the amazement of her companion there issued forth, holding each other’s hands, a pair of creatures that it was difficult to regard as the progeny of the human race.

They were of the masculine sex and wore extravagant clothes; the sort of clothes that one sees on the bodies of dwarfs and midgets in circuses, but it was impossible for either Netta or Hastings to look at anything but their faces, which were more horrible to human sight than if they had been creatures of a monstrous nightmare.

It was only after a second or two that the full ghastliness of the deformity that dehumanized these beings entered the consciousness of the two spectators, but when it did so Netta clapped her hands over her own face and sprang to her feet.

“I can’t bear it! I can’t bear it!” she screamed. “Take them away! Let me go from here!”

The old woman placed herself between her “partners” and the terrified girl.

“It’s all right, Missy,” she mumbled, and then making once more the same sub-human caressing sound and the same clicking noise with her tongue, she shuffled the two unfortunates back again into their hiding place and let fall the covering.

It was several minutes before Hastings succeeded in pacifying Netta and persuading her to sit down again; and even after she was seated and was able to smile faintly at her own weakness, several involuntary spasms of shuddering ran through her frame.

“Didn’t I tell ‘ee?” the old woman triumphantly protested, taking her seat on the narrow bed. “Them’s queer to look on and that’s God’s truth, dearie, but if it hadn’t been for the drink, them ‘ud be as natural-like as your own self.”

“Who are they?” enquired Mr. Hastings, looking with a good deal of relief at Netta who had now overcome her shivering fit.

“Me partners,” repeated the hag. “Them as has got old Betsy her poor living, day in, day out, these twenty years. ‘Ee should see ‘un dance, Mister. Them can dance same as real poppets.”

“But who are they?” repeated the misanthrope, displaying more curiosity than Netta had ever seen in him before. She herself had now completely recovered her sober senses, and dimly through a turbid cloud of dream-like images there began to rise before her the vision of what she had run away from and the stark question of what she was to do next.

“Them be the childer of me own daughter, Mister,” replied the woman. “Of me own daughter, Nancy Cooper, what Squire Ashover sweeted. When Squire broke with she, her married a decent market-man, what grew ‘taties and such-like. But ’twas no use. Squire’d learned her to drink terrible; and

’twas along o’ that she runned off wi’ Colpepper Thomas the horse-dealer. He were the drunkenest brute between Exeter and London, and it was my own self who buried her. She left me her two, them as has been my partners for twenty years. She swore they were Squire’s, and we got hundreds of pounds out of ‘ee for they, unbeknown to his lady.”

Old Betsy paused, and Netta, who had been staring at her in consternation ever since she began, now began stammering: “Do you mean that those poor things are — half-brothers — to — to — the present Mr. Ashover?”

“That’s what old Betsy means and not a word less,” chuckled the old woman. “We bain’t gipsies, as folks do say; not a bit o’t. We be a good Frome-side family same as Squire ‘isself. Them Ashovers be Satan’s own tribe, every one of them. There be old man Dick who went and hanged ‘isself so I’ve a-heard. He was Squire John’s brother. And now they say Squire Rook have got some doxy or other in house wi’ ‘ee. He’d look silly, would Squire Rook, if I askit he for a few hundred for me partners here!”

William Hastings was not surprised to notice that Netta avoided meeting his eye. He had summed up her situation pretty shrewdly by this time and was vaguely considering in his own mind what line of action he ought to take. What he did not feel sure of was whether she had left Ashover with its master’s concurrence; or whether, out of sheer weariness of her equivocal position there, she had just drifted off.

Having relieved her feelings by her long confession Betsy Cooper now became taciturn and practical. She indicated that in return for a small sum of money she would retire for the night behind the Paisley shawl, leaving the rest of the interior of her retreat at the disposal of her guests.

“There be a horse-trough under hedge,” she remarked, pointing at the door of the caravan, “if so be that either of ‘ee want to wet your hands afore night.”

The idea of setting out again to look for a more conventional shelter was appalling to Netta. She slipped down the caravan steps upon the roadside for a moment; and did dip her fingers in the receptacle described by the pseudo-gipsy; but the night was so dark and the air so chilly that she was glad enough to return to her seat by the stove. She would have given a great deal just then for a taste of what the old woman had designated as “adder’s gall”; but her whole life seemed so broken up that she was thankful enough to have someone, even if it were only William Hastings, to cling to as a raft in that blind sea.

Hastings also made a temporary exit into the environs of their shelter with a view of collecting his thoughts and deciding upon his course of action. He made up his mind to accept this chance-given hospitality, leaving the problem of what to do next undecided till the morning. Netta had begun to look as if she longed for nothing so much as sleep. Well! Sleep would perhaps clear his own mind and give him the clue to the best course of action.

While the old woman herself was filling up her water jugs at a spring that adjoined the trough, Hastings contemplated his companion, who sat on the bed, her head buried in her hands, and wondered what the circumstances actually were that had led to this flight from peace and comfort.

“Netta!” he began, anxious to get some insight into her thoughts.

“Yes, Mr. Hastings.”

“I don’t want to hurt your feelings or be impertinent, but you must know what I feel, meeting you in a place like this, after knowing you as well as I have.”

She looked at him with her forehead wrinkled in hesitation. Could she make a confidant of such a man? Something in her yearned to unburden itself in a torrent of pitiful words, but something else — a queer mixture of pride and timidity — made her feel as if it would be a sacrilege to speak to any living soul of what had happened. With the recovery of her normal self there rose up before her mind, as the one anchor to which she must cling, through ruin, through disaster, through blind misery, the fixed idea that she had effaced herself by her own will for the sake of her love.

"I don't think you know me very well, Mr. Hastings," she said, smiling.

He was curiously nonplussed by the ease and naturalness of her tone. Seeing her as he had seen her in the street that night he had forgotten how far she had gone in her acceptance of the light social tone of the Ashover circle.

"No — no! Of course not," he muttered hurriedly; but in his heart he thought: "Oh, these women! These women! One minute they fling themselves upon your neck and the next they take this society air and bow you out of the room."

"I mean it's difficult to explain everything to-night," she pleaded, not missing the clouded expression that had come over his face.

He remained silent for a moment; while she looked at him rather wistfully, wishing that he was the kind of person to whom it would be easy to unlock the secrets of her heart. Then he said suddenly: "You won't mind staying the night here with me, will you? I don't see what we can do except leave everything till the morning."

For the moment she misunderstood him and a deep indignant flush mounted into her cheeks, but his matter-of-fact air reassured her and she felt ashamed of herself.

"Don't think I'm ungrateful, Mr. Hastings. You've been most kind to me." And then she added as an afterthought: "But I shall hate taking the only bed in the place!"

Once more Hastings got that funny impression of something put on and artificial in her tone. But he let it pass and the return of Betsy Cooper brought their dialogue to a close.

The arrangements for the night were simple enough after all when they were actually made. Old Betsy retired behind the suspended shawl from the recesses of which emerged the most extraordinary succession of inhuman sounds that Hastings had ever heard in his life.

The clergyman himself, notwithstanding the libidinous leer to which the old woman treated him as she disappeared, a look that was made doubly significant by her manifest recognition of his profession, proceeded to wrap his overcoat round Netta's passive form as she lay on the bed and then, making himself as comfortable as he could in the wicker chair, prepared to spend the night in metaphysical reverie, his pipe lit, and his feet on the stove.

Netta's quiet breathing soon showed she was free from her troubles among the eidolons of sleep, and the man was left to his own thoughts.

Strange enough were his thoughts!

This lonely wheeled hut in the midst of the darkness seemed to him like a silent ship voyaging through the gulfs of immensity. He visualized the unspeakable deformities behind that curtain, sleeping against the lap of that old woman, like Phorkyads against the knees of Medusa; and it seemed to him as if that invisible group were a fitting enough symbol of all that this whole terrestrial ship carried, in its voyage, through the godless and measureless ether.

He recalled what Betsy had said of that "Cimmery Land" to be revealed by these pariahs in a "girt wold crystal stone"; and he smiled grimly to himself as he thought of how all over the county of Dorset men and women were moving in their dreams through just such an impossible country.

And then he thought of his book and of how during these last spring days he had neglected it; seduced a little, he could not tell why, by a certain quality in his wife he had not noticed before.

And then letting himself go upon the full stream of his misanthropic fancies, he imagined that this caravan, in which he sat, warming himself and smoking, contained all that was left alive in the whole stellar system. He imagined it transported through empty space; through space star-less, planet-less, moon-less; a vast “Cimmery Land” crystal, void of everything except the unconscious spirit of darkness.

And in the gray hollowness of that crystal, which he now saw as the very rondure of eternity, he was obscurely conscious of a projection of himself, of William Hastings; not the William Hastings who was on the verge of discovering the secret of universal death; but a William Hastings who was a little unhappy boy at school, persecuted by his companions and hating all the world, but able to think the whole world away and to sink back, back, far back, into the comfortable arms of the infinite Nothingness!

His last thought, before his pipe fell from his mouth and his head sank back in sleep, was that of the two creatures behind the Paisley shawl. He fancied he saw them emerge from their retreat. He fancied he saw them take each other’s hands and dance a strange and monstrous dance, the dance of the Annihilation of All Life; the dance of That which was destined to take the place of Life; when the Caravan of the Universe touched at last the circumference of its voyage!

CHAPTER XV

THE DAY THAT broke over the five human heads — if Betsy Cooper's "partners" could be called human — domiciled in that fantastic shelter was one of those exceptional spring days that seem created by Nature to protect herself against the too exquisite intensity of her own birth pangs.

It was as if a tenuous film, composed of some aërial stuff more delicate than vapour or cloud, had been drawn like a floating veil between earth and sky.

Every palpable object by roadside or meadow seemed to emerge from a soft enveloping mist that was neither white nor yellow nor purple but resembled rather that mother-of-pearl opalescence which shimmers in the hollowness of certain seashells.

The mental atmosphere in the caravan was, however, as so often happens with our persecuted humanity, in direct and discordant opposition to the tender vaporousness of the relaxed weather outside.

It was an atmosphere of cold and obstinate resolution; disenchanted, joyless, weary, but rigid in its purposes, and defiant of all opposition.

The mood that dominated that small group as they talked over their bread and tea was the mood of Netta Page. So hopeless in its inflexible determination was this mood that it seemed to obsess and preoccupy the girl herself to the complete exclusion of her other normal faculties.

She manifested no more than the very faintest shrinking when, in the process of satisfying the needs of the deformed twins, the Paisley curtain was dragged completely aside.

What she had decided upon was to take the midday train to London and just lose herself in the unsearchable depths of that great sea of tossing humanity.

Contrary to Cousin Ann's opinion, she had taken no more money when she left Ashover than the coins in her purse; and the appeal she now made to Hastings was that he should purchase her railway ticket for her before they separated.

Hastings refused for a long time even to consider such a thing. What he felt was that whatever may have been the reasons for her unaccountable flight it was incumbent upon him to plead for second thoughts; incumbent upon him to prevent any irrevocable step till Rook had seen her again. He was anxious to hire a conveyance and just take her back to the village, leaving it to herself and Ashover to settle their difficulties when they met. If he had had the least inkling of the fatal visit to Tollminster, it might have given him a clue as to how to act, but the situation being so dark and obscure, all he could think of was just to retard the rush of events.

It was unfortunately true, and he had had to confess this to the obstinate girl, that the bank he dealt with happened to be in Bishop's Forley, so that if he once agreed to lend her this money all they had to do was to wait till the hour for the building to open. She dragged this out of him by wild talk about pawning her cloak and rings, but he cursed himself for his candour when he found how ardently she jumped at it.

Old Betsy Cooper listened with intense interest to all this talk and hurried off with alacrity to find pencil and paper, when, the discussion concluded at last and Hastings conquered, Netta insisted upon writing a letter for him to take to Rook.

Had the clergyman been more of a man of the world, had he been less hopeless and disenchanted himself, he might have held out against her entreaties. But what could he do? He couldn't put her by force into a cart bound for Ashover; and to leave her to trail round in desperation through the pawn-shops of this forlorn town seemed more heartless than to accede to her wishes.

A vague idea did for a moment cross his mind that he might leave her imprisoned in Betsy Cooper's care while he hurried back himself to Ashover; but even so abstracted a disciple of Paracelsus was too well acquainted with the tenacity of women when under the power of a fixed idea to give more than the attention of a second to such a scheme.

Another line of action that flashed through his mind was to send the old woman off to despatch a messenger or a message to Rook, while he himself held Netta by force just where she was. But Netta's impatience, shut up with him there alone for half a day, in close propinquity to those Deformities, was more than he found himself prepared to face. Had she been a younger girl or a weaker girl, the thing would have been easier. He could have dominated her then by sheer official authority. But how could he dominate a self-possessed, reserved woman, her own mistress, knowing exactly what she wanted, and knowing exactly what she wanted of him?

The end of it was that with Netta's letter to Rook in his pocket and with all the money he had had on him transferred to Betsy's pocket, he started off with the girl through that vaporous spring haze on their way to Stockit's Dorset Bank.

He found no difficulty in drawing out the money from his small savings. The difficulty came when it was a question of giving her something beyond the actual price of the ticket so that she should not find herself penniless when she reached London.

Another woman perhaps would have been unpersuadable over this, too, but as long as the money she made use of was not Rook's money Netta's scruples were feeble and easily over-ridden. He had the satisfaction of knowing, before they separated, that what she finally accepted was enough to keep her alive for at least a month after she reached town, and even longer than that if she were very careful. But if she yielded on this point and seemed quite vague and uncertain as to whether the money were a loan or a gift, she became as rigid as adamant when Hastings asked for some address.

"London is enough address for any one," she said, with that peculiar society tone that Hastings found so difficult to put up with. "You'll hear of me, if I become a celebrated actress," she added more naturally.

Hastings had taken for granted that since he had made it possible for her to escape he was in a position to demand her address, and this point-blank refusal outraged his sense of justice. When he understood that she really intended to remain obdurate, he began to regret that he had not made this stipulation earlier, made it before the means to exact it had passed from his hands.

It was eleven o'clock when this conversation took place, and the London express left at noon. The girl entreated him to say good-bye to her before she actually went to the station. She was nervous, she said, lest someone should recognize him, even if she herself passed unnoticed.

Her umbrella was rolled up neatly now and her black bag looked eminently respectable. No one would have recognized in this quiet dignified woman the forlorn creature of last night's encounter.

They went together into a little dairy shop and had a luncheon of cocoa and halfpenny buns on a marble counter. It was then that, in a final attempt to change her resolution, he began to emphasize the unfairness of the course she was taking and its cruelty to Rook. The girl's reply to this was to break, without a moment's warning, into a passion of silent weeping. Her big tears, for it was a peculiarity of Netta's to shed very large tears when she wept, came literally splashing down upon the marble table and reduced all his arguments to silence. Even at this juncture, however, he was struck by the manner in which women can give way to mental anguish and yet retain their consciousness of practical exigencies. For even in the midst of her tears he saw her glance at the clock and begin feeling in her purse to make sure she had not mislaid the money he had given her.

It came over him like a sudden illumination, the tenacious power of life in human beings, this mysterious life, against which he was waging his insane metaphysical war!

For Netta pulled out of her pocket one of those tiny handkerchiefs, compressed into the shape of a small puff-ball by being clutched in the palm of a feverish hand, such as all the lovers and all the sons of women see so often without seeing, as if they were the handles of doors or the knobs of bedposts, and after rubbing her cheeks and adjusting her hair looked straight into his face with a spontaneous smile.

That smile, more pitiful and more heroic than anything Hastings was destined to witness for many a long day, returned to his mind more than once in the course of the next twenty-four hours. It followed him back to his cottage by the water meadows. It followed him to his supper table. It followed him to his bed. And when he was next seated at his desk, reassembling the dark threads of his devastating philosophy, it troubled his sentences and ruffled his thought in the same way that the discovery of a gleaming bracelet in an ash pit would disturb the occupation of a gatherer-up of cinders.

Though there was so little of a link between them, the mere sense of the fatality and finality of the step she was taking made it difficult for both of them to bring themselves to the irrevocable moment of saying good-bye. He walked with her lingeringly down the narrow street, with its rows of little greengrocers’ and confectioners’ shops, faintly hoping as they went along that even yet, at the last, she might draw back from her desperate plunge.

They passed a vulgar modern hostelry entitled the Antiger Arms just before they reached the final turn to the station; and quite casually and with that peculiar kind of dull, sick, superficial curiosity, such as must often be the mood of condemned criminals as they are led to execution, the girl glanced into the little carriage yard of this place.

Her fingers clutched her companion’s wrist.

“There’s Mr. Twiney!” she whispered.

Hastings did not need to be told. With a rush of fierce relief, which showed how far below his misanthropic indifference his uneasiness at Netta’s departure had gone, he recognized the familiar figure of the most affable of his parishioners.

Netta made now an instinctive movement to escape; but the priest held her arm tightly and pulled her into the yard after him, past the painted shafts and the muddy splash-boards of a long line of farmers’ gigs, till he had attracted Mr. Twiney’s attention.

“Mr. Hastings! Lord ‘a’ mercy on us! And Miss Page! Well, I’ll be blotted out of Book! Ay, won’t Squire be glorified to see ‘ee! A’ve been raging and carrying on like a ferret in a poke. It’s been hither and thither with him and no mistake; no rest, no sleep you might say, since he drove wi’ I to get tied up to’s cousin. Ye’ve a-heard of that goings-on, I reckon? ’Tis all over Dorset. Tied up and married he be, safe and sound; but a’s had no pleasure in’t so far; only hither and thither, as a person might say. But a’ll be a man again now, belike, the poor gentleman, now you’ve a-found this lady, Mister Hastings!”

The clergyman looked at Netta to see if she had caught the drift as unmistakably as he had done himself of Mr. Twiney’s words.

Her head was rigid on her neck, but tilted a little to one side, like a flower-pot on the top of a dahlia stick.

"Mr. Ashover and Lady Ann are married, you say?" She repeated the words as if they were an echo of something else, of some other, quite different words that were resounding in her own ears.

Mr. Twiney looked at them now with an expression of grave concern upon his countenance. It came over him that he had "let his tongue hang out" as his wife Eliza was wont to express it.

"That be just how it be, miss," he answered solemnly. "But don't 'ee take on because of that, lady," he added anxiously. "Gents like our Squire do marry or not marry same as the likes of I do throw peelings to pigs. 'Tis a small matter to they, lady. Why, 'tis nothink at all! They sleeps the same; and they eats the same. 'Tis a kind of whimsy with they, and I'm blind sure Squire'll be as joyed to see 'ee as if he ain't never set eyes on that grand young woman what is now his lawful missus!"

Hastings slipped his hand into his waistcoat pocket and glanced at his watch. It was a quarter to twelve. In fifteen minutes the express would come in. In twenty minutes it would have come and gone.

He found himself looking nervously at the entrance to the yard. At any moment, he thought, Rook might appear on the scene and settle everything!

Netta might have easily noticed both these significant movements on the part of her indiscreet protector; but at the close of Mr. Twiney's speech she had produced a lead pencil and a bit of paper — legacies, both of them, from their night with Betsy — and had begun writing hurriedly and quickly. She held up the paper now toward William Hastings.

"That'll find me in London," she said. "But you must swear to me, by God's truth, that you won't show it to Mr. Ashover. Do you swear that?"

Confused and bewildered by the rapidity of her movement, and only anxious to retain her with him till the train had gone, Hastings gave her his promise.

“I shall Want to know how he gets on,” she murmured hurriedly, repossessing herself of her black bag which he had placed on the ground. And then with her hand on his arm: “But you swear you won’t even tell him you’ve got an address? If you do, if you give him the least hint, remember you’ve broken your word!”

She need not have pressed her point so desperately. In the earlier hours of their contact the priest’s consideration had been mostly for Rook, who, after all, was his patron if not his friend. But, as so often happens in these cases, when one enters an emotional imbroglio from one particular entrance it is likely enough that one comes out of it on quite the opposite side. Hastings had been swept so far into the tide of Netta’s feelings that it was impossible for him to remain the neutral spectator he had been at the beginning. The mere fact that she had taken him into her confidence as she had done drew him to her side and compelled him to divide his loyalty.

As he took from her this little bit of paper he saw a look on her face which made him realize her identity as he had never done in the days at Ashover; realise it in the way human beings so seldom do realize these mysteries as they pass and repass in the casual encounters of life.

At the very moment, however, when this new perception broke the hard crust of the clergyman’s sensibility, Mr. Twiney, who had been staring at the entrance to the yard, suddenly called out in stentorian tones: “There he do go! There he do go!”

Hastings looked up and saw the figure of the Squire of Ashover on the farther side of the road, running as fast as his legs could carry him in the direction opposite from that of the railway. Rook had made a point of being on the platform to see that particular express go; but a policeman in the station, of whom he asked the eternal question he had been asking all day and night, had reported that he had just seen a woman, exactly corresponding to the description given, eating with someone in a little dairy shop in the town. “But whether she’s still there, Mr. Ashover, I can’t inform you, sir.”

If Mr. Hastings had been more of a strategist and less of a philosopher he would have clung to Netta at this crisis and made Mr. Twiney pursue his master. Instead of doing this he completely lost his head, bolted out of the yard into the road, and ran up the street after him, shouting: “Mr. Ashover! Mr. Ashover!” at the top of his voice.

A great brewery van nearly rolled over him as he tried to cross, and he had to draw back from under the very horses’ heads; and when he did get over, Rook was already some twenty yards away, running at a great rate, entirely oblivious of the fact that any one was following.

The policeman’s words had filled the unfortunate man with that sickening desperate hope that trembles, by its own extravagant impetus, on the verge of certainty. As he ran, he already saw Netta in the small shop; saw himself rushing in upon her there; saw himself hugging her savagely to his heart; saw the illuminated look with which she would greet him; felt a flood of sobbing, ecstatic relief, as if a dead body, loved beyond everything in the world, had been restored to life.

It came over him with a blinding rush of tragic certainty that if he let Netta slip out of his hands now at this moment she would disappear completely into the void. To find her, to speak to her, to hold her now was his one chance!

He was actually within a few paces of the very place where the girl and Hastings had had their hurried meal when the latter overtook him.

The priest was too breathless to do more for a moment than stand gasping. As he struggled to speak he could hear in the distance the unmistakable thunderous sound of the Great Western express rolling into the station.

“She’s there!” he gasped. “Rook, she’s there! She’s got her ticket for London!”

The unhappy victim of the hunting dogs of remorse did not delay a minute. Like a leaf in the wind he turned his face; and breathing hard as an animal that reverses his track, he rushed off the way he had come, scattering the astonished pedestrians and making the drivers of market carts and trade wagons turn round to stare at him.

It had not been wasted, even on the indurated skull and irresponsive nerves of Mr. Twiney, that as the man ran so desperately north-northeast, the woman hurried with equal precipitation south-southwest.

He returned to the stable, and in order to be what the poet calls utrumque paratus (prepared for either event), he began harnessing his long-necked mare, expressing, as he did so, his own commentary upon these events into her cavernous ear.

“He’ve a-run from train and she’ve a-run to train! That’s how things do go, Liza, me beauty. ’Tis a pity for man and beast, me lass, that ’tis so, but so ’tis and us has best reckon on’t. He that way, she this way! ’Tis only to be trusted, me little hoss, that since World be round and Christmas be coming, this poor sorrowing gent and his sweetheart’ll cuddle down yet, comfortable and sly, spite of all accidents.”

Philosophers may have had, ere now, sufficient detachment from human feelings to contemplate the cruel tricks of time from the point of view of eternity; but though William Hastings, as he followed his desperate patron at a slower pace, endeavoured to regard these things with ironic equanimity he found himself listening with the most agitated attention to the distant puffing of the great green-painted engine as it waited in the station.

As for Rook, driven, as it might seem, by the Eumenides themselves, he had no strength left for any thought in his head except to reach that platform before the train moved out. On this return run he no longer visualized his encounter with Netta. His heart seemed on the point of bursting in his body, as he dashed along, keeping to the roadway in spite of the traffic, so as to be less impeded.

He did suffer from a vague impression as he ran that if he only could find breath in him to shout her name the girl would be bound to hear him and unfasten her carriage door, even if the train were moving. But, as it happens in dreams, his voice seemed to die away, ineffectually, in his throat. The nearer he came to the station the more clearly he could hear the heavy snorting of the locomotive, waiting like a great leashed hound to rush forth again upon its way.

He ran faster yet, and still faster, a strange enough figure in his long flapping ulster, his arms bent at the elbow, his fingers digging into the palms of his hands. Every second that passed seemed to him like something more living and terrible than just mere time; seemed to him like the pulse beat of a long-drawn-out gigantic arm — the invisible arm of his desire — the fingers of which were already clutching the door handle of Netta’s compartment, at which the railway guard was standing now with his whistle at his lips.

The whole world was reduced to a very simple equation at that moment, to the coming together for ever, or to the rending apart for ever, of Netta Page and Rook Ashover. Nothing existed for him, as his breath came in gasps, but the formless outline of an unspoken cry, a cry that implied words and yet was never destined to be uttered in words; the cry, “Netta, stop! Netta, stop! Netta, it’s all right!”

He actually heard the guard’s whistle now and the louder responding whistle of the engine. He rushed blindly forward. He did not realize that he was shouting wildly as he ran. Afraid that he would not have time to force his way through the doors and the crowds of the waiting room, by an infernal piece of misjudgment, one of those fatal blunders that seem like the very hoof of a demon outstretched to trip a man up, he veered aside when he heard the train moving, and rushing round the corner of the building, saw himself jumping on to the platform of one of the last carriages, perhaps of the guard’s van itself! God! There were high iron gates at this spot; gates to climb over which he would have had to be a veritable acrobat.

It was over. It was all over. He was too late.

He shook the iron bars of the gates with his hands, and out of his mouth came a hoarse frustrated howl.

The train was moving too fast now and his eyes were too blinded to see her face at the window; but she saw him, and a kind-hearted commercial traveller in the seat opposite her was horrified to see a quiet-looking, white-faced woman leap up and begin fumbling with the handle of the door. “Can’t get out now, missy!” the worthy man protested; pulling her back with gentle firmness into her seat.

When William Hastings arrived at the station he was more disturbed than surprised to observe a small crowd of porters and cab drivers collected round the gates to the left of the waiting room. At his appearance on the scene they thinned themselves out and he was aware of the figure of Rook Ashover, seated on the ground with his back to some iron railings, gasping for breath and crying like an infant.

"Ashover! Rook Ashover!" murmured the clergyman, recovering his own breath in long deep sighs. "You'll see her again, Ashover! You can find her again!"

As he uttered the words he felt the silly futility of them, and the two pencil scrawls he had in his pocket, the letter and the address, seemed to possess pulses of their own which beat in unison with the beating of his heart.

He got Rook on his feet at last. The wretched man insisted upon going into the station and making enquiries about the next train to London. There was no train at all, it appeared, until six o'clock that night and that was a slow stopping train that did not reach town till after midnight.

Even Rook, distraught as he was, realized the folly of pursuing his friend any farther that day.

It was, however, only by degrees, only after they had walked slowly back to the Antiger Arms together, that the full stark hopelessness of the situation dawned upon the distracted man's mind. London! How could he possibly find her in London, whatever day he went, or whatever train he took?

While they were waiting in the hotel yard for Mr. Twiney, who had retired to the tap room, Hastings handed over to Rook the letter which Netta had given him. Rook opened this as he stood there and read it leaning against the wheel of the gig; while Hastings went discreetly off to call the driver.

The letter ran as follows:

DEAREST ROOK:

I beg you not to think hard of me because of the drink. I did it because I had to do it. Don't think hard of me, Rook, my dear, dear love. I did it for the best, but I can't stand it any longer. Don't worry about me. I shall be all right. Good-bye, dearest Rook. There's nothing for you to feel sorry about….

NETTA.

With his eyes full of tears and his mouth drooping at the corners, in that grotesque twitching way in which a proud man struggles against breaking down, Rook folded up this letter and hid it carefully in his pocket.

He had recovered a good deal of his normal equanimity by the time Hastings brought Mr. Twiney back from the tap room; and that excellent man remarked to them both as they drove off, sitting side by side: "'Tis a wonder, gentlemen, 'tis a Bible wonder, how what do seem worse to we than dirty weather by thik old Gorm signpost do in the latter end when us turns about, seem Heaven's own blessings! 'Tis a wonder that so't should be. But so 'tis; and us has got to reckon wi't."

The long drive back to Ashover was broken by only one brief stop, when both Mr. Twiney and Hastings insisted upon Rook's drinking a glass of beer and eating a bit of cheese. The sky remained overcast all the way by that same strange filmy veil that Hastings had noted when he first awoke in the caravan.

They reached Ashover by the middle of the afternoon; but when they approached the house Rook commanded Mr. TWiney to stop the gig.

"Hastings!" he said, "would you do a good turn for me?"

The priest, who had been throughout their drive singularly divided in his mind between his loyalty to Netta and his obvious duty to Rook, expressed himself ready to do anything.

"Get out here, then, would you? And run into the house and ask for Lady Ann? You might tell her that I've driven on to the village with Mr. Twiney and that I rather think I shall stay the night with Lexie. Will you tell her that? Oh, and you might tell her, too" — he hesitated, conscious of the alert interest of Mr. Twiney— “you might tell her — well! — everything that’s happened; just as it did happen! Will you do that for me?” And he helped the clergyman to descend from the cart, and then, calling upon the driver to drive on, got up again into his place.

CHAPTER XVI

IT WAS THE third day of June, and Pandie, having "done" the occupied chambers of Ashover House, was busy cleaning the windows and brushing the floors of the two small rooms which opened upon the landing opposite the large front bedrooms.

The bedroom above the dining room looking out upon the linden tree was still used by Rook. Netta's bed was covered by the same counterpane. Netta's clothes still hung in the mahogany cupboard. Netta's modest cold-cream pots and bottles of eau de Cologne still stood on the old-fashioned washstand.

Lady Ann, too, now Lady Ann Ashover, had not moved out of the great "spare room" above the drawing room, which had been allotted to her from the moment she first arrived.

It had been a shock to Rook's mother and something approaching a scandal to the inhabitants of the kitchen when it became evident that the master and mistress of the house aid not intend to share the same room. Martha spoke of it with hushed voice and gloomy solemnity to Pod, the evangelical sexton.

"It be contrary to nature, that's what I do say, Mr. Pod. Contrary to nature and contrary to the blessed Scriptures."

The sexton had no quarrel with this sentiment. Indeed he was prepared to go further than his friend in his reprobation of "these heathen ways what the gentry do pick up in their travels." He put the case to Mrs. Vabbin with convincing logic. "If the holy Lord had meant us to sleep single He would never have put it into our brains to hammer up these here double beds.

Double beds means sleeping double. Any turnip can see that. And who would have thought of girt double beds if the Lord hadn't whispered into the patriarchs' ears them holy texts about the Woman being subject to the Man?"

Mrs. Vabbin's enormous countenance, with its little nose, little mouth, and little eyes, shone with a kind of interior lustre as she imbibed these oracles. "Pod be nothink to look at," she remarked to Pandie afterward, "but when he opens his mouth to speak, the Holy Spirit do fly out'n and make a person's heart grow weak, same as they girt drums down at Patchery Fair."

As April passed into May and May began to take upon itself the appearance of a summer month, Mrs. Ashover's concern over this unnatural behaviour of the Squire and his bride began to quiet down. As far as she could see, the two treated each other just exactly as they had done before; and the knowledge communicated to her by Ann — for the niece concealed nothing from her aunt — of the child the girl expected before that autumn was over, was so unspeakably gratifying that everything else sank into insignificance in comparison.

It was an infinite relief to her, too, that not for one second would Lady Ann consider the idea of her leaving Ashover. It was also a pleasant surprise to find that in the thousand and one details of managing the establishment, details passionately precious to the old lady's heart, she was not going to be interfered with in any way by her daughter-in-law.

The return upon the scene, gradual but sure, of the "county families" of the neighbourhood, was also a source of intense and secret satisfaction to the little woman. Lady Ann seemed ready to leave this aspect of her new life as completely as she had left the domestic side of things, entirely to her aunt. Mrs. Ashover found it difficult to persuade either Rook or her to take the least interest in the little society visits that began steadily increasing in number as it became more and more certain that that woman was gone for good.

For the aunt it was a new light on her niece's character to find that Lady Ann despised the "county families" and detested every sort of "society," being quite content to spend her days in long rambling walks alone with Rook's dog, or in just sitting on the seat under the linden listening to the thrushes. It was almost as if Netta's mania for unsocial solitude had been bequeathed to her successor; but the happy old lady was too preoccupied with the success of her grand scheme to bother her head very much over this new phase or to worry herself as to what it indicated regarding the relations between husband and wife.

The third day of June was Mrs. Ashover's birthday; and now, as Pandie went in and out of the two little rooms she was attending to, rooms kept scrupulously clean in a sort of contented emptiness, as if waiting to be turned into a day nursery and night nursery when the autumn came, it occurred to her mind that it was time to remove the old lady's breakfast things and receive her orders for the day.

Through the open windows and the open doors of that panelled landing the warm sunshine was pouring into the old house bringing with it the pleasant sound of the mowing machine and the sweet smell of cut grass.

Pandie hummed to herself as she went up the short flight of polished steps that led into the "new wing," as it was called, at the end of which, looking out upon the orchard and upon the yellow gorse and green bracken of Battlefield, was her own bedroom and that of her friend Martha.

Taking off her rough apron and tidying herself before the glass, preparatory to ascending to the third floor which was almost entirely taken up by Mrs. Ashover's long, low-ceilinged boudoir, the red-haired servant changed her humming into the erratic strain of an ancient Somersetshire song, such as in all probability had never been heard before in that Fromeside manor.

She moved to her open window, as she sang, tying up the strings of a spotlessly clean apron and rolling down her sleeves. Leaning out of the window she soon met the gaze of two elderly men resting at that moment in leisurely contentment from the not very arduous task of mowing the grass paths of the kitchen garden. It was the privilege of Mr. Twiney to steer the lawnmower, while Mr. Pod, acting the part of a human horse, marched in front, pulling the machine along by the aid of two slender cords.

Mr. Pod was now with the utmost deliberation emptying the box of the lawnmower into a wheelbarrow, which was already half full of velvet-soft dark-green grass.

Mr. Twiney was lighting his pipe. Hie two old cronies standing there in the early summer sunshine between the rows of immature green peas and immature sweet peas, between a border of yellow pansies and a hedge of pink and white peonies, gave an added sweetness to that ribald Sedgemoor song, as the hard-worked damsel trilled the lines like a great red-poll'd bird.

Both of the elderly men were arrested by her voice; but Mr. Pod only gave her a cursory glance and turned to his wheelbarrow. Mr. Twiney, however, jerked his thumb in the direction of his companion, as much as to say, "Don't 'ee mind his being there, me pretty maid; I be a-listening to 'ee!" and then made a deliberately gallant gesture, beckoning the wench to come down and speak to him.

Pandie did not hesitate. With one glance at the looking glass on the chest of drawers she ran down the stairs, slipped through the scullery unnoticed by Martha, and emerged from the back door.

Mr. Twiney, moving leisurely toward her in his shirt sleeves, had the air of one whose professional duty required him at that juncture to survey with care certain gooseberry bushes and certain rhubarb stalks and to pick off the blighted leaves of particular standard roses whose buds were still green.

Arriving at length, after many pauses, at a point opposite to the kitchen door he proceeded to greet the red-haired maiden with a gesture of dignified surprise; and, like a man interrupted in the preoccupation of a lifetime, began to unbend the austerity of his visage into a grave but indulgent urbanity.

"A fine morning, Pandie, me girl!" he exclaimed. "'Tis good growing weather for both beasties and roots. Them peas be wonderful well come on, and I've never seed they onions so high. 'Tis the same with me old mare down in village. She do put her old head out of winder and hollers to everythink what traipses along. 'Tis real summer be come this season, same as it used to be when us were childer. Old Pod he be got his bit of mead, down by river, most ready for cutting; only it be so full of them sour weeds that 'twon't make good hay. Now there's me own little patch up by churchyard, maidie! Pod had dunged his mead with nothink but cow-dung, while all them dead folk, right down from King Charley's time, do make hay for I and me old mare!"

Pandie nodded her head sympathetically.

"You was always a lucky man, Mr. Twiney," she remarked. "Though they do say that grass what's nourished by corpses makes milk bad for butter. But maybe horses be different; though me old father used to say that horses be more human than we be. They be sensitive beasts, I reckon. But maybe your horse takes kind of natural to churchyard grass, Mr. Twiney?"

"Maybe she do. Maybe she don't," replied the gardener. "There be more sextons in my family, come to think of it, than there be in Pod's; though he did cut me out with the parson that is. Not that I grudge it to the poor man.

If it weren’t for what he gets for thik little job ’twould be workhouse for ‘ee; and all the village do know it.”

The two interlocutors stared gravely at each other, while over them both floated, on waves of aromatic sunshine, the scent of currant bushes and gooseberry bushes, the scent of heavy peony blooms, of the sun-warmed leaves of budding briar-roses and of the barrowful of cut grass.

Pandie pondered in her heart for some piece of news that would enhance her value in the eyes of her friend. She recalled the occasion when by a heaven-sent piece of luck Lady Anil had been so nervous and “beyond herself” that she had confided in the servant that this was the beginning of her fifth month of pregnancy.

How dearly would she have loved to reveal this fact to Mr. Twiney!

Still more powerfully was she tempted to speak of a matter that she and Martha Vabbin had been discussing for the last three months: the extraordinary change that had taken place in Lady Ann’s own habits and ways; her long preoccupied silences under the linden, when she neither sewed nor read; her long hours of heavy thought at her own window, her long lonely walks with the dog.

But the most agitating urge of all, an urge that only the strongest inbred loyalty could have resisted, was the desire to make a confidant of Mr. Twiney concerning the two separate bedrooms and concerning certain inexplicable scenes that had taken place between the Squire and his new lady, scenes of which she had not even dared to speak to Mrs. Vabbin herself!

Suddenly the right inspiration came to her.

“’Tis Missus’s birthday to-day — the old Missus’s, I mean. And she’ve a-got in her head to do what she’ve a-always done on her birthdays; and that’s to picnic out in Antiger High Mead. I’m a-going up now to her room to take her orders for what Martha have to pack in hampers; and pretty soon they'll be sending for thee own self about driving of them out there."

Pandie's face got as red as her hair as she made this announcement. She looked at the gardener with austere gravity, as much as to say: "You see before you the possessor and revealer of all hidden things."

But Mr. Twiney's composure was unshaken. "I've a-known all that these last two days, maidie," he replied, "and I've got somethink to tell 'ee what'll make 'ee stare like an owl to hear of! I heard tell of it from our policeman when he was last round here. It seems that that old bitch-wife Betsy Cooper, what folks call a gippoo though she be no more a gippoo than I be, have moved her cart up from Bishop's Forley to thik crossroad where Gorm Lane do meet Antiger Lane. 'Tis where the old bitch can snare all the rabbits she've a mind to and where there be a fresh-water spring. The place have naught to do with our Squire. All that belongs to he over thik way is that Antiger High Mead where I be to drive the Missus."

Pandie's face, which had been growing more and more downcast under this recital, which transferred the glory of knowledge from herself to Mr. Twiney, now brightened again.

"There be nothink in the move of a gippoo's cart to make an ado over," she murmured complacently.

"That'll be all thee do know on't," retorted the gardener. "It'll open your eyes a bit wider, me maidie, when I tell 'ee that Squire have gone and gived old Betsy two ten-pound notes for to clear out of thik lane; while she be biding where she be to get more from 'un! They say them innocents she do take money for be Squire John's by-throws; seeing as how he was so smitten wi' Nancy, what was their mother."

Pandie did indeed open her eyes at this. She even became a little pale. She had more than once heard this legend about Nancy Cooper, but the idea of her master being actually compelled to hand money over to Nancy's mother shocked and startled her feudal pride.

She opened her mouth to utter an indignant protest, when the voice of Martha from the scullery behind her put an abrupt end to the colloquy.

"Pandie, where be 'ee? Missus be ringing for you, Pandie!" And then in a tone intended to be heard across the currant bushes as far as Mr. Pod's wheelbarrow: "What be come to 'ee, lass, that you go interrupting a man's work like that? Come into house, lazy-bones! Come into house!"

While the family's dependents were thus discussing affairs in the kitchen garden the new lady of the house was displaying signs of unusual agitation as she sat in her favourite place under the lime tree. The tree above her was in full blossom and the air hummed and murmured with the innumerable bees that hovered about it. All the sweetness of the early summer flowed in upon her senses, one little thing and then another bringing its own especial evocation of delicate memory. The sudden sound, and equally sudden cessation of sound, as a blue-bottle fly droned past her; the rich lazy movements of two tortoise-shell butterflies, the swifter flight of a great yellow brimstone butterfly; the gleam of the pearl-white blossoms of an elder bush in the shrubbery, held up like a cluster of filigreed chalices to catch the distilled quintessence of that golden morning; all these things and something beyond them all, something which might have been defined as the accumulated anonymous fragrance of all those flowers of the field that lack any definite scent and yet from their very number must fling some sort of essence of themselves upon the air, such as buttercups and moon daisies, flowed in upon the mind of Cousin Ann and blended themselves with her troubled thoughts.

Every now and then she would cast a nervous glance at the three windows of Mrs. Ashover's boudoir; windows which projected from the eaves of the house, above the level of her own and her husband's more spacious bedrooms. She seemed to shrink from the idea that the old lady was aware of the agitated state of her mind, to shrink from the thought of that erect little figure watching her inquisitively, anxiously, from one of those three windows!

She kept rising from her seat under the tree and making little impatient excursions, first to one flower bed and then to another, as if to assure herself that the green stalks of this or that plant of the later summer had not blossomed into sudden miraculous bloom. What a rush of turbulent thoughts whirled that morning through Lady Ann's brain! What troubled her most through it all was the agitating change that seemed to have taken place in her own nature. She had always regarded herself as being "in love" with her cousin; but, as she looked back on those early days of her association with him, the feelings she had then, compared with what she suffered from now, seemed a mere girlish fancy.

She would have supposed, from her own abrupt and straight-cut psychological insight, that the condition of being pregnant would have completely saved her from this miserable infatuation. She would have predicted, had the case been that of another woman, that the new interest, the looking forward to a new life, would have detached her from the child's father, numbed her emotional nerves, lulled her into a kind of lethargic trance and nourished her upon vague, sweet, half-animal dreams.

Nothing of the kind! She found herself wretchedly and shamefully in love with her husband, torn by the most humiliating of all forms of jealousy, jealousy for a rival whose personality she despised and whose existence had melted into air and become nothing.

She was jealous of a ghost, of a shadow, of a memory, of an unreal image conceived by pity and begotten by insane remorse.

Every incident in her new life with Rook hurt her to the inmost nerve of her. personal pride. It was humiliating that he refused to share her room. It was gall and wormwood to her to see him day by day so submerged by his own fixed idea that he went to and fro like a man in a trance, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, noticing nothing; taking not the least interest in any of her projects, taking no interest at all in this child of theirs which was now so emphatically beginning to manifest its presence. She had broken down under the strain once or twice; and, as Pandie alone in that household knew, there had been some terrible and lacerating scenes between them.

But on the whole she had just suffered in silence; and she was at least thankful that the sagacious old mother remained, as far as she was able to detect, completely oblivious of what was going on.

What was preying on her nerves at that particular moment was not, as it happened, connected with Netta at all. It was connected with Nell. Rook that morning had carelessly announced that he had been invited to lunch at Toll-Pike Cottage. Well! There was nothing but what was perfectly natural in that! It was only by pure accident that she had that very morning, about half an hour ago, caught sight of William Hastings, mounted on his bicycle, riding at a steady speed in the direction of Bishop’s Forley.

He might of course have been on his way to visit some outlying districts of their own estate. He might easily have been running over to Antiger Lane to call upon Mrs. Drool, to buy honey or eggs from her, or because Binnory had got into some trouble. At the thought of Binnory she instinctively shuddered, remembering the experiences of her wedding day. Her nerves were all jangled that fine June morning. The chances were surely all against the man’s having set out on so long a ride.

And yet were they?

It was unusual for Hastings to go visiting in the morning. He generally wrote in the morning and went his rounds in the afternoon. Besides, Ann knew that he had a philosophical colleague in that squalid town.

She wished she could remember what the reply had been to Mrs. Ashover's invitation, asking the vicar and his wife to picnic with them in Antiger High Mead. Had Nell Hastings accepted for them both or only for herself?

The abnormal condition of Ann's nerves was proved by the fact that she actually got up now with the intention of going straight to Mrs. Ashover's room to satisfy her mind on this point; and then, no sooner had she reached the front door than she felt so invincible a repugnance at the thought of encountering the old lady that she reversed her steps and came hurriedly back to the shelter of the lime tree.

She had "The Bride of Lammermoor" with her in the old Ballantyne edition; but in vain she tried to forget the sting of her trouble in following the proud griefs of the unhappy Ravenswood! All she could do was to gaze absentmindedly on those quaint illustrations; too abstracted even to brush away the little ivory-coloured yellow-stamened blossoms that kept falling on the open pages.

The uncertainty of it all was the thing that seemed to hurt her most. She visualized the thin harassed face of Rook, as she had seen it that morning, as he perfunctorily kissed her cheek, preparatory to setting out on some too-long-delayed piece of business connected with his property. He had been growing steadily thinner, steadily sadder and quieter, ever since his marriage. He was invariably kind and considerate to her. The only violent scenes they had were scenes deliberately and wantonly brought on by herself in the irritation of her nerves.

Over and over again she had told herself to wait till the birth of her child. Then, surely, if it were a son — and she had made up her mind that it would be a son — Rook's interest in her, in life, in everything would come back!

All would be well if only this poisonous stabbing of jealousy would cease.

What a thing jealousy was!

It was like an actual sharp thorn pressing into her flesh; a thorn through which a little rankling stream of fermenting poison ran like a corrosive acid through her secretest veins.

Cousin Ann smiled bitterly and miserably with her beautiful full lips. How she would have mocked at herself half a year ago! How she would have sworn that such emotion as this was nothing but a silly female affectation! It was like a definite material malady. She could almost localize it; as if it were a malignant growth within her physical frame, counteracting with its persistent throb the sweet lethargy of pregnancy.

The thing was made worse for her — though she herself was unconscious of this — by the innate primitiveness of her nature. With all her social breeding Ann Gore was essentially an unsophisticated, natural, savagely simple creature of earth. Rook's ingrained cerebralism, those dehumanized ponderings upon life, into which he used to fall, even in the early days of their companionship, had never so much as penetrated the outer surface of her smooth feline skin.

But it was this uncertainty that maddened her most!

Was Rook unfaithful to her with this funny-looking little clergyman's wife, as well as with the ghost, the phantasm, the wraith of Netta?

She had felt so confident that if once she got hold of him, in complete intimacy, the spirit of her youth, her vitality, her strength would soon put an end to these aimless philanderings!

But there had been no intimacy! The ghost of Netta stood unappeased upon their bridal threshold holding them apart. And kept like this at a distance from him, all that was most formidable in her, the beauty and power of her body, the pathos of her pregnancy, the resilience of her spirit, remained unused, unexerted, disallowed.

She was like a strong and beautiful plant cut off from water and sunshine by some invisible yet insurmountable barrier.

The uncertainty, the miserable uncertainty! It was becoming more than she could bear. With a resolute movement, more obstinate than any she had yet made, she rose now from that sun-warmed seat, adjusted her summer hat, pulled her embroidered smock smoothly down over her rounded hips, picked up her long-handled parasol, and started off toward the entrance of the garden.

She emerged into the road and, with slow deliberate steps, without hurry or hesitation, proceeded to cross the bridge.

All that enchanted summer landscape quivered and vibrated around her in an air that was almost windless. The tall grasses of the ditches and hedges seemed like undulating ripples in a vast umbrageous sea, of which the deep-grassed hayfields, full of buttercups and red-stalked sorrel and white daisies, were the untraversed ocean floor, and the hills and copses and orchards the spray-flecked waves!

The Frome itself flowed high and strong that day between its banks, where tarnished marigold stalks and freshly sprouting rushes gave to the muddy roots of willow and alder the dignity of microscopic African swamps, with newts for alligators and tiny green frogs for hippopotami.

The fecundity of summer filled every little hollow and crevice in those banks with infinitesimal growths, nameless except to botanists, many of them the embryonic sproutings of plants destined to wait a couple of months, or even longer, for their time of flowering.

Crossing the bridge and following the familiar road, now white and dusty between its uncut grass borders, Lady Ann walked forward with a firmer, surer pace. She used her red parasol as a walking stick. Her summer hat, with a cluster of tulips beneath its wide brim, was held high and straight on her proud young head. Her mind, as she walked, was not oblivious of the singing of at least three invisible skylarks, out of a sky as blue as a Della Robbia plaque; and in the vigour of her youth, even against her conscious mood, her senses began to respond to the jocund pulse beat of a prodigal, lavish, irrepressible countryside!

It was about half-past twelve when she arrived at the wooden bridge near the sheep-washing pool which marked the halfway point between Ashover Church and Ashover village. Just beyond this bridge, on the side of the road opposite to the water meadows, there was a little field path which mounted slowly, through a couple of green barley fields, to the rough open country below the northern extremity of Heron’s Ridge.

Cousin Ann climbed over the stile leading to this path and began slowly ascending the incline between the divided masses of immature green stalks. Skylarks trilled and trilled above her head, one song blending with another song in that peculiar timeless ecstasy which seems to have more in common with the scarlets and blues of some great Venetian picture than with any musical instrument.

She had crossed the first barley field and had reached a thickset hedge which was now a mass of new leafage mingled with a weight of dim, half-faded hawthorn blossoms. She turned to her right at this point and moving slowly through the feathery grasses between the green barley and the hedgerow advanced to a spot on that sloping hill from which she could look straight down to the back entrance to Toll-Pike Cottage.

All the wide stretch of the Frome valley lay before her, green and lovely in the quivering translucent noon heat of that summer day. Out of the level plain of the brook meadows the familiar outlines of the church and its gravestones stood like a reef of gray rocks in a green halcyon sea.

Between the excited woman and the mysterious power emanating from the mortality of that place there was a formidable and strange correspondence — a correspondence that did not rise to the level of the girl's mental consciousness, but affected her, none the less, and strengthened, so to speak, the despotism and magnetism of her will. Lady Ann had all the Ashover dead behind her; supporting her, sustaining her, protecting her; as if she were a faithful seaworthy ship into whose care they had entrusted their last forlorn hope.

The kitchen door of Toll-Pike Cottage stood wide open and from where she stood she fancied she could detect the form of Nell's enormous tabby cat asleep on the sun-warmed threshold.

She hesitated a little now; not for any emotional reason, but because her instinct as a landowner's daughter reluctED at the notion of crossing a field of corn that was already ankle-high.

She moved on a few hundred yards, searching for the faintest vestige of a path. The brown mould as she continued to thrust her parasol between those spears of diaphanous green was not yet so devoid of moisture as not to emit its own peculiar smell — the smell of the actual flesh of the earth — which mingled so naturally with the sharp sour scent of the growing stalks. In spite of the obstinate anger in her heart which was driving her forward, her whole physical being found itself responding to that immemorial contact, the contact of a woman who has conceived, with that which conceives and brings forth all life.

Suddenly her spirits rose in triumph. There was a little path!

From a gap in the hedge, evidently an ancient secretive way, for the sticks that had been twisted across it had burst into leaf, right down to Nell's very door, ran a narrow ribbon of brown soil dividing the expanse of barley.

Lady Ann hurried down this path, her skirts swishing against the growing corn, her parasol grasped tightly in her hand. The back door of the house was wide open and Nell's great cat, the Marquis of Carabas, was fast asleep on the threshold. Cousin Ann with noiseless fingers unhooked a little wire gate which was there, and stepping over the ridges of William Hastings's potatoes, approached the door.

The thrill of action, of any kind of action, had so quickened the pulses of her energetic spirit that, strange though it may sound, she felt happier at that moment than she had actually felt since she came back from Tollminster on her wedding night. A situation that would have appalled a different type of woman seemed to rouse some ancestral fighting spirit in Cousin Ann; seemed, in fact, to assuage, with a sort of sporting or hunting recklessness, the lodged and rooted trouble within her….

What was that?

She paused, listening, one hand pressed against the lintel of the door; the other stroking the Marquis with her parasol, as he rubbed his back against her ankles.

From within the little front dining room came the sound of the arranging of knives and forks, of plates and glasses; a sound which conveyed instantaneously to Cousin Ann's mind the fact that whoever they might be who were to partake of that meal, the meal itself was not ready.

And then, all suddenly, she heard Nell begin to sing as she put the finishing touches to her luncheon table. She sang the famous song of the exiled courtier in “As You Like It”:

Who doth ambition shun
And loves to live i’ the sun,
Seeking the food he eats,
And pleased with what he gets,
Come hither, come hither, come hither
Here shall he see
No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

The girl had no power of voice and no very good ear. She sang in a careless and irresponsible way, but the jealous heart of the listener did not fail to catch the strain of thrilling feminine happiness that underlay the notes of the old song.

“She is alone and she is expecting Rook,” thought Lady Ann; and a sudden spasm of fierce anger took possession of her; an anger that caused the red parasol to tremble in her clutch as if it had been a deadly weapon.

Then in a flash it came over her what to do. In a far better trained and far richer voice than Nell’s she burst out into the melancholy Jaques’s bitter antiphony:

If it do come to pass
That any man turn ass,
Leaving his wealth and ease
A stubborn will to please,
Ducdame, ducdame, ducdame!
Here shall he see
Gross fools …

She did not get any further; for Nell, who had stood for a minute with a plate of almonds and raisins in her hand, frozen helpless with panic, now came hurrying down the passage, her cheeks white, her mouth grotesquely open.

"Lady Ann! How you did startle me! Is anything the matter?"

Cousin Ann made no movement to meet her, no movement to cross tibe threshold. She waited till the girl came quite close.

In one second Cousin Ann became as calm and collected as if the two of them were casually meeting at a garden party at Antiger House.

"I'd no idea you had a voice, Nell," she said. "We must have you bring your songs up to the house one of these nights."

Nell bit her lip. The tone of that "we must have you" was like the tone Lady Ann would have used to some pretty little girl in the village; to some child of Martin Pod or Mr. Twiney.

"Won't you come in?" The words were uttered mechanically. She had meant to say something altogether different.

"Oh, no, no! On no account!" Cousin Ann responded. "I'm lunching at home. It was so nice of you to ask Rook to join you and your husband. By the way, could I see Mr. Hastings? I've got a message for him from my aunt."

Nell's mouth opened and shut and her eyes looked as frightened as a hedge sparrow's when it hears the hunting call of the shrike.

"William isn't here," she murmured faintly. "He was suddenly called away and I thought — I thought it would be silly not to enjoy the pleasure of such an important guest. If I had had any one to send, I would have begged you to come, too; but I expect even then it would have been too hurried a notice. But now you are here, I do hope you will stay? And let me have the pleasure of getting a meal for you both?"

“My husband has not come yet, then?” enquired Lady Ann. Nell shook her head. “Well. Perhaps I will rest a little then, if I may?” And taking the other’s consent for granted, and carrying it off with so natural an air that it was impossible for Nell to resist her, she moved hurriedly down the passage and went straight into the dining room.

There lay, betrayed and revealed to those jealous eyes, a pathetic little love feast prepared by the young girl for the man she idealized.

The two places had been laid opposite each other in the curve of the bow window. A great bowl of blue violas, light and delicate as butterflies’ wings, more like wild flowers than garden flowers, stood in the middle of the table. At the side of one of the plates, evidently the one to be used by Rook, lay three pansies, a purple one, a yellow one, and a black one.

Lady Ann surveyed this spectacle with a sudden indrawing of her breath. So this was the way the sad, remorseful, preoccupied Rook was taking his diversion. And he had lied to her, with the worst kind of lie, the treacherous half-lie of a coward. He had duped her, under the guise of conscience-stricken remorse. What hypocrisy, what calculated cold-blooded hypocrisy. And she, too, in the state in which she was.

Her indignation blotted Nell completely out of the picture. Her one desire now was to meet Rook face to face.

“How prettily you have set the table,” she said with a smile. “I’m sure Mr. Ashover will be delighted when he sees what a charming welcome is awaiting him. Well, I must be off.”

She moved back to the kitchen door, quite oblivious now of her pretended need of resting.

Nell was too miserable and bewildered to say one word in answer to this. All she could do was just to follow her visitor meekly down the passage.

"What a lovely cat," Cousin Ann now murmured, stooping down to stroke the Marquis of Carabas. "Oh, by the way, Nell, my aunt expects you to her picnic this afternoon. Will your husband's engagement prevent his being there, too? What shall I say to Mrs. Ashover?"

"It's very kind of you, Lady Ann, I'm sure. But William can't possibly come, I'm afraid."

"Well. Come yourself, anyway," cried Cousin Ann, picking up her parasol and passing out. "You don't happen to know from what direction Rook will descend upon you?" she added gaily as Nell waited in the doorway.

The girl shook her head.

"Because I'd like to ask him whether he intends to come to his mother's little party. But never mind. My aunt and I will survive it, I daresay, even if we are the only people there. Good-bye." And without waiting to see the closing of the door — the door that was no longer to be left open for intruders — she retraced her steps by the same path she had followed to reach the house.

She knew that Rook's business that morning had taken him to the other side of Heron's Ridge, and her only impulse now was to walk quickly enough so as to intercept him while he was still out of sight of the cottage.

She was conscious of feeling a little tired and faint as she ascended the hill; but her anger, which now settled into a calm, cold fury, was strong enough to support and sustain her; and it was not long before she reached the stile into the second barley field, breathing heavily as she went.

Here again she came to a tall hawthorn hedge voluptuously scented with the richly perishing May blossoms. She forced her way through a half-open gate which must have remained exactly in the same position since the early spring, for the feathery grasses grew high and tall around it and several wisps of bindweed had encircled its lowest bar.

She had calculated her movements to a nicety. There, approaching her with swinging careless steps, down the rough slope of a gorse-grown incline, was the figure of her husband. He saw her in a moment; stood for a second as if confused at her appearance; and then came on resolutely to where she awaited him, her free hand pressed tightly against her waist, her face white and drawn.

"Ann! What are you doing here?"

She made a little gesture that kept him at a distance while she recovered her breath.

"I — thought — I — would like — a little stroll — but it — it has been rather too much for me."

She spoke in gasps, but she smiled quite naturally into his face and her tone was calm.

"You'd better come into Nell's with me," he said. "You can't walk back in that state. She'll be able to look after you."

"I think — if you don't mind, Rook — I'd prefer to rest a little where I am."

As she spoke she sank down, easily and spontaneously, among the grasses of the hedge. Her movement disturbed several white butterflies which fluttered away along the edge of the field, while a scarlet-and-black cinnabar moth flew heavily from a tuft of clover to a patch of hedge parsley; where it paused, as if to regard the tulips in her hat, its wings drawn close against its body.

Rook knelt down anxiously by her side, his face sad and puzzled; his heart infinitely weary of the whole business of living. Above them, lost in the cerulean blue, not one lark, or two or three or four, but it might well have been a whole classic chorus of larks kept up that arrogant, brazen, importunate monotone of ecstasy, such as no instrument of string or pipe, no voice of man or woman, could lift from the earth; the very voice, so it might well seem, of the griefless, merciless, exultant sky, whose colour mocks all human passion by the impact of its appalling simplicity.

CHAPTER XVII

IT DID NOT need a long interlude under that June hedge to bring the colour back to Lady Ann's cheeks and a more even beat to her indignant heart.

The savage and primitive portion of her nature was soothed and satisfied by the fact that she was keeping Rook away from Nell; and something more subtle within her was quick enough to divine that Rook's attitude under this turn of events was not at all the attitude of a baffled and disappointed amorist.

He seemed just simply concerned and agitated at her own state and apparently took it for granted, without any other thought, that he would now have to support her back to Ashover.

He took her back there, indeed, leaning on his arm, by the very same path she herself had followed an hour ago; and his tenderness and solicitude were so obviously genuine that, though her anger against him still smouldered on in the depths, she confined its expression to nothing more serious than a few bitter sarcasms. It still remained possible that "everything," including that carefully prepared table, was on Nell's side; possible, after all, that Rook had not wilfully deceived her, that he had not, in fact, himself been aware of the convenient absence of Mr. Hastings.

Though she was feminine enough to derive a wicked satisfaction in the thought of that table left there without a guest; those yellow, purple, and black pansies lying unseen by any eye except her own, she was practical enough to insist on Mr. Twiney's being sent back at once to the village with orders to call in at Toll-Pike Cottage on his way to his own house. "And put the back seat in, Twiney, please," she said, as they encountered the gardener on their return. "And don't forget to call for Mrs. Hastings as well as Mr. Lexie! I shall drive; so there will be just four people. Mr. Ashover will walk."

Perhaps even the outraged feelings of Lady Ann would have been subdued into pity if she could have seen the forlorn figure in Toll-Pike Cottage removing one by one the plates from the dining room and the dishes from the kitchen stove. Nell had seen from her bedroom, to which she had fled to escape the mocking sight of her preparations, the husband and wife making their way back across the fields; and the sight had filled her with a cold, miserable hopelessness and a bitter shame.

Lady Ann's intrusion had been particularly cruel because there had been a pitiable struggle in her own conscience over the whole affair. She had seen very little of Rook since the fatal day of Netta's flight. He had given her very few chances to see him. And though she had struggled heroically to keep up the level of her emotion to what she had felt when they met in that drawing room, there were occasions when, as in the case of this unfortunate lunch, her longing to be with him, to have him to herself alone, overpowered her conscientious scruples.

The fact that she had steadily struggled to efface every instinct of possessiveness from her feelings so as to be of genuine use to him as a friend made it all the bitterer and more shameful to be thus exposed in her lapse from her self-imposed standard by Lady Ann's appearance.

Nothing is harder to bear than a fall from one's own ideal when it is grossly interpreted. A portion of oneself ranges itself then on the side of the accuser and the rest of one's being writhes helplessly under a double shame.

By degrees she managed to calm herself enough so as to restore her house to its normal appearance. She hadn't the heart to taste any of the things she had prepared. Standing by the cleared and empty table she nibbled a few biscuits and drank a glass of milk. Of those three pansies, she slipped one without a smile into a little apple-green volume of Shelley and squeezed the other two into a vase of wild flowers.

She had just done this when she saw Mr. Twiney at the gate. She went out to meet him. He announced in a circuitous rigmarole that he had been ordered to call for her with his gig.

"'Tisn't as if me cart were a gentleman's cart; but the lady up there," and he jerked his thumb toward Ashover House, "be going to drive me mare, and she expects 'ee to sit on thik back-seat 'long wi' Mr. Lexie."

Nell was on the point of explaining to the man that she had not the least intention of coming to Antiger High Mead; but she suddenly changed her mind.

"I am going up to see Mr. Lexie in a minute or two," she said, "and I'll tell him to expect you."

She let Mr. Twiney depart then; and running back into the house and up into her room began to put on her walking shoes and her newest hat.

Half an hour later she was sitting in Lexie's little garden at the rear of his cottage; confessing everything that had occurred. The enclosure was a small one, defended on two sides by rough gray walls and divided from a small orchard at the back by a briar-rose hedge.

The girl sat opposite Lexie in a low deck chair; and as she talked to him from beneath the shady brim of her hat she kept pulling at the green blades and brittle daisy-stalks of the grass patch beneath them.

From one of the apple trees in the orchard came the sweet reiterated quinquapartite moan of a wood pigeon; and Lexie, as he listened to what his guest was saying, found himself repeating the measured Shakespearean quatrain that he loved so well:

Whereupon it made this threne
To the phœnix and the dove,
Co-supremes and stars of love,
As chorus to their tragic scene.

"And so she came right into my room and saw how I was expecting your brother — saw everything. And I could tell just how it struck her, just what she thought." Nell sighed miserably and threw away a little handful of squeezed-up daisy-stalks which fell across the burnished golden face of a dandelion.

"She thought what was the truth," said Lexie, the leathery folds and humorous wrinkles about his eyes deepening into a hundred crevices and furrows as ruggedly emphatic as those on the bark of his favourite elm tree.

The girl lifted her chin and leaned forward. "You know it wasn't like that," she said. "You know I hadn't the least wish to make her feel badly. It just happened that William was out for the day and I thought it would be nice to cook a meal for him — for Rook, I mean. I hadn't talked quietly and properly to him for weeks and weeks."

Lexie did his best not to smile as if he were speaking to an irrational child. He was conscious of a certain irritation against his brother. How badly things were arranged in this world. Why couldn't all this romantic "havering" be concentrated on someone more fitted to appreciate it than this master of manias and inhibitions!

"And now I've really hurt her," Nell went on. "She'll think that there's something serious between Rook and me and be up in arms whenever we meet. I've made things worse for Rook, made them much worse; and there's actually nothing between us except what you know perfectly well — just what I happen to feel myself — which doesn't matter to Rook at all or to any one else!"

Lexie's half-conscious irritation against his brother betrayed itself now in spite of his humorous lightness of tone. "Tell me, Nell," he said, "are you in love with Rook?"

The outrageous directness of this question did not seem to annoy the young girl. For some curious reason those plain significant words gave her a kind of relief. She liked the way Lexie uttered them. She liked to hear them being uttered.

"In — love — with — Rook?" she repeated very slowly. "I wonder if it is as thrilling as that. I certainly have never been in love with my husband if 'in love' means the sort of feeling I have for your brother. And yet William has been much nicer to me lately. He's been steadily nicer and nicer since he stopped writing his book."

"Has he let it go altogether?" asked Lexie.

She shook her head doubtfully. "I wouldn't like to say that and I think it would be unlucky to say it. It might start him off at it to-morrow. But he certainly has not written a line — I know that for a fact — since the end of April. He wrote a little after Netta went away; and then he stopped. Why do you suppose he stopped?"

Lexie replied to this only by one of his characteristic grimaces.

"Don't you worry about Ann, my sweet Nell," he said. "She'll be just the same to you. And when she's talked to Rook about your lunch, and beaten him up a bit, she'll be the same to him, too! These things are not really so terrible as people think they are. There's a deal of conventional bluff in it."

"Women think a lot about things like that," murmured the girl feebly.

Lexie sawed the air with his hand; a trick of his when he got excited. The gesture was peculiar to him and its nature resembled the movement a person might make when obstructed by tall reeds in a thick swamp.

"They don't really!" he cried with more emphasis than Nell had ever heard him use about anything. "It's all put into their heads by what they read and by what they hear and by what they think that other people think. Left to themselves women would take these things very easily and very naturally."

As he paused to take breath, for he had worked himself into a sincere agitation now and his gray eyes had become quite large and brilliant, the girl opposite him suddenly burst into a peal of unexpected laughter.

He looked at her with injured gravity, the naïveté of which made it harder for her to recover herself. His self-respect was genuinely outraged; but the graver and more discomposed he looked, the more difficult did she find it to stop laughing. It was as if Lexie had become a church, a funeral, a parliamentary debate, a meeting of scientists. She began to have what children call "a regular laughing fit." She put her hands to her face, and tears of merriment ran down her cheeks.

"What the devil's the matter with you?" he demanded, rising from his chair and approaching hers. His face wavered between sympathy for what might have been hysterical agitation and annoyance at what might have been childish rudeness.

His tone quieted her and she took her fingers from her face and searched about for her handkerchief.

"I'm so sorry," she said, "I'm so very sorry. It's silly of me —— You're a dear, Lexie — I love you very much." And she held out her hand to him.

He took it and refused to let it go.

"What was it that set you off just then?" he asked gravely. "Did I say anything especially ridiculous? Did I give myself away in some unpardonable fashion? Did what I said seem obvious and banal beyond words?"

"Dear Lexie!" murmured the girl, trying in vain to get her fingers out of the invalid's clutch in such a manner as might seem natural and unconscious. "Dear Lexie! Of course you didn't do anything of the kind! What you said was very sensible; and I daresay quite true. It was because it was so sensible that I laughed. I don't think sensible things, or even true things, are ever the right explanations when it comes to women!"

Lexie's countenance at that moment would have made an engaging study for some master painter; for some portraitist possessed of the psychological impressionism of Spain combined with the grandiose vitality of Venice. The little wrinkles in the skin of his cheeks indicated that his humour was tickled. An unusually concentrated frown in his heavy forehead suggested that his wits were piqued. While the way his drooping half-closed eyelids reduced his eyes — lately so wide open — to nothing but little narrow slits of amorousness denoted that the accidental imprisonment of a hand that desired to escape had already aroused the satyr in his blood.

"You steered me off just now," he said, pressing the hand he held against the girl's slender neck, "when I asked you a definite question. I don't believe you're half as much of an idealist as you think you are, you sweet Nell. Why do you keep that hat on? You're not afraid of sunstroke, are you?"

As he spoke he used his free hand to pull out the one hatpin that the girl wore; and in a moment her head was bare. He stooped over her as if to follow up his advantage.

Nell's own sensations at the moment were terribly complicated. His warm knuckles pressed against her neck sent a faint luxurious relaxation through every nerve of her body. She was so full of shame at her recent lapse from her own ideal that a great weariness possessed her heart, a weariness that could easily have found a numbing relief in letting him do what he liked.

But simultaneously with these emotions there suddenly rose up within her, to her own surprise, a surging wave of anger against him. What right had he to behave in this way? What right had he to assume that she would let him make love to her? She freed her hand with a jerk and pushed him back so violently and unexpectedly that he staggered.

“What are you doing, Lexie?” she cried indignantly. “I’ve told you before I don’t like this sort of thing!”

She didn’t catch the expression upon his face at this rebuff. She only heard him mutter something under his breath as he moved off; and then she saw him go hurriedly to the flower bed under the wall and stoop down. He seemed to be looking for something among the green shoots of the unbudded delphiniums, something that required much fumbling and searching for, if it were to be-found at all.

His body looked so thin and fragile as he stooped over the bed and his head so heavy, that a twinge of commiseration passed through her.

“What silly punctilious creatures girls are!” she thought to herself. “Why shouldn’t I have let him kiss me if he wanted to? He’s a much finer, a much more interesting human being than I am; and he’s ill, too! What a brute one is with one’s wretched pride and egotism!”

Lexie had found what he wanted now and came back smiling, his head held high, his hand extended. It was a single lavender-coloured, double French primrose, enfolded in its own large crumpled leaf.

“It’s the last left,” he said, handing it to her. “Fast-fading primroses covered up in leaves,” he added, purposely misquoting; “only this isn’t a real primrose. I never have been able to make out what mysterious old associations I have with this flower. It always gives me a peculiar sensation unlike anything else. Don't you think, my sweet Nell, that there are certain memories in us that come straight down to us from our parents and through them from their parents? If it isn't like that, what is it? Memories of our childhood before we were conscious?"

He stopped and they both resumed their seats; he to light a cigarette, she to pin the flower very carefully upon the edge of her dress, against her neck — "exactly," she thought to herself, "where he touched me just now."

"No, no," he said, "don't you let that scene with Ann have any effect upon you at all. I give you my word of honour, Nell, that there's nothing in it — nothing, nothing. She'll be exactly the same to you when you see her next. Please, don't let's have any bourgeois 'not-speakings,' and so on, in our circle!"

"But. Lexie, I can't go to this picnic after what happened to-day! I can't face Ann after that! It goes against something in me which doesn't feel at all 'bourgeois,' something that seems just the opposite of 'bourgeois!'"

Lexie peered gravely at her through his cigarette smoke. "You're wrong, Nelly dear. I tell you you're wrong. It's the very best thing you could do; for Rook, for yourself, for Lady Ann, for everyone. It is, indeed!"

The girl bent her head, frowning. She felt an unconscionable longing to see Rook that day. It was a chance she might not have again for many days; and it would be amusing, sitting on the back seat of Mr. Twiney's gig with Lexie.

"How is Rook going to get over there himself?" she asked.

"He? Oh, he'll walk. Do come, Nell. Do be a spirited, civilized, sensible girl, and come. My mother will think it awfully funny if you don't. It's her birthday, you know; and rather an event in our family."

The girl looked at him dubiously. "I don't — feel — as if I could face her and — and talk to her as if nothing had happened. She must think that Rook and I have been seeing each other much more than we have.”

Lexie got up and threw away his cigarette. It fell close to her feet and she put her foot on its thin wisp of smoke.

“Think what a meteorite that must seem,” she said, “to the tiny grass-insects. Isn’t it hard to realize, Lexie, how all that we feel is only like a little smoke in the grass?”

“What’s that?” he rapped out, and moving up to her he took her by the wrists and looked threateningly into her face. “What’s that? What’s that? Like a smoke? Well, and if it is — you dear troubled Nell — that doesn’t make it any the less important.”

He let her go and remained silent and very grave, looking away from her, away from that sunlit garden, where the early afternoon shadow was just beginning to pass from the gravel path to the box border; away from that piece of dusty white road outside his gate, where that very morning he had picked a bit of yellow stonecrop from the wall and a bit of ground ivy from under the wall, crushing them in his hands and only relinquishing them when Mrs. Bellamy brought him his breakfast, and it came into his mind how perverted, how corrupt, how mad with the worst madness there is in life it was to diminish one jot or one tittle of the unique, the miraculous importance of these heavenly sensations. “Oh, let me live another year — two more years — three more years!” he prayed to that June air and those June odours.

It was almost as if it came like a sign of acceptance, of recognition, from some hidden heathen deity, still able to exert his power in that Dorset village, that even as the man and the girl looked into each other’s eyes, there sounded from some neighbouring tree invisible to them both the world-old Cuckoo! Cuckoo! of the unconquerable augur of sweet mischief.

Lexie's faced relaxed into a smile of thrilling satisfaction; every wrinkle in it deepening and radiating, while he rubbed his hands together. "It hasn't changed its tune yet!" he cried. "The summer is only beginning."

"Very well, Lexie," said the girl with a deep sigh of submission. "I'll go with you. I should only be perfectly miserable if I went back now to the house." She paused, frowning. "I must have just a word with your brother. I couldn't endure William's coming back and this whole day being wasted. I don't hate William as much as I used to, Lexie," she added inconsequently.

"No one hates any one when his own life is all right," he said. "Come on, you sweet Nell, let's see if Mr. Twiney's outside. If he isn't, we might walk as far as that."

He moved toward the house. "One moment," he said. "I'll just run in and tell Mrs. Bellamy."

She watched him disappear.

Over her head flew the long-tailed bird, cuckooing as it flew. Awkward and yet rapid in its direct movement, it seemed to her, just then, as if it were no ordinary feathered creature; but rather a mysterious agent of the gods. She felt a sick repugnance at the thought of encountering Lady Ann again; but her desire to see Rook, to talk to him, to hear his voice, grew every moment more imperative.

Far away though it was now, she could still hear the voice of the cuckoo; and in some inscrutable manner the sound of it acted as an irritant to hear nerves, making her restless and impatient, making every minute of delay seem fraught with some kind of vague danger to both herself and Rook.

At the very moment when the young girl was thus concerned about him, Rook himself, having eaten a hurried lunch, was walking quickly across Battlefield.

Before leaving the house he had opened his iron cash box and placed two five-pound notes in his pocket.

“I’ll settle that business with Betsy,” he thought, “on my way to High Mead.”

As he passed the Drools’ cottage he was observed by Binnory, who promptly followed him into the lane and overtook him at a run.

“Squire Ash’ver!” cried the idiot breathlessly. “Take I with ‘ee to see the gippoos! Take I with ‘ee to see them two who be half beasties and half men! Take Binnory with ‘ee, Squire Ash’ver, and he’ll do summat for ‘ee one day! So he will, too, summat ‘ee never’d guess at! Take I with ‘ee, Squire Ash’ver!”

Rook turned toward the excited boy with a look of positive hatred. He remembered his behaviour to Lady Ann. He associated him with Corporal Dick.

“Go home, Binnory!” he rapped out. “Get home with you, child!” And he quickened his pace to shake off this unwelcome attendant.

He had never been quite satisfied with the accepted version of the lad’s paternity. In his heart he had more than once accused Uncle Dick of being his father; but that was at moments when this whole business of the “Ashover immorality” grew to the dimensions of an obsession.

They all had the same taint! His father with Nancy Cooper, Corporal Dick with this gamekeeper’s wife, his grandfather with the Corporal’s mother — they had all, in taking their pleasure, become the causes of hideous complications.

If he had let Netta alone, perhaps by this time she would have married some honest man and been as happy as women are; whereas now —— His thoughts recoiled from the fantastic abominations his imagination called forth.

"Squire Ash'ver! If I give 'ee them three girt blue her'n's eggs I've a-got hid away, will 'ee take I to see the half beasties?"

The lad was trotting by his side now, his mouth open, his eyes furtive and foxy. Rook began to lose his temper in earnest. There was something peculiarly irritating to his nerves just then in this encounter. It was bad enough to have to deal with old Betsy and her "partners." There came over him an unpleasant sense of being surrounded by crowds and crowds of Ashover bastards, each new one more repulsive than the rest. He felt like Macbeth, contemplating the interminable descendants of Banquo.

"Get away with you, can't you?" he cried angrily. "What do you mean by following me like this?"

"Don't 'ee talk to I like that, Squire Ash'ver," pleaded the boy, his tone wheedling and coaxing.

"Go home!" shouted Rook, and began to stride along even more quickly than before.

But the voice continued at his elbow; for the boy found no difficulty at all in keeping up with him.

"If you'll take I to see the half beasties, Squire," cried Binnory as he ran, "I'll show 'ee where 'tis said Witch Nancy were bedded when they two was born! 'Tis a dry pond up High Mead way, near-along where you be going to eat and drink present. I've a-seed 'un when I were little. 'Twas Granfer Dick showed 'un to I; and he'd a-say how wonderful it were that them things should be born'd, 'long wi' frogs and toads and hedge-pricklies what have their own lawful nature!"

Rook stopped and turned round upon the idiot, furious with a blind anger. He raised his stick as if to strike him a blow. Binnory seemed not the least disturbed by this gesture; indeed, he grinned in his face and did nothing but just skip back out of arm's reach.

Rook went so far as actually to pursue the boy for a stone's-throw or two, in the direction of his home; but when he came close up to him a great wave of weariness and disgust fell upon his spirit and made it impossible for him to lift a finger.

"Go home, I tell you!" was all he could say. But he might have been addressing his words to the elm trees in the hedge for all the effect they had. Whether Binnory had the wit to detect an artificial note in his threats, or whether he trusted in his own obstinate tenacity to get what he wanted in spite of the Squire's anger, his next move was a masterpiece of strategy.

He scrambled up the bank and pushed himself through the hedge into the wood. Once in the wood, he waited till Rook turned to go on again; and then proceeded to run parallel with his victim's advance, keeping the thickset hedge between them.

Under the smooth branches of the newly leafed beech trees he ran; under the darker foliage of the sycamores; under the stinging twigs of the green hazels; over dog-mercury, over pink campion, over the soft unbudded whitish-green spikes of foxglove and mullein. Feeble-winged currant moths flapped against his face as he ran. Greenish-coloured pollen from the stamens of entangled parasitic plants clung to his cap and to his hair. Swathes of pith twine tripped him up. The oozy stalks of half-dead bluebells bent and broke beneath his boots, staining them, with sticky vegetable juice. Rook heard him groan now and again as the thorns pricked him or the twigs stung his cheeks; but he no longer uttered any words. All his energy seemed taken up in the effort of keeping pace with his unsympathetic companion.

At last the man could endure the situation no longer. It had begun to touch the limit both of his patience and of his sense of humour.

"Come here, you rascal!" he shouted. "Come here, Binnory, you rogue! If you can run like that over there, you'd better come back into the lane. I'll take you with me! You shall see your gippoos!"

He had hardly finished speaking when, like a rabbit from its burrow, pushing aside the prickly thickness of a holly tree in the hedge, the boy came tumbling and scuffling down the bank.

Rook moderated his pace after that; and the two curiously assorted companions, having made up their quarrel, proceeded on their way down that sweet-scented lane, amicably discussing the weasels, squirrels, and rabbits that kept crossing their path and the various bird notes that reached them from the wood.

They came at last to the grassy clearing, where the lane associated with the mysterious name of Gorm branched off from the other; and there, straight in front of them, under the hedge, was Betsy Cooper's caravan.

The old woman had erected a clothes-line as a sort of extempore tent; and behind a row of vividly coloured garments hanging between two posts the forms of the unfortunate "partners" were visible, seated opposite each other on the ground, their laps full of moon daisies and quaking grass.

Rook could see Betsy herself, a few hundred yards or so down the road, digging up dandelion roots with a knife.

He went straight toward her, leaving his companion to stare at the "half beasties" to his heart's content.

"Ay, Squire! So 'ee be come to I, then; so 'ee be come to Auntie Betsy, same as she told 'ee 'ee would. 'Tis good hearing to me wold ears to catch the sound of thee tongue and see thee wicked smiling eyes again! Thou'rt always welcome, Squire Ashover. Thou'rt always welcome."

"I've brought the money, Betsy," said Rook quietly, manifesting little tendency to respond to her familiar garrulousness. "And now I hope you'll keep your promise and move away."

He put his hand in his pocket as he spoke and produced the two five-pound notes. The old lady's countenance assumed a time-battered expression of senile imbecility, out of the depths of which, like the gaze of a snake peering through a sheep's skull, shone her tiny yellowish eyes.

"Come to cart, Squire Ashover; come to cart. I've got summat to show 'ee afore us puts thik bit of paper across wood and across iron."

Rook replaced the notes in his pocket and followed her submissively to her wheeled house. His chief anxiety now was to get his business done before Mr. Twiney's conveyance, bringing the rest of the party, should appear upon the scene.

The old woman manifested no surprise at seeing Binnory, who was now seated on the grass at a cautious distance from the dwarfs, regarding their infantile play with a mixture of suspicion and fascination.

"He be an innocent, same as they be," she chuckled, glancing furtively at Rook. "Dilly Drool should have come to I for a sip o' tiger-root when she were heavy. My Nancy never missed a morning without taking of it; and 'twould have given her as healthy a babe as maid could wish; only her old man couldn't keep his hands off her because of the drink."

Rook moved aside to let the woman go up the caravan steps in front of him. She turned her head as she reached the top.

"Thee Ashovers be sweet-spoken gents and I don't care who hears me say it; but ye be queer ones with the maids; and 'tis that what brings the thwartings and blightings upon 'ee; for 'tis a sure thing that them as handles ploughs when rye be green and goose-pods be sour finds nothink in meadow when 'a do come to harvest-time save toadstools and devils-bit!"

"What do you mean by 'goose-pods,' Betsy?" her guest enquired, mounting the steps behind her.

“I mean them things in pond-water what ain’t water-lilies nor ain’t long purples. But come ‘ee in, Squire Ashover, come ‘ee in; I’ve a-got summat to show ‘ee!”

The old woman made him sit down on the narrow bed which was covered now by a patchwork quilt. She pulled the white curtains across the window, so that the hot afternoon light that poured into that small interior was softened and mellowed.

Then she placed a wooden table in front of him and on the table a curiously woven very old mat, of an unusual and enigmatical pattern.

Rook wondered vaguely what the preparations meant; but his thoughts wandered off to his fixed idea of his bad treatment of Netta and they only returned to his present surroundings when the sound of the steady trotting of Mr. Twiney’s mare broke upon that summer stillness.

He listened intently, his face toward the door; but the dogcart passed by without stopping, its occupants apparently undisturbed by the sight of the dwarfs and Binnory.

Betsy Cooper gave no sign that she had even heard the quick trotting of the mare, as Lady Ann speeded it up with rein and whip. What she did now was to place upon the table a perfectly round clear crystal, about the size of a large apple, and so smooth and globular that it was only by putting it down with the utmost gentleness that she rendered it immobile.

“What’s that?” said Rook. “Can you see fortunes in it, Betsy?”

“Fortunes!” snorted the crone contemptuously. “You can see the Will of God in it, Squire Ashover!”

The man bent down over this microcosmic symbol of the world he found so hard to handle, and stared fixedly and rigidly into its irised depths. Violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, red — they were all held in faint solution in the rondure of that prismatic orb.

Betsy stood in front of him, waiting patiently. She did not ask him "if he saw anything." She leaned her hands upon the table and half-closing her eyes swayed a little, backward and forward, humming some obscure gibberish underneath her breath.

Then Rook did actually begin to see something. Whether it was a phantom of the mind, "a false creation proceeding from the heat-oppressèd brain," or whether a flawless crystal of that particular kind has the power — as yet unverified by science — of reflecting thoughts as well as objects, the fact remains that he saw the figure of Netta bending over something.

What was it she was bending over? Her head was lowered so that he could not catch the expression on her face; but the feeling he got from what he did see of her was sad without being hopelessly unhappy. It was calm and quiet.

"What is she looking at?" he muttered aloud.

The old woman above him took no notice of his words; but her hummings and mumblings increased in volubility. Then he became aware of what it was that this image of his ill-used mistress gazed at so calmly. It was himself — the form of Rook Ashover — and it lay hushed and white and still in a coffin of dark-coloured wood.

For a seconder two longer he looked at this picture in the crystal; and as he looked a great wave of unalterable peace and happiness passed over him.

So deep and convincing was this sensation that when the figures finally faded away and he lifted up his head he experienced that sense of irrational fretfulness and irritation such as people feel when they are awakened suddenly out of a restorative and dreamless sleep.

He poshed the table away and stretched himself. His very muscles felt as if he had just been aroused from a prolonged slumber. He yawned and scowled crossly; stretched out his arms again and muttered: “Ay! ay!” in an intonation of petulant querulousness.

Betsy Cooper took not the least notice of what he was doing. She removed the mat. She took down an old clay pipe from a bracket nailed to the wall and filling it with tobacco sat down upon a chair to smoke. A thin sun-moted stream of light that had found an entrance between curtain and window frame turned her mummy-like face into gleaming gold and the smoke of her pipe into pontifical incense.

Rook rose to his feet and stood over her. He felt drugged and stupid and absurdly childish.

“Where did you get that thing from?” he asked, in a fussy, matter-of-fact, disparaging tone.

Betsy took the pipe from her mouth and stared at him with the slow, patient, satiric stare of thousands of years of sunburned, rain-bleached wisdom.

“’Tis the Cimmery stone,” she murmured.

He began walking up and down that small interior like a wild animal in the presence of his tamer.

“What Cimmery stone?” he demanded abruptly, standing in front of her again.

“From Cimmery Land, Squire,” she answered quietly. “And that be the land where folks do live like unborn babes. They don’t see nothink, nor hear nothink, in thik place, except what be like the smoke of this ’ere pipe; and when them folks do talk ‘mid theyselves it be like the turning of Miller Cory’s girt wheel — mum, mum, mum — where us can hear the drumming of wonderful green water and where millstone be all moss-mumbled and wheel be all hart’s-tongue ferns! ’Tis real wet rain, what’s finer than corpse dust, them folks do live under; and they tell I it be wonderful strange to see ‘un walk and talk … mum … mum … mum … and thik mist all slivery and dimsy round ‘un.”

As the old woman spoke Rook became quieter and his nerves less irritable. He could not catch the full import of what she said, but it soothed and calmed him. It was as though she were describing to him the god-like dwellers in some unearthly Limbo — some Elysian Fourth Dimension — out of Space and out of Time — where everything was, as it were, painted with gray upon gray; and where large and liberating thoughts moved to and fro over cool, wet grass like enormous swallows, easily, naturally, without any effort; thoughts that were made of memories and of hopes, and never of logic or of reason; thoughts that came and went under a thin, fine, incessant rain that itself was composed of the essence of memory, the memory of old defeated, long-forgotten gods whose only immortality was in this gray, cool, silent, sadly driven mist!

As he listened to the old woman and watched the smoke of her pipe floating up into the illuminated sun-ray where it broke at once into a hundred silver-blue undulations, it came over him that this Cimmery Land of which she spoke was the thing that he had so often vaguely dreamed of; dreamed of on lonely roads at twilight; dreamed of lying on his bed listening to the sounds of the morning; dreamed of under walls of old buildings in the quiet places of historic cities, when the noons fell hotly and the shadows fell darkly, and from hidden fountains came the splash of water.

Dreamed of! But never, until this moment, felt within his conscious brain, as something that out of the turbulent arena of life might actually emerge — emerge and establish itself — as this crystal had done, projected like a Bubble of Eternity from some great under-tide, beyond the reach of loss and longing and lust and loathing, beyond the reach of everything for which humanity has found a name.

His reverie was interrupted by strange sounds from the grass plot outside.

"Thik innocent be pestering me partners," said the old woman, rising stiffly to her feet. "Best gie I them bank-notes afore ye leaves," she added, screwing up her eyes and swallowing her thin lips till her face resembled a Chinese idol.

Rook put his hand in his pocket and drew out the two notes. The old woman took a bit of wood out of the unlit stove and a plain steel knife out of a drawer. She laid both these things on the table where the crystal had been, the former on the top of the latter. Taking the notes in her hand, she spat three times on them and spread them out upon the wood-and-iron cross which she had thus constructed.

"I'll be off from troubling of thee any further, Squire Ashover," she said. "And if I bain't much mistaken thee and me will follow different ways here-to-come."

By the time Rook arrived at Antiger High Mead his mother's birthday picnic was in full swing.

The late afternoon sun cast long richly coloured shadows across that small hayfield. The haymakers had left their work to go to their tea and their half-filled wagon was standing under a large pale-leafed ash, its glossy chestnut-coloured horse, monumental as a statue in classic bronze, patiently munching a great heap of fragrant grass.

The three women were sitting with their backs to him so that Lexie, drinking his tea with epicurean satisfaction, his eyes missing nothing of the magic of that June day, was the first to see him approaching.

He came round from the western side of the field, so that his shadow, advancing before him, fell across the whole party and extended to the wheels of the wagon under the ash tree.

"There you are!" he cried in a half-jocose, half-reproachful voice, a voice that carried the nuance that they might have waited for him before actually beginning their repast.

"You're late, Rook," said his mother, turning her head and making room for him at her side.

"How is it we didn't pass you?" enquired Lady Ann. "Is there any other way? I thought you had to come by the road."

"So sorry I couldn't manage that lunch with you, Nell," he said, taking no notice of the questions asked him and putting out his hand for a cup of tea. "Ann has explained how it happened, I expect? She'd got farther afield than she ought and I had to take her home."

"Oh, Nell perfectly understands!" cried Lady Ann, selecting a water-cress sandwich from the basket beside her. "Your apologies are so belated, my dear, that they're really unnecessary. Aren't they, Nell? It's just like Rook, isn't it, to be so formal in his explanations? You might think that we were all strangers, instead of — what we are!"

Her rich flute-like laugh rang across the hayfield and, her gray eyes, full of voluptuous malice, played mischievously over both her victims.

"I think it's quite right for Rook to apologize," said Mrs. Ashover. "I'm sure that's the kind of thing I brought you up to do, isn't it, Rook?" The little old lady surveyed her eldest son with ironic complacency.

"You brought us up to nothing of the sort, Mother," remarked Lexie, holding out his cup to be refilled by Lady Ann and laying it carefully down by his side as he prepared to light a cigarette. "You put into our heads such an idea of the greatness of the family that every single thing we did was done as if an Ashover couldn't do wrong."

"I'm sure Mrs. Ashover never taught you anything of the sort," threw in Nell gently, smiling at Lexie with a clinging, lingering smile on her unclassical mouth, while every nerve in her body responded tremulously to Rook's closeness to her. "I'm sure the outside world regards you all as possessed of beautiful manners. Don't you think so, Lady Ann?"

"Is that a subtle suggestion that however much I may marry an Ashover I must always remain an outsider?" retorted the daughter of the diplomatist.

Nell blushed. This kind of equivocal badinage was always embarrassing to her; and she felt vaguely that Cousin Ann was in some indirect way trying to make a fool of her.

Rook, who had been drinking tea and eating bread and butter like a man in a trance, now put down his empty cup, glanced whimsically at his wife, and holding out his hand to Nell to help her to get up, said quietly and naturally: "Come for a stroll with me, Nell, then, will you? And we'll make up for our lost lunch by finding a wood-warbler's nest. There used to be a lot of birds in these woods. Do you remember the black-cap's eggs, Lexie? How we left two in the nest; and I broke all we took; and then got angry when you wanted to go back for one of the two we'd left?"

While he threw out these casual remarks to cover their retreat, Nell was struggling to regain her composure; struggling to get strength of mind enough to look Lady Ann in the face. The temptation to obey him and follow him was more than she could resist; but she knew well that his naïve masculine assumption that he was carrying off the situation by his flippant tone was entirely unjustified.

To Nell's consternation Lady Ann herself at that moment scrambled up from the grass. "Black-caps!" she cried. "Oh, Rook, I'd no idea you had black-caps so near Ashover! We used to have to go so far out into the woods to see one; and then you generally heard it without seeing it!"

Rook's mind at that moment sank down into a veritable gulf of misery. He saw himself for the rest of his life having to deal with this strong, capable, high-spirited woman, for whose personality at that moment, although she was the mother of his child, he felt not one single shred of love, but rather something that bordered very closely upon sheer hatred.

This occasion would probably be repeated again and again and again — the same difficulty in getting away; the same inevitable dissimulation; the same teasing contest. And yet he ought to have been gratified and thrilled at having the love of a girl as beautiful and distinguished as Ann Gore.

The truth was, he thought, as he let his brother Lexie take up his wife's challenge and talk about black-caps, the truth was that men didn't want the love of women, unless under circumstances that gratify a certain subtle craving in their life illusion, a certain subconscious self-love, which is deeper than any pride, or any vanity, or any conceit, or any lust! They want to love women themselves, in every possible kind of way, wickedly, tenderly, chastely, licentiously; but when it comes to a matter of being loved, they become harshly exacting and suffer from every sort of antipathy and repulsion unless in the one single case where their life illusion is satisfied.

The most immoral of men are monogamists in this sense. They are perfectly prepared to exploit the love that women give them and turn it to their own profligate account; but it rarely occurs to them that such love is in itself a rare and exquisite commodity. It presents itself rather as a tragic and burdensome appendage to a lovely and magical experience. It only becomes precious, as a thing in itself, when it answers the hunger of this mysterious life illusion which is deeper than possessiveness and stronger than sensuality.

Women, on the contrary, so Rook's troubled thoughts ran, regard their own "love" as so rare and so precious, that it fills them with a sense of intolerable grievance when the man they care for slights it or undervalues it. They are ready then to accuse such a man of every sort of meanness and baseness. With malicious inspiration they label him with just the particular faults that are most hateful to him, associating their indignation against him with everything in the world except the one thing for which he is really to be blamed; the fact, namely, that he was betrayed into speaking their language when he was using them in his fashion.

He remembered vividly the latter taunts that his wife had levelled at him as they lingered together in the hall before he started. They were all unfair, unjust; beside the mark. And yet they hurt him just because they touched him where he was most sensitive.

She had accused him of having concealed from her what she called his "love affair with a little chit of a married schoolgirl." And as they watched his mother coming down the Jacobean staircase she had flung at him the taunt which she divined would pierce him the deepest.

"It's her blood in you, you know! That Gresham blood!"

While these thoughts passed through Rook's mind his eyes were fixed upon the corner of the hayfield where Mr. Twiney's horse had been tethered. They had taken him out of the shafts and he was nibbling now at the new honeysuckle shoots in the leafy hedge.

Great bushes of elder, crowded with flowery "patens" of ivory whiteness, stretched their branches down to the level of the cut grass; and the look of these heavy blossoms against the close-shaven ground gave to

Rook a sharp sensation of some old childish memory that made his present sadness all the deeper.

The badinage that had been passing like an invisible shuttle-cock among that group of people subsided at last. “Don’t break the black-cap’s eggs this time,” cried Lady Ann after them as Rook moved away with Nell toward the edge of the wood.

They were still within sight of the others and were examining the tiny crimson petals of the first wild rose they had yet seen really in bud when the girl murmured anxiously in his ear: “We must never do it again, Rook. We must be very, very good from now on! Your wife is very angry with me. She despises and hates me, and I can’t stand it. Oh, Rook, how cruel it is for everything to be like that. when it’s all so beautiful!”

He looked at her face vacantly as it was lifted up to him from under her broad-brimmed hat. Her mouth was twitching. Her eyes gazed at him through so much water of unfallen tears that he began absentmindedly to speculate — as if in the presence of a scientific problem — how it could be possible that they could remain as they were without brimming over and running down her cheeks.

“Come on,” he said abruptly. “Let’s get out of sight.”

They moved forward a few yards, skirting the hedge. Nell trailed her fingers through some tall umbelliferous flowers that grew amid the uncut feathery grasses. She hung her head and her heart felt weary within her. Was he in a mood to disregard all she’d been saying — all she had been vowing to herself of renunciation and effacement? Was he going to take her into all that lovely freshly budded greenery, into all that mass of leaves and undergrowth, of ferns and moss and entangled branches, and just seize upon her without further scruple?

Her heart began to beat violently. A vibrant tremor of magnetic excitement rose from the very centre of her soul and, like a mounting stream of quicksilver, quivered through the nerves of her body. By anticipating his unscrupulousness, his reckless indifference to consequences, as something already present before her, she was conscious of a sudden responsive thrill of complete abandonment.

They came to a gap in the hedge. Her heart beat so wildly that she was afraid the man must hear it. Where had fled all her self-sacrificing vows, all her resolutions of effacement? Glancing round at the others before she let him pull her up to his side on the hedge bank, she saw Lady Ann had gone over to the place where she had tied the horse and was re-adjusting the bridle so as to give the animal more scope to feed. There was something in this simple and natural proceeding that struck the girl's mind with a sense of shame. She saw Mrs. Ashover, too, talking so quietly and happily with Lexie — both of them with their backs propped up against haycocks — that she felt as if there were something discordant, ill-considered, irrelevant in this ill-timed love of hers for this husband, this son, this brother, whose days might have stretched out so calmly before him in these pleasant places.

Rook helped her through the hedge, however, and led her straight into the wood. Above their heads the indefatigable little chiff-chaff repeated his two-syllabled monotone. From far up the woody slope, where the trees were taller and the undergrowth thinner, there sounded the Caw — Caw — Caw of the man's own ragged-winged namesakes.

Nell's skirts were stained with beech drippings, with the sticky amber-coloured tar of the spruce firs, with the brown oozings of patches of swamp ground, with the black moisture where accumulations of former rains had saturated the hollow interstices of elm roots and oak roots; with the dust of last year's funguses. Burr prickles clung to her thin stockings. Her hair, for she had snatched off her hat and carried it now in her hand, was loose and rumpled, and full of bits of twigs and shreds of moss.

They came to a little open space, covered with thick bentgrass of a vivid emerald green and surrounded by young sycamores. Here they sank down exhausted and silent: Rook with his back against one of the trees, Nell huddled up at his side, her head resting on his lap.

The physical effort which she had had to make, in forcing her way after him through so many obstacles, had exhausted her to such a point that her nerves were now in complete quiescence. The movement of his fingers as they disentangled the various little objects that had got caught in her hair increased her feeling of profound passivity.

His own thoughts were perhaps sadder than they had ever been in his life. The very quietness of the moment, the faint innumerable summer sounds that came and went; the rising and falling of a cloud of indolent sunlit gnats, each one of them a little dancing speck of intense consciousness; the sharp reiterated strokes of a woodpecker hidden somewhere above their heads; the swaying of the bent-grass in a wind that was gentler than the breath of sleep: all these things seemed only to enhance and emphasize the lamentable futility of human life, its confusions, its blunderings, its pitiful misunderstandings.

His heart ached for Netta. If only he knew that she was alive; that she was at least in no desperate straits, in no hopeless misery! But this absolute dead silence lay like a block of heavy quarried stone upon the well mouth of all his natural happiness.

Nell's voice broke the silence.

"It's lovely here, isn't it?" she said. "I'm very glad we came here, Rook. I shall never forget this afternoon. It was sweet of Lexie to make me come, wasn't it? If it hadn't been for him I never would have thought of it."

The man did not answer at once; or rather he answered with a reassuring movement of his hand.

His actual thought at that moment was rather to be concealed than revealed; for it was one of those thoughts that isolate a person's identity and put up a sort of invisible screen of malicious loneliness between oneself and one's companion.

He indulged in the fantastic wish, in fact, that some sudden electric disturbance, some insane magnetic current, might kill at one blow every kind of "love" toward him in his mother, in his wife, in Nell. He would like to be loved by only two people in the world: by Netta and by his brother!

"Yes, I am glad Lexie brought you," he said. "It would have been absurd not to have had you here. Ann is not really as jealous as she likes to pretend. But you know how it is with me these days! I can't think of anything. I can't concentrate on anything. I see Netta's face, I see certain expressions of quaint enjoyment, of funny bewilderment, that she used to have, and it just paralyses me! I'm only half alive all the time. And I hate everyone — well! not quite everyone, Nell — who interrupts my thinking about her! Wouldn't you suppose, Nell, that it would be possible by sheer willing to force a lost person to reveal his hiding place? It seems so grotesque, so mad, that she should be at this moment somewhere in London wanting to see me; and I should be here wanting to see her; and that we Cannot communicate in any way!"

Nell rose suddenly to a sitting posture and turned toward him. "Do you know, Rook," she said, "I sometimes fancy that William knows more about her than he has confessed."

"What!" — The word leapt out of Rook's throat like a bullet from a revolver. "What are you saying?"

He scrambled to his feet and pulled the girl up with him so violently that his fingers hurt her arm.

"Dear Rook!" she gasped. "I — don't — I — I mean — I don't suppose — —"

The excitement in his face, the return of life to his eyes, the grip of his hand, revealed to her with fatal lucidity how little, in the deepest part of his nature, her own personality and all the romantic happiness that had passed between them really counted.

"Knows more about her? Hastings knows more about her? What do you mean? Has he said anything to you?"

"No — no — no — no," she stammered hurriedly. "It was just a silly thought of mine. It was just that now and then, when I've talked to him about Netta, I seemed to feel as if he were uneasy in some way. I hadn't thought of it seriously till this moment. Oh, Rook, dearest Rook, don't think too much of so little a thing!"

"I shall come over to-night and talk to him. Will he be at home? He isn't away for the night, is he? Let's get back! My mother will be worried. We mustn't keep them. We don't want them to drive off without us."

His words came to her ears one after another, like the rattle of musketry, heard from behind the torrent of some tremendous volume of falling water, some splashing Niagara of doom in her own mind. She had not realized till that second of time how far she had gone in her vague irrational hopes about the future, about a future in which he and she were, by some heavenly sorcery, linked together. Consciously it had been to her no more than an enchanted episode, "the perfume and suppliance of a minute"; but in the unconscious recesses of her mind — as happens with most women — she had been spinning, like an insatiable little silkworm, a subterranean cocoon of romantic inventions.

But it was over now; over for good and all; and she must get back to those self-effacing moods; those moods whose sweetness — though she had not guessed it at the time — must have been craftily nourished by these irrational wellsprings of hope, far, far below the surface.

She must get back to that feeling she had had, on the day in the Ashover drawing room, when he fell at her knees wounded, distraught, beside himself; and she became for the moment a calm healing spirit, without a single selfish desire of her own.

“They won’t have gone, will they?” she murmured, as they pushed their way back through the entangling undergrowth by the way they had come.

“They’ll have waited! They’ll have waited!” he kept saying, as he hurried forward.

When they came to the place where the ground was swampy and their feet sank into a substance that was brown-black with the dissolution of bark and leaves and grass roots and ancient moss, he put his arm round her waist to lift her faster along.

It was not till they were close to the hedge dividing the wood from the hayfield that Rook realized, as he released her waist and let her pause to tidy herself up and put on her hat, how white her face had become and how dazed and numb her whole being was. But self-absorbed in the mania of his remorse, it did pierce the armour of his egoism to see the look in her eyes as she stood fumbling with her hair in front of him, her arms raised and her body flecked with the shadows of leaves and branches. He became conscious that she, too, this troubled figure with the sycamore shadows wavering upon her dress, was unhappy in the same sort of way he was unhappy and without his toughness to bear it.

For a moment they passed out together beyond the circle of both their deep-bitten sorrows; and it was as if what he had felt as he gazed into

Betsy’s Cimmery Land crystal rose up again from beneath and beyond them and lifted them into a region outside the sphere of all human confusion.

“They’ve waited!” he whispered. “I can see Lexie and Mother. It’s all right, Nell dear!”

She smiled in answer and instinctively held out her hand. He took it and held it for a moment. “You’ve been very good to me, Nell,” he said. “I don’t know what I should do if I hadn’t got you.”

These last words of his coming after her realization, that afternoon, as never before, of how little, after all, she really meant to him, sounded as hollow to her ears as the mocking rhetoric upon a tombstone.

She did not speak but dropped his hand as one who had come to the end of her endurance and whose only desire was to escape. Breaking away from him she pushed blindly through the hedge and walked across the field without looking back.

CHAPTER XVIII

IT WAS JUST ten o'clock on that same June evening. So late was the sun in sinking and so protracted was the twilight that even now, although the last yellowish-green spaces in the infinite horizon had faded into steely gray, there yet remained a pallid nebulosity in the air, a nebulosity that seemed to emanate from the surface of the earth, as if the earth were its own moon and had the power of holding back both the velvety invasion of darkness itself and the natural luminousness of the high stars.

Nell had gone to bed by that curious earth light without requiring a candle. She lay now in an exhausted and docile suspension of all her energies; letting the fragrant airs that floated in through the open window stir her hair faintly and lightly upon her forehead and become the accomplices of that abnormal twilight of twilight which made the planetary orb itself resemble a leaf-shadowed glowworm.

She listened for a while in motionless passivity to the murmur of men's voices in the study across the passage. She even smiled to herself a little as the fantastic notion crossed her mind that she might be a girl in Damascus or Antioch or Stamboul or in some place where women had nothing of the free initiative such as they possessed on the banks of the Frome.

With this fancy still in her brain and the large serenity of that June night lulling her senses, she turned over on her side toward the wall. There, in the pallid dimness, she stared passively at a little chance-drawn mark on the gray-plastered surface before her, a quaint little hieroglyph of the fingers of accident, which had come to take many strange shapes and be associated with many strange feelings during her life in that room. Before she slept on this occasion that little scrawl took the shape of Mr. Twiney's cart; and in the cart, erect and straight, stood the figure of Lady Ann, holding the reins, like a classic charioteer!

She had a vague feeling that she herself was fleeing from this equipage, fleeing down the glade of a deep, deep wood; and then, all in a moment, like the celestial clouds thrown about their favourites by the Homeric gods, a great friendly mist received her and enveloped her; and she fell into a dreamless sleep.

Meanwhile, in the room opposite, a momentous and peculiar dialogue was imprinting itself, like a disordered pattern under the hands of a drink-crazed artist, upon the ethereal stuff of that June night.

"She gave you no sign, no hint, then — not one of any kind — as to where she was going when she got to London?"

William Hastings shook his head. Far down in the priest's subconscious nature there stirred a malicious exultation at the fact that he was holding back Netta's secret from this rival of his.

During these last two months, parallel with the cessation of his writing, there had arisen within him a more possessive attitude toward his wife, an attitude that made it harder for him to endure the girl's attraction to Rook. By one of those inexplicable contrarieties which seem so inevitable an adjunct to all erotic emotions, instead of being tempted to reveal Netta's address to Rook and thus to side-track him away from Nell, he was fortified and strengthened in what he had come to regard as a sacred contract with the other woman.

It is likely enough that in any case he would have held fast by his oath to the runaway; but under the present circumstances this oath became more and more of a superstitious trust, a trust into which he flung not only what was obstinate and unyielding in his nature but what was malicious and revengeful.

His pride had been hurt far more than he himself had realized by his wife's infatuation. He must have divined, even while still at work on his book, a good deal more of what was going on than he had permitted either Rook or Nell to detect.

He was a man whose subconscious emotions worked their way to the surface slowly, and, as it were, by a process of infiltration. His first response to his wife's attraction to Rook had been philosophical and indulgent, just as his first response to Netta's flight had been a concern for Rook himself; but both these moods were easy and superficial, while all the while there was gradually stirring within him a dark unconscious anger against Rook which only required the impact of some external shock or encounter to bring to head.

Thus in the matter of Netta's address his feelings had become extremely complicated. He had begun by keeping her secret out of a vague loyalty to her but he found himself keeping it now out of a definite hostility to Rook.

"No," he repeated monotonously to every appeal. "No. She only gave me that letter, which I gave you. Beyond that, you know as much of what happened as I do."

"Hastings, you're not concealing something from me because you think that if I get hold of Netta again it'll make my wife and my mother miserable, and upset everything? If that's what's in your mind I give you my word I won't bring her back! I've no thought of bringing her back, anyhow. It's the last thing I want to do now. I only want to see her, to know where she is; to get rid of this awful sensation of blankness and emptiness."

"So you feel like that, do you?" said William Hastings, pushing the matchbox across the table and lighting a cigarette himself. "I have often wondered, Ashover, whether it was possible for you to feel a thing like this, simply and naturally, as an ordinary man would feel it.”

“Did she mention,” interjected Rook, “when she was talking to you, any names of her friends?”

“She spoke of someone called Minnie,” answered the other.

“That was it! Minnie!” cried Rook eagerly. “Did she mention her surname? Did she mention what theatre she worked in? Did she mention what part of London she lived in?”

William Hastings drummed with his fingers carelessly on the table. He had given Rook his only easy chair; and he himself sat erect and nonchalant on the chair he used when he wrote.

“No. She mentioned no surname and no theatre. She talked of Minnie a great deal. She seemed very fond of Minnie. I began quite to visualize this remote young woman; not by her appearance exactly; but by the way Netta made you understand the sort of person she was. I got quite interested in Minnie, Ashover.”

“You’re sure she hasn’t written to thank you for that money? That’s the thing I cannot understand.”

Hastings became aware that irony and sarcasm were entirely irrelevant at that moment.

“No. She hasn’t written to me,” he answered simply. “If she did, of course I would tell you at once. I expect she’s got a place in some theatre. Has it occurred to you, Ashover, to go the round of the London theatres?”

Rook cast a puzzled, scowling look at his host. He became vaguely conscious that this little stubby dark-eyed man with the Napoleonic paunch was practising some derisive trick upon him.

“The round of the theatres? Good God, Hastings! what do you mean? Do you mean that I should enquire from every manager in London what people are on his list?"

The clergyman looked at him now with unmitigated malevolence. "Why don't you apply to some detective office, Ashover? Those people are trained like dogs for just this kind of thing. They would probably ferret her out in a very short time."

"I have thought of that," replied Rook, crossing his legs and lighting another cigarette. "The objection to my doing it is, I'm afraid, a ridiculously simple one; and you know what that is, Hastings!"

Hastings lifted his eyebrows and drummed on the table with his plump white hands. "I can guess," he said.

"I just haven't any cash," went on his visitor. "I mean, nothing approaching enough for a thing like that! And besides — I suppose you'll think it silly; but I have a sort of horror of using detectives to find Netta."

"Perhaps you don't really want to find her," said the clergyman.

Rook looked at him sharply from the depths of his armchair. He began to be much more conscious than he had been at first of the maliciousness in the man's tone.

"Why do you say just that, Hastings?" he asked drily; and if the priest had been more clairvoyant than he was he would have become aware of a sudden veering of the psychological weathercock.

It had begun to dawn upon Rook that this man was, in some secretive way he could not quite define, playing a game with him.

"Oh, I don't mean anything, Ashover. I understand well enough how you shrink from using those people. I only meant that sometimes one is unconscious of the real impulse behind one's actions."

"You're sure you didn't give her any more than those fifteen pounds?"

As he spoke Rook looked at the pale, plump face above him with its heavy-lidded greenish-black eyes and became conscious of the fact that he had no more notion of what went on in this extraordinary person’s mind than he had of what went on in the mind of some great toad hidden under a rhubarb leaf in Nell’s little garden.

Rook had insisted upon returning to Hastings that particular sum; and the clergyman, unwilling to make an issue out of a point of that kind, had accepted the money in the spirit in which it was given.

“Not a penny more,” repeated the man at the table, resting his chin upon his hands and staring at the oblong frame of grayness through which the scented night air came floating into the little room.

Rook uncrossed his legs and clutched the arms of his chair with angry, bony fingers. He scowled helplessly at the impassive countenance above him. There was something in the immense silence of that slowly descending etherealized darkness that seemed to render it a kind of brute stupidity in him not to be able to read his companion’s thoughts. That impalpable summer air was like a condensation of the thoughts of the terrestrial globe itself, strange, dreamlike, non-human, such as rose and fell, fell and rose, with the rhythm of some vast, placid, elemental sea.

Rook longed to tell the man that it was Nell herself who had suggested that he knew more of Netta’s plans than he had confessed; but even in his present harassed impatience he had not quite the cold-blooded cynicism to drag the young girl into their colloquy.

“Shall we have a light?” he remarked at last, when it seemed to him that Hastings was prepared to go on staring into the darkness without motion or change or limit.

The man did rise from his seat at this; moving stiffly, like a person whose soul has returned to its body after some long translunar journey. He lit a couple of candled and put them down on the table before him; where they bowed gently in that perfumed air, one after the other, like two grave acolytes in the presence of a dark altar.

"Hastings," said Rook all of a sudden when, with no change in his position, the theologian had resumed his mute dialogue with the wordless spaces.

"Well, Ashover?"

"If Netta, by any remote chance, does write to you, you won't fail to let me hear of it at once?"

Hastings smiled. "Of course I'll let you know of it, Ashover."

The curious thing at this moment was, that, by reason of some inherent duplicity and illusion-weaving power in Nature herself, the priest was actually fortified in his dissimulation by the great flow of honey-scented darkness which now flooded everything and drowned everything.

It was as if "the still small voice" of the very planet we live upon, when, in the absence of wind or storm, it makes itself felt from its inmost interior integrity, were saturated with some irremediable ultimate evasion. It was as though this old protean universe, when once you reached its native inherent character beneath all its masks and transformations, had its own secretive life illusion, its own eternal magic-bestowing falsehood, from which the subterfuges and equivocations of the human race drew living nourishment.

"Hastings," said Rook again. "If you did by any chance find out where Netta was, you haven't got any grievance against me, have you, that would make you want to hide it from me?"

Whatever may have been the reservoirs of planetary duplicity from which the priest was able to draw his support there was no need to use them just then; for an interruption occurred which saved him from any reply.

Two moths, of the species known to entomologists as yellow-underwings, flew into the room together and fluttered straight into one of the candles. Hastings gazed at them without moving; but Rook, springing up from his place, began a series of frantic efforts to catch them in his fingers. He stood by the table, making desperate clutching movements with his hands, while his companion, pushing back his chair a little, watched him gravely and silently.

One of the moths was caught at last, and going to the window Rook threw it, rather than released it, into the embalmed darkness outside. By the time he returned to the table, however, the other moth was lying singed and dead beside the candlestick.

"Why didn't you catch it?" he cried indignantly; and the sudden consciousness of what had really happened — of those two feathered amorists moving together over the dark currant bushes in a mysterious ecstasy; of their being drawn toward a flame that desired them not and indeed knew not of their existence; of their being separated with an absolute and final separation; of the one he had thrown out fumbling vaguely with its antennæ in that immense darkness, from under the shadow of a peony leaf or a dock leaf; fumbling and uttering — who knows? — lamentations and moanings that would sound like the voice of Eros himself if there were ears that could hear it — struck like a spear into Rook's brain.

He went to the window, closed it with a violent gesture, and throwing himself down with a groan into the creaking cane chair, rabbed his face with his hands.

"It's getting too much for me, Hastings," he said, "It's getting altogether too much for me! What qualities ought one to have to be happy in a world like this? Ay? Ay? What has Lexie got, for instance? Courage? A lust for life? A mania for the wretchedest flicker of consciousness, as long as it is consciousness? Oh, I would like to escape from the whole thing! To escape out of it, I tell you, clear, clear out of it!"

Hastings surveyed the agitated man with a concentrated frown. This interview was beginning to break up the misty veil of more natural human feeling which of late had been forming, like an attenuated film, over the dark river of his thought. The plummet thrown out by Rook's pessimism reached the surface of that formidable undercurrent and stirred its waters.

"Why do you say 'escape'?" he asked sternly. "The longing to 'escape' is only the other side of the lust to enjoy. It's as old as the hills, that 'clear, clear out of it!' and it's as feeble as a baby's wail." He looked at Ashover more gently now, as he felt within him, rising up from the depths, the pride of his own life illusion as opposed to the other's.

Ashover, too, felt, man-like, the challenge of a conflicting system of metaphysicalized self-assertion, and a gleam of interest in their discussion broke the gloom of his mood.

"Well? What do you do, Hastings, when you feel the turn of the great screw?"

"I never feel its turn, Ashover! I have nothing in me to resist it and therefore I can't feel it. We're talking in different languages."

Rook smiled. "I've always wanted to ask you what that book of yours is really about. It seems to me that this is a moment when I may do that."

The theologian got up. He walked to the window and opened it wide. Then he came back to the table and blew out both the flames.

"We needn't burn any more moths," he said in a low voice. "You and I can see enough of each other without candles."

He resumed his seat and the two men sat silently in their places in that perfumed darkness. There was a syringa bush by the garden gate and the smell of its flowers mingled with the less definite scent of the wide-stretching hayfields. There was a faint dampness in the air from the neighbourhood of so many water brooks, but this only had the effect of making the darkness larger and cooler and more liberating.

William Hastings gathered up within him those obscure magnetic forces to which human beings give the names of "will" and "thought" and "purpose." There flowed into the resultant complex of his energy, as the two sat silently there, a desire to undermine the very foundations of this proud, alien, inaccessible soul that lay chafing and fretting before him with this ridiculous wound in its heart. He felt no pity, no sympathy; but the obscure malice which had been slowly accumulating within him for many months took the form now of a longing to overcome the creature's remoteness and detachment, to invade it, to overwhelm it, to drown its rock base and carry it away on the torrent of his own stronger, more formidable identity.

With a movement of his fingers that was much more rapid and nervous than usual he struck a match with the mechanical intention of lighting a cigarette. The little burst of sulphurous flame illuminated his own bent head; and at the same time brought his companion's face up out of what seemed an abyss of nebulous darkness. He shook the flame into extinction and threw the match-end away.

"There's no pleasure in smoking when you can't see the smoke," he said.

"Well? Are you going to tell me about your book?" repeated the other.

There was a moment's deep silence between them that lay upon the filmy folds of the darkness like a dead child upon a woman's lap.

"Ashover!" The word seemed to come from a portion of the man's being that was behind and beyond his mere physical frame.

"Well? What is it?"

"Do you realize that there is a hidden struggle going on in the depths — an appalling struggle — between two Powers that are beyond man and beyond Nature?"

“I certainly do not,” muttered Rook sullenly.

“One of these Powers is the life force,” weat on the priest. “The other is the death force. And what I have come to realize lately is this: that just as man can put himself into the magnetic matrix of life and germinate new creations, so he can also unchain the cogwheel and break the mainspring in that ultimate darkness! In other words, Ashover, I have found out that the soul of man is a much more dangerous weapon than is usually imagined.”

“All this sounds to me very like what I’ve heard in church,” remarked Rook grimly.

“It is like that!” cried the priest, “It is! It is! But that only shows that what I’ve discovered answers to an indestructible instinct in the human race.”

“The human race is not much of a criterion,” grumbled the voice in the cane chair. “It swings east by north; and then it swings west by south. It’s a bloody weathercock, your race instinct!”

“It hasn’t swung much for the last five thousand years on this matter,” retorted the other. “Against all the claptrap of science it has steadily maintained the one great appalling truth that men and gods and all the living things in nature are only pawns and dice and counters in a conflict between two equal and unfathomable antagonists! Haven’t you yourself felt it, Ashover?” His voice dropped to a penetrating whisper which pierced the darkness like a conspirator’s dagger. “Haven’t you felt that everything you consciously thought and did had behind it something else; gave way into something; just as broken ice gives way? And haven’t you felt that this something was sometimes life and sometimes death? Haven’t you felt that kind of thing, Ashover?”

Rook’s voice out of the darkness had the sort of tone a floating tree trunk might have had, as it knocked against another, on the dark tide of a swirling river.

“My good man,” he said, “I’ve felt so often every kind of sickening sensation that I’ve lost the spirit to tabulate them. I don’t see why you should stop at this duality of yours. Why not take it for granted that the universe is crowded with levels, strata, planes, dimensions, altitudes, regions, all of them full of wretched sensitive beings like ourselves longing to escape?”

The intonation of weary scepticism in his voice seemed to have a peculiarly irritating effect on the priest’s nerves.

“You’re not serious, Ashover,” he said. “No one who analyses his own feelings can get away from this great undertow of opposite tides — the death urge and the life urge. What I’ve discovered is that we can get behind the scene and pull up the dam, so that the death force can flood the whole field.”

Rook’s voice became more weary and detached than ever, as all the mysterious polarities in his nature focussed themselves in fierce secretive resistance to this vision that was invading and seeking to dominate his own.

“I think nothing of these forces of yours, Hastings,” he retorted. “Why stop at life and death? Why not have a whole vortex of conflicting powers? Life and death are just words! All we know is a mad chaotic jumble of things that we call ‘living’ and things that we call ‘dead.’ What I feel is that the whole imbroglio may be a set of obscene dreams, a great concourse of phantasmagoric shadows, most of them disgusting; some of them magically lovely! And what I would like to do is to dive down into some lake of nothingness where you could forget that there ever were such horrors!”

Hastings became conscious of a definite feeling of anger toward this man. A vague throb in some old deep scar within him reverting to some half-forgotten outrage his pride had received, when he, a child of middle-class origin, had been insulted by these careless aristocrats, began to mingle now with a rationalist's natural indignation against merely fanciful speculations. These people never took these ultimate issues seriously. They were no more to them than the leap of fish in a mill pond! Phantasmagoric shadows! The great dark fragrant night about him, full of the odours of a red earth, pressed upon his brain with a sense of the thinness, of the irrelevancy, of these bodiless conjectures. Life? Did he not know its bitterness, its brutality only too well? Death? Was not this divine darkness a very symbol of the sweetness of the eternal sleep? He felt that if, at that moment, he could, by raising his hand, have plunged the whole stellar system into final destruction, he would willingly have raised it!

And this man, this Ashover, had now linked himself with a spirited, amorous girl who would soon — he knew it well enough! — satisfy this tenacious family's desire to continue alive upon the earth. And his own fragile neurotic Nell was obsessed by her girlish fancy for this indolent sceptic; this persifleur who, with his pools of nothingness, posed as a martyr of remorse because he had driven his mistress out of his house! What did the man know about "Dimensions, levels, regions"? Phrases of that kind, how hollow, how rhetorical they were, with this enchanted June night whispering to them of the realities of life and death!

Far off across the wide water meadows he could hear at intervals the husky cry of some lonely nocturnal bird, a night-jar, perhaps, or a bittern; and the sound came to him as something that fortified his drastic vision of things. Was he not, himself, a solitary nighthawk crying out aloud, in a language no man understood, as he felt the damp airs of the great flood coming up over the marshes?

"What I feel about all this" — it was Rook's voice speaking again, and more wearily, more indifferently than ever— "is that the true reality of things, the reality that we may wake up to when we die, is so completely different from life and death that it is a mere waste of time to argue about it. You say that my longing to escape is only the inverse of — well! of Lexie's mania for living. But what of your own mania for death and destruction, Hastings? Isn't that, too, with all the energy you throw into it, just the inverse of what you call the life urge? You are really just as dogmatic in your death-cult as Lexie in his life-cult! What I feed is that the whole thing is so mad and so chaotic that to dispute about it at all is to lend yourself to being fooled and deluded. Better let it alone; and just take each day as it comes."

Hastings began to experience one of the most discomforting sensations that the human soul can endure, the sensation of feeling his spiritual pride menaced by something alien, He gave his chair a jerk backward in the darkness and clenched the fingers of his right hand so tightly that the nails nearly pierced the flesh.

It was absolutely necessary to him at that moment to find himself stronger, more formidable, more evil even, than this man who carried the airy indifference of his class into the very gulfs! And the sophisticated trifler was loved by three women! The struggle between them had by this time become one of those primeval struggles between two horned animals, in which power over nature, power over women, and power over God are fantastically mingled as the elements of a war to the death.

It seemed to Hastings, at that second, as if their hostility to one another, this sullen obscure wrestling that was going on in the darkness, occupied an arena that sank down into the very navel of the earth.

He felt a desire to go to the window and lean out. From where he sat he could detect a group of little faint stars; and he tried feebly to recall what constellation it would be that at that particular hour looked down upon Toll-

Pike Cottage. A vague uneasiness had begun to trouble his mind; Was it possible that this Pyrrhonian attitude of Rook's toward life, this careless, indolent, drifting "chaoticism," gave the man the same advantage over him in philosophy as he possessed in the material world? But how could a person so casual, so formless, so evasive, be as close to the open secret as one who was concentrated and knit together, with a deep hard purpose in his mind?

He suddenly began to get an impression that Rook was playing with him, had been playing with him during the whole of their talk! That was an old trick of these accursed "upper classes." You never knew where you were with them; you never knew where you "had" them! Like a cold finger of boreal ice pointing at his central nerve the abominable suspicion began to invade his mind that his whole system of philosophizing was only a weapon in a fierce personal struggle for recognition, for ascendancy. Apparently it was not necessary for an Ashover to have recourse to such weapons! They need not formulate their philosophy. They need not be logical or rational. They could play with the realities of life and death as they played with their dogs and their guns and their girls. They could just lie back upon themselves and be what they were and all the rest of the universe might go on as it pleased! "Chaoticism" indeed! That was exactly the word. To walk through the lanes and the woods; to enjoy his meals; to seduce a girl here and a girl there; and to hand on his name by a well-timed marriage to another generation, who would also lie back upon themselves and talk of chance and chaos; while he, William Hastings, who had put his whole life's blood into a book of crushing, deadly, annihilating power only existed as an object of quaint interest, set aside as a fantastic-brained country parson who was useful for reading pious homilies in the presence of Ashover monuments!

"You won't deceive me in any way over Netta, Hastings?" The words, coming from the other hidden countenance, in that midnight chamber, floated away out of the window toward the little, unknown group of stars.

"Deceive you? Why on earth should I deceive you? I tell you you know everything there is to be known in the whole world!"

The man's voice took on at that point the peculiar quiver which indicates in highly strung nerves the approach of a collapse of all self-control.

"Why don't you apply to the detectives, Ashover!" he went on. "To the detectives!" And suddenly without the least intention he broke into a loud harsh rasping laugh. "The detectives!" he kept on gasping in a choking voice. "The detectives!"

It was Rook who felt a longing to go to the window now. That little room was becoming intolerable to him. He did, in fact, get up from his seat and stagger to the window sill, his legs numb and stiff; but Hastings was still rocking himself to and fro in such an alarming spasm of laughter that he remained leaning there with his face to the interior of the room.

The priest's sinister explosion died down at last and he lifted his head from his hands.

"So I suppose now," he said, addressing the dark figure that concealed so much of the starlit window frame, "you'll have an heir to your historic family."

Rook was too surprised by this rude remark to make any answer at all. He began to think the moment had arrived for bidding his host good-night. There evidently was nothing more to be got out of him with regard to Netta and he was in no mood for prolonging this scene.

But the ferment he had unwittingly aroused in Hastings's soul had not exhausted its vindictive ricochets. "And so it's a boy you're expecting, is it?" His voice became hoarse as he went on with unrestrained malice: "I saw Binnory Drool to-night. He talked about you and about Betsy and the others. You've seen the others, I suppose, Ashover?"

Rook struck a match now and advancing to the table lit one of the candles full in his host's face. He was so startled and shocked by the expression upon that suddenly illuminated countenance that he drew back with an unconscious exclamation of dismay.

"Ay! What's the matter, man? What's up? Are you angry with me about anything? What have I done?"

The priest jerked his chair farther back. "What was that word of yours?" he whispered huskily. "Phantasmagoric! A good word, phantasmagoric!"

Rook took up the other candle in his hand and lit it from the one that was already burning. The two small flames rose now between the two men like the horns of the ultimate Dilemma.

"Your people in the family vault must be in high feather these days, Ashover," the priest went on. "They've been working and working for this, for many a long year. They were getting quite anxious, down there under the stones! It would have been a pity to disappoint them, wouldn't it? I wonder what it feels like to have a long line of ancestors regulating one's private affairs? It must be an interesting feeling."

Rook looked round the room to see where he had put his hat and stick. He walked to the spot where they were and took them up. "Good-night, Hastings," he said. "I must be off now."

The priest rose to his feet like a man drunk or drugged.

"What would you have done," he said, "if I had known anything about Netta? Known, for instance, where her address was now? Would you have gone straight off to her? Would you have left your wife and have gone to live with her? Not a bit of it! You'd have given her a little flattery and a little money and come right back here to your walks and your meals and your ‘phantasmagoric shadows’! Tell me this, Rook Ashover. How does a phantasmagoric shadow look when its female shadow has been decoyed away? Does it dance like a good obedient puppet on well-pulled wires? Does it, Ashover — does it?”

It must have happened then that some mysterious nerve in the man’s inmost identity, some nerve which had been strained by his struggle with Rook to the breaking-point, did actually break at that moment, destroying the normal intellectual self-control that renders certain actions impossible. For what occurred seemed monstrous and fantastic when Rook recalled it afterward. Repeating the words: “Does it dance, does it, does it, does it?” the man skipped up toward Rook, his arms grotesquely stretched out, his face distorted into a goblinish leer, one leg bent and raised in the air, the other hopping along the floor.

Rook drew back in apprehension, thinking that Hastings would end by striking him; but instead of that what he did was to seize one of the brass candlesticks from the table and fling it with a wild swing of his arm against the door.

Rook made a half-defensive, half-protective movement toward him; but the gesture proved unnecessary. The man clapped his hands to his head, staggered across the room, and falling into the cane chair where the other had been sitting burst into a passionate fit of weeping.

Two things occurred one after the other then, that were afterward so closely associated together in Rook’s mind that it was difficult to separate them. From the silence of the darkness outside there came suddenly to his ears, carried as it seemed from, somewhere beyond the garden and beyond the immediate meadows, that same extraordinary sound which he had heard on the occasion of his night with Ann in the Drool cottage.

He had no time to analyze the nature of the sound, but there did flash across his consciousness a vague and irrational notion connecting it with the savage outburst with which this huddled and sobbing object in the chair had derided his unborn child. Had the prophet of annihilation been answered by a howl of counter-mockery from those silent tombs under the chancel slabs? Or was the whole thing a ghastly trick of his own disturbed brain, an auditory hallucination practised upon him by the agitation of that extraordinary encounter?

He bad no time to question further this "supernatural soliciting," to use the Shakespearean word, when the door of the room opened silently and, by the light of the one candle that still burned upon the table, appeared the white figure of Nell, her hair loose about her shoulders, her feet bare.

She had been awakened from a deep sleep by the noise of the candlestick hurled against the door, and without any clear consciousness of where she was or what she was doing she had rushed blindly across the landing.

Rook, who had flung down his hat and stick upon Hastings's desk, now made a mechanical movement toward them, feeling that it was not the moment to intrude any longer upon these two people.

Nell stopped him with a quick gesture.

"Oh, what is the matter?" she cried. "No! No! I can't let you go like that until I know what's happened! What is it, Rook? What have you done to him? Have you two been quarrelling?"

There was no need for Rook to reply for Hastings himself got up from the chair.

"Go back to your room, Nelly dear," he said gently, but in a tone that made it difficult for the girl not to obey him. "I'll just see Mr. Ashover out and then I'll come. Have you got everything, Ashover? I don't think you'd anything but your stick, had you?"

Rook could do nothing but just press Nell’s hand as he passed. Her eyes clung to his in that dim candlelight in a way he never forgot. He left her standing with the light in her hand at the top of the stairs.

“Good-night, Ashover. I’m afraid I lost my wits just now. I have quite got them back.”

“Good-night, Hastings, and I beg you not to think any more about it or indeed about any of these things too much. It’s better sometimes to wake up in the morning as if you were newly born.”

He held out his hand as he spoke and Hastings, after a moment’s hesitation, took it.

“Perhaps it’s just as well once in a way to lose one’s wits,” he said. “Don’t be afraid. If ever I hear from Netta I shall let you know. Good-night, Ashover.” And he closed the door behind him with a faint recrudescence of his lost sense of formidableness.

At least he had not revealed to him Netta’s secret. It was necessary to his very life, at this moment of the supreme wreck of his self-respect, that the simple chance-given vantage ground of having the girl’s address in his hands should act as a counterpoise to his abasement.

The ultimate duplicity of the universe, whether it were logical or phantasmagorical, had at least given him one way of crying an incontestable “checkmate!” to the Squire of Ashover.

CHAPTER XIX

THE LAST DAY of June found most of the Frome-side hay fields cut and carried. Not only so, but the newly sprouting grass in nearly all of these peaceful enclosures had begun to assume that peculiarly rich shade of green, deeper than the first spring verdure and in a certain sense even fresher, by reason of the fact that at the earlier season the new shoots are surrounded by so many of the old winter-bleached blades and stalks, whereas, at this great midsummer solstice, between the time of the rains and the time of the coming of the roses, the mowing machines have made a clear field for that vivid aftermath.

The wild roses were out already, and in their glory; so were the cream-yellow clusters of honeysuckle; so also the firstborn of the foxgloves. Field orchids and bird’s-foot trefoil were taking the place of daisies and cowslips; and down in the water meadows ragged robin and marsh-woundwort were lifting their heads amid the innumerable spear points of the new-grown rushes.

Dragon-flies began to appear in greater numbers over the rain-filled cattle ponds and along the ditches; the most common kind being those whose bodies were as blue as kingfishers and their wings like quivering fans of quicksilver chequered with powdered jet dust.

All through that month, through the earlier days of sunshine and through the later days of turbulent rains, Rook had sullenly been groping in his mind for some clue to the almost triumphant malice with which Hastings treated him now whenever they met. He found it difficult to believe that it was simply due to jealousy over Nell; for of late he had hardly seen anything of the girl and when they did meet it was under conditions to which the most jealous husband could hardly take exception.

The fact that his absorbing remorse about Netta had destroyed all desire within him for other women produced the illusion in his mind that he was isolated, cut off, marooned and under a sort of curse. To himself he seemed a moral leper, doomed to produce unhappiness wherever he went or whatever he did; and so, as often happens with egoists of his kind, he took it for granted that others saw him exactly as he saw himself.

That it never occurred to him that he might be paying the penalty now for earlier irresponsibilities was due to the fact that in those first days of his encounters with Nell, Hastings had seemed so entirely removed from all mundane or human emotions. The man had not been exactly what the old books used to call a "wittold"; but he had certainly produced the impression that no romance in which his wife chose to be involved was likely to worry him very much. But all that was completely changed! He felt as if Hastings were watching him with the eye of a malignant raven; and though his own sensuality was as dead in him, just then, as if he had been swimming among icebergs, it was an intensification of his self-condemned loneliness not to have the balm of Nell's sympathy.

This last day of the month was a day of days. It was one of those sequences of twenty-four hours that seem in some way detached and isolated from the rest of the season. There was a mild steady wind blowing from the southwest, a wind that in its journey across the orchards and dairies of the west country seemed to have gathered up the sharp taste of green apples and of green corn, and to have mingled this more astringent essence with the rain-scented breath of heavy-uddered cattle and with the sweetness of old-fashioned rows of pinks in hot sunny borders, between brick paths and box hedges.

By one of those earth-obsessed intuitions which his growing malady seemed to render more intense and clarified every day, Lexie had predicted the occurrence of this halcyon weather and had arranged to have himself driven out by Mr. Twiney to a place called Comber’s End, which lay on the farther side of the great stretch of water brooks and meadows on the edge of which the village of Ashover stood.

Comber’s End itself was hardly a hamlet; its chief peculiarity being an old manorial farmhouse surrounded by a large pond or small lake, of considerable depth, at one extremity of which was an ancient water mill.

Rook was to meet his brother at the spot and they were to lunch together there, Lexie bringing the meal with him carefully packed in a basket by Mrs. Bellamy.

There was no road of any kind directly across the marshes. The best toad for driving round them was several miles east of the village, while the way Rook had selected to walk, following narrower and rougher lanes, was nearly as far as that in the western direction.

It was indeed down a narrow grassy road that he found himself walking, in the mid-hours of that unusual morning, with the larks singing above his head, the warblers chattering in the hedges, and the lane itself stretching away in front of him, a long straight line of narrowing perspective bordered by pollard willows. He felt wearily, hopelessly sad, as he walked along, switching aimlessly with his stick the dock leaves and hemlock plants and rousing from their noon siesta, now a long-legged heron, and now a green snake, while the far-travelled wind rustling through the alders and the guelder bushes seemed to him like a trailing army of defeated sighs; sighs that died upon the air, one after another, and were replaced, one after another, by new fugitives from new fields of remote disaster.

Rook would have felt less sad if he could have regarded the impasse in which he was caught as a matter of blind destiny. The poison that rankled in him came from the thought that he could have escaped from the whole thing if only he had been sensible as Lexie was sensible, and had not just run headlong upon the shoals, like a ship with a mad pilot.

He felt responsible at that moment for the unhappiness of all the lives within his reach. His mother alone was free from the curse that seemed to have fallen upon him; his mother, and perhaps his unborn child. Even his love for Netta was not so much a craving for Netta's society as a wretched remorse at being the cause of her disappearance.

He examined his heart as he went along; and it was borne in upon him that he never had really, in all his life, loved a single human being except his brother. And now his brother was dying.

As he stared at the long lines of pollard willows on either side of the lane, their grotesque trunks, topped by what looked like thick upstanding panic-stricken hairs, became to him a silent avenue of Rook Ashovers, each of them born without a heart and each of them awaiting some kind of retributive judgment day! He wished he could walk along that road for ever and ever; or that, by walking along it till his knees tottered and his soul was sick to death, he might do penance for the misery he had caused.

He saw life at that moment in a different light from any that he had seen it in before. He saw it as a place where not to have become involved in any other existence was the only cause for real thankfulness to the gods; in any other existence than such as was organically linked with his own. For his relation with Lexie had brought only happiness to them both. So had his relation with his mother until she had imbibed this mania about his marriage.

The rest was all misery! Netta he had disappointed and thrown aside. Nell he had tantalized and thrown aside. Ann he had provoked and humiliated beyond the point of forgiveness. What was there about him that made any intimate association with a woman dangerous and fatal? Not simply his selfishness. Plenty of selfish men enjoyed, after their fashion, eminently successful lives with the girls of their choice. There was something about himself, something about his kind of selfishness, that was as deadly to his happiness with these sensitive creatures as was catsbane to cats or wolfsbane to wolves!

He tried to imagine a world in which there were no women at all, or rather a world in which he himself had no dealings with women. Could he have lived, in harmonious and contented happiness, without any amorous dalliance? He remembered a certain day when someone or other, he forgot who the person was, had challenged him about his idleness, had suggested that to go on as the impoverished Squire of Ashover, doing nothing but walk and eat and sleep, was unworthy of a man with any spirit. He swung his stick into a bush of dogwood and chuckled aloud. God! he had intelligence enough to dispose of that indictment. What did it matter? The world was full enough of "honourable men" struggling frantically to get the advantage of one another in this race for success, for fame, for recognition, for achievement. What did it matter? Better, far better, to live harmlessly in some quiet untroubled place, watching season follow season, month follow month, aloof and detached; leaving the breathless procession of outward events to turn and twist upon itself like a wounded snake!

What did it matter? There was no "great Task-master" in the invisible world waiting to fall upon him with upbraidings and penalties. The opinions of his tribe, of his class, of the human race itself — what did they really amount to? His account was with the universe that had tossed him forth and that would receive him again. No! he could sink back deep enough into his own nature to let accusations of that kind fall harmless about him. It was not in that direction that his mistake lay. His mistake lay in not recognizing that unless a man has the stomach of a pirate it is better to give these tempting brigs and brigantines a wide berth; better to sail the high seas without meddling with any of them!

If only he had found out how fatally Nature had mingled the elements in him before he committed himself to Netta or Nell or Ann! This blending of an irresistible attraction to the feminine body and mind, with an absolute lack of emotional passion, was nothing less than a monstrous deformity! What kind of a heart had he, when he could find it in him to wish that he had never set eyes on any one of the three? His instincts were not perverted. They were only so capricious and elusive, so bloodless and non-human, that they flitted over the flower beds of life very much as those little blue butterflies he was watching now flitted from that patch of St. John's-wort to that patch of hawk-weed!

He began to walk more slowly and driftingly along that interminable lane. He felt as if he had already been following it for half a day; and it still stretched straight in front of him, without any sign of an end or of a turning. It seemed to melt into that leafy horizon as the moon-path across the sea on a moonlit night dips down over the rim of the world.

He felt utterly weary of himself and his familiar destiny. Yet he found it impossible even to conceive of any other. The idea of leaving Ashover and starting life afresh with any new ambition was as far from what his energy could compass as for a perch in Saunders' Hole to turn into one of the swallows that skimmed its surface.

What he craved, with all the desperation of a fox caught by wire netting in a fowl run, was just to be free; free, to enjoy precisely such an excursion with Lexie as this one was, without feeling a dull throb in his secret conscience, like the throb of a malignant growth in the pit of his stomach!

He stopped for a while, leaning over a gate and gazing into the green slime of a cattle-trodden ditch, across which three orange-bodied dragon-flies were darting with as much arrogance as if it were a Venetian lagoon.

He had a feeling that some deep inarticulate grievance, much less clearly defined than these other causes of misery, was obscurely stirring within him. He tried to plumb the recesses of this emotion and he came to the conclusion that it was a blind repulsion at the idea of being married to Lady Ann. He suddenly found himself actually trembling with a convulsive fit of anger against his wife; and not only against his wife. It was as if he had never realized before how profoundly his life illusion was outraged by his marriage. The thought that he was irretrievably committed to this brilliant high-handed companion; the thought that his life was no longer to be a series of sweet solitary sensations, but a thing which was only half his own, stripped the magic from earth and air and sky!

And this was a trick that had been played upon him by a subtle conspiracy of all the persons in his entourage. His mother and Lady Ann had plotted for it. Netta had sacrificed herself for it. Nell had accepted it and condoned it. And most of all, that indestructible and accursed entity, the House of Ashover itself, had pushed him into it with urgent, unwearied, importunate hands, all the more powerful because they were invisible!

His mind began running up and down the events of his life. He had drifted into this cul-de-sac in a sort of anæsthetized trance. Something vety deep in his nature had always preserved an absurd faith in his power of extricating himself from any trap. This faith no doubt depended on his emotional detachment; on those remote translunar journeys of his mind that seemed to reduce all human relations into a misty puppet show, seen through the smaller end of a telescope!

He cast about in his brain until his mind trailed its wings and sank huddled and drooping from sheer exhaustion in the attempt to find some outlet from his dilemma.

To and fro those orange-bodied dragon-flies darted. To and fro across the oozing footprints of the cattle, between great heaps of dung, clouds of infinitesimal midgets hovered and wavered; while in a corner of clear water a group of tiny black water beetles whirled round and round, as if they were trying to outpace their own small shadows which answered to their movement, down there on the sunlit mud, in queer radiated circles like little dark-rimmed moons.

The peculiar nature of Rook’s intelligence did not permit him the pragmatic refuge of some drastic change in his system of life. His soul wilted and sagged but he felt no energy to cry: “Hold … enough!” to the cohorts of chance; or to deify them with ethical nicknames.

That the universe could be envisaged as a place where human characters were hammered and chiselled into some premeditated mould of valour or resignation never so much as crossed the threshold of his consciousness. His vision of things would go on to the very end drawing its quality from just such vignettes of the ways of nature as he was staring at at that moment — those casual heaps of cattle dung, those dancing midges, that green pond slime, those revolving jet-bright beetles!

He was sick and weary with the effort of thinking; of thinking round, and round in the same circle. He was like a hunted gladiator who, in his blind race for life, keeps seeing the same impassive faces looking down upon the same heart-breaking circuit of the arena.

At that particular moment it began to dawn upon him that this numb, paralyzed, gray, horizonless state was worse, in the kind of misery it produced, than his furious self-accusations about Netta.

It was not the Netta trouble that was hurting him the deepest now, it was his reaction to his marriage; a reaction that seemed to menace the very essence of his identity, an essence that had winced and squirmed under the whip of his remorse but after all had been there, intact and integral in the darkness; there for good or for evil!

But his marriage seemed in some mysterious way to invade this precious untouchable essence, to swamp it, to blur it, to destroy its outlines. The truth was that the peculiar "formula" or illusory "symbol" of his especial kind of sensuality had always implied a very definite relation between himself and the object of its attraction, a relation according to which it was necessary for him to feel himself entirely independent and detached from the other person; necessary, in fact, that he should feel himself to be stronger, more formidable, more integrated than this other.

Under conditions of that kind, with every nuance of this "formula" satisfied, he could be tender, pitiful, and even clairvoyant; as he had been, almost to the last, in his feeling about Netta; but when this "formula," this symbolic projection of the realistic fact reflected in the distorting lens of his mind, was broken up by a differently adjusted balance of relations, in place of tenderness he was liable to feel a blind hostility, and in place of pity a cold-blooded vindictive malice.

His "love-making" with Cousin Ann had always been of a very light and a very superficial sort, from his side of the encounter; just because the strength of her nature precluded that protective or possessive thrill which his vice demanded; and now that he found himself actually married to her, nothing that her brilliance or her beauty or her grand manner could achieve gave him the faintest sensual pleasure.

Rook's was the kind of nature that derives no satisfaction from sensual emotion unless it is at liberty to disparage rather than to idealize; to pity rather than to admire; to possess rather than be possessed; and in every one of these requisites he was outraged and frustrated by his marriage with his cousin.

What he really required of life was not an impassioned love with an equal mate, but certain faint, vague, elusive ecstasies that were entirely unspiritual, entirely unemotional, and entirely de-personalized. Women were to him not human souls to be loved for themselves but just vibrant quivering telegraph wires, from which, as they stretched across land and river and hill in their long mysterious reach, the rain-scented winds of night and morning drew magical hummings and whisperings and wild sad prophecies!

Rook had never possessed any sense of proportion; and he was especially liable to let his moods become manias when they were associated with anything physiological. At that moment he got the sensation that his brain was going to burst like the seeds of a gorse-bush in hot weather, as he contemplated those jet-black beetles revolving in their unwearied circles.

He felt as if Lady Ann's personality were actually adhering to his own; and not only adhering to it, but sucking it up; as a whirlpool might suck up a paper boat!

His imagination got more and more unbalanced; ran riot more and more wildly; as he thought of himself in relation to this cousin-wife. He began to feel as if from henceforth to the day of his death he were destined to be deprived of all separate individual reality, destined to become a mere husk or shell, in the centre of which was nothing that could assert itself, or sink down into itself, but only something that had to reflect, reflect, reflect the thoughts of a completely alien person.

He felt as though this female creature, to whom he was now so indissolubly linked, were some sinister living growth, fungus-like and carnivorous, that devoured his flesh and drank his blood; something that it would be necessary to cut away from his inmost bones before he could breathe freely or take any natural pleasure in life again.

The feeling grew and grew upon him, as he stared at that stagnant pond; till it seemed as if some actual magnetic power were menacing him with suffocation! And then, all in a moment, he found himself continuing his slow progress along that interminable pollard-bordered road.

For some reason or other connected with the tension in his brain, the hedges ceased to be green under that halcyon sky. They became gray, like the colour of wood-ashes. The trunks of the willows, too, became gray; and the lane itself under his feet, its deep clay-stiffened cart ruts and its margins of silverweed and feverfew, became gray as the face of some enormous dead creature upon which he was treading.

A paralysis of dizziness seized him, mingled with an abysmal loathing for he knew not what. He staggered as he walked and he found himself feebly shaking his head as if to make some overt protestation against a vision of things that his reason still assured him was unreal.

And then it was that a rider, mounted upon a tall gray horse, came cantering toward him and, pulling up when he reached him, turned his horse round and proceeded to ride by his side along the lane, talking to him as he rode. The horseman was a young man of singularly prepossessing appearance, and as he bent down over the animal’s neck to bring his face nearer to the pedestrian, Rook received a vivid impression that something which had happened to him before was now going to happen again and in exactly the same way.

He was not in the least surprised to detect in his companion’s face a certain unmistakable resemblance to his own, nor was he startled or in any way shocked when the youth addressed him as “Father.”

“It is just dizziness,” Rook found himself saying. “It has nothing to do with what I have been suffering.”

“You must not suffer, Father,” the youth said gently, stroking his horse’s neck with a light hand.

“I thought just now,” Rook retorted, “that there was no human being in the world unhappier than I am.”

“Why are you unhappy, Daddy?” enquired the youthful rider.

“It’s an indescribable horror,” Rook answered. “Something that a lad like you had better not try to think about. I myself could hardly put it into words. But the effect it has upon me I could describe; only that would make you as miserable as I am.”

He placed his hand on the edge of the rider’s saddle and the boy laid his own upon it and began caressing it.

“There’s no need for you to tell me, Daddy,” he murmured. His voice became so low and faint just then that Rook glanced at him anxiously. And it was not only that his voice seemed to sink away like a wind that sighed itself into silence among feebly stirred grasses. His very form and face grew shadowy and indistinct.

Rook was conscious of making a quick desperate effort to hold both horse and rider near his side. He had the sense of clinging tenaciously to something that was falling back into fathoms of water. The very silence into which the boy’s voice sank, the grayness into which his form dwindled and receded, seemed to be broken and troubled by a confused medley of hummings and murmurings, obscure, indistinct, unintelligible to the man's ears.

"I thought just now," Rook went on, holding tightly to the edge of the rider's saddle, "that there was no one in the world more cowardly, more contemptible than I am; no one in the world more treacherous, lecherous, and mean-hearted! And then I saw that the green slime was the green slime, that the cattle dung was the cattle dung; and it came into my head that a man has to accept himself for what he is; or if he can't do that just kill himself and end it!"

Kill himself and end it! The words seemed to drift away, over the flanks of the horse and over the pollard willows, as if they possessed some palpable body of their own that could not dissolve at once into the air. Rook heard them floating across the fields. Why didn't they sink into that mass of grayness that now began suffocating him again?

He made a convulsive clutch at his companion's fingers, and once more that fresh, fair youthful face leaned down close to his own.

"It must be the boy from Comber's End," he wanted to say to himself; but in place of saying "Comber's End" the word "Ashover" came into his mind.

And then again it seemed inevitable and natural that the youth should be murmuring: "It's all right, Daddy; it's absolutely all right."

"I must tell him about the green slime," Rook thought insistently. "I must make it clear to him about the cattle dung."

"There's a heron over there, Daddy," said the young horseman quietly, "and it hasn't a gray feather on it."

For some reason or other the sense of a heron having nothing gray, not one single feather of gray about it filled Rook with indescribable relief.

"Can it fly?" he whispered.

But the boy was silent again and once more both horse and rider seemed to recede and recede into an enveloping mist. Frantically Rook clung to those youthful fingers, and as he clung to them they grew warm and firm again under his touch

"It was the green slime," the man began again, in a hurried husky voice, his brain full of the one obstinate desire to make a very difficult point clear. "And the cattle dung," he added, pressing the horseman's hand against his saddle.

"What they made me think was that no one who makes any effort to change his nature or to change any one else's nature has any right to be alive upon the earth." His voice subsided but he was still driven on by that desperate impatient sense that he must make everything plain before the lad cantered off.

"Slime — dung — not one gray feather — —" he gasped wildly; and then, in a sudden burst of exultant freedom: "No one is worthy to live," he cried with a loud voice, "who doesn't know — who doesn't know — —"

"What, Daddy?" whispered the voice at his side.

He flung the words into the air now with a ringing triumphant voice.

"Who doesn't know that all Life asks of us is to be recognized and loved!"

The young rider suddenly snatched up the hand with which Rook had been so desperately retaining him and raised it to his lips. Then he gave him a smile the penetrating sweetness of which diffused itself through every fibre of the man's body.

"Good-bye, Daddy!" he murmured gently; and whispering some quick word to his horse he gave the bridle a shake and cantered away down the lane.

The sound of the retreating horse hooves subsided slowly into silence. The boy's face, so unmistakably resembling his own but with a beauty and power in it beyond anything he had ever approached, remained in his mind as an ineffaceable reality!

"Recognized and loved," he muttered; and there arose within him the feeling that it was for the creation of a being like this that all the suffering he had caused and all the horror he had endured found their solution. It was toward this that the invincible life purpose, reaching out from the buried dust of his ancestors to him, had been pushing him blindly forward, tearing a path for it, clearing a way for it, through all his confusions and calamities!

The rider's figure was out of sight, however, now; and the beat of his horse's hooves was quite silent. The feeling which had arisen from some subconscious recess in the man's nature died down with their vanishing. Rook surveyed the empty road in front of him with a vague, incredulous smile. Then he shook his head in the same feeble protesting manner as he had done before.

"Rook Ashover, you must look to your wits!" he muttered; and he struck at a tall patch of hog weed out of which fluttered a tortoise-shell butterfly.

All sorts of quite irrelevant and even ridiculous things came into his mind. He remembered a wooden sword that he had played with as a child and he saw distinctly the gray dilapidated mane of a hobbyhorse he used to ride. Then there came suddenly into his head the word "Gorm," written upon a ghostly signpost.

"That boy must be the boy from Comber's End," he repeated mechanically. But as soon as he had formulated the words he remembered that it was when he himself was a boy that he used to meet the farmer's son of that remote manor house.

The face of the countryside had retaken its natural colour from him now. The appalling grayness which had so mysteriously fallen upon it had completely vanished.

"I must have worried myself into some sort of fit," he thought. "I wonder if I fell down just now and have been lying on the road, as Mother used to say I did when I was a boy. God! I must be a bit more careful how I let my thoughts run away with me! I wonder if someone on horseback did pass me by, or pick me up? But what on earth could I have said to the chap? He must have thought I was drunk. God! I must have seemed perfectly mad to him! I talked to him as if he were Ann's child grown into a man. And he talked to me like that."

He pulled his hat down over his head and walked steadily forward, puzzled and disturbed. He could see the end of the lane now, about a quarter of a mile in front of him. It merged itself in a broad highway, the famous Roman road between Salisbury and Exeter, and at the point where it met the road stood a copse of larches, incredibly fresh and green against the southern sky.

Rook continued to review with a sullen puzzled obstinacy his recent experience. What annoyed him was that he kept seeing that green slime and those trodden cattle droppings; and then completely losing the thread of everything. Had he fainted there by the pond and just dreamed about the rest? But when he came to his senses he was out of sight of the pond. He must have got up and walked on, still in a state of unconsciousness! He had heard of people doing that kind of thing. What did they call it? Amnesia. Well! He must stop letting his thoughts run on into these wretched manias. He had been worrying himself too much. Marriage? Well! Other men had made fools of themselves before, without falling into these morbid spasms of horror. Was he, deep down in his subconscious nerves, twisted in some way, unnatural, abnormal, without the ordinary masculine feelings about women? He knew that the excitement with which he was now hurrying to Comber's End was something beyond any emotion he had ever felt in awaiting a rendezvous with a woman.

Was that fainting-fit into which he had fallen just a mental reaction from some deep shock of physical aversion connected with his marriage to his cousin?

He stood quite still under the green clump of larches and pondered on this with a scowling brow.

What nonsense! He remembered how wonderful and lovely that night in Drools' cottage had been. Was it nothing but the heady fumes of that rich Dorchester ale, nothing but the sorcery of those snow-burdened midnight spaces, that had cast such a glamour over that encounter? Was he, down deep below all his love affairs, an indurated, an incorrigible misogynist? He shuddered a little as the memory of the nausea through which he had passed reapproached the threshold of his consciousness. He shook it off with a jerk of his head and a wave of his stick; and started at a swinging, resolute stride, northward, along the highway.

"I'm tough enough to survive these shocks," he thought to himself; "and I can drink my draught of Lethe and forget them all."

He looked around him now with a return of his natural de-personalized passion for that perpetually changing face of the Frome valley.

"Forget them all," he repeated to himself: and out of the depths of his soul he uttered a kind of inarticulate prayer to those green pastures, to those leafy woods, to those sailing clouds, that he might remain to the end their unperturbed, unaffrighted votary!

After a quarter of an hour's walking along the Roman road he came to a lane on his right which was as thickly overgrown with summer grass as if it had been a narrow elongated meadow. "To Comber's End" said the signpost at the corner; and Rook hastened down this propitious avenue of greenness with a nearer approximation to a light heart than he had known for many a long day.

After following the lane's winding course for some twenty minutes and getting, as it seemed, deeper and deeper into a maze of ancient orchards and dark-stemmed covers he came to a place where his path widened out into a kind of miniature parkland.

Acres of velvety grass dotted with thick-trunked oak trees lay spread out before him in the hot, shadowless noon sunshine, with a herd of brown-and-white cattle feeding on one side of it and a group of horses lying asleep on the other.

The scene had that peculiar monumental quality under the cloudless sun, such as does not often, even in the most privileged localities, arrest the traveller's attention. It struck Rook now as if it came to him with the weight of a whole series of complicated human impressions behind it. It seemed to summon him forth, as it must have summoned his ancestors before him, out of the cluttered distractions of the passing hour into some larger, nobler world, some world that lay all the while only just behind the familiar, the taken-for-granted, the common undistinguished face of crude reality!

He crossed the grass with a happy liberated step; passed close to the sleeping horses whose huge and sprawling abandonment had something so naked, so animal about it — their legs and hooves protruded so shamelessly from their round bellies! — that he felt as if he were some shadowy supernumerary come to life in the rich canvas of a Tintoretto or a Titian; one of those carelessly sketched anonymous figures whose business it is to stare modestly and self-effacingly at some great mythopœic event whose "persons" are gods and beasts and heroes.

Passing down an avenue of chestnut trees, whose branches made a flickering catafalque over his head, he came to the edge of the little lake on the farther side of which the Comber's End manor house stood.

The place was as majestic and undisturbed as if the centuries had passed over it like a flock of wild geese dropping nothing but a few gray feathers to mark their flight.

The kitchen garden of the manor farm was surrounded by a high brick wall, the eastern side of which abutted upon the lake, leaving only a narrow footpath, overgrown with tangled vegetation, between it and the actual water.

Rook, as he saw all this, was suddenly almost glad that he had not come bolt upon his brother! That peculiar thrill, unlike anything else in the world, that trembles through us when, quite alone, we arrive suddenly upon a scene that answers to our deepest æsthetic exigencies is quickly dissipated by the neighbourhood of even the most friendly alien personality.

It establishes itself, this feeling, as if it were a furtive, intimate understanding between ourselves and whatever scene it may be answers to our craving.

And such moments have another, a yet more subtle value; namely, their power of linking themselves up in some mysterious way with all the other past moments of a similar nature that we have passed through in the course of our life. Toward these other moments the present one seems to gravitate by a natural affinity, taking its place among them and establishing itself among them, in such a way as to draw them out more clearly, more definitely, from their hidden retreats, and to make us more vividly aware of them.

It is then that we become conscious that in addition to the ordinary gregarious human life, led by us in contact with others and in the stress of our normal pursuits, there is another, a more intimate life, solitary and detached, that has its own days and months and years, such as are numbered by no measurings of common time, by no computation on any terrestrial almanac.

Underneath the procession of our normal days the visions of these solitary moments mingle and flow, making the dust and noise of the overt drama of our life seem crude and vulgar in comparison. They have nothing to do with the emotional or with the rational processes of our nature, these moments of vision. They are purely æsthetic. Yet they are not æsthetic in the sense of being entirely preoccupied with what is usually called beauty. The more definite and more suggestive word "magic" indicates better the quality to which they respond. For "magic" can be felt, both in landscapes and in other places, where there are few elements of those high mysterious values which we associate with the beautiful.

As Rook stood now on the edge of Comber's End Pond and watched the moor hens and coots and wild ducks floating upon water that was the colour of lapis-lazuli, it was not the beauty of the scene that carried his consciousnes down that strange interior river, under ancient bridges and by hushed gardens, past shadowy terraces and turreted towers, past lonely towpaths and long-stretching melancholy roads! It was something that might easily have worked its charm upon him had the place lacked almost all the gracious beauty it possessed; had it been no more than a couple of stunted pine trees staring down upon the raw edges of a deserted quarry!

Rook's own particular response to the accidental groupings of scenery was something that implied sometimes a vindictive malice against the richer forms of loveliness and an obstinate sullen preference for things that were abject, woebegone, god-forsaken. Thus were certain peculiar characteristics in his erotic life transferred to his æsthetic life; and the misery of his yearning to comfort the unhappy Netta found itself balanced by his malignant reaction from the brilliant Ann.

Suddenly to his immense astonishment he caught sight of his brother where least of all he had expected to find him; and as he chuckled to himself and waved his stick in the air he became for a moment a completely different human being.

Gone were all his dark manias and phobias. Gone were all the mystic ecstasies of his secretive personal life. In one great wave of joyous rejuvenation he became a boy again with the companion of his boyhood!

An aspen poplar, blighted by some long-forgotten thunderstorm, stretched a great dead leafless branch, bifurcated in the centre, right over the surface of the lake. Out upon this perilous projection the reckless invalid had managed to climb; and there he lay, in serene and triumphant complacency, his Cæsarean head propped against the blackened trunk and his thin bare legs dabbling in the water. He had been there all the while, watching Rook with a whimsical amusement, and all he did now, when his elder brother walked over to his retreat, was to greet him with such a satiric grimace that Rook felt the same disturbed boyish embarrassment that he used to feel in the very old days when Lexie took him to task for some piece of egoistic priggishness which he had hoped had passed unnoticed by that cynical eye.

“You don’t expect me to join you out there, I hope,” said the elder Ashover, regarding his brother’s position with some apprehension. “What have you done with poor Twiney and his cart?”

Lexie’s only reply to this was to make a second grimace which crumpled up his classical countenance till it resembled one of those goblinish tailpieces with which 18th-century publishers used to adorn their more decorative quartos.

"Don't you worry about your lunch before the moment I've arranged for it, brother Rook," he remarked after a moment of silence; during which Rook seated himself upon the bank at the foot of the tree. "The amazing thing is that I've managed to get you here at all considering the way you've treated me these last weeks."

"Ay? What's that? Oh, you mean that I've been more often to Toll-Pike than to your place? What nonsense! I haven't seen Nell for the last fortnight and we've been together twice — no, three times! — in that time."

Lexie settled himself more comfortably in his seat, drew out of his pocket a small cardboard box, rattled it vigorously, opened it, shook the contents into the palm of his hand, and conveying it from there to his mouth, swallowed it at a gulp.

"What's that?" enquired Rook, lighting a cigarette and stretching out his legs in luxurious contentment.

"Morphia tablets," replied his brother with ironic brevity.

There was a touch of bitterness, of faint reproach even, in the tone with which those two sinister words were uttered, which Rook did not miss.

The two men looked for a moment into each other's eyes. Rook was the first to remove his gaze; and as he turned it upon the sunlit waters of that great placid pond that he and Lexie had visited together from their earliest childhood, a sharp pang, different in its nature from any he had been feeling before, went through his heart.

What would he do, how could he endure his life, when this brother of his had been driven from his last stronghold, from the bifurcated branch of Ygdrasil, the World Ash tree, and had slipped into a lake deeper than that of Comber's End?

CHAPTER XX

IT WAS UNDER the heavy green of a midsummer chestnut tree, of all trees the one which takes to itself most completely the character of that umbrageous season, of that interlude in the year's progression, when the "primal burst" is over and the yellows and purples of the August efflorescence are still unbudded, that Rook and Lexie unpacked Mrs. Bellamy's basket and enjoyed the culminating hour of their fête-champêtre.

The chestnut's branches, with their huge, somnolent leafy fingers hovering above them like an indulgent episcopal benediction, stretched out over the smoothly running brook which fed the water mill at the eastern extremity of the lake. Here Rook ate his meal, seated with his back against the trunk of the tree; while his brother, with that invincible desire to give every passing moment some additional heightening, which the fatality of his illness had begun to accentuate to a point of actual recklessness, had succeeded in balancing himself on one of the great motionless spokes, covered now with moss and ferns, that in former times used to turn the machinery of the mill.

The younger Ashover had finished his lunch — his taste for food was growing steadily more capricious and fastidious — and was now smoking one cigarette after another, as he sat hunched up there above the stream with his knees beneath his chin.

"I hope that wheel won't suddenly begin to turn," said Rook. "How does it manage to stay still with the water flowing on underneath it?"

"It's not really flowing," said the other. "To make it come with a proper rush, strong enough to move the wheel, they'd have to lift up some dam on the other side."

They both remained silent, listening to the monotonous ripple of the little brook as it eddied and gurgled round the stones in its shallow bed.

"There's a trout!" cried Lexie suddenly. "Did you see it? It went under that green stone. Do you remember how we used to catch them in a butterfly net by damming up the pools under the bank?"

Rook shook his head. "I'd forgotten that," he said. "But I remember how you always used to say that a fresh-caught trout, lying stone dead in a handful of grass, was one of the objects a person would remember most vividly if he had been transported to a different planet and was trying to recall the most characteristic and delicious things in his old earth life. The look of those silvery scales and purple spots, with the little bits of bright-green grass sticking to them, was only rivalled by one other thing in the world you used to say."

"What was that?" enquired Lexie.

"The smell of the inside of a pea's pod when you've just shred the peas?" pondered Rook gravely. "Or the smell of one of those squares of fresh turf in a wheelbarrow when someone's making a new lawn; or the smell of honeysuckle, when it's very yellow and a little faded? No! I don't believe it was the smell of anything! What was it that you used to put second to the trout?"

He mused for a minute or two in a silence that was full of the faint ripple of the stream and of the distant murmur of wood pigeons.

"I know!" he cried eagerly. "No; it wasn't a smell. It was the look of silverweeds, all covered with white dust, at the edge of a road that's just going over a hill from which you can see the sea!"

Lexie stared at him from his precarious seat on the mill wheel with a strange, intent absorption; an absorption so deep that Rook became aware that his mind had wandered away from their conversation. His eyes as he stared grew larger and more wistful, and the elder brother became uneasy and in some way put to shame by their expression.

There came over him, as he met their unseeing gaze, a sensation of the most heartbreaking sadness; that sort of sadness which comes upon us when in the middle of some hot cornfield, between the singing of larks and the hum of the cutting machine, between yellow stalks and red poppies, we hear the tolling of the village bell and think of the raw, open oblong hole in that crowded enclosure and of the white surplice of the priest!

“I’m getting stiff sitting here,” said Lexie breaking the spell. “Give me your stick a moment.”

Rook held out to him the end of his stick and his brother pulled himself up by its assistance and jumped upon the bank. Here he lay down upon the sun-flecked moss, his head against the other’s knees. Rook ran his fingers over the embossed corrugations and deep-dented furrows of the younger man’s heavy forehead.

“I wish to the devil,” he said abruptly, “that you and I were quite alone in the world! Think what it would be like,” he went on, “if this evening I were coming back with you to Marsh Alley, and there were no one in Ashover House except complete strangers! Mrs. Bellamy could look after us both perfectly well; and we’d have nothing to think of — no worries, no responsibilities! — nothing but just to read and talk and walk and watch the changes of the weather.”

“You might have done it if you’d really wanted to,” said Lexie.

Rook’s hand left his brother’s forehead and made an impatient clutch at the moss and the dry rubble.

“That’s a cruel thing to say; and you know very well it’s a silly thing, too. I couldn’t have left Mother alone. I might as well say to you that if you'd really wanted us to live together you'd have never gone off to Marsh Alley at all."

Lexie shifted his position a little so as to get his face into the sunshine.

"How could I live in that house with you and the old man cursing each other all day long? It was you who begged me to go off, so that we should have a place where we could be at peace!"

"Then why did you talk just now about my leaving Ashover and living with you? We did practically live together in those days. I was always coming over to you. You know I was, Lexie."

The younger man's tone softened. "I know it, Rook, I know it. It's only been this last year, since you brought your girl here, that we've been really separated. Why did you do it, Rook? Why did you do it?"

"I wish to the devil I hadn't done it!" cried the other fiercely. "It was only that that made Mother bring Ann here; and if she hadn't come, we might have been just as we were!"

"You'd have got some other girl; or I should," said Lexie. "No, it's no use blaming each other. It's all natural enough."

"It isn't natural," shouted Rook; and Lexie, though he couldn't see Rook's face, was only too well aware of the quivering and tightening of his upper lip and the protrusion of a vein in his forehead.

"It's a monstrous mania, this obsession we both have for young girls! It's inherited from the old man; just as he inherited it from his father! It was a beautiful piece of irony, just worthy of the way things work out, that it was Grandfather's bastard who landed me with Ann. And then the trouble I've had with Betsy; and with Nancy's luckless progeny! I tell you it's a monstrous obsession; that's what it is!" Lexie got up and sat in a pool of flickering golden sunshine, hugging his knees.

“I cannot understand,” he said, “how you can be what you are, with flashes of noble insight such as you have, and then fall back like this. When you talk as you’ve just been talking I feel only one thing for you, brother Rook.”

“What thing?” enquired the other in a more normal tone.

“Contempt,” was the younger Ashover’s laconic answer.

“Lexie, that’s not fair,” protested the accused man with the peculiar expression of half-ironic, half-authentic humility which he always assumed under a frontal attack. “Why is it contemptible to call this thing an obsession?”

“Because you sing such a bloody song about it, and then go on exactly the same! Why can’t you treat your girls as girls ought to be treated; and as, in their hearts, they like to be treated? Why can’t you just enjoy them for what they are and let them know what you are; without making such a devil of a fuss about it? It was a piece of pure sentimentality to bring Netta here in the beginning. And then, to go and marry Ann just because you’d taken your pleasure — —”

“But, good Lord!” Rook interrupted, “one can’t get one’s cousin, and a girl like Ann, too, into trouble and ‘nothing said’!”

The invalid made one of his most goblin-like grimaces at this.

“She got her pleasure out of it as well as you, brother Rook, and as for the results — oh, well! It’s no good going back on all that now. When is her child to be born?”

He flung out the question with as much nonchalance as if it had been of very small moment whether Ashover had an heir or not.

“In September, I suppose,” answered the other. In the silence that followed this, Rook’s mind wandered off to Netta and a miserable frown came upon his forehead as with his eyes watching the movements of a pair of green finches in a small hazel bush beyond the stream he wondered whether that drinking habit into which she had flung herself had gone from bad to worse. “I’ve done it for the best,” ran the phrase in her letter. Did that refer to the drinking? And if so, what did she mean?

“What’s the matter now?” enquired Lexie, and his elder brother began to explain how his remorse about Netta’s disappearance was mixed with his fear of the effect of drink upon her.

“You know what it is,” he said. “Men can drink heavily without its changing their life. I don’t think women can do that. If once they get any real dependence on it, they’re lost! Their whole nature seems to go to pieces.”

Lexie nodded grimly.

“I can’t think what started her drinking like that,” Rook continued. “She never touched liquor when I first knew her; but since that New Year’s Eve party of yours she got worse and worse. She used to drink in her room. I found a lot of bottles afterward; and I could see that Pandie knew about it.”

Lexie opened his eyes very wide at these words. “You don’t mean to say you didn’t see what was at the bottom of that?” he cried in unfeigned astonishment. “I saw it like a map.”

Rook stared at him blankly. “What are you talking about?”

“You don’t mean to say you missed the piquancy of that little game,” Lexie went on. “I don’t know how much was due to your philanderings with Ann and Nell; but it was plain to me that Netta had got something on her mind that she was trying to drown; something that egged her on to be absolutely reckless.”

Rook struggled awkwardly and stiffly to his feet.

“Did she say anything to you?” he cried harshly.

"Don't fly off at a tangent now. You couldn't have stopped her. It was natural enough."

"But she knew Ann and I were old friends. I told her so often. And she hadn't the least idea there was anything between Nell and me."

Lexie smiled complacently and pityingly. "It's amazing, Rook, how you can be so intuitive with women sometimes and so absolutely blind at other times! I don't say that your flirtations made her unhappy; but they were quite enough to make her a bit careless of appearances."

"Did any one else see what she was doing, do you suppose, except you and that little baggage Pandie?" Rook began swinging his stick as he asked this question. A troubled and nervous desire for some sort of action made it impossible for him to remain still.

"I have not the least doubt that everyone saw it — except you. I shouldn't be surprised if Cousin Ann saw it, even before I did."

"Why didn't she tell me, then? Why didn't you tell me?"

"Really, Rook, that's going a bit too far! Outsiders can hardly be expected to meddle between a man and his girl. Besides, nothing could suit Ann better than that Netta should make herself impossible!"

Rook let his stick fall to his side.

"You don't think she encouraged her in it, do you?" he said in a harsh whisper. "They were always together."

Lexie laughed. "There's a big gap between encouraging a person in a thing and making a fuss to stop them from it. I don't suppose Ann did anything about it at all. Just watched it going on, as I did, and hoped for the best!"

Rook's face was now convulsed with anger. "You were all against her!" he cried. "Every one of you! You all hated her and wanted her to clear out, while you kept me locked up and fed with penny buns like the bear in the Bristol Aquarium!"

Lexie chuckled with immense zest at this comparison. There was something, he thought to himself, very like a zoo animal about Rook's sulky restlessness. He got up from the ground and came over to his brother.

"Come," he said, "we won't quarrel over Netta. I would far rather live with Netta, drunk or sober, than be married to Cousin Ann! But don't look so miserable! If I were married to your wife I would soon put her in her place. And I'd dearly love to do it, too!" he added, with a leer that was at once dictatorial and satyrish. "I'd manage her, brother Rook. I'd tame her."

They gathered up the remains of their meal and tossed them into the basket.

"No, I'll carry it," said Rook, "and you take my arm! I can't have the doctor cursing me for tiring you out over this day's business. I want to have a lot more jaunts with you this summer."

They moved off together along the edge of the lake. For some reason or other Lexie's blunt, uncompromising attitude to Lady Ann gave Rook a feeling of relief. He felt less submerged, less invaded, less divided from himself with his brother at his side.

"Well!" he said presently. "This isn't the first time you and I have walked along this piece of grass. Oh, Lexie, Lexie, what things we have seen and felt together! I know that, wherever I am and whatever I see, there aren't many objects that catch my notice without my wanting to share them with you. I don't hold back much from you, Lexie."

The younger Ashover irreverently put out his tongue at this.

"Liar!" he said. "You know perfectly well that you're as reserved as the devil, even with me! I often feel that you have endless ideas and sensations that you hug to yourself and would hate my getting a hint of. But I do believe you love me, Rook, better than any one else. I think you'll feel queer, now and then, after I've been put by Mr. Pod under that elm tree."

Rook's reply to this was to hang his stick over his wrist and hug his brother tightly in his arms, kissing him repeatedly on cheeks, mouth, eyes, and forehead.

"Well!" he said breathlessly as he released him, "it's a good thing that you and I were born under the same roof. Think what it would have been like if we'd just casually glanced at each other on some railway platform or pavement and realized what we'd missed when the crowd divided us! No, no, Lexie. Nothing will make me believe that you won't live longer than I shall. These doctors are always making mistakes. There! I announce to you, this last day of June and by the edge of this blue lake, that we shall live to walk here together in twelve months' time, talking just as freely as we're talking now! Perhaps I shall have found Netta again by then."

They looked straight into each other's faces; and one of those moods that do not often fall upon human beings, unless brought about by the magic of sex, passed over both of them and blended with the noble and spacious purlieus of those manorial woods, with the deep blue of the water, with the brick towers and gray slate roofs of Comber's End.

They moved on then; and after walking round a bed of reeds, from which a moor hen and its half-grown family splashed out into the open pond raising a thousand iridescent ripples, they came to a pause by a low ornamental wall decorated at intervals by brick pilasters the capitals of which were covered with the white droppings of innumerable swallows who made them starting points for their flights over the lake.

The two Ashovers sat down upon the sun-warmed coping of this low wall, a pleasant relic of the times when the Lords of Comber's End were the feudal enemies of their own family. It gave Lexie, who was something of an antiquary in these historic matters, quite a complacent thrill to be able to remind Rook how long ago it was that the last of these hereditary foes had died childless. “It would have given him a shrewd slap in the eye,” he grossly chuckled, “if he could have looked forward a couple of hundred years and seen us sitting here in ease and satisfaction.”

Rook sighed. “Perhaps not,” he said. “He may even be at this very moment anticipating the blow that’s going to finish us off. How do we know that Ann’s child won’t turn out a girl? If it does, that’ll end it! Comber’s End and Ashover’s End — there’ll be nothing to choose between’ em.”

“Why do you say ‘that’ll end it’?” protested the other. “It looks to me as if my sister-in-law were good for more than one fling of this sort.”

Rook was silent. Why had he said just that? The words had seemed to come from him with the smooth and suave fatality of speech which makes it difficult for poets to say “earth” without saying “green” and “sky” without saying “blue.”

“Somehow,” he contented himself with replying, “I can’t imagine Ann not having a son for her first child.”

He smiled at that moment to himself; for he thought how Lexie would have jumped out of his skin if he had answered him by saying that he had himself, that very morning, seen with his own eyes the boy that was to be born!

“By the way,” he enquired casually, “do you know if there are any young people at the farm here now?”

Lexie looked at him significantly and quickly. “I’ve a good reason to know,” he said; “but I was going to keep it from you for a bit longer. As a matter of fact, there’s a very handsome youth there and a charming young girl. I know it because I had a companion with me when I drove out here this morning."

It was Rook's turn to show signs of agitation.

"What's this?" he flung out. "You don't mean to say — —"

Lexie interrupted him. "It's Nell," he cried hurriedly. "Don't get annoyed with me, Rook! I met her quite by chance and begged Twiney to stop and pick her up. She was setting out to see this youth and his sister on some parochial affair of Hastings's. Hastings puts lots of things of that kind off on her."

"Where is she now?" The words broke from the elder man with an impatience and eagerness that surprised himself.

"I don't know where she is now," answered Lexie. "I told her we'd call at the house and take her home late in the afternoon. I meant to keep it as a surprise for you, so, for God's sake, don't look so sick!"

Rook "sleeked over," as the poet says, his agitated expression; and picking up a loose piece of masonry from the wall beside him flung it into the water. The missile caused an enormous circle of ripples which enlarged and enlarged under their eyes.

"Do you remember how we used to play ducks and drakes in this pond?" he said. "I can't remember now where we got the stones."

"Under the house, over there," said the other. "You used to send me off to get them while you went on reading your book!"

Once more, deep down underneath the immediate agitation of Nell's presence between them, the old familiar thrill of their intimate association ran through Rook's soul. He watched the ripples that he had made in the water go on extending and extending toward the centre of the lake. "When Lexie and I are together," he thought, "it's as if a new personality were created that throws a glamour over the tiniest little thing that happens."

“Do you believe,” he said aloud, “that there’s any chance — any shadow of a shadow of a chance — that you and I will meet again after we’re dead?”

Lexie’s answer to this was not lacking in either emphasis or assurance.

“Not the faintest,” he said with a smile. “While either of us is alive the other will, in a sense, go on living. But when we’re both dead, we’re both dead. Do you realize what to be dead actually means, brother Rook? I sometimes have the feeling that in that matter I have more imagination than you!”

When he turned to see the effect of his words upon his companion he saw Rook’s gaze intently fixed on something on the lake which was obscured from his own sight by a tuft of reeds. But a moment later he, too, saw it — the form of an incredibly proud and majestic swan, paddling slowly toward them.

The bird was so beautiful that the vision of it passed beyond the point where either of them could share the feelings it excited with the other. It seemed to bring with it an overpowering sense of awe; for both the Ashovers regarded its advance in spellbound silence. It was as if it were floating on some mysterious inner lake that was, so to speak, the platonic idea, or the ethereal essence, of the actual lake which they were contemplating. It might have been swimming on an estuary that had suddenly projected itself into our terrestrial spaces from a purer level of existence, some tributary of the Eternal and the Undying, that flowed in for one ineffable second of time, converting the watery element it mingled with into its own ethereal substance.

The spell of its approach was broken as soon as the bird itself realized that the Ashover brothers were not two motionless tree-trunks, but alien and disturbing invaders. It swung round with a proud curve of its great neck and an eddy of the blue water about its white feathers, and sheered off toward the centre of the pond.

Rook and Lexie regarded its departure with concentrated interest; but now that the magical moment had passed they were able to note the almost humorous effect of the swan’s attempts to retain his impassive dignity, to show appropriate indignation, and at the same time to put a good clear space of deep lake water between himself and the onlookers.

“Susannah and the Elders!” murmured Lexie with a chuckle. “But aren’t they provocative and tantalizing? I wish we could hide ourselves in the reeds and see it making love to Leda. What a shame Nell isn’t here!”

“It’s its neck that’s so arresting,” said Rook. “That sense of incalculable power mixed with serpentine beauty!”

“I don’t know about that,” remarked Lexie, “but I would give a great deal to see Nell caressing it.”

A heathen and classic wantonness descended upon both men. They began to feel an irritable desire to separate from each other and find, each for himself, a companion as beautiful and capricious as that proud bird.

“I don’t see why we should wait till the end of the afternoon,” said Lexie, “before getting hold of Nell. What do you feel about going straight up to the house now?”

“All right,” Rook agreed. “Only you know what that means? It means we’re bound to quarrel! Won’t you admit now that this whole business is a mad obsession? Here we sit, you and I, in the very acme of our precious day; everything enchanting round us, everything doubly delicious because we’re together; and the mere sight of that bird’s neck sets us off on the old wretched will-o’-the-wisp hunt, ‘over bog, over briar,’ though we know perfectly well that the whole thing’s an illusion!”

Lexie made a deprecatory grimace. “Not an illusion at all. That’s one of those tiresome metaphysical tricks you’re always indulging in. Besides, it doesn’t mean any very great separation. We usually come back to each other pretty quick, good luck or bad luck! Do you remember in old days how we used to set out for a bit of sport to Tollminster Great Fair? Have you forgotten those fields down by the river at Bishop’s Forley? Or those seats under the trees at Polberry Cross? You used to be much more excited than I was when we started off, after breakfast, on a fine August day. That’s just what you double-faced metaphysicians are always up to! You want to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. You want to call honest natural pleasure an illusion; and yet you’re more frantic to get hold of it than any one else!”

Rook sighed heavily. His brother’s words, bringing back the long summer days of that old, careless, irresponsible life, made him feel the full weight of all his present miseries. Oh, why couldn’t one separate altogether the spirit of adventure in these things from the wretched entanglements that come in their train? The outrageous notion came into his head of how lovely it would be if these irresistible beings, who allured him so, were as heartless and emotionless as that clouded-yellow butterfly whose flight he was now observing! Why couldn’t it have been arranged like that; emotion and attraction remaining absolutely distinct things? They were distinct in him! Why couldn’t they be distinct in everyone? And then, as the image of Netta’s face as she had turned toward him on that last day in their room rose up before his mind’s eye, he knew that all this chatter about sport and pleasure was a mere ruffling of the surface of reality. How could one even dream of girls being like clouded-yellow butterflies, when that single look, terrible and beautiful “as an army with banners,” in the face of one of them, was enough to take the taste out of all food and the sweetness out of all sunshine?

“Let’s walk once across the field before we do anything else,” he said sadly; and Lexie was far too sympathetic to the fitful moods of his brother, and far too sagacious, to utter a word of protest.

So, turning their backs to that blue water, they moved slowly side by side across the sunlit park land. The oaks were beginning to cast shadows now, short abrupt shadows, the hot shadows of an early summer afternoon, smelling of moss and the breath of cattle and of puff-ball funguses.

The horses, which Rook had passed earlier that day, stood crowded together in the shade; while the brown-and-white cows, beginning to grow restless at the approach of milking time, moved uneasily along the edge of the meadow palings, snuffing the air and lowing.

They crossed the whole expanse of the grass in silence, and when they reached the road Rook could see that Lexie showed signs of feeling his malady upon him. They sat down by the roadside under a beech tree, where the ground was covered with last year’s leaves and the scattered husks of beech mast. Here Lexie produced his little box and swallowed the last two tablets which it contained.

“I must have another,” he murmured. “He said I could take three.”

He dropped the empty box on the ground beside them and produced an unopened one from his pocket. Out of this, when he had broken its wrapper, he extracted one more tablet and swallowed it hurriedly.

“Let’s have a look!” cried Rook, taking the little box into his hands.

The strain of suffering passed very quickly out of the younger man’s face; as if his faith in the beneficent drug had the power of anticipating its chemical and physical effect.

"Ten of those little things," he said, "would finish you off, Rook. I fancy it would need about fifteen to kill me, as I've become inured to it. Odd, isn't it? Think now — how simple it would be for both of us to gulp them down, one after another; and then just to light our last cigarettes and make ourselves ready for Eternity. We're in such a convenient place, too! Twiney would be bound to find us; and he could bundle us into the bottom of his cart as if we were venison. Nell would have to sit by his side with one foot on you and one foot on me. It would be quite a cortège-macabre. The whole village would turn out to see us go by. You know how the rumour of those things runs in front of the thing itself? 'The brothers Ashover, furtively but blamelessly pursuing their last journey into their native domains.' Can't you hear how Hastings would describe it to his friend in Bishop's Forley? Can't you catch the unctuous clerical humour enhancing the taste of the well-baked tea cakes on some little tennis-lawn?"

Rook, who was holding the box tightly in his fingers, looked at his brother with a scowl. "I think it's extremely wrong of Twickenham to let you have so many of these damned things! You might easily swallow them in your sleep; or even forget how many you'd taken and take an overdose. Really, Lexie; I mean what I say! It's not right. I don't like it. There! I'm cursed if I'll give them back to you!" And he proceeded to put the box into his own pocket.

"Give me those tablets, Rook, or I shall get angry! You needn't blame Twickenham. I only get the prescription from him. The chemist makes them up. He's an old friend of mine. You don't know him. He's a great fisherman and we talk of flies. He knows me too well to be afraid that I shall take one tablet more than the right amount. And no one but you would ever dream of a person taking morphia tablets in his sleep. Give them back, Rook, or I shall get very angry with you, and that may finish me off!"

His face became so agitated that Rook did grow afraid as to the effect such excitement might have, and drawing out the box he laid it down on the grass by the side of the empty one.

At that moment Lexie struggled hurriedly to his feet. “There’s a White Admiral!” he cried in childish eagerness. And sure enough, clinging to a beech leaf on a bough that was just above their heads, its wings drawn back so that the translucent loveliness of their green-veined sides was revealed in full sunshine, swung this rare and exquisite butterfly.

Rook watched his brother standing there with his back to him, his arm extended and his hand moving slowly and tremblingly toward the unsuspecting creature, evidently, from its flawless freshness, just emerged from its chrysalis. How often had he surveyed in old days this familiar figure, stealing up toward some gorgeous hoverer, his whole being absorbed and rapt in the intensity of the chase.

There! Lexie had made his snatch at it, but the White Admiral had slipped away and was fanning its wings, wide-open now so that its proud black-and-white markings were distinctly visible, on another beech twig farther away.

Lexie moved toward it and once more stealthily lifted his hand.

It may have been that this familiar vision, redolent of old, sweet memories, brought to the elder brother’s mind, in one unbearable rush of bitter thought, the feeling that henceforth he no longer possessed his own independent identity; or it may have been that ever since he first saw Lexie with that little box, the idea had been vaguely stirring within him that it would be wise to have such a key to final escape safely in his keeping! Whichever way it was, just at the moment when Lexie was most absorbed, Rook quickly opened the full box, emptied about twenty of the tablets into the other one and thrust the two boxes into different pockets.

Among the many movements made by the animals and the birds in the environs of Comber’s End on that loveliest of midsummer days it was significant enough that the two most symbolic and expressive ones made by mortal men should have been a movement to capture one tremulous living creature and a movement to set free another; to capture a White Admiral butterfly, and to set free — hospes comesque corporis — a human soul, fooled to the top of its bent.

CHAPTER XXI

JULY PASSED AND August came. The halcyon weather of the Comber's End day had not lasted very long. The latter half of July was gusty and cold. In many of the cornfields the wheat lay prostrate, beaten down and rain-sodden; while the hedge flowers, such as knapweed and scabious and ragwort, had that look of overweighted overgreen foliage and undersized rain-blighted blossoms such as indicates the absence of long hours of uninterrupted sunshine.

But with the coming of August all this changed. The prostrate corn lifted itself up a little. The roads grew dusty. The fairy rings on Battlefield turned pale green; the turf around them became bleached and yellowish; while the taller grasses at the edges of the fields assumed that shade of old mellow gold which answered to the ripening of the grain at their side.

The effect of the preceding stormy weather had been to produce an anticipation of autumn in certain aspects of that harvest season, in others to retard the autumn's approach with a kind of second midsummer. It was only on the higher uplands and on the slopes of the hills, where the soil was lighter and more gravelly, that the grass embrowned itself and lost its sap. In the valleys it remained moist, even after many long, hot days; and though groups of trees, here and there, that had been exposed to the rains and winds carried signs of their ill-usage, the more protected ones, in the depths of the Antiger Woods, for instance, were as richly green still as in the early days of June.

But a week of hot sun and sultry twilights soon manifested its effects. All along the banks of the Frome great spikes of purple loosestrife alternated with the ragged clumps of hemp agrimony and with the rose-coloured tufts of willow herb. The ditches of the water meadows were overgrown with meadowsweet; and under the crowded stems of the hazel copses the yellowing leaf spears of the dead bluebells were covered with masses of enchanter's nightshade.

But the real quality of these cloudless August days was to be found in the cornfields. Here amid the tall yellow stalks and the grain-swollen ears of wheat and barley rose up as if over night, millions and millions of poppy flowers. Something about the texture of these filmy scarlet petals, as if they had been made of the blood of the earth itself, shed by hot sun kisses and staunched by hot sun breath, carried the very secret of that season from field to field and across the white haze-tremulous roads.

Little quivering vibrations in the air, waves of heat, would be seen floating now over the tops of thyme-scented banks or over the burnished metallic surface of the bracken. And as these flickering heat waves drew their faint purplish veil between one's eyes and the landscape, they brought with them the feeling, even in the midst of some brief stroll abroad after early tea, that one was upon a long, significant journey; a journey to a country quite unknown, to great dim cities with towers and spires, far off, over leagues and leagues of shimmering poppy-stained vapour!

And indeed, as one great spacious golden morning followed another, there did seem to grow upon the consciousness of more than one of the persons living in Ashover the feeling that they were being carried forward on some steady-keeled purple-sailed galleon toward the unknown marvels of an unknown harbour.

Lady Ann, now beginning the eighth month of her pregnancy, seldom left the garden. For hours she would sit on her chair under the linden tree, her hands idly clasped upon the book in her lap, her eyes fixed on the shadows on the grass.

Rook had become more considerate and more tender toward her as her time drew near; but he could not pretend to an excitement he did not feel; and for any sympathy in the paramount question that absorbed her — would her child prove to be a boy? — she was driven to the rather teasing and exhausting speculations of Mrs. Ashover, combined with the old lady's memories of the pre-natal peculiarities of her own sons.

It was the beginning of the second week in the month. The herbaceous borders of the Ashover garden had become like little tropical forests of heavily scented blooms to the bumble-bees and humming-bird moths that moved about among them. Round the high stalks of the delphiniums and the hollyhocks all manner of smaller flowers huddled themselves: petunias, verbenas, calceolarias mingling with every variety of campanula.

"How incredibly secure," thought Rook to himself, as at about two o'clock in the afternoon of a day that seemed even hotter than the preceding ones he strolled along the flower borders with the vague intention of taking the opportunity of a solitary walk while his mother and his wife both rested and the whole place was hushed in its noon siesta, "how incredibly secure and complacent you do look!" He surveyed half-enviously a small patch of blue lobelia that had got itself wedged in between two tufts of London Pride. "I suppose the life of a lobelia is entirely composed of long delicious passive sensations! I suppose a deep narcissistic ecstasy in its own Tyrian blueness is thrilling through it at this moment, combined with all sorts of mysterious rapports with the earth and air such as our animal senses have absolutely no idea of! I daresay it can even feel the movement of the planet itself; very likely blowing back a lovely freshness upon it, through all this heat, from airs outside any of the airs that we're conscious of! And it probably has the most subtle nuances of pleasure from its sense of the deep cool earth under its roots. I must tell Twiney to make sure he waters all these beds every evening now!"

He glanced at his wife's chair with her book and parasol left upon it; and it struck his mind how completely this girl of sport and adventure had submitted to her new rôle. He sighed heavily as he turned the corner of the house; for it was borne in upon him that he had made not the least attempt to penetrate the barrier of aristocratic reserve with which this mother of his child had guarded her feelings. She must have been having her panics and her disgusts; as well as her thrilling moments of mysterious pleasure! He certainly had made no attempt to arrive at any real intimacy with her, at any intelligent comprehension of what she was feeling at this crisis in her life.

What strange creatures human beings were! What obstinate, obdurate walls of egoism separated them from one another and substituted ignorant hostility for imaginative understanding! He walked round the house and down the kitchen-garden path where the rows of dahlias, tied to tall sticks, were still only masses of dark glossy foliage with chilly sour-looking globular buds that in their immaturity seemed to reject rather than welcome the noon heat. The difference between these sap-cold shining-leafed plants and the warm bloom of the peaches ripening so fast against the hot red bricks of the great garden wall fell in with his fatalistic thoughts; seemed to suggest the same insurmountable divergencies in the vegetable world as existed in human nerves!

But how infinitely shut away from vexations and tribulations the garden was, with its floating breaths from mint and rosemary, with its vague, sweet, diffused essence of ripening fruit under the hot, tarry netting, where the wasps buzzed and the white butterflies played!

The place seemed to hold up invisible barriers against everything in the world that was not gracious and time-mellowed. Mild ghosts of generations of placid gardeners seemed to bend over those well-weeded furrows of brown earth mould; seemed to raise old wrinkled sunburnt hands to the rusty nail heads and mouldering shreds of cloth which held the smooth twigs of the apricots; seemed to shuffle along those quiet paths carrying musk-scented geranium plants from “frame” to flower bed!

The spot seemed in some especial sense the accumulated retort of the human race to all the elements of chaos. Rook felt, as he loitered in it, as though the absence from his own days of the sort of patient diurnal labour which for generations had made all this possible was the central cause of his discontent.

He passed out at last into the orchard; and from the orchard into the open uplands. The slope of Battlefield as he made his way between gorse and bracken was sweet with the invisible scent of thyme. It was difficult not to tread upon tufts of euphrasia and milkwort; and when he reached the top of the hill the hot, windless suction of the noon’s leonine mouth had filled the air so full with the odour of pine bark and turpentine and fir needles that he felt as if the trouble of human thoughts were a kind of foreign intrusion, an ill-mannered and irrelevant guest, amid the largesse of all this earth life.

Instead of exhausting him, the heat of that hour of the day seemed to put a sort of magnetic fever into his blood. He ran down the slope of Dorsal, sweating from every pore, but with an almost fierce exuberance of energy. Reaching Antiger Lane he turned to the right, away from the Drools’ cottage, and began striding up the road at a great pace, swinging his stick as he walked. He soon passed the place where Ann had confessed to him just four months ago that she was with child, but even the sight of the hedge and bank and gate and trees at that particular point did not destroy the careless aplomb of his mood.

By degrees the nature of the scenery on the side of the lane facing the Antiger Woods changed its character. The hillside diminished to a gentle upward incline and by the time he arrived at a point parallel with the village of Ashover this slope became a field of ripe wheat.

What wind there was — an almost imperceptible breath from the east — reached his senses across this cornfield; and the smell of the ripe ears, like a quintessential airy diffusion of the bread of life itself, passed into his veins and increased the heathen exuberance of his blood. For the first time since he had seen that white swan's neck curving so provocatively at Comber's End, Rook immersed himself in the great undertide of the world's sensual life. All sorts of passing impressions, selected at random out of the things he had seen that day, conspired together to push him on into this fatal humour. The blue lobelia was there, the yellow wasps were there, the rusty nails in the scraps of cloth against the hot brick wall were there, the tonic fragrance of the fir trees; and now this sense of the bounty of the gods in the "living bread" of the generations!

There came over him the old mysterious classic acceptance of life upon the earth, of birth and death, of pleasure and sorrow, of love and the loss of love; and he had the feeling that whatever might be the issue of all these things for him, it was enough that they had been just as they had been. The horror that is never very far away, the loathing and the sick mad dread, seemed to fall off from his thoughts like scum from a boat's prow.

That immense noon heat, large and indolent and yellow pelted, like a great planetary lion, had licked up with its burning tongue all the poison and putridity.

He was immensely surprised, as he turned a corner of the lane, to encounter the redoubtable Mr. Twiney seated luxuriously in his familiar cart while his long-necked mare cropped the grass by the hedge.

Rook had no sooner caught sight of Mr. Twiney's face than he knew that something had ruffled the man's equanimity. The blue smoke from his pipe ascended in a thin spiral wisp and wavered among the thick sycamore leaves above his head as if it had been the tail of some dreamy feline ghost; but Mr. Twiney's tone did not correspond with the placidity of the smoke.

"Heigh! And what be Squire Ash'ver doing, then, this peevish-hot day? Ain't it enough to make man and beast sweat their selves into rain pipes; and grow as slippy as eels in pond mud?"

"It certainly is pretty hot, Twiney," said Rook, wiping his forehead. "How does your wife stand this kind of weather?"

Mr. Twiney sat erect at this and eyed him with a defensive and suspicious eye.

"Me old woman be snappish in winter, prickish in ploughing time, and all heads-and-tails in harvest. But come summer, same as us has now, and she be sweet as oil of Lebanon. I wish other folks were as well-spoken as my old woman be."

Rook undid the buttons of his waistcoat and tugged at his flannel shirt so as to let the air touch his skin.

"Who is it you're waiting for?" he enquired.

The owner of the mare gave the back of his grazing animal a gentle flick with his whip.

"Them sting flies be poisonous bad for horseflesh," he remarked meditatively. "What they do feed on when there ain't no horses where they do bide passes me comprehension."

"Twiney, who are you waiting for?" Rook repeated in a more abrupt tone.

The man looked at him rather dubiously. "I suppose I ain't giving away no lady's secrets nor no gentleman's either, when I tell 'ee, Squire, that 'tis thee own brother that I've a-brought here, long wi' Missy Hastings from Toll-Pike."

"Oh, naturally — quite right — very nice. I'm so glad." These meaningless syllables fell from Rook's lips as if they had been over-ripe apples detaching themselves from a motionless bough on a windless night.

The man in the cart watched him closely, but the indolent and casual expression on Mr. Twiney's freckled face made him appear as one who while observing everything observed nothing.

"They be gone to Titty's Ring, Squire," he said pensively. "'Twere only a few minutes agone that they set out. I saw the tail o'n vanishing into wood by yon hedge gap. Don't 'ee be worritted, Squire! Master Lexie walked as upright as if he'd never had an illness in's life. I said to 'un, 'Don't 'ee kill yourself with exercise, Master Lexie!' and Missy Hastings she laughed in me face like a green yaffle. 'Let 'un lean on thee arm, as if thee was man and he were woman!' I said. And Mr. Lexie he answered me short and brusk-like, same as if I'd said somethink indecent. It doesn't do to speak to quiet men as your brother have spoke to me just now, Squire. All village do know he hasn't long to live. And maybe that's what makes 'un cranky. And we must be considerate with a nice gentleman, as he be. But I bain't one for brusky speeches, whether from the gentry or from me own wife. I likes to be bespoke soft and easy, Squire Ash'ver, as well as any man in England."

"I'm sure my brother meant no harm. And I'm sure Mrs. Hastings didn't mean to laugh in your face, Twiney. I can't imagine either of them doing such a thing. Well! Good-day to you! If I happen to meet them I'll tell them that you're still waiting."

He began to move off, but Mr. Twiney's indignation was not yet appeased.

"I think you ought to know it, Squire, though I'm not the one to tell you. But they do say down village that Mr. Lexie and Missy Hastings be up to no good in these goings on. I've a-driven them two into every lane and every cattle drive round these parts. I think it's only due to 'ee, Mr. Ash'ver, seeing as you're Squire and such-like, to let 'ee know how the wind be blowing!"

"All right, Twiney; I'm much obliged to you, Twiney; but you mustn't listen to the village gossip, you know. Good-day to you!" And with unctuous discretion on his tongue but black anger in his heart he strode down the lane.

So this was why he had been seeing so little of Lexie during the last fortnight! The rogue had stolen a march on him and had been up to serious mischief with that romantic little idiot! He found it impossible to see the thing in a reasonable or magnanimous light. A few weeks ago he would have shrugged his shoulders and washed his hands of the matter. Nell belonged to Hastings; not to him. She had never really belonged to him! Why was it, then, that he felt so maliciously angry with both her and his brother? He refused to attempt to analyze what he felt. He just gave himself up to a blind irrational grievance; to a sense of having been betrayed by his brother and fooled by the girl.

Every complicated and suppressed irritation he had ever harboured against Lexie rose to the surface. He felt as if he had wilfully allowed his remorse about Netta to tie his hands in a struggle with his brother which had been secretly going on for many months; a struggle as to whether he with his translunar lust, or Lexie, with his humorous satyrishness, should carry off this sensitive little being of the twisted mouth and the slender pliable limbs!

No sooner was he round the first corner and out of sight of Mr. Twiney than he stood stock still, staring at the woods in front of him. He knew well where Titty's Ring was. It was a clearing in the centre of the wood where the ground became level for a short distance and where in former times there had been a spring. Lexie had had from childhood a curious predilection for this particular spot; for the lusciousness of the long damp grass that grew there, for its complete isolation in the centre of so much undergrowth, for its cuckoo-flowers that were larger and of a deeper lilac there than down in the valley, while all the years he had known it there had been two grass snakes in that place, which every spring cast their spotted skins; of which skins he had collected quite a number, mysterious and unique objects, different in the feeling of their scaly texture from anything else in the whole world!

It was, in fact, as Rook well knew, a symbolic and significant fact that his brother had taken Nell to this favourite spot of his, and had taken her there, too, on an afternoon that seemed, as Lexie himself would have put it, "dedicated" to such a felicitous proceeding.

He approached the fence that separated him from the wood and began staring savagely into its umbrageous recesses. The wood itself became, as he gazed into its leafy shadows, an utterly different thing from what it had been before. It became a classic and Arcadian refuge, "dear to Pan and the Nymphs," in whose embowered hiding-places all the responsibilities of the world fell away and vanished.

Rook began to visualize the scene in Titty's Ring with an intensity that caused him a sick sinking sensation in the pit of his stomach. He made a faint troubled effort to remember the menace that overhung his brother's life; but even as he did this he found his own fingers fumbling at the little box containing those morphia tablets, the loss of which, when he returned the other one, Lexie had never discovered. No! He himself, as his mind became more and more morbid, might be driven to die, too. And that being so, the difference between their two fates was not so tremendous as to give him a cruel and outrageous advantage.

And after all, at the bottom of things, when it became a matter of two males fighting for a female, these questions of honour and justice and fairness and even decency, didn't they always go to the wall? Lexie had flung them over. There had been a sort of tacit understanding between them about Nell; and though he had certainly allowed Lexie to think that he had withdrawn from the field, it was taking his withdrawal a little too literally, to act as if Nell were entirely fancy-free.

Rook's thoughts, as the August sun beat upon his head, growing even hotter as it sank a little from the zenith, were so wild and unbalanced as to resemble the thoughts of a person in a fever. The shock of what he had just heard and the vivid material images his mind kept conjuring up of what was going on at Titty's Ring stirred up a certain black mud of human maliciousness which lay dormant in one deep recess of his nature.

The most fantastic ideas entered his mind; the idea, for example, that he was the victim of a conspiracy of persecution, or at least of manipulation, in which everyone in his circle played a definite part, propitiating and managing him to ends that were theirs and not his.

He began to envisage Netta's disappearance as part of this conspiracy and it presented itself to him that his wife had probably encouraged Lexie in this more serious pursuit of Nell. And his mother, too! He recalled now how often in the last few weeks the old lady had held him at her side, no doubt to keep him away from Toll-Pike Cottage. He felt an angry sensation of being waylaid and humoured and manœuvred at every turn, of being surrounded by the pressure of soft, firm, strong hands that were regulating his life contrary to his deepest life illusion!

Once more he began to feel that in opposition to the free play of his identity all these terrible forces of tribal continuity and tribal self-assertion were using him for purposes utterly foreign to his own personal vision of existence. They intended that the family should have an inheritor; and in order that this should come to pass they were prepared to turn him, Rook Ashover, into a mere passive link in a chain that stretched back to the 13th Century and forward God knows how far!

The old blind vicious feeling came over him that he, a lonely, solitary, hunted figure, was engaged in a life-and-death struggle with "Thrones, Dominations, Principalities, and Powers," all conspiring to reduce his independent life to a meaningless cipher!

Well! He would fight them all; and if Lexie — the only human soul in the world that he really loved — went over to their side, he would fight him, too, whether he were a dying man or not! All the time that these extravagant thoughts whirled through his brain he held his cloth cap in his hand; and the early afternoon sun, full of the iron virulence which it possesses at that hour, intensified the fever that raged within him.

All at once, driven by a sudden irresistible impulse, he forced his way through the fence and plunged into the wood. Like Lexie he knew every stick and stone of that countryside; and it was not long before he hit upon one of the little mossy paths, formerly game drives but invaded now by every sort of vegetation, which intersected the thick undergrowth.

He followed this path with a stride that grew more and more rapid as he advanced; for he knew by the look of certain outstanding trees that he was not far from the piece of level ground where Titty's Ring and other smaller nameless expanses of open grass broke the leafy monotony.

Arrived at the first of these woodland greenswards he paused for a minute to take breath. Steady, unflickering shadows, dark as the hollow places in some immense sorrowful upturned face, lay in great silent pools on the deep-rooted grass. Faint vibrations of the air that could hardly be called winds lifted the feathery seed tops of hawkweed and dandelion; while out of the silence all around him came indescribable sighings and rustlings, as if an invisible population of elemental beings, lighter than air itself, were awakening from their noon siesta.

Wiping the sweat from his forehead with the cap he was still clutching in his fingers, he shook his head solemnly and gravely from side to side as if replying to some formidable argument of an unseen antagonist. He then moved away from this first clearing and took a path opposite to the path by which he had come.

A second greensward was followed by yet another, each one more magical in its shadowy seclusion; and Rook felt as if he were passing through a series of sacred groves, the leafy purlieus and outermost "lady-chapels," it might be, of some thrice-holy place, as yet unvisited by any human votary!

Hush! He was certain that he had heard voices….

He stopped dead still, listening intently, cursing the loud chatter of a jay that broke the surrounding stillness.

It was those two! He knew their tones. He knew the amorousness in his brother's low chuckling laugh; he knew the faint broken protest — who would not know that if not he? — of Nell's timid and enchanting reluctance.

The path in which he waited now was narrowed and almost closed by several horn-beam bushes; and to the end of his life he remembered the look of those thick leaves, so olive-green on one side and so ivory-white on the other! One of these bushes had extended clear across the path; and unwilling to force his way noisily through its thick growth he sank down upon hands and knees and crept under it, still holding his cloth cap in one hand and his stick in the other.

A sour-sweet smell rose from the earth as his knuckles pressed against it, that peculiar smell which belongs to dry wood mould that has been so fed by fallen leaves and by the rubble of dead twigs as to become something far more organic than the soil of any ploughed-up open field.

In the midst of the blind turmoil of his blood his senses seemed preternaturally acute and alert. He saw the tiny gray cups of a little patch of moss, each cup decorated outside by infinitesimal scales and bosses, as if from the fingers of some fairy Hephæstus, and shining inside as though inlaid with opalescent enamel.

It was extraordinary how clear his mind was as he crept forward, the lower branches of the hornbeam switching the back of his head. He even stopped, for the flicker of a second, to lift up the bent stalk of a minute saxifrage which his hand, as if it had been the paw of an animal, had brushed heavily aside. As far as the sensations of that little cluster of pale green petals were concerned he might have been a love-crazed dinosaur, advancing to interrupt the pleasures of a brother dinosaur. A blind weight, a crushing bruise, and then a great mysterious uplifting! That was all that the saxifrage felt. How could it know that this miraculous uplifting was the result, achieved at a moment when the rest of the man was demented, of the existence of a pitifulness in human nature that was older than its earliest appearance in Antiger Great Wood?

There was a single moment, just before he saw them there in that sunlit glade, when a half-forgotten memory of some childish game with his brother in that very place became a living portion of the olive-green screen before him, a living film of affection, which had to be torn apart by a conscious movement of his will before he leapt out upon them.

But he lifted his head now, very gently, rising up on his knees; and what he saw, as he rose, seemed by its own power, independently of his will, to break that filmy screen of ancient association. Standing locked together in one another's arms, in the very centre of Titty's Ring, the long grass in the sunlight showing green as seaweed about their feet, Nell barely touching the ground upon which Lexie's heels were so masterfully planted, the two figures were swaying to and fro in an ecstasy of amorous enchantment. He rose upright, flung aside the last intervening branch of the hornbeam, and rushed out upon them.

His first impulse was to strike them both down. The accumulated irritations of many months would have been behind that blow; and behind it, too, would have been a deep, subterranean, occult jealousy of Lexie; not merely the immediate jealousy over Nell but a much more subtle thing: a jealousy of Lexie's sagacity and — who knows? — even of the mysterious advantage in these things that his very illness gave him! And mentally speaking, the blow was given. Rook had the feeling of giving it. He had the relief, the exhaustion, the relaxation of having given it. And yet in the course of his rush toward them, and of his approach till he' stopped in front of them, he never so much as raised his hand.

Lexie was the one whose head was turned toward him and he at once loosened his hold upon the girl, who sank down upon the grass. Whiter than any human being had ever seen it was the younger Ashover's Claudian countenance as he moved forward a step or two, putting himself between his brother and the girl upon the ground. As for Nell, she gave one startled cry, stared at the intruder as if he had been a complete stranger, and then covered her face with her two hands.

"So this is it, is it?" said Rook hoarsely, confronting them with a look so menacing that Lexie made a little nervous deprecatory movement.

"Rook — I'm ashamed of you — to follow us like this — to frighten Nell like this —— What's up now? What's the matter with you? Nell and I have a perfect right to come out together if we want to on a fine August afternoon!"

His voice took on the old familiar tone of semi-badinage as he said this, and the colour began to come back to his face.

"So this is it!" repeated Rook, staring wildly at Nell who had now removed her hands from her face and was answering his look with a steady scrutinizing gaze that became more and more full of complicated significance.

"So this is how you have decided to treat me," he went on, throwing down both stick and cap upon the grass and rubbing his forehead as if to obliterate some evil dream. "It's the sort of thing one expects from Lexie," he continued bitterly; "but I'd fooled myself into thinking that you were different from the rest of them, Nell."

The younger Ashover began at this moment to display unmistakable signs of his malady. A quick spasm crossed his features; his mouth quivered; a convulsive tremor ran through him. "Sit down!" said Rook in a commanding tone. "No, you're perfectly right. I ought not to have come. But you needn't be afraid, you two; I won't interrupt your excursions a second time. Sit down, Lexie, can't you?"

His brother obeyed him and sinking on the ground by Nell's side hugged his knees with his arms.

"I thought you meant fisticuffs just now, Rook," he said, smiling. "What would you have done" — and he turned his head toward the young girl— "if Rook and I had started butting at each other like two roaring bulls? God! I'm glad you didn't go for me with that oak stick of yours, Rook. It looks like the very father of cudgels! Sit down yourself, for the Lord's sake; and don't stand on one leg any more."

But Rook did not change from his dazed, fixed stare at Nell. It was as if he had been some infuriated but puzzled savage, whose spirit was slowly being sapped by the power of a civilized eye.

"I'm sorry, Nell," he blurted out at last. "I'm very sorry I followed you."

But the girl rose quietly to her feet. "I think I'll walk home by myself," she said. "I've had enough of the Ashover family for one afternoon!"

Her tenuous sarcasm, obvious and simple though it was, carried a weight out of all proportion to its justification, by reason of its incongruity upon the lips that uttered it. Lexie made a grimace; and searching about in his pocket for what he wanted lit a cigarette with shaky fingers.

But Rook's face darkened into an angry frown. "You won't leave this spot, Nell," he said fiercely, "till you and I have come to an understanding!"

She made no answer to this challenge; but tossing her head and giving him one quick reproachful look she walked off toward the hornbeam path.

Both the brothers saw her forcing her way through the branch-covered aperture with swift impatient movements of her thin bare arms.

When she was out of sight Rook made a hesitating movement to follow her.

"Stop, you fool, stop!"

The affectionate roughness in Lexie's tone did more than all his whimsicalities to soothe away the elder brother's dangerous mood. Curiously enough, too, the mere fact that he had seen the worst, or what he convinced himself was the worst, of that amorous encounter, drew out the sharpest sting of his jealousy. And the girl had gone. Lexie and she were no longer together. And in her going she had reserved her indignation, her hurt pride, her revolt, her sense of shame, entirely for him; her mute reproaches entirely for him; her revenge entirely for him. That "I've had enough of you Ashovers" was a barbed dart that she must have known he would be the one to smart under! Lexie would not care. Lexie enjoyed a certain humorous gregariousness in his amours. "Enough of the Ashovers" was a hit at the elder of the Ashovers; and in these cases the one whom the woman wants to hurt the most is the one she loves the best!

So he argued with himself, applying the balm of convoluted reasoning to the wound he had received; a wound that all the while was healing from another cause … from the relief of a blow that had only been delivered on the astral plane! Restrained from following the girl by all these concerted withholdings, Rook himself sank down now on the grass of Titty's Ring by the side of his brother and accepted from his fingers a cigarette of peace.

"Think of all the hands through which this little white tube has passed," said Lexie, with a relaxed sententiousness, "only that it may burn itself out into thin air, between two quarrelling men, in the heart of a Dorset wood!"

He pulled out his little box as he spoke and swallowed a couple of the lozenge-shaped tablets. Rook was conscious of a faint sardonic malice as he let his own finger and thumb toy with the companion box in his waistcoat pocket.

They subsided into gloomy silence while the wood murmurs around them became a sighing echo of the great forward-rushing flood of Time, swallowing everything up.

"By the way, Lexie," Rook said after a pause, "doesn't it seem as if it were carrying things a trifle far, for us both to be making love so openly to the wife of the village priest? Hastings, of course, is too lost in his book to care what his girl does; but I did get a hint from Twiney just now that the village had begun to talk."

Lexie looked at him with narrowed, screwed-up eyelids. Rook got a faint impression of something approaching a lewd wink; but Lexie's eyes had so many natural wrinkles around them that he may have been deceived.

"I notice," said the younger Ashover, "that it isn't until your particular star is suffering a momentary eclipse that this matter of propriety comes to the front. Good Lord! if we're to begin considering the feelings of the village we might as well give up having any pleasure at all. At least I might, who haven't been blessed with a mistress like Netta or a wife like Ann! Why! Do you realize that I haven't had any dalliance with any wench at all since those days when we used to go to Tollminster together?" His voice became high-pitched and even querulous. "I tell you it would be monstrous if I should go down to my grave without having known any pleasure!"

He fell into a fit of bottomless gloom from which his voice emerged again like the sound of a bumble-bee in a great foxglove bell.

"I adore them all!" he muttered. "I adore them all!"

Rook watched him with sympathy; but a mysterious meanness in himself at which he was both surprised and ashamed made the difference of their luck in this particular case not altogether disagreeable to his inmost mind. A very queer sort of vicious irritable malice, akin to the malice with which one regards the struggles of a mob at the ticket office of a theatre, took possession of him as he looked at Lexie's agitated face. He felt for one second as if it would give him a wicked delight to crowd Titty's Ring with the forms of sleeping mænads; and then, immediately afterward, to obliterate them with a wave of his hand!

His thoughts were interrupted by an unexpected remark from his brother.

“Nell is quite certain now,” said Lexie gravely, “that Hastings does know where Netta is. She got it out of him last night that he knows. She told me to tell you.”

The whole face of the surrounding scene changed in a moment for Rook Ashover. He rose and pulled his brother up by his hands.

“Damn the man!” he cried fiercely. “I thought there was something of that kind. Come on; let me get you down to the cart. Twiney’s been waiting long enough.” He took Lexie by the arm and held the hornbeam branches back while he passed through.

The sound of their footsteps, the rustling of leaves and cracking of twigs died away in the distance. The light wind lifted the grasses of Titty’s Ring with an undulating airy softness that was neither melancholy nor cheerful, a remote softness that did not correspond with any emotions known to the human race.

Clouds of wavering gnats rose and fell, veered and drifted, across that sunlit space; and in their movements there was a sort of rhythm as if they were obeying some unseen fairy orchestration.

The two spotted green snakes, secure now of any interruption, came forth side by side. They might have been drawing the beechnut chariot of Titania herself; so carefully did they advance, every now and then lifting their purple-stained heads and darting out their tiny forked tongues. No other living thing appeared. Sunlight and shadow lay peacefully side by side; and silence fell upon silence like water upon water.

But nothing that stirs the magnetic currents between human beings, those waves of emotion that are like invisible harp strings and are so cruelly jarred, can be altogether lost in the atmosphere where it was begotten.

Something remains, some faint disturbance, some ghostly ripple, in that particular air, of which minds that are sensitive to such vibrations must for ever afterward be conscious.

Limned in that enclosure between woodland and woodland, some shadowy residue, some tenuous adumbration of those three human forms would thenceforth tremble there on the verge of visibility.

Long afterward when those three persons were dead and buried, the eidolons of what had happened to them in that agitated moment would be ready to resume their shape.

The rains might disfigure that spot and the storms dismantle it. Titania's snakes might reach their appointed sum of years and cast no more skins. It still would remain as an evidence of the potency of human passion that something in the quality of that place would never again be quite as it was before. Less palpable than any revenant of definite shape, these airy essences would only touch the nerves of such as were responsive enough to feel them. But as long as Titania's Ring did not lose altogether the character it held then there would be that upon its air that would not pass with the passing of any summer.

CHAPTER XXII

All through the rest of that hot August, night alter night in the small book-littered room at Toll-Pike Cottage, Rook wrestled with William Hastings over the matter of Netta's address. The priest did not deny, on the contrary he quite openly admitted, that he knew where she was; but weeks passed and nothing that Rook could say or do was able to shake his obstinate resolution.

"I promised Miss Page not to betray her and I won't betray her."

They gradually became occasions of a curious and complicated perversity, these recurrent and prolonged conversations in that stuffy little room. Nell did not by any means always absent herself from the arguments between the two men; and her presence, when she joined them, added its own troubled implication to the increasing morbidity of these strange encounters.

In her reaction against both Rook and Lexie after that incident in Titty's Ring she had drawn insensibly closer to her husband. What had gone on in the depths of that entangled system of nervous susceptibilities which her slight frame enclosed would have required the elucidation of a book far nearer to the mysteries of life than that sinister manuscript in her husband's bureau now so seldom looked upon!

Her romantic devotion to Rook, already removed from the turmoil of her disturbed senses, sublimated itself during these hot August weeks into a passionate longing to do something, to do anything, to restore his peace of mind. She had begun to believe that if only she could bring Netta into his life again, that restless fever that seemed eating out his soul would be allayed and quieted.

Her unsatisfied craving for love, roused and irritated by days and days of feebler and feebler resistance to Lexie's ardour, turned now, in her reaction from her yielding mood of that one unfortunate afternoon, into a less fastidious and more complying attitude toward her legal companion.

Hastings himself began to be vaguely aware of unsuspected depths of perversity in his own feelings, especially in regard to his contest with Rook. He found himself deriving a vicious triumph from drawing out to further and further lengths the protracted struggle between them and he was even tempted sometimes to pretend to be weakening in his resistance in order that his opponent should not lose hope and retire in anger and disgust.

But if there were unsounded levels of morbidity in his desire that their strange duel should not end too quickly, there were still more furtive depths in his attitude to Rook and Nell when he had them together under his eye. He did not hesitate at these times to make the very utmost of the newly established relations between himself and his young wife, playing unscrupulously upon Nell's desperate desire that he should reveal his treasured secret and exploiting her touching attempts to persuade him.

Nell had not the remotest inkling of all that was going on in his mind. She herself, with a young girl's erotic egoism, was living just then in a sort of lingered-out trance of dreamy self-effacement. Had she known what ambiguous motives were mingling with his refusal to yield up Netta's secret she would have shrunk from his caresses as from those of a hooded snake. But her indignant disgust, as in so many similar cases, would not have been altogether just or fair. Hastings had, until that eventful summer, lived so completely in his metaphysical thoughts that he might be said to have had no normal human life at all; and now when, for the first time under the biting whip of jealousy, his natural self-assertion rose up and demanded satisfaction, it was only to find that this long-starved, long-delayed burgeoning was afflicted at the very root.

Against the corrosive poison of the humiliation he endured from the mere sight of Rook and Nell together his wounded vanity turned and turned upon itself, like an animal that turns against its own flesh; and by a strange obscure law, working in that dark inner world, he found his account in lacerating his own deep hurt still further; because, in so doing, he dragged the others down with him in a morbid complicity of shame.

As August drew to a close and the ninth month of Lady Ann's pregnancy approached, Rook felt himself becoming more and more of a lean, lifeless, motiveless shadow of the man he had formerly been. The preparations for his son's birth — for no one seemed for a moment to doubt the sex of the newcomer — caused him nothing but irritation. It was as though, as the infant came nearer and nearer to birth, it drew to itself every magnetic current of vitality that stirred in the air about it. The atmosphere of Ashover House seemed to exist for no other purpose than for nourishing this insatiable intruder; and Rook went to and fro among his people with a sense of seeing his most cherished fancies and illusions reduced to insignificant wind-wafted straws blown up and down the steps of the Capitolium in the path of a young Cæsar!

There were moments when that strange hallucination of the rider on the gray horse who had overtaken him on the road to Comber's End returned with a dim rebuking gesture at the excess of his pusillanimity; but for the most part he found himself shrinking away from the flushed triumphant languor of Lady Ann, from the nervous excitement of Mrs. Ashover, from the gloating whispers and glances of Pandie and Mrs. Vabbin.

It was indeed with the feeling of an escape from something that had grown well-nigh unbearable that he kept returning, every few days, to his attacks upon the secretive malignity of Mr. Hastings. To his conscious mind it was always of Netta that he thought; but in reality the mere neighbourhood of Nell's devotion, the mere propinquity of that supple youthful body and those clinging idealizing glances, was something that restored him to his lost place in the centre of his universe, something that transformed him back, from a negligible courtier mannikin in the train of his offspring, to an authentic protagonist in his own life tragedy, dealing with existence on equal terms!

The last day of August came and went; and with its departure the weather showed signs of changing. Gusty westerly winds, blowing up from the Bristol Channel across Sedgemoor and Blackmore, began troubling the sun-bleached trees and moaning disconsolately through the deserted stubble fields.

Rook had begun to grow conscious that he was playing no very dignified part in this psychological chess game. He felt certain uneasy misgivings as to whether his determination to drag the secret at all costs out of the husband had resulted in anything more palpable than the distraction of his own troubled nerves by the society of the wife.

There came over him, too, as he began to recognize that Hastings had an obstinacy in him that no importunity and no persuasion could influence, an ugly and unpleasant sense of having been entangled in some equivocal spiritual orgy that was exercising a drug-like and sinister effect upon all three of them.

He felt ashamed that he had permitted this Toll-Pike obsession, whatever its nature might be, to interfere with the frequency of his visits to Lexie. Lexie had not been so well after that Titty's Ring excursion; and though whenever he and his brother did meet it was quite on the old unassailable footing, the younger Ashover could not help being conscious that the only permanent effect of the summer jaunts which he had found so sweet was to throw his timid companion back more unhesitatingly into the arms of her husband, more absorbingly into her platonic passion for Rook.

If Lexie could have pierced with his sagacious weather eye the mile or so of gusty autumn-smelling air and the few inches of brick and mortar which separated his candle-lit chamber from these nocturnal encounters at Toll-Pike Cottage, he would have made more than his usual grimace of disgust at the neurotic tricks of the human mind. It would have seemed to him that the very atmosphere of that room of Hastings's was penetrated with unnatural suppressions. He would have denounced every one of its three occupants as being engaged in spinning out, like so many demented silkworms, a thick unhealthy cocoon of meretricious emotion. He would have cast upon his brother one of those looks of indignant moral contempt such as a shrewd horse-dealer turns upon a showy but short-winded nag. And if he could have appeared before the three of them with an appropriate protest upon his tongue, it would have referred to the superiority of the most gross and the most unsophisticated bawdiness over this super-subtle mental dissipation!

As one rain-swept day followed another over the roofs of that Frome-side village the sense of expectancy, in the minds of all the persons with whom we are concerned, grew steadily heavier and heavier; until it became something that could hardly be borne.

This expectant mood, with the burden of gathering fate pressing upon it, is a natural enough phenomenon in all cases of child-birth. In this case, however, it went further. It affected Marsh Alley and Toll-Pike as well as Ashover House. It entered the innocent domicile of Mr. Pod. It sat down like a veiled figure upon the lintel of Mr. Twiney. It even seemed to visit the stable of the long-necked mare; so ominous and plaintive were the whinnyings that proceeded from that square window abutting on the village street.

More than ten days of these September gusts had passed; when, one stormy night, Nell Hastings found herself suddenly and unaccountably wide awake in her bed. There was a waning half-moon observable through her window which kept throwing a pallid stream of light across her husband's sleeping head, before it was swallowed up once more by swift-travelling clouds.

The girl felt impelled to prop herself up on her elbows and stare out upon that patch of troubled changing sky. She had that uncomfortable sense of vast world-wide impending catastrophe which often comes to people, when, at some moment usually associated with oblivion, they catch the face of the world off-guard, so to speak, and in unsuspecting disarray.

She glanced over her shoulder at Hastings's face. Was it some movement, some muttering of his, that had roused her into this unnatural wakefulness? She looked at his watch on the little table beside them. It pointed to half-past two; just that particular hour of the night which Rook always maintained was associated with the lowest ebb of vitality in mortal pulses; the hour when ships sank, when wild geese failed in their flight, when old trees and old men turned cold, and when animals and children were stillborn.

Ah! It must have been Hastings who had disturbed her; for he was beginning to talk in his sleep now.

His words were broken and incoherent; fragments, it might well have seemed, and wind-tossed straws, of that troubled substance, the whole compact rondure of which seemed to be bearing them gustily through space, buffeted up — down — here — there — by winds that had no mercy and no purpose.

All at once she bent down above him and listened with every sense in her body; listened with the beatings of her heart above all; and with a cold tension of her muscles.

“I’ll see you dead before I’ll tell you!”

Her brain became one petrified conch of listening. It became a brittle shell through which some mysterious sound was destined to pass which it found almost unbearable.

But she had to bear it; and it did not fail to come in that commonplace, realistic, matter-of-fact manner characteristic of all true oracles.

“Thirteen Walpole Street” came the words from the sleeping man. “Walpole Street.” And then there followed more incoherent mutterings and once again that ferocious sentence the words of which seemed to glow with a smouldering lava-like fury. “I’ll see you dead before I’ll tell you!”

He rambled on a little further after that; but his words carried no more significance to her ear than does the wash of the tide upon the pier-posts of a ferry when the traveller has once stepped ashore. She sank down again by his side in that wind-tossed half-moonlight and lay staring at the little squares of the window.

As so often happens with momentous human decisions, such as carry in their train drastic issues and devastating results, the first knowledge she had herself of the thing she was going to do seemed in some curious way to precede and antedate all the motives that subsequently accounted for it.

It was as if she were making a discovery in the mind of another person, the definite discovery, in fact, that this other person had decided, for reasons absolutely hidden from everyone, to bring Netta Page back to Ashover!

What she really discovered, as she stared at those window squares, was that she herself had irrevocably decided to bring Netta back; but this decision — based upon nothing that could be accounted for by any rational argument — required every kind of rational argument to support it and make it plausible!

What she felt within herself as she considered her plan — this plan that she suddenly discovered to be already existing — was that, now she knew Netta's address, it would be impossible to hide it from Rook; and if Rook knew it he would take the next train for London. It seemed so much better for Netta to be the one to make the journey. If Rook went off in his present mood, God knows when he would come back. And obviously he would go. She knew him well enough to know that for an absolute certainty. Well, then, if she didn't want to think of him breaking away from everyone and staying on blindly with Netta in London, the only thing to do was to bring Netta to him.

She had begun to feel an unmitigated reaction against the morbid entanglement into which the existence of that secret had brought the three of them. She hated to think of her husband in that particular light. She hated to think of his having that advantage over Rook. To bring Netta herself upon the scene was to clear the air in every direction. She did feel a moment's qualm at the thought of doing it when Ann's child was so near birth. But Ann had never been considerate of her feelings or indeed of any one's. Ann had always struck out remorselessly for her own hand! So drastically had she done so that it seemed a kind of Quixotism to consider Ann in the matter at all. The person to be considered was Rook and as far as Rook was concerned, now that she knew where Netta was, there seemed to be only two conceivable alternatives: either to give him the address without comment, which would mean his going off pell-mell to London, to return

God knew when; or to wire Netta straight away and send her the money to make the journey herself!

As to what would happen later on, as to what permanent arrangements Rook might wish to make, or Netta might be prepared to make, that must be left to the future to decide. She and William would have done their part, as soon as Netta and Rook had been brought together again! Her own desire was simply to reinstate her husband's dignity in Rook's eyes, and Rook's dignity in her husband's eyes; and to break up the unhealthy and sinister duel between them which had converted that August into one of the most morbid epochs in her life.

Of any deliberate revenge upon Lady Ann her mind was quite unconscious. She just ruled Lady Ann out of court as a person who could be trusted to strike out for herself, whatever happened. She had not forgotten the intrusion into her dining room, or the exposure of the plate with the three pansies beside it. That incident had made a dent upon her mind which the intervening months had not obliterated, but it played no part in what she felt now. The waves of thought that kept overleaping one another in her small oval-shaped head as she stared at the square panes, at the racing yellow-tinged clouds, at the formless moon, were almost all generous and romantic.

The most dominant and most recurrent of these thoughts if they had been translated into definite words would have run as follows: "Rook is pining for Netta, who will never understand him as I understand him. But he wants her; he is full of remorse about her. Left to Ann and Ann's child, he will eat his heart out in utter misery. I alone can save him by bringing Netta into his life again."

The day that dawned upon this eventful night was a dark and strange one even for that unusual September. It suggested rain; but it was not raining. It suggested thunder; but there was no thunder. Only, without the assistance of any frost or of any apparent wind, the first fluttering down of leaves took place in all manner of unexpected directions.

Even Hastings felt the influence of the day. “Don’t you smell something queer in the air this morning, Nell?” he said to her at breakfast.

The girl nodded in silence, waiting for the right moment to make her momentous announcement.

“It’s extraordinarily odd,” he went on, “but I keep being conscious of some subtle smell — in this room — in the garden — in the road — that I haven’t noticed since I was a child. It’s not exactly a smell, either! It’s more than that. It’s a taste in the mouth and a strange indescribable feeling through every pore of the body.”

Nell did begin to listen to him now, lifting up her chin between a vase of salpiglossis and a vase of cinerarias, both of them brought from the Ashover garden by Rook.

“I keep thinking of all sorts of little objects connected with my life when I was a child,” Hastings continued. “I see the backs of certain volumes of the Latin classics my father used to read. My father was a cobbler, Nell. Have I ever told you that? But he had a mania for reading Latin. He was not a learned man. It was a sort of fantastic game with him. And there’s something about the smell of this air that makes me think of London pavements and the peculiar feeling of the wet city mist on your face when you open a window into a room lit by gas and crowded with leather-bound books.”

He sank into silence again; but his face bore such a happy, dreamy expression that Nell was quite shocked by his next words when, after a long pause, he looked across at her with a light in his eyes.

“I shall take my book up again this morning,” he said. “I’ve been getting a new angle on it during these nights with Ashover. I’ve been tapping his brain without his knowing it — not for ideas exactly — but to get my own thoughts into focus.”

He rose from the table as he spoke and going to the window opened it a little farther.

“There’s the smell of something more than rain out there,” he said. “If you want to know what I really think, Nell, I think there’s a terrific thunderstorm coming up! Perhaps it’s that which brings what I have to write next in my book — my chapter of all chapters, Nell! — with such a mad rush into my mind.”

He moved back to his chair, but instead of reseating himself, he leant against it, keeping his eyes fixed upon her and growing more and more excited.

“I believe I could finish the whole thing if I really got started to-day, Nell. I’ve only four more chapters. But they’re the difficult ones. That’s why I’ve been letting it go lately. They’re the ones that explain the actual process of cosmic unravelling. They’re the ones that give the clue to the unwinding of the clock!”

She looked at his illuminated and disturbed face with a scrutinizing eye. Had he the natural human intelligence to grasp all she meant to do by having Netta here? One could never tell with him! There was an obstinate wilfulness in the man that might sheer off at any tangent, at any moment. “Shall I speak to him now?” she thought. “Or shall I wait?”

Her decision, like so many human decisions, was brought to a head by something entirely outside her control. She caught sight of the village postman passing their gate, an occurrence that meant that in the space of about half an hour, giving him time to reach Ashover House and return, he would be passing it again and consequently be at hand to enable her to carry out her precipitate plan.

She moved straight up to her husband, and in a low, hurried, eager voice confessed what she had overheard and what she wished to do.

The criss-cross currents that tossed themselves into spray within the depths of the priest’s mind took two main directions as he listened to her breathless suggestion.

The first of these tidal currents was full of a heavy sulkiness at being betrayed into giving up his secret; a secret which had become a sort of fetish with him as being the symbol of his malignant advantage over Rook Ashover. It was just because those harmless syllables, “Thirteen Walpole Street,” had become a kind of mania with the man that he had been overheard muttering them in his sleep; and now Nell was in possession of them!

But the second of these two mental tides contradicted the mood of the first. By having Nell and Rook so often recently under his eye his jealousy had gathered momentum; while the perverse forms of malignity which at the start had supplied an antidote to this jealousy were beginning to lose their savour and to grow tiresome and insipid.

There were several reasons why Nell’s surprising suggestion did not altogether displease him. For one thing he felt sure it would mean the end of this platonic philandering between his wife and Ashover. Rook could hardly make use of Toll-Pike Cottage as a rendezvous for two love affairs! In the second place, it would cause definite and emphatic annoyance to Lady Ann; for whom, ever since he had learnt that she was to be a mother, he had nourished one of his queer half-neurotic, half-metaphysical aversions.

As Nell talked to him now she could see from his expression that his feelings were not by any means simple. She had recourse therefore to a grand feminine coup, which came to her by a sort of inspiration.

"You know what you have so often felt," she pleaded, "with regard to all our friends here? Well — that, at any rate, will be quite different when you've asserted yourself between Netta and Rook."

He stared at her in clouded bewilderment. What on earth did she mean? He could not believe that she saw quite as clearly as her hint implied the gaping depths of the hurt to his self-love which his position as the priest of the village had worked in him.

"You mean?" he murmured tentatively.

She looked straight at him now; and, like so many essentially honest and unscheming women, she found that the very integrity of her nature gave her a power, when she was embarked on a campaign of diplomacy, far more effective than any actual cunning in argument.

"I mean that it'll be more of a relief to me than I can tell you for you to be worthy of yourself and in the open over Mr. Ashover. I can't explain to you what it'll mean to me, William, to be free of this horrid sense that you're doing something shameful and unkind, like this hiding up Netta's address! It's made a difference to me already — just our talking freely like this about it! And if we send our telegram and have Netta here I shall feel still happier! I do think, William dear, that none of them have looked to you for your help and advice in their lives, as they naturally might have done, considering, after all, that you are the vicar of the place!"

She watched him anxiously; and a glow of excitement came into her face when she saw that her words had not been without their effect.

"You mustn't think," she went on, "that my friendship with Mr. Ashover prevents my seeing how coolly, to say the least of it, both he and Lexie treat you in your position as priest. It's the one thing about them that I've never understood.” She stopped and glanced quickly at him, wondering whether she had let herself go too far.

“I’m glad to have been able to tell you this, William,” she added. “Because I feel so much that it only wants a little more respect on both sides for you and Mr. Ashover to get on splendidly together.”

She had won her point. She knew it as clearly as if he had thrown up both his hands and cried out: “I yield!” Her victory was almost as unexpected as it was complete. She did not estimate, because it was outside her knowledge of the man’s metaphysical mania, the part played in his yielding by his mysterious hostility to Rook’s wife. Still less did she realize how much of it was due to a certain queer tenderness which he had come to feel for Netta herself, a tenderness that was, in the last resort, a kind of sympathy of pariah for pariah, of one child of the people for another child of the people.

“Then I can write the telegram?” she cried impulsively. And making a swift childish clutch at one of Hastings’s hands she raised it to her mouth.

It was this gesture more than anything that she had done which reconciled him to her victory. There is nothing in the world more calculated to establish a man in his own esteem than to feel the lips of a young girl against his fingers! The psychological effect of such a thing, reverting to dim, far-off pre-Homeric times, carries a magic along with it capable of seducing the coldest-blooded philosopher.

Hastings watched her scribbling the telegram on a piece of paper. He heard her muttering aloud those familiar syllables: “Thirteen Walpole Street,” which he had himself been so malignantly and triumphantly whispering under his breath for the last half year. He derived a peculiar physical relief, like the drawing of a piece of rusty iron out of his flesh, at the mere sound of those words on another’s lips, and while his wife rushed out with the telegram to the postman he found himself running up the stairs to his room with a clearer mind and a more lively desire to continue his life's work than he had felt since the day of Netta's flight.

The woman had been more on his mind than he had acknowledged to himself; and his recondite revenge upon Rook, by refusing her address, had been a severer strain upon his nerves than he had calculated upon. Well! He was clear of it. He would have the whip hand of them all now. He would henceforth be in a position to assert himself as the formidable spiritual director of all these people!

He sat down at his table and drew out his manuscript. The sight of these closely written impassioned pages changed the current of his thoughts once more. What did it matter whether these people treated him properly or not? What did it matter whether he was an effective parish priest or not? What did it matter whether his gentle Nell kissed his hand or not? Long, long years after he was dust in dust, after there was no longer any living creature who remembered him, his work would still be exercising its effect upon the universe; the wonder of the disillusioned, the terror of the illusioned!

For the rest of that day Hastings worked silently, passionately, upon his book. When he came down to lunch he was like a different man. Nell had never known him in such high spirits. He gossiped about the village people. He told her stories about his early struggles, his desperate youthful attempts to get an adequate education, his experiences at various theological colleges.

The girl thought to herself, "If he'd been like this a year ago, I would never have gone out so much with Lexie." Had Nell been more superstitious than she was she would have felt uneasy in the presence of this unnatural exuberance. An occult-minded person would have watched William Hastings very closely at that juncture and would perhaps have endeavoured to calm and allay this stream of excited talk. But Nell's own spirits were so exalted just then at the despatching of the telegram and the idea of Netta's arrival that she responded to his mood with a mood of like kind. Never had Toll-Pike Cottage heard such voices and such laughter. It would have taught the evasive Rook something he did not know as to the nature of women could he have seen the apparently complete and radiant accord that existed between these two. All through the afternoon, until tea-time, Hastings worked on; writing with scarcely a glance out of the window or away from the page; as if it were necessary to finish the book that very day.

After one of the happiest teas they had ever had since they were married, Nell announced that she intended to make Mr. Twiney drive her down to Bishop's Forley station; so that, in case Netta had been at home when the telegram reached her and had started at once by the first train, she might not be left stranded.

Hastings shook his head. "You're assuming too much, young lady," he remarked. "The chances are all against her being in the house when your message arrives. And why should she start in such a hurry? The natural thing would be to give herself at least a night to think over it."

Nell looked at him significantly. "That shows how little you know about women," she said. "There's probably not been a day since she left when she hasn't imagined herself rushing off back again just like this! What I said in the telegram was that we both thought that she ought to come, that it was important she should come. That would bring me without waiting overnight, if I were in her place!"

Hastings smiled grimly. "You and Netta are different people, Nell. And there's another thing, too. You seem to assume that she's got the money to come. I must say I think that's a rather big assumption."

Nell’s face crinkled itself into a fit of giggling at this.

“How funny you are, William,” she gasped. “Didn’t you see me go to my chest of drawers just now? I gave the postman five pounds to telegraph with the message!”

Hastings stared at her. “Five pounds? Where did you get that from, Nell?”

She laughed still more at this.

“Where — do — you — suppose I get — money — from?” she murmured. “Do you think someone gives it to me?”

“I give it up completely,” he cried. “You’re too much for me to-day, young woman.”

She made the shadow of a childish grimace at him, more in the manner of a daughter than a wife; a look that if Rook had caught he would have felt a malicious suspicion that all the romantic glamour he had come to associate with her was in some sort of way a trick that had been played upon him.

It is doubtful whether there is any man in the world who, if he saw all the flickers of expression in the face he is enamoured of, would not be shocked to the foundations of his being; and both Rook and Hastings were such megalomaniacal subjectivists, that as far as they were concerned there really were two quite distinct Nells who doubtless inhabited the same slender frame! It was doubtless Lexie who came nearer than either of them to see the girl as she actually was.

“It’s your own money!” she cried radiantly. “Well! We’ll see whether you’re right or I’m right about her coming to-day. But I’m going to meet this train, anyhow!”

She was going out of the room when he stopped her with a new tone in his voice.

“Have you given a single thought to the future?” he began. “I mean have you considered what’s going to become of Netta after we have got her here?”

Nell made an impatient little gesture with her slender fingers.

“That’s just like a man!” she cried. “Always calculating and weighing. How do we know anything about the future? We may none of us live beyond this autumn!”

The priest lifted his eyebrows and let it go. After all, whatever the upshot of all this was to be, it was a matter for Rook and Netta to settle between themselves. And it did seem to him clear that any issue would be better than the present uncertainty and misunderstanding.

He withdrew to his room and launching out once more upon the dark tide of his impassioned logic, forgot Nell, Netta, Rook, and all terrestrial happenings in that unique absorption in the pure pleasure of laying thought upon thought, speculation upon speculation, which can give, to those who abandon themselves to its fascination, a delight that surpasses every sensual happiness.

It was nearly ten o’clock that night when he heard through his open window the wheels of Twiney’s conveyance stopping at the garden gate.

He listened. Two women’s voices! So Nell had been right in her premonition, and Netta had come! He pushed his papers aside and ran down the stairs to welcome them at the door.

He had no time at the moment to do more than shake hands with the newcomer; for he had to help Mr. Twiney carry up her trunk to the attic room; but a few minutes later, when they were all three together in the parlour, he received his first intimation of how little they either of them knew of what was going on in their visitor’s mind.

"I'm so glad you came, Netta," he said in a kindly, almost paternal tone. "What Nell thought was that something had to be done! She was afraid that Mr. Ashover was working himself into such agitation about you that it was cruel to keep you hidden away any more. Though I did obey you, didn't I, in holding your secret tight?"

"I knew you," broke in Nell, "better than William. He thought you'd wait till to-morrow. But I was sure you'd come to-day."

They both surveyed their silent visitor with friendly curiosity. Netta was quietly and unassumingly dressed. In general appearance, when she pushed up her veil, she looked quite unchanged. But there was something about her manner that made it hard to talk as naturally and openly as they expected to do as soon as Mr. Twiney's back was turned.

"Mr. Ashover is not ill, I hope?" she asked in a low voice.

"Ill?" cried Hastings. "I should think not! And it's Nell, not I, who's got this idea of his being so worried. Besides, it's not only about our Netta that he's been worrying. I suppose you've heard — —"

He stopped suddenly, catching a quick warning look on his wife's face.

"When is the child to be born?" asked Netta quietly.

"Oh, pretty soon now, so they tell me," Hastings replied. "I daresay it's the kind of thing that Mr. Ashover finds especially trying," he added. "But I'm sure he'll be so thankful to have his mind set at rest about you that he'll be a different person to-morrow."

"I sha'n't be a burden on you long," said Netta. "I've told Nell that it's only a very short little visit." She made an affectionate movement toward her hostess and laid her hand upon her arm. "I can't let Nell's hospitality make me a trouble to you," she went on, "and I won't let it either!" she added with a smile.

Hastings drew back, baffled and puzzled. Netta had teased him before with a certain society air which he regarded as an affectation; but her present tone was different from that. It was the tone of a person who has a definite and unalterable plan in his own mind and who is just diplomatically sparring to gain time. There was something about Netta's reserve, something in her manner and in the expression of her eyes, that thoroughly puzzled him.

There was no more real conversation between them during the light supper which Nell now brought in upon a tray; but as soon as the visitor had retired to her attic bedroom her hosts exchanged their impressions.

"I don't believe she's drinking any more," said Nell. "That's the great thing to be thankful for."

Hastings shook his head.

"And yet there's something queer about her," the girl went on, "that scares me somehow. Did you notice it? A sort of unnatural quietness?"

Hastings nodded

"Of course, she always was quiet," Nell continued, "and very likely we've forgotten how quiet she was. But I can't help feeling it's more serious than that. I don't know what to make of it! She talks naturally enough and listens to what you say. But one has the feeling all the time that her mind is only half in the room with you."

Nell rubbed her face violently with her hands; an habitual gesture with her when she was cornered and bewildered.

"She frightens me!" she burst out. "You don't suppose she's taken to drugs, do you, William?"

He shook his head.

"She seemed to realize about Lady Ann's child," the girl added, "without being told. I couldn't stop Twiney talking about it. But it didn't seem news to her. Perhaps she'd heard about it on the journey. Twiney said, by the way, that Pandie had told him that the child might be born any day now!"

Hastings protruded his under-lip in the manner characteristic of him when any of his manias were touched upon, "It would not trouble me very much," he said grimly, "if after all this fuss it turned out to be a girl!"

The unwitting cause of this midnight discussion in Toll-Pike Cottage lay awake in her attic bed long after her hosts had wandered off into the paths of sleep.

Strange enough was it to find herself once more on the banks of the Frome! Strange and, in a sense that she was not able herself to analyze, sad with a sadness beyond anything she had ever known.

Vainly she tried to envisage what form her reëncounter with Rook would take. As she watched the rolling banks of whitish-yellow clouds crossing and recrossing that sickly, shapeless object, so distorted, so disfigured, that she knew to be the waning moon, a very curious and disturbing mental experience took possession of her. She had the feeling that some great passage of time had elapsed, some half-century of the journeying years, and that she alone of all the people she had known in Ashover was alive on that September night. She felt vividly conscious of being a solitary disembodied spirit, without desire, without hope, without regret, without any faintest wish to change anything or to alter anything; indeed, with no emotion at all except an infinite sadness.

Why she should be so sad she could not tell. Rook, Lexie, Hastings, Nell, Lady Ann — were they not all lying in absolute quiescence in that enclosure by the water meadows? A new race of men and women filled their places, who cared nothing for them, nothing for their memories, nothing for their names!

Her mind seemed to revert, with a cold, responsive weariness, to the inscrutable melancholy that used to puzzle her upon the face of Sir Robert; and it seemed to her, as she watched that bulging, unhappy, deformed moon, cringing before the clouds, that she now understood the secret of his sadness. It was a sadness that only a certain type of sentiency in this world ever responded to or touched the fringe of, a sadness that had something to do with what the undying elements must feel — the earth, the air, the water — as they submit in their patience to the eternal process; and watch the human generations coming and going and leaving behind so faint a trace!

And then, without any warning, a queer thing happened to Netta Page. She grew suddenly conscious that an actual human face was peering in upon her from outside the window; not pressing itself against the window pane, but regarding her with fixed intentness out of that heart-sick moonlight, its eyes looking straight into her eyes with an expression in them that gathered up and held in suspense the diffused woefulness that filled the great sky tent.

Long years afterward Netta could recall that look. And the curious thing about it was that she never hesitated as to the identity that hovered behind it, out there, in the sick, gusty night!

She knew it for the face of Sir Robert Ashover; and so deep an impression had that portrait of the Cavalier made upon her mind that even now, as she felt a vivid consciousness of his actual presence, it was with no trace of fear but rather with a sort of emotional recognition that she met his gaze. Hardly conscious of what she did she stretched out her arms toward the window; and it seemed to her as if that sorrowful phantom countenance smiled gently and reassuringly at her as it faded away.

When it was gone and she was once more lying back upon her pillow she found herself silently crying; not with bitter self-pitying tears, but with the sort of tears that belong to the winnowed and de-personalized spirit of the human race itself as it draws back from the confused arena of its sufferings and catches the sounds of disaster and calamity, faint and muffled, and almost mellowed as they rise up above the roof tops of the world.

She made up her mind that when she did meet Rook on the ensuing day she would make him take her into the church, to that marble image of the Cavalier there! How strange it was, she thought, as her tears dried upon her cheeks, that the mind of a person dead and buried more than two hundred years should still retain its power to influence and to console! Was it that something actually survived, of such a person’s subtler, more sensitive consciousness, among the places where it had moved in its lifetime? Or was there, behind all the dream stuff of the whole tragic scene, some imperishable cistern or reservoir of superhuman pity into which these nobler, these more imaginative responses sank, as the years moved round, adding always something to this great protest?

Netta’s nature was too simple, her beliefs and half-beliefs too vague and unformed, to be conscious of more than the crudest outlines of these open questions; but the things she had suffered and the things she had done, combined with the pressure upon her mind of her return to a place of so many memories, stirred up within her thoughts and speculations corresponding with these and corresponding with that troubled night sky.

The face at her window may have been a creation of her over-excited nerves; but before she fell asleep at last, in the early dawn, she had immersed all the recent impressions of her London life in these earlier associations; associations saturated with the sights and sounds of the country, and full of a sadness that was more wistful, if not less bruising, than the kind of wretchedness she had superimposed upon it.

The faint light of the dawn as it filled the small attic window with a cold, pale, watery blueness, like the blueness of polished steel, merged with the great concentrated secret thought which had been sustaining her all that agitating day.

She dreaded her meeting with Rook more for his sake than for her own. What would his reaction be to what she had to make him understand? Why, oh, why, she thought, did things that were so clear, so simple, so indisputable, to one human mind, become so strange, so foreign, so insane, when communicated to another?

With something more than the hard bones of ivory skulls were human beings divided, each from each! And she flung out against the pallid, bluish dawn a last desperate prayer that that particular queer-shaped skull that had so often lain by her side should not prove impervious to what she had to communicate to the consciousness within it!

CHAPTER XXIII

IT WAS THE last day of September. The Ashover brothers were seated side by side under Lexie's elm tree in the churchyard, the back of the younger propped up against the trunk, that of the elder against an anonymous tombstone.

The day was misty and warm. The early afternoon shadows had that purplish haze and dew-wet mistiness over their dark outlines on the grass which dwellers in the west of England have long learnt to associate with the red berries of traveller's joy and the white clusters of old-man's-beard! It was one of those days when the filmy seeds of dandelions move at random, without the stirring of a breath, from resting place to resting place; when the purple tufts of knapweed reveal the hard globulous husk below the petals; when the ragwort droops heavily over the mole heaps; when the dominant odour upon the air seems to be a blending of burning weeds and rain-soaked funguses.

"Are you sure she told you all she told me?" Rook was saying, in a voice that seemed as if it might have been the very epitome of that autumnal season, so languid and spiritless did it sound.

"Good Lord, Rook! How can I tell what she told you?" rapped out the other. "The thing is clear enough, anyhow. Those Anglican fathers must have got hold of her soon after she disappeared. She's had more than six months of their confounded chatter. The wonder is that they haven't spoilt her more than they have. You know what I'm like over these things; how tough and hard to be fooled I am? And though I can't forgive them for putting their nonsense into the mind of a sweet creature like that, I have to admit that it's the genuine thing with her. And I expect, too, it has given her a new interest." He paused and frowned meditatively. "I expect it's been for the best, Rook," he added gravely.

"Did she say anything to you about wanting to join some order?" asked the elder brother.

"She mentioned it as a possibility. But as far as I could make out, these Fathers, whoever they are, weren't encouraging it. I suppose they want her for other purposes. Oh, I don't like it — I don't like it, Rook!"

Rook recalled his own recent talk with Netta in Toll-Pike Cottage; and he also felt that he "didn't like it." Indeed, that was putting what he had gone through during that interview very much too mildly.

The encounter had been to him like a draught of coloquintida. It had been one of the master ironies of his life. He had rushed to greet his former mistress with an exultant sense of reconciliation and recovery. He had met her with a glowing wave of tenderness; and then in place of the answering tide of renewed loyalty, in place of the clinging and pathetic affection he had expected, he had been received by a completely different Netta; a Netta who treated their former life as if it had been sin; a Netta who took it for granted that thenceforth to the end of his days he was going to be faithful to Lady Ann!

The situation had been made doubly ironical by the fact that it had been impossible to conceal from his wife that the girl had come back. He had brought the news out boldly and frankly and there had been a distressing scene between them about it; a scene that had been repeated afterward with even more unpleasant nuances of misunderstanding when he had tried to explain the new and unexpected attitude toward him in which his mistress had returned.

Ann had never been more hard, more unyielding, more brutally cynical. She took the line, or pretended to take the line, that the whole thing was an elaborate pretence or pose on Netta's part. She treated him as if he were a clumsy and conceited victim of a masterpiece of calculated cajolery from an astute adventuress. She flatly refused to see Netta or to listen to any further explanations of her return. "C'est fini! C'est fini!" she had said with a wave of her hand when he brought the matter up for the third time.

"I saw Nell yesterday for a moment — —"

Rook's thoughts had been wandering so far that he felt as if these words of his brother's had been spoken hours ago instead of a minute since.

"It was Nell who got her address out of him and wired to her to come," said Rook. "Just think of it! It seems difficult to believe that all these things have happened since you and I talked in this very place last November."

"That great full moon!" responded the other. "And I thought I shouldn't last out to the end of the summer; and here we are nearly in October! God! I'm glad to be still alive in this world; able to eat a tasty bit of pigeon pie as well as another; and to bustle over for a bit of back-chat with brother Rook of a fine autumn afternoon! By the way, Twickenham maintains that I must be getting a mania for morphia. He says I finished my last box a couple of weeks too soon!"

The elder Ashover's fingers instinctively pressed a little cardboard object in his waistcoat pocket; but all he said was: "I hope you'll need those things less and less as time goes on."

"I've had to go a bit slow on cigarettes this last month," remarked Lexie, striking a match and lighting one as he spoke with more than his usual deliberation. "My bill with Twiney was terrible, as you may imagine," he added, watching the heavy-scented circles of smoke ascend into the thick autumnal air.

Rook glanced at him with sardonic solicitude. “I could just manage to lend you five or six pounds,” he muttered, “but of course it’s really Lady Ann’s money.”

“Oh, I shall get on,” chuckled the other. “You’ll want every penny you’ve got when this child of hers appears. Have you decided upon a nurse yet?”

Rook sighed heavily and looked away over the familiar water meadows, over that level plain of grass and reeds which had been so often “a bank and shoal of time “for his mind’s escape. There came over him a grievous sense of being divided from his brother as they had never been divided before. This new responsibility, even if it were his wife’s money that dealt with the material side of it, was something that in a subtle and invisible manner ended his old bachelor association with Lexie. His life with Netta had not impinged upon that at all; had been, in fact, only a more extravagant case of the amorous adventures that in the old days had consolidated their friendship, giving it that heathen predatory touch which adds quality and piquancy and substance, as if they were fellow huntsmen in the same perilous jungle! But this allusion to the nurse of his child, carrying the implication that thenceforward he was bound up with deep traditional issues independent of Lexie altogether, seemed to signify the definite end of something and the definite beginning of something else, seemed to stand out like a great ambiguous signpost in his days — like that obscure “Gorm” signpost; meaning nothing, yet meaning everything!

He looked at Lexie’s face as the younger man puffed out those spirals of blue smoke into an air that was thick with diffused colour, like the palette of some planetary Tiepolo; and it came over him that the real mistake of his life was in having departed, one stone’s throw, from the calm epicurean existence of those first years after their father’s death.

What had made him depart from that unruffled backwater, that earthly paradise of equanimity? Well! Just his viciousness; just that desire to round off his life with some feminine person or other who would satisfy those insatiable instincts that in the nature of the case his brother could not satisfy!

Oh! Could he only have foreseen, could he only have foreseen! — If he'd been tough and hard and callous he would have been able to whistle them all down the wind. In that case he would have made love to Ann and kept her at a distance; love to Nell and kept her at a distance; love to Netta and kept her at a distance! It was this fatal mixture in him of viciousness and pitiful sympathy that had ruined his life.

For his life was ruined. He knew that as definitely as if he had seen himself like a dead horse in a field, with Lady Ann and her beautiful offspring battening upon his flesh like two resplendent-winged dragon-flies!

Another person would have considered him the fortunate possessor of a distinguished wife and — he felt sure it would be so — of a distinguished heir to his name. Outwardly, at this moment, especially now that Netta was off his conscience and independent of him, he was a man any one might reasonably envy. Yet here he was, looking yearningly at Lexie's seamed and weather-stained face, as he might have looked his last at some lovely enchanted island from which a fatal vessel was irrevocably bearing him away!

Ay! Ay! A human being's life was not a thing of outward possessions, of outward circumstances. It was a thing of a certain secret abiding life illusion, that must be in some measure satisfied or all was lost! His life illusion implied his freedom from every sort of responsibility, except the responsibility of being a good son and a good brother. He was a man born to make women unhappy if he so much as approached them! And yet, how not to approach them, being obsessed, as he was, with this insane impersonal desire? What a dilemma! Why wasn't it possible to have love affairs with trees, with the elements, as those old classical personages used to have?

Oh, how intensely he loved his brother as he looked at him now! If only he could have exchanged with Lexie; he to be the sick one, the doomed one, and Lexie to be the husband of Lady Ann!

"How did Twickenham say you were when he examined you yesterday?" he asked at length, bringing to an end his prolonged melancholy silence.

"Oh, I thought I'd told you," replied Lexie eagerly. "He was very pleased — really surprised, you know! He seemed to indicate that I might go on quite comfortably through another year. My peculiar trouble seems to lend itself to these prolongations and postponements. And in my own secret mind — though I don't want to say the words — I have a sort of instinct that if I do last out one other year, it'll be damnably hard to unloose my hold upon life!"

Rook looked at him with infinite sympathy. He looked at the enormous size of Lexie's head, at the depths below depths of life energy in his glaucous coloured eyes, at the sweet, rich; almost feminine curves of his sensitive mouth.

"Lexie," he began, and stopped suddenly.

"Well, Rook, what is it?"

"I oughtn't to say a thing like that, I suppose. It's one of those absolutely outrageous things that Nature lets people think, but that no decent person could possibly bring himself to say!"

"What is it? What is it, Rook?"

"Well, I was just thinking how many lives I would offer up, and whose lives, if the gods would make me absolutely assured that yours would go on for thirty more years!"

Lexie threw away his cigarette and made a face at him. "I wouldn't have the least objection to this holocaust of yours if I didn't know for a certainty that, no sooner had you done it you'd begin regretting it! You're a funny person and I doubt if you realize how far your queerness goes."

He got up from the ground and yawned. When Lexie yawned he did so with the earthy shamelessness of a wild animal.

"Let's walk back to my place together, Rook," he said. "We could stop at Toll-Pike on the way, maybe, and see if either of the girls is in! Old Hastings, Nell tells me, has started off like a maniac at that book of his. She says he writes day and night now; and hardly stops to eat his meals. It's lucky for her that she has got Netta with her."

They crossed the graveyard together. "Well! Well!" Lexie continued, "It's something that you and I are still walking on a good gravel path side by side. I might so easily be now lying under that elm trunk with the beard growing on my chin and evil-smelling rheum running out of my eyes and nostrils! Yet here we are, looking forward to an excellent tea with black-currant jam among my phloxes, and very likely a couple of sweet-natured wenches to enjoy it with us! How any one can ever worry himself about the shuffling of the cards, as long as there are any cards to shuffle — that's what I cannot understand, brother Rook."

They emerged into the road and proceeded to wander slowly through its white dust watching the heavy-winged tarnished peacock butterflies flutter before them from silverweed to silverweed.

"Think what it would be like," said Lexie, "if every human being left a thin silvery trail behind him like the slime of a snail! Think of such a trail crossing and recrossing its tracks from where it first leaves its perambulator to where it climbs into bed for the last time! Our tracks must pretty often have gone over the same ground, side by side along this road. And yet it is an absolute and irrevocable certainty that one of these walks together will be our last."

Rook's thoughts were preoccupied at that moment with the stark question, a question that gave him the sensation of looking into a gaping wound which had begun to fester, as to what kind of a tilt or twist or secret palliative he could administer to this truculent life illusion of his, so as to endure Netta's conversion, his child's birth, his mother's senile jubilation, and this indescribable separation from Lexie which Lexie seemed too egoistic and self-absorbed even to notice!

"One of these walks will be our last," his brother was saying. Didn't he have the wit to recognize that this "last" had already happened?

They approached the clump of alders that overhung the sheep-washing pool. This was the point where the river turned sharply to the right, heading for the water meadows, and was crossed by a wooden bridge bordered by the same kind of whitewashed railings as skirted the preceding strip of road.

In the centre of this bridge the two brothers came to a pause, leaning against the railing and looking away over the barley fields, now a misty expanse of golden stubble, which sloped up toward Heron's Ridge.

"Do you remember how we used to call this bridge 'Foulden's Bridge,' for no reason except that we had a nursery-maid called 'Foulden' who used to meet that old villain Pod here of a fine summer's evening?"

Lexie chuckled as he uttered these words with an unctuous comprehensive historic chuckle which "flew low," so to speak, like a great flopping mallard, over all the days of all the years of both their lives!

Rook did not trouble himself to answer this particular remark. The two brothers were so content in each other's society that they had a way of thinking aloud; each one pursuing his own deep-indented furrow of contemplation; quite satisfied if now and again these isolated trails crossed one another, like Lexie's silvery snail tracks!

"I think the most delicious moments of my life," said Rook dreamily, "if I put aside the very best of our excursions together, have come when I've been walking by myself along some road I've never seen before. Are you listening, Lexie?"

His brother bent over the railing to watch the course of a bit of wood which he had flung into the water. He lifted up his head presently. "One minute!" he remarked. "Don't forget what you were going to tell me; but I want to see" — and he flung another piece of wood after the first— "I want to see whether it's Rook or Lexie who gets safe under the bridge!"

Rook leaned over the white-washed railing by his side. The Frome ran shallow and weedy just there. A few slender dace, with their heads upstream, were letting the current carry them languidly backward; while at the side of the river, where the water ran over clear sunlit pebbles, a great shoal of minnows were hovering and darting, like little tongues of quicksilver.

"There we go!" cried Lexie, giving his brother one of those looks of complicated naïveté and subtlety which always troubled Rook's mind, as if with the tantalizing proximity of some dimension of human goodness and sweetness which was only offered to be snatched away. "There we go!" And he ran across "Foulden Bridge" to the other side. Rook followed him, puzzled at the eagerness with which he himself, too, awaited the issue of this childish contest.

"I'm out! I'm safe!" cried the younger Ashover, pointing with his stick. Then in a moment his face assumed a most curious mixture of condolence and triumph. "But you're stuck fast under there! You're done for, Rook!"

The elder man did at that second of time undergo an unusual and very unexpected sensation, a perfectly direct and unmitigated shock of self-pity, as if he had been suddenly condemned to leave a world full of beauty and happiness.

“Well? Shall we go on?” said Lexie. “I’m glad it was you and not I who sank, because that means that we shall be together this time next year.”

They moved on across the bridge. The road stretched straight in front of them with nothing but the small white square of Toll-Pike Cottage, far away on the left, to break its perspective till it lost itself in the dim autumnal blur, haze-wrapped and purple-shadowed, of Ashover village.

They moved very slowly now, arm-in-arm, scattering the dust with their feet. Each time they prodded the ground with their sticks little white clouds arose, that subsided patiently and sadly after they passed, like the sighs of disappointed watchers.

“What a place in the imagination,” said Rook suddenly, “has come to be taken by dust. Doesn’t it always return to your mind, that scene in Syria, when the Lord stopped and wrote in the dust?”

Lexie swung round. “You mean when He spat in the dust and made clay! It certainly is strange how every incident of that life falls in with the commonest omens of any walk you go. What were you just going to say on the bridge, Rook, when I interrupted you?”

The elder brother frowned. “Oh, nothing,” he said crossly; but after a pause and in an abstracted tone, “I was wanting to clear up a thing that’s always puzzled me. What is it you feel when you’re alone on a strange road, especially when it leads up over a bare hill? Do you suppose it’s an atavistic memory from times when people were more nomadic and more isolated than they are to-day? Or do you think that all the feelings of solitude, accumulated from many generations, are gathered up then; as if there were a person in each of us who was like a kind of Wandering Jew, with a consciousness entirely made up of the vague, faint, half-human impressions of loneliness, a person whose whole long mysterious life, reaching through many centuries, were one solitary journey?”

In place of answering him Lexie pulled him round by the arm and they stood for a while looking back. All the familiar objects that they looked at then — the wooden bridge with its white palings, the dark-green alders by the sheep wash, the square tower of the church, the gray-stone bridge, the clump of thick-foliaged trees that hid Ashover House — all these things that each of them had known from childhood fell into a new and unfamiliar setting, as if they had been discovered off-guard, in some secretive mood that they had been at pains to conceal.

“Don’t you feel,” said Rook, “that we might be at this moment two characters in one of Grimms’ fairy stories? Haven’t you got that odd feeling, that you get in those stories, as if there were nothing really vulgar or banal in the whole world? As if we might see an old woman driving a goose over that first bridge and a man with a pack on his back crossing this second bridge, and every door in the village ready to open to the cooking of magic cakes and the purring of great wise all-knowing cats! It’s what comes from living in the same spot all one’s life and then suddenly seeing everything as if you’d never seen it before. The only way to escape from vulgarity and commonness is to live all one’s days in a place like Ashover.” He stopped and drew a long breath. “I don’t think I really should care very much,” he added, “if I should never go ten miles away from here until I died!”

They turned their faces once more toward the village and walked on together without further speech till they came to Toll-Pike Cottage.

Lexie's anticipations were justified. They found Netta and Nell seated together in the little front garden. They were able to observe the two girls several seconds before they were themselves seen or heard owing to the muffling softness of the white dust and the fact that the women were engaged in an intimate and agitating conversation.

As the brothers watched them across the fence there came into Lexie's mind that peculiar sense of the passing of time which so often seized and arrested him. That he and Rook on this particular day of September should catch sight of those two, Nell in her white summer frock and Netta in black, talking so earnestly and anxiously, with the little round bed of red geraniums in front of them and the window of Hastings's study open above their heads, seemed to be one of those events that, common enough in themselves, are yet pregnant in some peculiar way with an unforgettable significance.

"Rook is right," thought Lexie, "about living in Ashover. It's the fact of one's knowing every stick and stone in the background of events that gives to events their heightened value. To get the passing of time one has to possess a dial, as it were, on which the hours are marked!" They opened the gate and entered the garden.

Lexie found it piquant to watch this meeting between Netta and his brother. "There are those two," he thought, "solemnly shaking hands and gravely discussing some indifferent matter, when a year ago they were sharing the same room and using the same water jug."

His thoughts were impinged upon by a very serious communication from Nell.

"We're worried about William to-day," she said. "He's been writing at that book of his without cessation for the last twelve hours. He got up early this morning, before I was awake, and we haven't been able to persuade him to come to any meals."

"Has he eaten anything?" enquired Lexie.

"Hardly anything. I took him some milk and biscuits. He hasn't locked the door. But when I go in he looks so wild and haggard and gets so angry at being disturbed that I daren't stop more than a minute. I'm afraid for his mind if he goes on like this. He sat up till three or four this morning. He couldn't have slept more than two hours. And I didn't like what he said when I went in."

"What did he say?"

"It was about Lady Ann and her child. It was awful, Lexie! I can't think how a sane man can think such appalling thoughts. I don't believe he is quite sane," she breathed.

"Can you see him from here?" enquired Lexie, speaking in the tone he might have used if Hastings had been a dangerous otter or badger.

"No. You see? The window's open but he's got the blind down. Come here, Lexie. I don't want Rook to hear us." They moved away to the other side of the geranium bed.

"Netta, you can't mean that you're going back to London without letting me see you once more alone?" Rook spoke these words wistfully and pleadingly but there was an undertone of indignant sullenness in his voice and his eyes had an angry glint.

The girl's face was very pale; a pallor which the golden September light clinging to her brown hair threw into touching relief. She seemed as Rook looked at her, standing there resolute and sad in her loose black dress, to be thinner and more girlish than in former times.

She was aware that his look had in it a recognition of her physical desirableness; the half-conscious non-mental renewal of an ancient magnetism. She knew that he was recalling with a certain tantalized sulkiness his former possession of her.

“I cannot bear it, Rook dear,” she said gently. “I could bear it if I didn’t love you. But I love you far too well. Don’t make it harder for me, Rook, than it is already!”

He glanced gloomily round; but Lexie and Nell had seated themselves on a wooden bench under the hedge, their eyes directed, not toward himself and Netta, but toward the window of Hastings’s room.

“Come into the house,” he said brusquely, taking her by the shoulder.

She felt so strong in her sadness and in her pity that she allowed him to take her into Nell’s little parlour and shut the door upon them; but her instinctive response to the familiar touch of his hands surprised her by its independence of her conscious mind.

The very moment they were alone the room began to assume that cunning, furtive, pandar-like look that rooms take on when human skeletons of opposite sexes stand in one another’s presence, silent, obsessed, with beating pulses and hammering hearts! Rook’s eyes mechanically noted a grotesquely sentimental picture of Nell as a little girl which stood on the mantelpiece and then without regarding her feeble protests he took Netta in his arms.

Those two human bodies seemed to rush together in a strange complicity of contempt for what was happening to those minds or to those wills. The man pressed his mouth so savagely upon the girl’s mouth that before their kiss was over her lips had parted in helpless abandonment.

He had sworn in his anger that she was “like all women” and she knew in her heart that she had proved herself like many among them in the manner in which she yielded at that moment without really yielding at all She just let him do with her as he pleased because her body already belonged to his body and seemed to return to its possessor with the inevitableness of a compass needle. And yet not for one second did she deviate or collapse from her mental resolution.

As soon as he had removed his mouth from her mouth and had begun to kiss her chin and her neck, this unseduced spirit in her revolted and flung him off. He became suddenly conscious that he was holding a limp, cold, unresponsive husk in his arms, something whose essence was not there at all, a stiff, lifeless simulacrum of the real Netta. He let her sink down into Nell's one available armchair, the very chair in which she had sat nearly a year ago, when on that day of torrential autumn rain she had come into the room with Cousin Ann.

"There … you see!" he gasped breathlessly. "All this mania of yours is just a morbid fancy that you've fallen into by living too much alone. You're my same Netta … you'll always be my Netta … nothing that can possibly happen can change that!"

An expression of pitiable sadness came into her face. She looked not only very pale but actually old and haggard at that moment. With the sunlight gone from her hair and her hair itself ruffled by their embrace the gray streaks in its heavy masses became lamentably apparent.

"When you say that it's wrong for you to live with me any more, does that mean that you and I are to be as if we'd never lived as we have?"

She made an effort to answer him, but it was too much. Those big tears, the sight of which brought back the pathos of her personality more than anything else could have done, those tears as big as the eggs of golden-crested wrens, began one by one to run down her cheeks. She made no effort to dry them. She seemed unconscious of their presence. Nor did the lines of her countenance distort themselves as most people's faces do when they cry. Her eyes remained wide open and fixed upon his own. Her mouth, too, remained strangely untremulous, its quiet curves set fast in an expression of weary composure.

Very slowly she shook her head; and then, after making some little swallowing movements in her throat, she spoke to him firmly and gently.

“I shall never love any one but you, Rook,” she said, “but I must go back where I came from. The Fathers have been very kind to me and they’ve found me work to do. I’ve got my life to lead somehow, Rook dear. And they’ve been very good to me. I owe them everything, everything!”

In her desire to explain she had touched just the one chord whose vibration was calculated to hurt him most.

“Everything, Netta?” he repeated with bitter sarcasm. For it was just that, that she should have turned in her despair to other comforters, to other responses, to a different refuge than anything he could supply which hit him to the depths of his nature.

It seemed to him as if what she had done was something worse than ingratitude. She had taken their love, which was the expression of all that had been best and tenderest and most delicate in him, and had treated it as something evil and sinful. He had given her a pity, an understanding, a recognition, that went beyond anything those priests could give her; and now she was capable of this enthusiastic cry: “I owe them everything!”

The window of the room was wide open to the garden and there floated in upon them the distant murmur of Lexie’s and Nell’s voices and the musky scent of geraniums.

Rook found that he had counted much more upon Netta’s attitude to him than he had until that moment realized. It was not that he had anything to offer her; any reasonable alternative to this new life she had found for herself. If there had been anything definite in his mind he could have dealt with this blow more effectively, have found an antidote for its smart. He was standing before her there, pleading angrily and helplessly for something that had no shape, no substance, no form. He was pleading with her to have pity upon his life illusion, pity upon his soul's inmost self, pity upon that ultimate reflection of himself before himself which lay in the abysmal mirror of his self-deception as the sky lies in a mirage of water above arid sands! He was pleading with her to save from destruction something that was so tenuous that he himself could hardly define it. Like a thin film of autumn mist his self-love wavered and undulated between them in that geranium-scented air. It became a drooping filament of unreal vapour. It faded; it hovered; it sank. A sense of intolerable emptiness came over him. Netta's Fathers had saved her soul; but they had stricken his. But how could she know that? How could she know that his feeling for her was the one affair of his life that exactly lent itself to that morbid peculiarity in the depths of his being, his desire to love a person who in some way was dependent upon him, helpless before him, different from what he was by some impassable gulf?

Along with the emptiness that filled his soul there came the sting of a peculiarly masculine resentment; the resentment which arises when a woman with whom one has dropped one's mask and put aside one's reserve suddenly reassumes her mask and her reserve at the very moment when one is most unarmed and at her mercy!

"And so your Fathers have taught you to look back upon our life together as sin?" His tone was strained and harsh; and the girl saw clearly that he was on the verge of breaking out into a torrent of indignant words, bitter, corrosive, capable of leaving behind them scars that would never be effaced.

She must stop him. She must explain to him. She must make him realize what she had been feeling when she deliberately began drinking in order to degrade herself in his eyes. It was intolerable to her that he should take her present mood, her new life, and make of it something that diminished the value of all that had been between them. What she wanted to make him understand was that never from her — never, never from her! — could come any diminishing, any undervaluing of their love or of all that that love had meant. And if she could not make him see this without saying what was too hard to say, well, she must say it!

Woman-like, what hurt her most was that she should have blurred the image of herself that their love had created in his mind, nay, spoilt his response to that image by giving him the idea that it was possible for her to have changed so much as to be ready to betray their past together, to blaspheme against what they had shared.

She looked at him with that expressive look with which one human being beats at the closed shutters of another's conciousness, like a starving traveller whose language is so remote, so foreign, that it might be mistaken for the wind in the trees, for the rain on the porch! What she wanted to lay before him was nothing less than the full measure of her love. That he should accuse her of not recognizing the worth of their days together or the value of the sympathy he had given her — it was blind, unfair, distorted, mad!

That was what men were always doing in this world; they were laying stress on external, outward, logical aspects of relations between people and missing the one thing needful! They were always working themselves up into rational indignation about aspects of love that were accidental, occasional, relative; whereas, all the while, Love Himself, absolute and immeasurable, remained dumb and inarticulate on the threshold!

As she looked at him now with this mystery lying unspoken, unspeakable, at the heart of her existence, and that turmoil of wild accusation trembling upon his tongue, it came over her what a tragic chasm it was that separated the love of a woman from the love of a man.

"It is thus. It is so. There are these evidences. There is this proof," cries the exacting reason of the one. "I love you! Can't you see that I love you?" answers the blind instinct of the other. Netta began to feel heart-sick and dizzy as she watched him, standing there like a judge; waiting, waiting, till some self-betraying murmur on her part brought down on her head the already formulated sentence. She seemed to herself to be beating back with her hands a clamour of discordant voices, of confused inexplicable sounds. Why did those steps keep marching up and down, up and down, in the room above? Or were they, too, only the beating of her heart? Surely that must be Lexie and Nell just outside the door! But their murmurings reached her as if they were not human at all; as if Rook's pulses full of unjust anger had acquired some horrid goblin speech and were rushing upon her like an infuriated mob —

And then, without any reason for it, she saw with incredible clearness a little thin gold ring that the "Father" had worn on his finger when she was first pouring out to him the misery of her shame, of her loneliness; and as that vision disappeared, mingling strangely with a fierce red spot on Rook's lowering forehead, she found herself experiencing that lightning-rapid panorama of her whole previous existence, such as, people had told her, persons underwent when, in drowning, they sank for the third time.

She certainly had begun to feel actually faint. What was Rook doing standing there, so funnily stern, in front of her? What was it she had to make him understand? Something that a person could do when he loved another person very much — but something that it was impossible to speak of!

"Rook!" she brought out with a kind of gasp.

At that moment the door flew open and Lexie and Nell precipitated themselves into the room. They both showed signs of extreme agitation and they both began speaking at once.

"Pandie is out there — —"

"Pandie has come to say that — —"

Rook turned pale. Had the moment arrived? Was he even now the father of an heir to Ashover?

Netta rose to her feet, also very white and trembling.

"Is it Lady Ann?" she asked.

Lexie was the one to explain; for Nell's attention was distracted at that moment by the sound of her husband's steps moving backward and forward in his room above.

"Pandie is at the gate," said Lexie hurriedly. "She says your wife can't be found."

The first feeling that Rook had under the shock of this unexpected news was — strangely enough — a queer spasm of relief! For some profound subconscious reason anything seemed more tolerable to him just then than to hear that his child had come into the world.

"Can't be found?" he repeated. And then, taking advantage of the strangeness of the communication to give vent to his unnatural emotion in the form of blind anger against the messenger: "What does the little fool come running here for?" he cried sternly. "Why doesn't she look about in the garden, in the kitchen garden, in the orchard, up Battlefield, even? Ann has been walking quite far some of these days. She's taken into her head to go a farther stroll than usual, that's all! What's the use of coming here to tell us a thing like that? Let me see her." And he made a step toward the open door, where Nell was still standing, nervously preoccupied by the sounds overhead. "Let me see her! Let me talk to her!"

But Lexie intervened and stopped him. “It’s more serious than you think, Rook,” he said gravely. “For God’s sake keep your wits about you! They’ve searched the garden and the orchard already. Pandie says they’ve been everywhere. Mother has been herself to the top of Heron’s Ridge looking for her. God knows what may not have happened! Women are apt to go crazy at these times and do the maddest things. Pandie says old Betsy Cooper has turned up, dragging the idiot Binnory after her, with some wild story about having seen her in Antiger Lane near Drool’s cottage. Martha Vabbin has gone to get Drool himself; and to see if by some lucky chance she just went in there to rest. But from what Betsy and the idiot say she didn’t go into the cottage at all — —” He broke off suddenly, disturbed by the sight of Nell rushing wildly up the stairs.

“There’s something wrong up there, too,” he added, with a shrug of his shoulders.

Rook without a word hurried into the garden. He found Pandie standing on the gravel path like a comic image of desperation, her head bare and her hand clutching an enormous garden rake.

“Oh, Master Rook, Master Rook! What have come upon our heads to-day?” cried the distracted servant. “Missus says I was to fetch ‘ee to come home at once; and Mr. Lexie, too, if he were well enough to walk on his feet. And she says you was to fetch Mr. Twiney and Mr. Pod up along! And she says you was to summon the police; and I reckon myself ’twould be only right, considering how them gippoos be abroad, to send to Forley Barracks for the Military. Lord alive! Lord alive! That I should be the woman to tell the Squire of Ashover that his lady be gone to find a hole in the river deep enough to commit ‘fanticide in!”

Rook was too bewildered by this time even to smile at these aberrations of the native of Somersetshire.

“What have you got that rake for, Pandie?” he asked.

“For to drag the ponds and ditches with, Master Rook! They say that when a body’s expecting, like as your lady be, there ain’t no pond water near or far that Providence don’t tempt ‘un with. ’Tis a pity her legs bain’t swelled up! When their legs be swelled up they can’t go suiciding and such-like. ’Tis a dispensation of Nature!”

Rook turned away from her.

“Lexie! Nell! Netta!” he called out. “I’m off to the house!”

He strode to the gate. “You go on to the village, Pandie,” he cried, “and get Twiney and Pod and bring them back with you in Twiney’s cart and don’t go shouting all this nonsense to everyone you meet. I expect I shall find Lady Ann safe at home when I get back!”

He was already in the road when he heard his brother’s voice calling him by name. He turned and met Lexie at the gate.

“Nell has just come down from talking to that beggar upstairs,” said the younger man, “and she says she’s had the greatest difficulty in quieting him. I couldn’t get the drift of what the trouble was; but he’s got his confounded book mixed up with your child. The chap seems to have gone all to pieces. I’m glad Netta is with them. Nell oughtn’t to be left alone with him.” He laid his hand on his brother’s arm. “You’re not letting this fuss about Ann upset you, Rook, are you? This day seems dedicated to one agitation after another! But don’t you worry, dear Rook. Ann’s probably turned up by now.”

Rook suddenly bent forward, took his brother’s grave and anxious countenance between his hands and kissed him rapidly. “I shall look in at the church,” he said. “That’s just the place none of them would think of! But, as you say, she’s probably safe back in her room by now. There’s something about this day that seems to make everyone nervous. I’ve noticed it before. Whenever the wind drops dead in Ashover and the air is absolutely still, something's sure to happen with us. We're a funny family. The gods must be perfectly sick of us. Well, I'm off! Don't leave Nell alone with Hastings, I beg you, Lexie!"

He strode off down the road.

Lexie saw Pandie staring up at Hastings's window as if she had been mesmerized. With one hand on her rake she was mechanically moving it about among the geraniums. Whether in that waking dream she imagined she was dredging a pond to find Ann's body or whether she was reverting to some childish memory of helping her father amid the rich loam of Sedgemoor, no one will ever know. There are instinctive actions and gestures of human beings, especially at some great crisis of drastic events such as was then gathering about these people, which will always retain an element of the grotesque and the inexplicable.

"I'll come with you to the village, Pandie," said the young man, breaking in upon her trance. "Here! For God's sake drop that rake of yours and pull yourself together! What's the matter with you, woman?"

The red-haired servant turned toward him a face that was distorted with emotion.

"She told I we be all flummoxed by thik parson up there."

"Who told you?" cried Lexie impatiently; and then, catching sight of Netta at the door, "Don't you leave Nell alone with that chap, will you? Pandie and I are going to the village."

Netta made a sign that she understood him and returned into the house. Lexie took the rake from Pandie's unconscious hands and led her into the road.

"Who told you?" he repeated as they moved off together.

“That gippoo bitch, Bet Cooper, ‘twere what warned I of ‘ee. ’Twas for that she be come, so ‘a did say. She’d a-seen thik parson murdering our Squire, or summat o’ that, in a girt wold crystal-stone, what she have stoled from some foreign scollard! I did tell thee mother what she did say; but not a thought would she give to it. Your mother’s not one to attend to God his wone self when she be put about.”

Lexie found his strength barely sufficient to reach the first house in the village, which by good luck happened to be that of Mr. Pod, the Sexton. Here he decided to rest, sending Pandie on to find Mr. Twiney.

Sitting in Mr. Pod’s little kitchen through which not a breath of air passed, either by door or window, he could not help recalling his brother’s words about these days when the wind was dead in Ashover.

“I don’t like it,” he said to himself. “I don’t like it! Things are beginning to get out of control; and I can’t tell what the upshot will be.”

CHAPTER XXIV

THE INVIOLABLE STILLNESS of that last day of September prevented Lady Ann from enjoying her usual rest in the afternoon. An unaccountable malaise came upon her, a sense of suffocation, of being shut in, imprisoned, sepulchred, buried alive. She had suffered from the same species of nervousness once or twice before, but never so badly as now.

She went to the window of her room and looked out.

Everything was hushed and death-still in the somnolent garden. The branches of the great cedar swam motionless upon the air and seemed borne up by vibrant aërial waves of soft blue mist.

"I'll go for a walk," she said to herself. "I'll take Lion."

She put on her prettiest summer hat, threw a thin loose dust-coloured cloak round her shoulders and slipped quietly down the stairs. Very cautiously, so as not to arouse any one's attention, she let herself out of the front door and walked round to the rear of the house.

She knew that Rook was out with Lexie somewhere and she knew that Mrs. Ashover was resting in her big upstairs room. As she came past the kitchen door she was met by that peculiar complicated odour which in English houses of the Ashover sort seems synonymous with two o'clock in the afternoon, might indeed be the very smell of the gamboge-coloured hide of two o'clock, that enemy of romance and all delicate joy! It was an odour in which the "washing-up" beginning in the scullery mingled with the servants' dinner ending in the kitchen and both of these with the indescribable sense of the crowding together of the various house pets, canine and feline, who had "followed the dishes out."

Lady Ann had not been able to eat much lunch and this two-o'clock smell made her feel for a moment a little dizzy and sick. But the great point was that nobody about the place saw her as she hurried past. Lion was neither at the kitchen door nor in his kennel by the stable. "Oh, I forgot!" she said to herself. "I told them to take him down to Drool's." She had vexed herself lately about the dog; feeling that, now her own walks were curtailed, it didn't get enough exercise, Rook being teased rather than entertained by the animal's company.

Her momentary malaise passed off after she had crossed the orchard and got clear away on the slope of Battlefield, and when she reached the top of Heron's Ridge she felt better than she had felt for several weeks.

She felt happier, too. That rich, indolent, windless autumn day was profoundly adapted to her mood. The sense of the apples and pears growing riper and mellower every day among those lichen-covered branches, of the hazelnuts growing browner and plumper among their crumpled leaves, of the mushrooms in the lush grass meadows appearing so suddenly and so quickly, that even those who knew their privileged haunts would wonder at their coming; the sense of all these things around and about her seemed to soothe her mind and liberate her spirit, as if the immense fecundity of Nature were something she could draw upon to enlarge and replenish her own vitality.

She had not been as far as Drool's cottage for several weeks; but to-day it seemed to her that it would be very nice to pay a visit to the place. She felt a queer emotional craving to stand once more, whatever might be the result of what she had soon to go through, in that little room of Binnory's. And besides, she would greatly love to catch a final glimpse of the dog, her one completely faithful and loyal supporter, before she entered upon this life-and-death struggle.

There were many feelings in her proud young heart that she had always found it easier to confide to horses and dogs than to her own species; and with Lion especially she had come to find a satisfying sense of dropping her reserve and giving way to this or that primitive and even savage emotion such as her stoical training had taught her to suppress in the presence of her own race.

She came down the Dorsal side of the hill with a gayer and more light-hearted tread than she had used for many a long day in her diurnal strolls. She watched the rabbits with the eye of a sportsman, at once sympathetic and predatory. She snuffed the air, at one big clump of bracken, catching the familiar taint of a fox in that misty windless atmosphere; and she stopped more than once to place her foot on the loose up-flung trail of earth mould which marked the movement of a burrowing mole. A few of her husband's black namesake birds kept up a perpetual clamour above the high tops of the trees as if to make sure that no invading jay or magpie should interfere with the return of their tribe when later in the afternoon they "made wing to the rooky wood," while the whirring headlong flight of more than one family of partridges made her forget her obligation to her own offspring!

It was only when she was quite close to the cottage at the foot of the hill that her mood veered. It was as if the master of the vessel of her mind had suddenly come on deck and given orders to swing sheer round, from larboard to starboard. It was a quick instinctive rush of anger against Rook that decided her.

"I'll turn round and go straight back," she thought. "That room is nothing to me now; and Lion will only want to go home with me if he sees me."

She was so close to the gap in the hedge, however, by which the lane was reached, a little to the right of the cottage, that she was led on, by that curious and childish instinct which demands that the most drifting of human walks should have some sort of goal, to struggle cautiously down the bank to the familiar road.

Once in the lane it occurred to her that the most sensible way home would be round by the barley fields; for Heron’s Ridge was much less of an eminence there, and she could stroll back at leisure by the village road and the two bridges.

She turned to the right accordingly at this point, and soon found herself opposite the gate into the wood where she had first revealed to Rook that she was with child. An unpleasantly familiar voice came suddenly to her ears from the other side of this gate. She moved a step toward it; and there, under the brushwood, she saw Binnory.

Nor was the idiot alone. Occupied, beneath his fascinated scrutiny, in collecting some especial herbalist’s plant — which may even have been, for all Ann knew about such things, the famous classical hellebore — the old trot, Betsy Cooper herself, turned toward her the sort of menacing scrutiny that a sinister sorceress of ancient times might have turned toward some Eurynome or Dione, big with the child of an Olympian.

“Save us and help us if it ain’t her ladyship’s own self!” cried the crone, rising from her knees and coming forward.

“’Tis my pretty leddy! ’Tis my pretty leddy!” ejaculated the idiot, approaching the gate with still more alacrity. “Have ‘ee been to Lunnon to find Squire Ash’ver, what rumpled thee fine feathers for ‘ee unbeknownst to any but poor Binnory?”

Lady Ann instinctively drew away from these two discomfortable figures, retreating, as she pulled her cloak around her, toward the middle of the lane. Here she stopped and faced them; but neither the old woman nor the boy made any attempt to come farther than the gate.

"Thee best get up along over Hern's Top as quickly as thee may," said Betsy Cooper. "'Twere only last night when I be cleaning me horse-cart, out where us do bide now, and me partners were quiet-like and 'twere all still as churchyard stones, that a voice inside me belly said to I, 'Look i' thik wold crystal, Betsy lass; look i' thik wold crystal!' And no sooner did I do what 'un did say than, Lord bless us and keep us! There was that black parson of yours a-murderin' of poor dear Squire!"

She stopped to take breath and Lady Ann moved as if to go on down the lane.

"It's true as God's dear blood, your ladyship!" screamed the old woman, making a feeble attempt to open the gate. "Get home with you, you owdacious turleypin!" This was addressed to Binnory, who was staring at the girl in the road as if he meditated a wild rush toward her.

"I can't listen to you now," said Lady Ann calmly. "But if you'd like to come up to the house later I'm sure you'll be made welcome."

She spoke in the tone she habitually used to poor people, the tone that was at once easy and distant. What it implied was: "I have no time now to chatter with picturesque vagabonds; but my servants will be charmed to give you tea in the kitchen!"

Betsy Cooper by no means missed the quality of this rebuff; but she was too excited to enter into personal adjustments just then; besides, beyond all her eccentricity, she was saturated with a feudal respect for the house of Ashover.

"Don't 'ee take on, your ladyship," she pleaded. "Don't 'ee take on! 'Twere after I'd a-seen that murderin' parson in Cimmery stone that I heard a voice out of one of me partner's mouths. They innocents do talk if it be talking, your ladyship; and it's what me partner said that do most bide in me mind. ‘A said a terrible queer word, Lady Ash’ver; and it’s as true as God’s dear blood what I be telling thee.”

The idiot, who had now climbed to the top of the gate and was balancing himself there like a demonic gargoyle, burst in with an exultant cry at this point.

“I do know what the half beastie did say, pretty leddy! Binnory do know what the half beastie did say to Granny Cooper!”

“I can’t listen to you now,” repeated Lady Ann sternly. “Come up to the house later; and you, too, Binnory, if you like. Good-afternoon to you both!” And she swept off down the lane with all a grand lady’s indifference as to whether the populace commented on her condition or held their peace.

She did not put her hands to her ears, however, as many prospective mothers of heroes and demigods have been driven ere now to do; and for that reason it was impossible not to hear what the old woman shouted after her.

“Till book be burned no child’ll be borned!”

The idiot, who had now scrambled over the gate, ran after her down the lane. “Till book be burned no child’ll be borned!” he screamed in his shrill voice; and it was only after Lady Ann had turned twice round, threatening him with her parasol, that he desisted and drifted back to his companion.

Even when she was out of all sight and hearing of these two troublesome beings and had rounded the corner at the point opposite Titty’s Ring she still seemed to hear that ominous and fantastic oracle. The magpies chattered it; the green finches chittered it; the very rooks themselves, who now began to gather in larger numbers, seemed echoing it with their rueful cawings. The whole incident was peculiarly distasteful to the girl’s mind; but the first effect it had upon her was doubtless an excellent one. It roused to full flood her gallant fighting spirit. What impertinence! What intolerable impertinence! And then her invincible youthfulness came to her aid. There was something that tickled her realistic sense of humour about the whole thing. “It’s just a trick to get money out of us,” she thought. “That fool Hastings has probably been telling everybody what he told me on New Year’s night, about his abominable theories. No doubt when he spent that day in the caravan with Netta Page the old woman listened to his mad talk. The dwarfs probably heard him, too! In fact, the chances are that our absurd clergyman and his insane fancies are the common gossip of the whole neighbourhood.”

Had Lady Ann been a more neurotic or a weaker person this agitating encounter would have been actually dangerous to her. As it was, so robust was her constitution and so defiant her temper, it seemed rather to hearten her and steady her than to do her any harm.

It did cross her mind as she left the lane and made her way through the stubble fields toward the village that she was at that crisis in her life singularly alone. Her own parents were dead. Mrs. Ashover was her nearest relative; and the girl was far too sagacious not to know that it was in the rôle of a mother of future Ashovers rather than in the rôle of a daughter to herself that the old tribal fanatic cherished her.

Alone. Well? What of that? Many a Norse ancestor of hers had been alone ere now, both on land and sea, and that fact had not weakened the strength of his arm or blurred his clear, unclouded glance into the shifty eyes of Fate!

Besides, she was not alone! Rook might have a cold and fickle heart. His mother might be obsessed by the family. Very well! Let them go. She carried her champion, her supporter, her ally, here in her own vitals!

She was at the top of the ridge now and beginning to feel exhausted. That young Viking in her belly was displaying his strength — and his sex, too — how sure she was of that! — by certain familiar thumpings and stirrings.

It must be getting on toward tea-time. The autumn sun already rested, red and glowing, like a vast eye-socket veiled in titanic sorrow, on the treetops behind the Drools' cottage.

The church and churchyard down there in the valley were gathered now in thick woolly mists, and as she looked at them she remembered the peculiar psychic support which more than once those dead people there had seemed capable of giving her.

Well! Weary though she was, she was so mysteriously self-subsistent at that moment that she felt strong enough to steer her vessel onward without assistance, or even sympathy, from any quarter.

As she came slowly down the stubble field with its faint strawy smell and its little tufts of fumitory and small wild yellow pansies she had a strange fierce longing for the unknown travail that was to come upon her. She felt associated so closely with her child in this struggle that it was almost as if two lovers, of proud Spartan breed, were preparing for an engagement with a barbarous enemy!

Never for one second did she contemplate the possibility of her death. The life force in her seemed so inexhaustible, so potent, that it tossed such thoughts aside, as a racehorse might toss the foam from his mouth and nostrils.

She soon reached the hawthorn hedge where she had met Rook on the occasion of her visit to Toll-Pike. She smiled faintly as she thought of that unenjoyed lunch! And she said to herself with stark sincerity, "How can Rook and Lexie find anything to attract them in that sentimental, funny-looking little thing?"

She sat down to rest on the identical spot where she had rested before. The hedge protected her from the rising mists, and the ground was still warm except where the longer grass had caught the dew. With her cloak wrapped round her she sank luxuriously back against the furrow of sweet-smelling earth mould. The largeness of that autumn day, its indrawn breath, its immense passivity, lulled her into a delicious relaxation.

She lay there for nearly an hour, living intensely and absorbingly in the great parturient process that was going on within her. Then, at last, feeling the approach of the evening chill, she rose to her feet, and, rested and comforted in mind and body, pushed open the ancient ramshackle gate into the remembered barley field.

It was then that quite suddenly, and, as it were, quite naturally, that tiresome, ungrammatical refrain, “Till book be burned no child’ll be borned,” repeated itself in her ears as if someone at her very side had whispered it.

Lady Ann became grave and stood motionless, like a beautiful animal scenting some species of ambiguous danger. “What’s up with me?” she thought to herself. “Is this nerves? Or am I growing superstitious?”

And then without reasoning about it at all she suddenly felt an irresistible instinct driving her to go straight down to Toll-Pike Cottage and face this life-hating conjurer whose sorcery was so inimical to herself and her child.

She tried to find, for her own justification, some quite reasonable motive for stopping at Toll-Pike Cottage just then; nor was such a motive very difficult to find. She felt not the slightest embarrassment at being seen either by Nell or Hastings in her present condition. As for Netta’s presence there, she did not permit it to affect her one way or the other. Her attitude to both these rivals of hers was that of an indifferent conqueror of superior race, whose caprices may be indulged to the furthest limit in sublime contempt for any reaction, favourable or unfavourable, that they might produce on the vanquished.

It did not take her long to reach the cottage. This time there was no Marquis of Carabas lying on the back porch. But Lady Ann did not intend to enter in that unconventional manner this time. She walked round to the front door and rang the bell. To her surprise she heard excited and agitated voices in the room above.

She waited. No one seemed to have noticed her ring. There was evidently something serious going on upstairs.

Was this crazy priest quarrelling with these two women? Was he ill-using them, perhaps? All her social instincts as a member of the English ruling class rose up in indignation. It was no more to her then that Rook had taken his pleasure with these girls than if they had been daughters of Twiney or of Pod! What was unpardonable was that in the village of Ashover, within a mile of Ashover House, an English clergyman should be behaving like a drunken blacksmith. For it was that. She was not country-born for nothing. She had heard so often that particular mingling of female clamour with masculine threats from under the eaves of thatched cottages, as she rode home, dreamy and content, through Sturminster, through Shaftesbury, through Stalbridge, from a successful hunt with the Blackmore pack!

With her practical and realistic mind she came to the prompt conclusion that in “his weakness and his melancholy” this hedge priest of theirs had taken to drink. Accustomed from her earliest childhood to high-handed interference, and entirely free from any physical apprehensions on her own behalf, the intrepid girl boldly turned the handle of the door, entered the little hallway, and walked resolutely and unflinchingly up the narrow staircase.

Her steps on the stairs were no more audible to the persons in that room than had been the sound of her ring. She heard scuffling and struggling in there as well as this turmoil of voices.

With a quick movement of her strong young wrist she turned the handle of the door and swung it wide open. The sight that met her eyes was disturbing enough; though it was not quite on a par with the violent ruffianism she had been imagining. Like all people of her kind she lumped the middle classes and the proletariat together, and took for granted that any of them might at any moment break all laws of decency and self-respect.

She was not surprised, therefore, to see William Hastings with a white distorted countenance struggling to release himself from the arms of Mr. Pod, who, very red in the face and obviously much embarrassed at being found in such a situation, was holding the priest down on a sofa-bed.

This article of furniture must have been recently dragged in from the room opposite, for it was placed awkwardly and grotesquely between the philosopher's desk and the round table in the centre of the chamber.

On one side of this makeshift bed stood Netta, evidently doing her best to soothe the afflicted man; while at its foot, leaning across it so as to touch her husband's hands with her own, was the slender form of Nell, from whose eyes the tears were streaming and whose whole body was trembling with agitation and concern.

"Lordy! Your Ladyship did give I a start!" cried the breathless sexton, relaxing his hold upon the man on the bed. "Us all thought as you was drownded in sheep wash or summat!"

"Thank God, you're all right, Lady Ann," said Netta gravely, glancing anxiously down at the man beneath her to see that he did not take advantage of this new apparition to make a fresh struggle to escape.

But Hastings was staring at Ann with wild intensity, every line in his face expressive of the passing of one complicated emotion after another across the clouded mirror of his mind. He had worked at the completion of his book so passionately that now it was finished the actual volume itself, its leather binding, its ink-stained pages, had become to his unsettled brain a magical engine of destruction, a nihilistic catapult as it were, that it now behoved him to hurl at the citadels of life!

Two of these life ramparts had got themselves lodged in his mind as especially challenging to his campaign — those Ashover tombs in the church chancel, and the living body of Lady Ann Ashover! From those tombs, Hastings had come to be obstinately convinced, emanated the very essence of this unscrupulous life force, which in its relentless strivings disturbed the placid pools of non-existence. And here was Lady Ann herself, now standing before him, the incarnation of the remorseless urge! With the extravagant fanaticism of a mad logician, Hastings formulated, even as he looked at the woman, a monstrous and diabolic project. He would make her herself hug to her heart his "Book of Annihilation," and carry it to the place of those living dead.

To his distorted vision this hurling of his book among his enemies presented itself as the supreme stroke in an abysmal spiritual warfare whereof he was the protagonist and this woman, big with child, the antagonist.

The man's intellectual magnetism was so great that as he sat up there in bed with the veins in his forehead distended and his face quivering with conflicting emotion the four persons in that room remained awed and silent. When he did speak it was with a mingling of insane cunning and disordered impetuousness.

“They won’t let me take it and hide it!” he cried. “I want to hide it under those chancel slabs … I could easily get up those stones and put it there; but they won’t let me! And now you’ve come and you’ll join with them. If you hadn’t come I’d have done it. Wouldn’t I have done it, fellow?” And he turned his distracted glance upon the embarrassed Mr. Pod, who stood watching him with one of his great fists ostentatiously clenched, as if Hastings were a troublesome bullock at Tollminster Fair.

“’Tis true enough, your ladyship, what Parson do say,” acquiesced the sexton. “‘A would have rinned all the way to church and have scrabbled with’s own hands at they paving stones! ‘A would have done that; and maybe heaved up some of they ancient Squires what do bide under them moniments! ’Tis God’s truth what ‘a do say, your ladyship. ‘A be a terrible strong man, and there be none to hold ‘un but only I and these two young leddies!”

Lady Ann became suddenly aware of the actual presence of Hastings’s book. The manuscript occupied a large leather-bound volume as big as a business ledger, and it lay on the priest’s desk just above his bed. She knew the look of the book, as she had seen it in his hands before; and she surveyed it now with a peculiar and unusual interest.

Nell, who was standing at the foot of the bed, caught the direction of the visitor’s glance.

“My husband had just finished his last chapter, Lady Ann, when this idea of hiding it in the church came into his head. You feel better now, William, don’t you? You won’t frighten us again, will you, William?”

The man rose a little higher on the bed, straightening his legs and propping himself up on his two hands. He stared at Nell’s face with that pathetic and puzzled frown with which people whose mental processes have grown jangled become for a moment aware of something wrong and unusual.

It was as if he were peering helplessly at the young girl through the entangled boughs of his own obscuring delusion. Fancying that he did hear her and understand her Nell flung herself down on her knees at his side and began chafing one of his hands.

Lady Ann exchanged glances with Netta; but neither of them, nor indeed Mr. Pod himself, who looked as if he would be thankful if the floor sank beneath him, seemed anxious to intervene between these two.

Lady Ann's thoughts wandered off to all that buried dust under the church pavement which seemed to be so persistent an influence in the movement of events in this place. She recalled the man's wild discourse to her on New Year's Eve, at the end of Marsh Alley, and how he had associated, even then, the negations of his ferocious logic with the extinction of the House of Ashover. He was disarmed and innocuous enough now; but she, in her sanity, began just then, as she saw the book lying there within her reach, to be betrayed into the same illusion as the one which this madman held, namely, that this mysterious destructive force had actually passed from the living man's intellect into the inanimate potency of the work he had just completed.

Once more that jingle of Betsy's— "Till book be burned no child'll be borned" — sounded in her brain with the appalling distinctness of a warning sea bell rocked by rising waves.

Nell was keeping up, in a kind of crooning tone, a sort of lullaby to the man on the bed. She seemed to forget the presence of the others.

Suddenly Hastings bent forward, stretched out his arm, and possessed himself of the volume on the desk. He turned over some of its pages with a sort of malignant awe; while a moment later with a glance at Lady Ann that had a flicker of demonic subtlety in it, he tossed the book down at the foot of the bed.

Then it seemed as if he forgot its existence; for he began to talk incoherently of certain early memories of his in the slums of London. He mentioned names that were completely strange to them all; and with those names he mixed the names of Latin writers and the titles of Latin books. And he talked of the lily pond in Kew Gardens, which must have been the. objective of some thrilling childish excursion. And then he muttered something about park railings, with deer behind them. "Let me feed them, Mother! Let me feed them!" he cried out in a loud voice; and then, without any apparent connection, he began reciting the old grammar-school tag:

"Common are to either sex
Artifex and oppifex,
Conviva, vates, advena,
Testis, civis, incola,
Parens, sacerdos, custos, vindex,
Adolescens, infans, index,
Judex, haeres, comes, dux,
Princeps, municeps, conjux!"

Mr. Pod manifested considerable apprehension when he heard these strange syllables. He looked from one to another of the three ladies as if he expected them to call upon him to clap his great hand over the mouth of the delirious man.

"This do come of praying and preaching," he whispered in an awestruck voice. "Parson be calling upon the Lord in Greek and Hebrew, same as 'tis writ the Blessed Saviour did. 'Tis enough to make a man's wits turn to have to say 'Dearly Beloved' and 'Scripture moveth us in sundry places' every seventh day, wet or fine! 'Tis a wonder more on 'em don't start hollerin' and forgetting theyselves!"

Lady Ann heard these words of the sexton with the sort of attention a starving man on a raft might give to the screaming of a sea gull while his companions were casting lots as to which of them should die first.

The sight of that volume lying at the foot of the bed obsessed her with an irresistible fascination. Suddenly she could endure it no longer; and, without a word said, she just slipped forward a couple of steps, snatched up the volume, thrust it under her arm beneath her cloak and moved quickly back to the open door.

The voice of the delirious man went on mumbling inanely the classic doggerel:

"Auctor, exsul, and with these
Bos … tigris … interpres …
Canis and anguis … serpens … sus."

It was as though, having completed his categorical Domesday Book of all life's progeny, he were waiting in sardonic expectation for the explosion of his train of dynamite.

Nell and Netta both made instinctive movements toward her. There was something treacherous and outrageous to their minds in this arbitrary despoiling of an unconscious man.

"What are you doing, Lady Ann?" cried Netta. "You're not going to take his book really away, are you?"

"Give it back…. Give it back…. Oh, how dare you?" protested Nell.

There was, however, at that moment such a dangerous light in the eyes of the girl in the doorway that neither of them had the courage to approach her. In any case, so tightly was she holding the book, it could not have been taken from her without a struggle; and the idea of anything of that sort, in the condition in which she was and under the eyes of Hastings, was inconceivable.

"Take it and good luck to 'ee, marm," threw in Mr. Pod. "And if 'ee do bury it, same as parson did tell 'ee to, me own girt pick what I do use in hard weather be lying under one of they stone seats in porch. I reckon 'twere a good deed if more of them books be put under sod! 'Tis this book-writing what do worrit quiet-lived folks more'n the worst god-danged ale in Dorchester!"

"You're not too … too tired … to walk home … Lady Ann … are you?" murmured Netta. "Because … I could go and get someone — —" She stopped abruptly in the presence of the cold stare which the girl gave her from the door; but she added gallantly, "We are all so thankful to see that you're safe."

Ann replied to this only with a general and easy "Good-night," and descending the stairs with the air of one who has paid a natural and normal visit let herself out into the garden.

A quarter of an hour later and Hastings's mood had changed again for the worse. The unfortunate man seemed to forget that he himself had wished to give his "Praise of Death" into the arms of a pregnant woman. He began to renew his efforts to break loose from Mr. Pod's restraining hands. So distressing was it to Nell to see his struggles that she enquired of Netta in a low voice whether it wouldn't be better to humour him and let him get out into the air.

"There would be no harm as long as we all went with him," she whispered.

But Netta opposed this suggestion with stern common sense.

"Nell, it's impossible," she retorted. "It's impossible. He'll be quieter presently. But if he isn't you'd better go to the village and get more help."

The girl's words were soon justified. Exhausted by his own violence the unhappy philosopher fell at last into a sort of comatose quiescence; and though, as the evening wore on, their hope that he would fall asleep was not fulfilled, there seemed no likelihood that he would make any further attempt that night to get out of the house.

He refused, however, to let Nell undress him; and she had to content herself with seeing him lying, pale and silent, his eyes fixed on the darkening window; while Mr. Pod, seated on a chair by his side, watched over him with respectful patience.

The twilight of that last day of September seemed loth to lose itself in the finality of night. All the various familiar sounds which that particular hour seems to evoke upon a country road — the lowing of cattle, the crying of nocturnal birds, the intermittent barking of a farmyard dog or of a fox in the furze covers — followed on her journey home the solitary figure of Lady Ann, with that closely written volume held tightly under her cloak.

As she walked slowly between the darkening water meadows and the misty stubble fields she became aware, more acutely than was usual with her, of the phantasmal quality of an autumn evening of this kind. The remote fluidity, as if they were being looked at through the windows of a sea king's palace, of the trees and gates and weir dams which she passed struck her with a sense of beauty that she had never in that particular way experienced before.

She had a queer, vague impression that she was feeling these things not only for herself but for the child within her; and, as this feeling grew upon her, a deep mysterious gratitude to life itself; not to any power beyond life — for she was a woman almost completely devoid of the religious sense — but just to life, life as it was, with everything that it entailed, rose up in her heart so overpoweringly that she actually hummed to herself as she walked along.

She felt chilly, however, as she crossed the wooden bridge and inhaled the mud-scented mist that rose from its surface; and once more that oracular jingle came into her head. “It’s all nonsense,” she thought, “to imagine that those Deformities I saw by the caravan that day uttered a thing like that! Betsy Cooper must have invented it herself. It’s the sort of abracadabra she would think of; especially after listening to that fool of a parson. I sha’n’t say a word of this to Rook or any one!”

By this time she did begin to feel the effects of her long walk; but she was a girl of immense intrepidity and she struggled on gallantly until, crossing the stone bridge by the churchyard, she found herself at her own drive gate.

As it happened there was a pile of burning weeds just outside this gate, one of the growing evidences of Rook’s absentminded submission to the indolence and carelessness of his dependents. She was still thinking of that “Till-book-be-burned” catch of the pseudo-gipsy when her eyes fell upon the great red heart of this smoking heap, glowing with a crimson glow in the damp windless obscurity.

Once more acting on a sudden unpremeditated impulse she removed the volume from beneath her cloak and flung it into the centre of the smouldering heap.

Having done the thing, it was with a fierce and primitive satisfaction that she prodded its pages open with the end of her parasol and watched the ruddy flames leap up and devour them. So bright were these flames as the pages really began shrivelling that she could actually catch a word or two in Hastings’s meticulously clear hand, as they were thus illuminated in their vanishing. She caught the word “nothingness” and the word “equilibrium” and some other word that might have been “dissolution” or “devolution”; and then there were no more intelligible pages left of the life work of the Reverend William Hastings!

She was interested, however, to observe that before falling into dust the last of these pages remained as thin blackened ghosts within the licking tongues of the fire; ghosts of written sheets, upon which she still could trace unreadable hieroglyphs and indecipherable signs; signs that were the bodiless revenants of those irrefutable arguments with which the theologian had demolished the universe that begat him, hieroglyphs that were like long-necked cormorants flying over a gulf into which Time and Space had sunk.

She left the heap of burning weeds and moved slowly, very slowly, toward the house. She began to be aware that the exhaustion, which made her body feel like something that was made of pulseless wool but at the same time was as heavy as sods of turf, was now accompanied by other, more disturbing symptoms.

Lady Ann bit her lip and stood for a moment quite still. Then, moving on steadily and quietly across the lawn, she mounted the familiar steps of the entrance to the house and opened the door into the hall.

Here she swayed and staggered; and finally fell half-fainting into one of the great mahogany hall chairs inscribed with the armorial bearings of the House of Ashover!

CHAPTER XXV

BY GOOD FORTUNE Mr. Twiney and his gig were both in the Ashover stable, when on Lady Ann's recovery from her collapse it became plain that her confinement was at hand. The man was despatched at once to fetch Doctor Twickenham, whose house was some three miles away, on the Tollminster Road.

It was Mrs. Ashover herself who discovered the girl, white and foredone, on that hard mahogany chair in the panelled hall. The old lady displayed as much energy in this crisis as she had done on previous agitating occasions; and it was not long before, with Rook's help, she had got the girl safely undressed and in bed, in the pleasant room she had used since her arrival on the scene more than a year ago.

Left alone at last with his wife, whose sufferings were at present very intermittent, Rook found himself quite differently affected and much more affected than he had anticipated. He was a man to whom the immediate presence of physical distress was more impressive than any mental or emotional appeal. Something peculiarly responsive and sensitive in him was stirred and troubled as he watched those quick spasms crossing the girl's flushed face.

"Ann," he muttered as he bent down over her. "Ann, my sweet Ann!"

She smiled at him stoically, but he could not help noticing that there was a remoteness and detachment at the back of her eyes, as if she were a duellist with drawn rapier saluting her opponent while she spoke lightly and casually to the friend at her side.

"You will get through it all right, Ann? You feel you'll be all right?"

It seemed natural enough to her that she should be the one to supply comfort at that moment rather than to receive it.

"Of course I'll get through it, Rook," she said. "Don't you fret yourself about me. Go for a walk and keep safe away till it's all over. And don't let your mother or any one else worry you about me. I shall be all right."

She clenched her fingers tightly as a recurrent spasm overtook her; but as soon as it passed she smiled at him again.

"He'll be born on the first of October," she said confidently.

There was a moment's silence between them while he wondered whether it would annoy her, or whether she would think it an unreal and sentimental thing to do, if he took hold of one of her hands.

To his utter astonishment she suddenly plucked both her arms out from beneath the sheet and flung them round his neck.

"Kiss me, Rook," she sobbed. "I love you! I do love you so much!"

He bent down; and for the first time in the lives of these two proud creatures there were salt tears mingled with the embrace they exchanged.

A hurried knock at the door made the man rise up erect and composed.

"Open it, dear," she gasped; and with a smile more obviously strained than any she had yet given him, "and go for a good long walk — but not too long!"

He opened the door and there stood his mother. The little lady had the demeanour of some military conqueror in an old print who stands amid dying men and horses with the complacency of a successful horticulturist.

"We mustn't exhaust her by talking," she said; and Rook felt inclined to take the triumphant old woman by the shoulders and shake her violently, while he bawled in her ears: "It's wicked! It's wicked! It's wrong! It's wrong! It's wrong!" What he did say was: "I'm going out for a while, Mother. Twickenham will be here in a moment."

"But — Rook" — and Mrs. Ashover showed signs of puzzled irritation — "she may ask for you presently. She may want you. They often feel like that!"

He pushed past her without replying and ran downstairs.

His overcoat lay on the hall table and he pulled it on, shivering. For some reason he felt at that moment deadly cold. As he did this Pandie came running out of the kitchen.

"Master Rook! How be my Lady? Be it really begun, then? 'Tis best for all when't do come quick and fast. Missus said I were to bide in kitchen and not come nigh to she; but 'tis terrible hard to stand afore thik old sink and act natural-like when my Lady be brought to bed. Martha, she do say 'tis the Lord wi' healing in His wings what us best to pray to; but I says, and they was my very words, Master Rook, I says, I'll just run out and ask Squire hisself. Maybe he'll say 'tis tempting of Providence for I to bide in kitchen! Maybe he'll say 'twere best for she and best for the blessed babe that I bide upstairs near thik door so's to be ready and waiting. Martha can open for doctor. She be one who can act natural when all be topsy-turvied! But I weren't born holy and hushed. I were born trembly and human-hearted. So don't 'ee tell I to bide in kitchen, Master Rook, when my Lady be brought to bed. 'Tisn't in nature that I should do the like o' that, whatever Missus do say!"

Rook hardly caught the drift of this torrent of speech, but a sickening pity came over him for that lonely figure in the room upstairs; and at the same time the feeling deepened upon him that he must get away — away — away.

He moved to the door; but the red-haired servant in her excitement clung to his coat sleeve.

"Thee aren't going out, Master, be 'ee? Oh, don't 'ee go out, Master, don't 'ee go out! I've a-heard four girt thunderclaps already as I were trying to scrape thik old silver coffee-pot what thee mother must have clean though sky do fall! Don't 'ee go out, Squire Ash'ver, don't 'ee go out, Master Rook! Doctor'll be here present; and 'tisn't in nature for 'ee to go!"

He flung her off and rushed bareheaded into the garden, slamming the great Georgian door behind him. It was with an indescribable feeling of relief, when he found himself outside the drive gate and in the road, that he felt heavy splashes of rain upon his face.

There was no sound of thunder; and indeed it may well have been that those four thunderclaps had no existence except in Pandie's head, but before he had gone many steps a torrential volume of rain descended upon him.

It was like the breaking of some vast taut hawser by which the very planetary ship itself was roped to its cosmic dock; so that the earth vessel now, free of all restraint, unpiloted, masterless, lampless, drifted, with all its dark, wet, silent decks and rigging, into a chaos of water, wherein the waters "that are above the firmament" mingled with the waters "that are beneath the firmament!"

When Rook reached the middle of the stone bridge he turned round, hearing the sound of wheels. Very faintly, like two watery marsh fires, phosphorescent and fitful, he could see the lights of Twiney's cart as it stopped at the drive gate. So the mare had been persuaded, somehow, in spite of this waterspout of rain, to pass the "Gorm" signpost; and the doctor had come to Ashover House, for the first time, for this purpose, since he came to assist at the birth of Lexie!

Rook leaned upon the cold parapet of the bridge from the surface of which the rain splashed into the darkness. As he stared down into the murmuring obscurity beneath him he remembered how the river had looked on that moonlit night when Lexie came over from Marsh Alley to meet him in the churchyard. That was the first time his brother had told him about his desire to be buried underneath the elm.

He clutched the cold edge of the stonework with both his hands and bent forward, listening to the gurgling noises made by the flowing water and to the hissing sound of the rain as it struck the river’s surface.

The rain beat down upon his bare head with a force that made him wonder if it were not going to change to hail. But it was much too warm a night for that; and he recognized that it was the unusual size of the individual raindrops and the torrential force with which their massed volume hit his skull, which gave him that particular impression.

He bowed his head still lower over the parapet, deriving a fierce pleasure from thus yielding himself up to the mysterious caprice of the blind, soulless, formless element which knew no difference between a living human skeleton and the inanimate blocks of smooth quarried stone. His mind, always abnormally sensitive to physical sensations, began to detach itself from any definite train of thought; began to disembody itself and unsheathe itself, until it seemed to arrive at a naked airy freedom which enabled it to mingle with the dark flow of that invisible gurgling water and with the seething downpour of that inundating deluge.

Drowning! That was the ultimate sensation he craved; drowning in these vast inhuman elements that obeyed no master and had no purpose or object or obligation; but only drifted and drifted, on and on, up and down, as the unknown reservoirs of subhuman force sucked them in.

Oh, with what happiness he could imagine himself floating — dead — dead — dead — down that current of dark swollen water! No more responsibilities, no more decisions, no more miserable remorse!

That mysterious country of the underworld of which the Greek wanderer had his vision, coming to it at last through those Cimmerian mists, may after all have held a shadowy correspondence with something that really did exist!

If so, it was surely there, surely under those gray willows and among those tall grasses, that the land of untroubled twilight awaited him, whose margins he had so often approached, caught in quick strange glimpses, along the Frome-side roads and the green Frome-side lanes!

He stood erect and looked about him. The rain began rapidly to diminish now, moving away over the valley toward the east with the same capricious suddenness as that with which it had first arrived.

He crossed the bridge and walked on to the entrance into the churchyard.

He hesitated here for a while, his mind returning to his wife and to that devastating sense of a woman's absolute loneliness at these hours which had driven him forth by a kind of shame. How wicked it was, how dark, how heathen, that mock sympathy which his mother and Pandie had displayed! How horrible this deep, blind, pitiless understanding that women had of one another at such moments — an understanding that was not tenderness or pity but something else; something that came to the surface at these times from the subterranean abysses of nature.

"Ann — my dear sweet Ann — bear it a little longer, just a very little longer, and you'll be happier than you ever dreamed was possible!"

So he said in his heart, making of his craving to relieve her in her travail a sort of desperate conscious prayer, directed to no deity and to no demon, but to the vast night itself, oldest of all divinities, accomplice alike of the birth of grass blades in the wet dew of Titty's Ring and of the birth of planets in the cold emptiness of space.

Then it occurred to him that he would like, on this night of the birth of his first-born, to go for a moment to where his father— “the old man” with whom he had had a lifelong feud — lay stretched out under his six feet of clay.

This irrational yielding to the very tradition against which he had struggled so long came upon him without warning; came upon him as if in reply to an actual summons. He hesitated for a moment longer, shaking his head from side to side and pulling his drenched overcoat tightly round him, while with a grim, rather ghastly smile he stared at the dark roof in front of him, from which the water was now audibly dripping.

He became suddenly conscious, as never before, of the appalling finality of human decisions, even in the least important matter. The water dripped, dripped, dripped, from that sloping roof, upon the enmossed slabs of some enclosed tombstone; and it seemed to him as if it dripped from the eternal wound in the heart of the universe, the wound that nothing could staunch or heal, the original blunder of the gods, the free will of life to will against life.

Shivering now a little, though the rain had quite ceased, and lifting his feet very heavily and with difficulty, as if they were subjected in some special way just then to the law of gravitation, Rook moved up the gravel path and rounded the corner of the building.

There before him, visible in spite of the darkness, was the familiar white headstone; there, too, the well-known trunk of Lexie’s elm. But what struck his mind with a shock of abrupt amazement, struck it with the sort of chill that comes over us when something occurs which resembles the intrusion of the abnormal or supernatural, was the emerging from the church porch of a human figure. He moved forward boldly, however, in pursuit of this figure which proceeded to cross the churchyard to its remote end under the broken wall. There, as he approached it, it assumed the appearance of a woman, a woman who took up a spade which she had left on the ground and began to dig with animal-like rapidity and concentration, throwing the loose earth upon a growing heap at her side.

It was clear she must have been at her task for some while before the rain interrupted her; for the heap of earth at the edge of the hole she was digging showed large and unmistakable in the darkness.

He recognized her now. She was Betsy Cooper. And well enough did he apprehend what she was at; for it had been one of the scandals of the village in his boyhood that Nancy Cooper, his father's favourite, had been buried somewhere in that quarter without a tombstone; and that even the mound that indicated the place had been flattened out in some orderly but impious tidying up of that particular spot.

He walked straight across to where the old woman was digging. She did not hear him approach and he came close up to her before he spoke.

"Betsy!"

She leaped up at the sound, and drew away trembling, dropping her spade into the hole. When she saw who it was her face became transfigured with wild concern.

"Get 'ee back into house, Squire Ash'ver! Get 'ee back into house while there be time! What be 'ee doing traipsin' in churchyard when thee's wife be brought to bed? Get 'ee back, Squire Rook, lest some girt blow fall on 'ee! Hist — hist — dear Squire alive! There be terrible mischief abroad this blessed night for thee and thine. I do know it and I've a-told them maidies in kitchen what I do know! Dursn't one of all thy folk up and tell 'ee what I did say to they afore this same sundown? I'd a-told it to thee wold mother but naught of it and naught of poor Betsy would she bide. Wahay! Wahoh! And that none should heed! Wahoh! And that thee own self should be traipsin' here, none withholding! Get thee back to house, for the sake of thy own flesh and blood, Squire Ash'ver! Get thee back for Christes' sake afore 'tis too late!"

The old woman's agitation was so extreme that she actually waved both her thin arms in the air, while her face assumed the look of some inspired prophetess.

Rook looked at her with grave attention. But, as in the case of a greater than he, there were powers and influences abroad that rendered him obstinately obdurate to her clamour.

"So you're trying to find Nancy?" he said sternly and quietly, looking down into the hole she had digged.

And as he looked, a sharp spasm came over him and a strange emotion gripped his vitals. In one single flash he got a vision of the whole tragic pity of the human race — these mothers, these children! He saw his own delicately nurtured Ann alone in that bed. He saw this old woman wrestling with the very earth, if so be that she might touch the bones of her child dead twenty, thirty years ago.

"Let my Nancy bide where she be!" cried the hag in desperation. "Look to thee own self, Squire Ash'ver! Look to thee own self and get back to house!"

He turned away, unwilling to drive the woman to further extremes of supplication; but as he left her there he said compassionately and gently, but with a certain sternness: "If you do find your girl to-night, Betsy, or on any other night, I will see to it that she has a proper tombstone."

He passed his father's grave this time with a shrug of his shoulders. Was the late Squire himself responsible for the abominable neglect that was the cause of Betsy's nocturnal piety? Were those "half beasties," as Binnory called them, his own half brothers?

He walked rapidly out of the churchyard into the road.

Once more that leaden feeling in his legs, as if the law of gravitation had suddenly doubled its centripetal pull!

Once more that accursed sense of enormous importance in the making of trivial, unessential decisions!

“Ann didn’t need me there,” he thought, “till it’s all over. It’s the least I can do for her to obey her literally. She doesn’t want any more of these mock-sympathetic watchers!” And he visualized with such appalling distinctness the red-haired Pandie, obsessed with gloating sentiment, clinging to the banisters or listening at the door, that he plucked at his heavy feet as if they had been two obdurate roots, and strode resolutely off toward Foulden Bridge.

It was then, out there between the river bank and the open meadows, that the quality of the sky above his head began to change. The waning moon was still below the horizon; but a gentle wind had risen from the west and had swept the clouds before it, so that Rook was able to discern at least one or two of the constellations with which he was familiar.

He could see the great outstretched wings of Cygnus, like the wings of some vast emissary of fate despatched by one demiurge to another, flying across the fields of space.

He could see a star that he fancied must be Aldebaran; and another that he noted to himself, with that pathetic satisfaction with which creatures of a day find respite from their nothingness in the mere naming of the immortals, as a luminary that might be, only his memory always failed him, that favourite sky mark of his brother Lexie, Vega in Lyra.

Lit by the stars as if by far-off candle flames the wide water meadows stretched away to his left; and beyond the river and beyond the barley fields rose dark and blurred, like a great bastion of some invisible fortress, the vague outline of Heron’s Ridge.

Certain stars, watery and faint, as if they had been the drowned but not quite extinguished bodies of glowworms, lay silent and deep-buried in the muddy water of a ditch at the roadside. Bits of broken reed stalk and wind-blown twigs from willow trees and alders floated between the images of these fallen stars, as if they floated above a crevice in the terrestrial orb itself which sank down into antipodal gulfs.

Calmed and soothed by the largeness of the night about him the Squire of Ashover began to recover the equipoise of his perturbed spirit.

Ashover? Ashover? What was Ashover between the hovering wings of Cygnus and the stretching out of the chords of Lyra?

He suddenly began to feel strangely, exultantly happy; happier than he had been for more than twelve months; happier than he had been since those irresponsible days just after his father's death.

Every person he thought of at that moment intensified rather than diminished his happiness. Round all the people of his life there seemed to float a sort of ideal luminosity, enhancing their dignity, their beauty, their originality, their human worth.

He felt a sense of inexpressible gratitude to the gods that he had ever known these people of his life, his brother, his mother, his wife, Netta, and Nell. Some actual chemical fluid, wonderful, magical, as if those high stars had been melted in some enchanted forest pool to which he had pressed his lips, seemed to flow round the figures of these people as they gathered there in his mind, and to harmonize for ever his relations with them.

Under the healing flow of this magical fluid, which seemed actually at that moment flooding every cell of his brain, the knots of the nerves that were jangled there unloosed themselves and expanded freely; expanded like the floating tendrils of dry seaweed when the twilight tide covers it, after a hot day!

In the ecstasy of what he felt just then it seemed to him that he could live happily by Ann's side for the rest of his life. It seemed to him that even if her love were far more predatory and possessive than it ever had been he still could live with her, live with her and her child, without any of that abominable illusion of being suffocated, divided, impinged upon, from which he had suffered so horribly in times past.

And the same thing applied to all the other people of his life. Something had happened to those knotted nerves in his soul that had untied them completely, that had spread them out beautifully and freely like crumpled mosses that have been washed by rain and can now hold the sun in their leafy cups without withering.

As he came near to Foulden Bridge his happiness grew to such a pitch that he actually skipped a step or two with those feet of his that just now were so leaden and heavy.

The alders by the sheep wash, if they possessed any conscious interest in the human figures of their environment, must have been struck by the sight of a bony, hatless, middle-aged man, skipping with his feet as if they were the hooves of an escaped goat!

All at once Rook became aware — without warning, without premonition — of that same young rider upon the gray horse moving silently along by his side.

Instinctively, as before, he clutched at the youth's saddle; and as before, the boy laid his warm youthful fingers caressingly upon his hand.

"I told her I'd have a tombstone put up as soon as she found her," he discovered himself saying, as if in answer to some reproach which the boy had made. "And I've obeyed Ann to-night quite literally. She told me to walk to Foulden Bridge."

Why he said just this, when Ann had never once mentioned the word "Foulden," is one of those queer incidents in a man's life destined to remain to the end of time hidden away unsolved in the limbo of the irrelevant.

But what troubled Rook then was that the youth did not respond to his self-justifying speeches. All he did was to press the hand upon his saddle with still more tender solicitude. Rook wanted him to speak. His longing that he should speak was the first interruption he had suffered to that strange happiness which still hung about him.

But the boy rode slowly on and remained silent. Suddenly Rook felt those fingers grow cold. And it was not only that they grew cold. They seemed to melt away; they seemed to become lighter and more insubstantial than mist!

He looked up. Ah! that figure was receding, horse and rider together, receding and receding; growing dim and faint, dimmer and fainter, until there was no more left of them than a troubled shadow, limned as it were in a great withdrawing wave, rolling back down a shelving beach.

And as they vanished from the man's sight there came to his ears what seemed like a lamentable sigh:

"Daddy! Daddy! Daddy!"

And though with his reason he knew it was only the rising of the wind and its tremulous passage across the shaken reeds, to his heart it seemed an appeal and a warning and a farewell; but what was most strange of all to him just then was the fact that simultaneously with the sinking away of that forlorn sigh across the wet fields, he became absolutely certain, beyond doubt or dispute, that in her bed in Ashover House his wife had been delivered of a son.

So certain was he of this that a rush of quick irrepressible tears came to the back of his eye sockets, and though not a tear actually fell he was conscious enough that he, too, Rook of Ashover, was experiencing now, for all his sceptical disillusionment, the most primitive emotion of the human race: that immemorial exultation, older than the tents of Abraham, older than the tents of Achilles, the joy that a man child is born into the world!

For the third time that night he stood hesitating. He would have liked to go straight home, run at top speed home, leap up the staircase, push Pandie and his mother aside, and embrace his wife and the new-born.

But at that moment another instinct in him contended with the desire to retrace his steps; namely, the instinct just to rush over to Marsh Alley and be the first to bring the news of his son's birth to Lexie.

Oh, he must do that. Lexie had been associated with every crisis in his life; and now — in the medley of events that had occurred since he left him at Toll-Pike — he had made no sign. To let this night of all nights pass by without seeing Lexie, would it not be something that he would regret to the end of his days? Lexie would laugh at him — he could see at this moment the face he would make — but he would be touched and pleased, all the same, at this disordered midnight visit. He could hear his voice rallying him: "So brother Rook is all 'alive-oh' at last!" That was the way he would fool him; that was the way he would send him back post-haste; utterly refusing, no doubt, to believe that the child was yet born; scolding him even for being so superstitious!

It was characteristic of Rook Ashover that at this particular moment of his life he should be hesitating between these two quite irrational appeals: the tug at his heart that pulled him toward a brother who would only tease him when he appeared, and the tug at his heart that pulled him toward a child whose very existence was entirely problematical!

For the third time he brought his hesitation to an end. For the third time he plucked at those earthbound feet of his and strode forward.

"I'll throw stones at his window," he thought, "if he's gone to bed." And he walked rapidly on to the centre of Foulden Bridge.

While these events were proceeding in the lives of the Squire and Lady Ann, matters were not much more quiescent or peaceful within the narrow walls of Toll-Pike Cottage.

With the help of the muscular arms of Mr. Pod the two girls had succeeded in restraining the violent excitement of the unfortunate philosopher. His thoughts still full of his book, his mind full of wild fancies, the fixed idea had taken possession of him that it was to deliver his precious work into the hands of his enemy, Rook, that Lady Ann had stolen it.

Helpless under the sturdy guardianship of his sexton gaoler the poor wretch had relapsed into that sort of petrified passivity into which rabbits and hares are wont to sink when some immense danger menaces their life.

The girls, who kept opening the door to see how he was, became more and more reassured as night drew on, believing — because it was just that they especially wanted to believe — that he had fallen into a calm, refreshing sleep, from which he would finally awake, cured of his temporary dementia.

So reassured did they become that they even prepared for themselves a little supper in Nell's kitchen and sat talking together there in low voices, while every now and then Netta would replenish a plate on the floor from which the Marquis of Carabas licked up the morsels his fastidious heart loved.

"We should have heard if she'd been seriously upset by going so far," Nell was saying in reply to some remark of Netta.

The other shook her head. "I'm afraid a good many things could happen in Ashover House and we remain in the dark about them here. To tell you the truth, Nell, I feel as if anything might happen to any of us to-night!"

She moved her chair a little as she spoke, so as to get it away from the window, against which the rain had now begun to beat with extraordinary violence. Both the girls turned their heads toward the streaming pane; and there fell upon them that tremulous and not always unpleasant shudder such as children experience in large shadowy gardens when they play at hide-and-seek.

"If William isn't better when he wakes up," said Nell presently, "I shall ask Pod to stay the night. There's no earthly reason why he shouldn't do that. One of us can go round and tell his wife."

Netta nodded. "I hope Lexie is safe home," she said suddenly, turning quickly round with a new trouble in her eyes. "Pod says he left him in his cottage when he came here, too exhausted to walk any farther."

Nell's mouth opened pitifully and she clapped her hands together. "Oh, Netta," she cried, "we forgot Lexie completely! How could we do that? Oh … oh … oh…." And she rose from her chair and looked helplessly at the flood of rain which made the window seem as if it were a porthole in a wave-deluged ship.

"There's nothing we could have done, anyhow," said Netta soothingly. "I don't think Mrs. Pod would let him go unless he really felt better."

Nell looked scrutinizingly at her, as a child looks at an older person, doubtful whether it is being honestly or treacherously comforted.

"I hope you are right," she murmured, resuming her seat. "It would be horrible if anything happened to Lexie from our thoughtlessness. But I can't believe it will! Oh, Netta, oughtn't one of us to go to Ashover House and get William's book? I don't like to think of his waking up and wanting it and not finding it!" And once more she rose from her chair.

"Nell, sit down!"

The elder woman spoke with an authority far more weighty and unhesitating than would have been possible to the Netta of five months before. She had come to exercise, even in that short time, a sort of protective domination over the young girl.

“Don’t let’s work ourselves up into unnecessary agitation,” she said, smiling. “Not that I don’t feel just as you do,” she added a moment later. “It’s as if we two were locked up together in a fortress, isn’t it? With some great battle going on outside, in which all our people are engaged, on one side or the other!” She looked at her companion thoughtfully and sighed heavily. “My whole life has been a sort of waiting,” she murmured in a low voice. “But that’s at an end now.”

Nell hardly heard what she was saying. A nervous restlessness, beyond what she could quite account for, made her fidgety and preoccupied.

“I can just see Lexie describing his evening with Mrs. Pod, can’t you?” went on Netta. “Can’t you see him shutting first one eye and then the other in the way he does when he’s done something he’s pleased with? There’s nothing in the world delights him more than listening to the opinions of people like Mrs. Pod.”

“Why is it that I feel so funny and nervous, then?” demanded Nell. “I know it’s not about William. I can’t tell you just how I know; but I do know…. It’s about the others.” And she looked at her friend with an expression of puzzled exasperation, as if it were a sort of unkindness on Netta’s part not to relieve her anxiety.

“Hush! Didn’t you hear something?”

It was Netta who rose to her feet this time. She went to the door into the passage and opened it.

“I thought I heard the gate clicking,” she said.

Nell jumped up hastily and pushing past her ran upstairs.

A minute later Netta heard her voice calling her by name from the room above.

“Netta! Netta! Come here!”

It hardly surprised her when she did stand by her friend’s side in that littered room to see the figure of Mr. Pod lying fast asleep in the wicker chair, while the couch they had brought in for Hastings was untenanted and empty.

“He must have slipped out in his stockings!” whispered Nell. The girl was trembling from head to foot and her face was as white as the face of the marble clock on the mantelpiece which did nothing but point to half-past eleven with a malignant emphasis.

Netta bent over the sleeping man and shook him indignantly by the shoulder.

“Where be I? What be doing to I? Let a man bide where ‘a be, can’t ‘ee?”

“You’ve gone to sleep,” was the girl’s somewhat hopeless answer to these murmurings. “Mr. Hastings has got out of the house and we must go after him! Get your things on, Nell, quick as you can! There’s nothing else to do. We must all go and look for him. He’s probably gone to Ashover House with the idea of getting his book back!”

“Be parson rinned off, then?” muttered the bewildered sexton, rising with some embarrassment to his feet and staring feebly at the bookcase as if he suspected his prisoner to be ensconced behind it. “‘A were there right enough, not two minutes agone! Do ‘ee think ‘a be hiding somewheres about, lady? ‘A be a terrible crafty gentleman, when’s wits be working.’

“Nonsense, Mr. Pod,” said Netta severely, pulling on her hat and gloves and shoes, while Nell did the same in her bedroom. “Any one would think you’d been drinking. A reliable man you are, Mr. Pod; to go to sleep when we trusted you so implicitly! You don't know what harm mayn't come of this criminal neglect of yours!"

It is always a relief in any great human crisis to find a scapegoat; and the staring imbecility of the poor man at that moment certainly did lend itself to such treatment.

"Aren't you ready yet, Nell?" the impatient girl cried, adjusting her cloak between the two open doors. "The rain has stopped now, so we needn't bother what we put on! The great thing is to catch him before he gets to the bridge."

Why she used the word "bridge" at that moment she herself could never have explained. "We've got to catch him before he gets to the bridge!" She remembered that phrase afterward with a certain superstitious shudder.

Mr. Pod, meanwhile, was defending himself volubly. "No need to be scolding of I, missy. I be ready to go along. 'Tis the other young leddy what's keeping us. I've a-laid out too many precious corpses in me time not to be up and lively for anythink."

Nell did appear now, at the head of the stairs, still very white and trembling. She seemed so helpless and so nervous that her agitation communicated itself to her friend.

"For God's sake, let's start." The elder woman's voice had caught the quiver of suspense with which the whole atmosphere of that house of open doors was now vibrating.

They all three descended the stairs together and passed out into the garden.

It had indeed been a chance for "a crafty gentleman" to exercise his wit, that stealthy escape of William Hastings! He had achieved it with the supernatural cunning of a madman, that cunning which seems to be instinctive and subhuman; as though, with the atrophy of his reason, a man’s mind were able to draw freely upon the magnetic duplicity of birds and fishes.

Passing the rain-drenched geranium bed, from which emanated an odour musky and sweet, as if from an enclosed conservatory, he picked up from the ground the great, heavy, iron-tipped garden rake which Pandie had dropped there early the same afternoon.

It was by reason of being burdened with this grotesque weapon that he allowed the gate to click as he went through, a sound that, in the silence of their suspense in the kitchen, had actually reached the ears of one of the girls.

The anger which the loss of his book had roused in him had now crystallized in his demented brain into a cold, murderous fury against the Squire of Ashover.

Hastings’s passion at that crisis was to his own mind a pure irrevocable physical necessity. It was necessary that he should find Rook Ashover — even if he had to break into his house — and it was necessary that he should kill him. Behind this necessity swirled and seethed and fermented all his suppressed jealousy, all his accumulated life hatred, all his desire to “crack Nature’s moulds” and bring back the original chaos!

Hurrying along the grass at the edge of the rain-soaked road without overcoat or shoes, the garden rake clutched tightly in his hand, he soon became aware that another figure, also bareheaded, was advancing toward him.

He was separated from this figure by scarcely more than the length of Foulden Bridge; but by the accident of his following the grass path rather than the open road he himself was a far less noticeable object to the other than the other was to him.

The coming together of these two figures, with the river and the white-railinged bridge between them, might easily have seemed like one single man encountering his own image, or even meeting a phantom of himself, as Goethe once did on an unfrequented road; but no such fancy as that crossed the mind of William Hastings. Whether in the whirl of his thoughts he paused to note the strangeness of this accident, that the man he was seeking was coming straight toward him, no one will ever know. Frozen stiff with excitement he savagely clutched his weapon in both hands and crouched down behind the woodwork of the bridge where it joined the road.

Rook came on with rapid strides to the centre of the bridge. What he saw was not the white railing at his side, or the swollen river beneath him, or the dim perspective of the road in front of him; least of all did he see that crouching figure.

He saw Lexie's face at the open window. He saw that expressions of mock consternation which he knew so well. He heard his voice: "Is all well with the child? Is all well with Ann? What are you in such a 'toss' for, brother Rook?"

And then, before he had time to do more than make that spasmodic mental jerk with which the mind passes from one region of reality to another, Hastings was upon him. With a terrific swing of that fantastic weapon the priest struck him full on the side of the head; the arm which Rook instinctively raised to protect himself coming in contact with no more than the handle of the instrument.

Stunned and unconscious the wounded man fell heavily back against one of the two solitary railings which formed the double balustrade of the wooden bridge.

The impact of so massive and bony a frame was too much for that weather-weakened plank; and with a sinister crashing sound it broke and fell outward, precipitating the unconscious man into the stream below. Face downward in that swift-rushing current floated now, limp and unresisting, what was speedily no more than the shape, the form, the image of a homo sapiens. First to one side of the river it drifted; then to the other; the weeds brushing against its face, and the Frome water, embrowned by the rain, splashing and gurgling round its unheeding ears.

It was quite out of sight in the darkness — it would have been perhaps out of sight in full daylight — when William Hastings flung his weapon down and returned to consciousness from the petrified trance he had fallen into after striking his blow.

He occupied himself for a while, with an absorbed and vacant concentration, in the task of breaking off and throwing into the river bits of the broken rail that still hung loose and uneven over the water. Then wearily and slowly he turned back the way he had come.

Exhausted by the storm of passion in his brain and by the physical stress of what he had gone through that day he did not get very far. Long before he reached the gate of Toll-Pike Cottage he sank down by the wayside, a huddled, shivering, half-dazed creature, who was quickly passing from all conscious memory of his identity.

Here they found him after the lapse of barely an hour; and when they had carried him back into his room and had undressed him and got him into bed it was clear that his incoherent murmurings were something different from his former insanity.

Before morning he was in a raging fever; and the doctor when he finally appeared, between eleven and twelve of this first noonday of the month of October, was able to say no more than that nothing could be done for him beyond what Netta and Nell had already done.

He died at two o’clock in the afternoon of the following day, recognizing no one, aware of no human feeling, returning, as he had so often wished to return, to whatever “equilibrium,” it may be, beyond the difference between life and death, beyond the difference between space and time, smoothes away the outrage of consciousness and the “whips and scorns” of memory.

Some thirty-five years ago the wife of a classical-minded cobbler in east London had given birth to an unhealthily sensitive child; had nourished him with milk from breasts that were themselves ill-nourished; had lulled him to sleep with songs to which no feet had ever danced, with which no airs from green grass or from yellow sand had ever mingled; had washed him, clothed him, wondered at him, worshipped him…. Dead, stone-dead was that woman now; dead, and in a grave marked with no more than her name and the number of her few and evil years! She had died in absolute certainty that her son would be a famous thinker, known from the Hebrides to Land’s End. But she had not been able even to lift so much as a finger to help him when the work of his lifetime was being thrust into a bonfire of weeds! And where was she now, that mother, when to a rush of girlish tears that were more than half for another man, her worshipped son, a thick-set, heavy-jowled image of lamentable mortality, was lowered into the earth, with a Mr. Pod at his head and a Mr. Twiney at his feet?

Rook Ashover was buried a couple of days later than the man who brought to an end his Pyrrhonian scepticism with a garden rake.

That harmless horticultural tool was picked up on the first of October by none other than Binnory, whose instinct for disaster brought him to Foulden Bridge before the wings of rumour had scarcely begun to flutter.

It interested Binnory to decipher on its handle the name of an ironmonger in Bishop’s Forley. The name Was Lovejoy; and Binnory got pleasure from speaking of the rake as if it possessed itself that sonorous appellation. He ran off with it across the hill and hid it under an elder bush on the edge of Titty's Ring. Here he would go, when the leaves began to fall, and rake them together with it; pretending that the elder bush was his house and that he was tidying up his drive "like Mr. Twiney at Ash'ver do"; and he would mutter his wildest fancies quite freely to this product of the Bishop's Forley shop, going so far in his weak-headedness as to treat it as a kind of living fetish. Once he even carried his treasure trove several miles down the lane to display it with pride to the "half beasties," whose caravan still remained in the neighbourhood.

Thus it happened that while the Squire of Ashover and the Priest of Ashover became less and less endowed with the illusion of personality, the rake "Lovejoy" gathered to itself more and more of this ambiguous value.

A hundred Octobers hence some pair of nameless lovers, seeking refuge from the inquisitive and the frivolous, may very likely stumble upon a rusty piece of iron and a worm-eaten staff, may very likely use them to clean the mud from their shoes, without the least notion of the part played by these objects in a long-forgotten Frome-side story.

No one knew what passed through Lady Ann's mind as she lay pale and silent hour by long hour with her new-born child by her side; the child that was, after all, a son. Never had the proud girl kept her feelings more completely to herself. To whom, indeed, should she reveal them? Her father was dead. Her mother was dead. Mrs. Ashover's grief at her son's death was so mitigated by her sense of escape from a far greater disaster, the tragedy of the family's extinction, that she could not have responded, even had Ann been entirely unreserved, to the girl's craving for response. Lexie had always been critical and suspicious of her, his vanity piqued by her preference for his brother, his taste offended by her philistinism.

Missy Sparrow-Hawk was not made for submission to circumstance. She was made to control circumstance. But like many another shrewd diplomatist in this chaotic world she found herself baffled and beaten by that element of pure chance which even a Poynings could not outwit.

She had calculated her moves with the most perfect nicety. She had counted on this. She had discounted that. What she had not foreseen was the intrusion upon the stage of events of the rake “Lovejoy.” She had felt so sure that in the end she would bring Rook round. Her child was her final master stroke. But no master stroke could bring the dead back to life.

Lady Ann was outwitted, outmanœuvred, beaten. As she lay in her bed listening to the wind in the autumn trees she looked steadily, unflinchingly, at the lonely years in front of her. She would live, of course. She would cherish Rook’s child. But whatever happened in the long future she would never again be the same Cousin Ann who had put on that crimson dressing gown in the gamekeeper’s cottage!

Well, there it was! She was twenty-six and she had her child. And yet in her unflinching realism she knew that she was beaten. The mouse-coloured dust in Ashover Church might exult in the continuance of its race. It had gained its end. It was victorious. But the human bridge by which that indestructible life urge had hurled itself into the future carried from henceforth a hurt, a scar, a mark, from which it would never quite recover!

Cousin Ann’s beautiful lips closed upon her secret. She would be a proud and competent mistress of a rejuvenated House. But as her heart hardened itself to envisage her defeat, she stared with her gray eyes into Something that at certain hours, when for instance the branches of the cedar creaked and the branches of the lime rustled, was not very far removed from what less stoical persons than Ann Wentworth Gore would have named despair.

At any rate, she did not protest, nor indeed did any other member of that household, when, by the reiterated importunity of the remorseless old dowager, the boy was christened John after his grandfather. Lexie in his heart was glad of his mother's choice. Let the name of Rook disappear from the face of the earth! Let no other human being ever carry it, or be called to bed or board by its familiar sound!

But it was a blubbered and ravaged countenance, emptied of all zest for life, robbed of its most characteristic folds and ceases, haggard and woebegone, like the knight-at-arms in "La Belle Dame," that the younger brother — who would, except for this infant, have been the new Squire of Ashover– turned toward the dishes prepared for him by Mrs. Bellamy and toward the books and trees and flower beds and sunrises and sunsets of his accustomed life. He saw, not felt, how beautiful those halcyon days of October were. He went to and fro in a blank and hollow trance, a trance scooped out and scraped dry of all rich and joyous aplomb, of all pleasant chat, of all mellow and wanton sallies.

When November came and Lady Ann's child was more than a month old Lexie began slowly to regain something of his old humour. The curious thing about it was that his health, instead of suffering any collapse by Rook's death, took a decided turn for the better. It was as if, by passing so suddenly into the dim underworld, the elder Ashover had transferred some actual psychic magnetism into the nerves of his companion. Their life together had been so intimate and so involved that it is easy to imagine the existence of a sort of common cistern of energy flowing between them; drawn upon by both of them; and deriving its source from the indestructible vitality of their ancestors! Such a reservoir would naturally flow with its own independent pulse; and the fact that there was only one of them left to draw upon it would double the influx of its power as soon as the first shock of separation had lost its violence.

The first outward indication of this vita nuova in the sick man was the frequency of his visits to Toll-Pike Cottage where Netta was still staying on as Nell's guest. More than once Nell came alone to share some meal with him in his own house; and by the time the first two weeks of November were over, there had been some very uncomfortable scenes with Mrs. Bellamy, who passionately resented these unconventional entertainments.

In the middle of November there happened to fall upon Frome-side a long unaccountable spell of gusty westerly wind. It was a peculiar wind that thus came to that Dorset valley over the orchards and moors of Somersetshire. It was an intermittent wind, with wild spurts of incredibly thin rain, rain so fine and vapoury that it soaked to the core whatever it approached and made man and beast, and even the trees of the field, bend and bow and sway and crouch, when its chilly gusts swept over them and enveloped them.

It was at the close of one of the worst of these persecuted days that Netta Page came to bid farewell to her buried friend.

The rain had ceased with the fall of twilight, but not one flower upon the grave she came to greet had that persistent wind left intact. What disfigured wreaths did remain on the mound of disturbed loam were reduced to shapeless tangles of string and stalks.

The wind kept blowing her hair loose from under her hat. It swept her cloak against her figure. It whirled round her in eddies and spirals. It blew leaves and twigs against her face and made it difficult for her to breathe as it beat furiously against her mouth and nostrils. She kept forming words in her throat; and it was to herself as if she uttered them. But whether any real sound would have come forth from her lips, even if this tempest had ceased, is more than doubtful.

But she was talking to the shrouded form beneath her; and, coherent or incoherent, her words had their relief for her own soul….

“You needn’t fret any more about him or her or me or any one! It’s all right, Rook dear. Everything is all right.”

The force of the wind made her lift both hands to her rain-drenched hat; but even that movement did not prevent two long wisps of hair from detaching themselves from the rest and blowing like tattered streamers behind her. Hurriedly she sank down on her knees and pressed her face against the soaked clay.

The descending darkness swept over her and covered her, separating her from the rest of the world.

Over Antiger Woods, over Dorsal, over Battlefield, like some enormous arrow-stricken dying bird, that darkness came upon her; and though her mind was too absorbed in her grief to be conscious of anything external it is likely enough that the swallowing up of all shapes and contours and colours in the one great wave of blackness made it easier for her to feel that she and what lay down there beneath her were for that moment undivided.

So dependent are the minds of human beings upon these outward tokens, so pitiably do they cling to the least vestige of any “real presence” of what they have loved, that the worst pang of loss that Netta was ever destined to know came when at last, stiff and shivering, she moved away from that spot.

It is significant that these holes dug in churchyard clay are not refilled and covered up, so as to be left just level with the surrounding sod! For it is these tragic hillocks, themselves so nearly resembling enshrouded human shapes, that give us the last illusion of our sorrow, the idea that they actually wrap up and enfold that form which in reality lies so far below!

Netta stumbled several times in the darkness over other graves, graves that were no more to; her mind than so many ridges of obstructing turf clods; but she reached the road at last; and when she did reach it and began to make her way with heavy dragging steps back to the cottage, though the storm of her grief had exhausted itself, what took its place was a cold, dull, inert recognition of that unbridgeable gulf between the living and the dead which the assuaging ritual of all the centuries leaves still exposed — yawning; gaping, uncrossed.

She found the door of the cottage left open to admit her; but the fire was almost out in the little parlour and the house was empty.

As she went to and fro among the deserted rooms, making weary and half-mechanical preparations for her own and her companion's evening meal, she fancied she heard the sound of loud harsh music coming from the direction of the village. She opened the kitchen door and listened. Certainly there was something going on. Oh! This was the worst of it; that a human soul is not even allowed to live in quiet with its own loss. Life must be rushing, jerking, trailing, dancing, howling forward, just the same; and for ever deriding the least attempt to hold it back, to strike it into silence!

"It sounds like a whirligig," she thought as she closed the door. "I didn't know they had whirligigs in the country." When the meal was prepared and all was ready for Nell's return she sat down listlessly on a chair in the kitchen, listening to that harsh music in the distance, to the purring of the Marquis of Carabas, to the ticking of the clock. Once she started, fancying she heard a sound on the floor above. She thought how queer it was that rooms where people had died should be endowed with more life than other rooms; and that the very boards should creak and the very soot fall dawn the chimney with a sort of intense and solemn self-consciousness!

She wanted to concentrate her mind an a hundred little incidents of her life with Rook; but instead of being able to do this she was compelled, as if by an inner command, to listen intently to hear whether another board would creak up there in Hastings's room….

Netta was not the only one who had heard the strains of music that November evening. A couple of hours before, just after she had taken her hat and cloak and gone out into the twilight, the unexpected sound had reached the ears of her two friends as they sat together in the very place where she was sitting now.

"Listen!" cried Lexie eagerly, leaping to his feet and running out into the back garden. The girl followed and he turned to her with an expression of childish delight. "It's a roundabout!" he chuckled. "Who would have thought it possible as late in the year as this and on a night like this? I've known them to come in October on their way to London; but never in November!"

He looked round him. It was nearly dark now; and, although the rain had stopped, the wind was moaning disconsolately in the trees above the wall and was tossing the bare stalks of the raspberry canes against the posts of the empty clothes line.

It was one of those evenings in which foot travellers on country roads lean for a while over some wet stile or gate and survey the faint whitish glimmer in the sad west, and listen to the splash of raindrops from some tall elm above their heads as a disturbed starling or pigeon tumbles out of

"When was the last merry-go-round you saw, Nell?" he asked. And there was a tone in his voice as if he were deliberately defying the forlornness of earth and air and sky.

“I’ve never seen one in Ashover, Lexie,” she answered.

“Well, you shall see one!” he cried. “For I’ll show you one. I can take a girl to a circus of a cold November night as well as another!”

“But, Lexie — —” she began.

He swept aside her objections. “Come!” he cried. “Get your things on! It’ll do us good to have a bit of sport.”

He hurried her back into the house and made her put on her cape and hat, both of them composed of new mourning black, bought at a shop in Tollminster.

As he held her cloak for her, she was struck by the manner in which the faded tweed suit he wore had grown by daily use to become a kind of animal’s skin. No human being’s clothes, seen without the wearer, could be more characteristic, more living, than Lexie Ashover’s! The effect was enhanced by the perpetual presence of some dead hedge weed or another left in his buttonhole as it might have been left on the shaft of a cart or at the bottom of a wicker basket.

He put on a heavy muffler and overcoat and took his stick in his hand. This stick, a round-handled ash stick, was worn as smooth and glossy by long use as the carved pew of a monk or a hermit’s spade.

Once out in the road they were aware that this stormy night had its own peculiar spirit, a spirit that had something reckless and magnetic in it, disturbing to human nerves. Neither the man nor the girl glanced back toward the white railings of Foulden Bridge, railings which had not yet been mended. Lexie kept talking and gesticulating; pointing with his hand in the direction from which the sound seemed to proceed; and laughing in his deep, chuckling, almost leonine manner over the strange fantasy of this belated showman in coming to such a place in the month of November.

He led his companion at a quick pace, past the house of Mr. Pod, past the entrance to Marsh Alley, until he brought her to a small enclosed field on the north of the village where such entertainers were wont to encamp when they visited that district.

The sound of the music increased in volume as they approached and was combined with spasmodic shrieks from the primitive engine that worked the roundabout, with the noisy shouts of young men, the laughter and giggling of girls, and the cries of children.

The wind was still blowing so violently that the rough naphtha-lighted tent, in the midst of which the wooden horses gyrated, shook and shivered and tugged at its supports to such an alarming degree that the older villagers hesitated to enter for fear of having the whole thing come down about their ears.

Lexie led Nell to the rear of a little crowd of wind-blown spectators who were standing at the entrance to the tent.

“It’s late in the year, isn’t it, for this kind of thing?” he remarked to a sturdily built stranger who was bending over one of the tent pegs, making the rope more secure.

“Late? I should think it was late,” replied the man in a surly tone. Then, when he took in the personality of Lexie: “We’re due in Bishop’s Forley to-night, sir,” he added, “and we stay there for the winter. I said myself ‘twere a fool thing to stop here with the weather so had; but he would have it so; and so here we are!”

“I’ve never known a merry-go-round in Ashover later than October,” repeated Lexie gravely, moving forward with Nell into the tent.

The engine happened to stop at that moment, and as the boys and girls who had been riding clambered down, and another instalment prepared to mount, a quick whisper ran round among them and many eyes were turned upon the couple.

Nell pulled him by the arm. “Let’s get away,” she whispered. “They’re noticing us.”

But it chanced that a particularly grotesque piebald horse had stopped just in front of Lexie. This horse possessed an unscrupulous and world-embracing eye, an eye upon whose yellow-tinted orb the flame of the naphtha lamps shone luridly, giving it an almost Cyclopean look.

“One minute!” the young man said. And leaving his companion standing there alone, white-faced and disconcerted, he climbed up with careful deliberation upon the animal’s back.

The music soon recommenced; and the fantastic circle of horses and riders revolved once more, to a pandemonium of raucous sounds.

“Looksee! Looksee!” cried one of the children. “There be Master Lexie, a-ride-a-cock-horsin’ same as we!”

Nell, in her black dress and black hat, was the cynosure of many astonished eyes. She knew them all, but she carefully avoided meeting the glance of any one in particular. Na one in the tent was bold enough to address her; the older people moving discreetly away to the farther side of the engine, the children crowding up as near to her as they dared but only whispering to each other in low tones that were drowned in the noise of the brazen din.

She herself stared helplessly at Lexie’s figure, in its frayed overcoat and blue muffler, appearing and disappearing with punctual regularity, like some sign of the Zodiac in a clock-work heaven.

The piebald horse he rode lost most of its individual character in that whirling revolution; but Nell could still catch the staring voracity of its insatiable eye, an eye that remained fixed upon her with an expression that was neither sympathetic nor derisive; an expression of simple devouring interest.

As to Lexie himself, his own lineaments were composed into a fixed and smiling mask of infantile complacence. One of his eyelids was lifted a little higher than the other in a kind of ecstasy of ironic roguery; but the glance he directed toward his companion as he passed her by in his gyrations had in it a sublime acceptance of destiny worthy of the animal on whose back he rode.

The noise in the young man's ears was deafening; and as he listened to it, giving himself up to the motion, his mind began wandering off to other sounds of a less artificial character that were at that moment rising up toward the cloud-covered sky from his native Frome-side.

He thought of the way the branches were creaking even now among the Scotch firs on Heron's Ridge. He imagined the grunt of a badger as it trotted in the moaning wind across Titty's Ring. He heard the cattle stirring drowsily in their bartons. He heard the splash of a perch in Saunders' Hole and the cry of a stray mallard drifting across the marshes toward Comber's End. Out of the heart of that brazen clamour he seemed to be listening to the tiny German clock ticking the hour in his mother's bedroom. He even fancied he could hear the quiet breathing in its guarded cradle of the small head of his House, the young new Squire of Ashover. And then suddenly, as in his fantasy he counted up these unnoticed sounds of the night, it seemed to him that he could actually catch the whirring of owl wings hovering about his elm tree in the churchyard, as they had done in the moonlight, just a year ago, when he met his brother at that place.

Before the music stopped or the rotation of the wheel of horses and riders came to a standstill, Lexie jumped down on the ground by Nell's side. He took her by the arm and led her out of the tent where they were met in the darkness by that familiar smell of an enclosure of grass trodden by men and beasts, the precise savour of which none know who have not been to fairs and circuses in country villages.

"The hobbyhorse is forgot!" he muttered; and the girl was bewildered by the fierce intensity of his grip upon her arm. The wind seemed to blow against his face at that moment with an ice-cold menace, as of some breath from the outer spaces. He gathered his forces together to resist this threat; and instinctively, in so doing, he let his arm in the darkness enclose Nell's waist.

"Don't let's go back just yet," he pleaded. "Netta won't mind waiting a little for supper."

The girl was so startled and shocked by the change in his manner as they came out of the tent that, in her pity for him, she did not have the heart to resist. But the touch of her warm young body, as he pressed her against him, soon restored him.

He led her down a grassy rain-soaked lane; one of those lanes on the outskirts of a village that usually end in nothing more hospitable than some isolated group of cattle sheds or pigsties.

What in this case they stumbled upon, however, was an open barn; and Lexie was enchanted beyond measure to detect in its cavernous obscurity a mass of sweet-smelling piled-up hay.

But Nell hesitated now and drew back when, with an exclamation of unashamed delight, he pulled at her hand to lead her forward into this shrine of Demeter.

"Let's go home, Lexie," she begged. "My shoes and stockings are soaking, and I'm sure yours must be! We really oughtn't to keep Netta waiting any longer."

But it was not easy to resist the wistful and humorous appeals, some of them almost querulous in their childishness, with which he implored her; and she yielded at last.

From outside in the darkness they could hear the shrieks and snorts of the merry-go-round and the wild music of a country jig that might have been the very tune to which the West Saxons first invaded Frome-side, so heathen and barbaric did it sound.

Neither of them could have told how long they were there together, with that sweet penetrating smell of the hay about them, and the scent of the dark, rain-drenched fields blown in through the door. But when they stood at last on the threshold of their hiding place, and while Lexie's countenance was illuminated for a moment by the light of the match with which he lit a cigarette, Nell noticed to her consternation a look upon his face like the look of a child outraged and lost.

"What is it, Lexie?" she asked anxiously.

But he threw the match away without answering. His mind, like a blind home-turning mole whose moving tunnel escapes all prevention, though its course can be traced by the upheaved turf, reverted to that six-foot-deep hole in the churchyard.

"Come along," he said brusquely; but a minute later, offering her his arm to lean upon, "I do hope you won't be the worse for this, Nell. It would be a shame if you were; for you're a brave and generous little girl. Do your feet feel very wet? If they don't feel wet I expect you'll get no harm."

This time it was the girl who made no answer. When they reached the field where the tent had been, they found the showmen in the process of packing up and departing. The wind made the lamps by which they laboured flare and smoke like the fires of some wild bivouac; and the figures of the men, showing dark and sinister in the tossing shadows, seemed as alien to the hedges and gates and trees as if they had been brought there by evil wizardry.

There was a group of two or three farm lads still lingering about the show wagons; and when Lexie and Nell had passed they heard behind them shouts of ribald laughter. Lexie felt his companion's hand tremble on his arm and a wave of anger, out of all proportion to the incident, passed through his frame.

"What brutes they are!" he muttered aloud.

And then in his secret thoughts he lamented the innumerable obstacles and difficulties by which the simplest and most natural attempts to be just ordinarily happy are surrounded and hemmed in.

"Something has given this human society a twist in the wrong direction," he said to himself. And even as he said it a shameful subterranean thankfulness that it was not he who was lying in that six-foot hole took possession of him.

"Nell, my dear, you're not angry with me, are you?"

She pressed his arm gently; and the wordless tenderness of that response touched him more than any words could have done.

"How sweet and lovely a girl can be!" he thought; and then in a kind of inward ecstasy, "I am alive! I am alive!" he cried to his own heart.

But a moment later, quite unknown to the girl at his side, "the form," to use a biblical phrase, "of his visage" changed. "Oh, Rook! Oh, my brother, my brother!"

Nell never quite understood why it was that just then he stopped dead still in the road and dropped the arm that was supporting her.

But he had gone down in his remorse among those who "lie in hell like sheep." He, the life amorist, the worshipper of the sun and the sweet air and the grain-bearing earth, was up to his knees at that moment in waters deeper and colder than the waters of the Frome.

But even there, though his face in the darkness had the injured, bewildered look of an outraged child, he held the dead man tightly, protectively against his heart. He did not budge an inch from the integrity of his nature. But his love, like a spear driven into the bed of a swollen river, stood up erect and defiant, visible through the driving mist to all such as might come that way, a signpost in the night, a signal, a token, a witness that would at least outlast his own days, even though it did not outlast the Scotch firs on Heron’s Ridge or the linden tree and the cedar tree on the lawn of Ashover House.

THE END

The Inmates (1952)

First published by Macdonald & Co in London in 1952, The Inmates was written and released shortly after Porius: A Romance of the Dark Ages, his final epic instalment in the 'Welsh Novels' series, which had taken Powys considerable time and energy to complete. He composed The Inmates far more quickly than many of his earlier novels and it was published the year before he turned eighty. From the mid 1910's onwards, he was a prolific author, producing many novels, short stories and works of philosophy and literary criticism, including books on Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Dorothy Richardson and François Rabelais. He continued to write and release books until shortly before his death in June 1963 at the age of ninety.

The Inmates is set in a mental institute named Glint Hall and centres on the lives and relationships between the inmates, John Hush and Tenna Sheer. Powys wrote in the prefatory note that the work proffers a 'Philosophy of Demented' and that he attempted to create '… a group of really mad people who have the fantastic and grotesquely humorous extravagance that, after all, is an element in life'. Powys' depiction of madness and the social and political institutions that preside over its definition illuminates the role and use of power in designating what constitutes sanity and insanity. He demonstrates that by categorising certain world views or beliefs as 'mad' and imprisoning those who espouse them, the powerful can maintain their authority and dominance.

THE INMATES
A Novel
JOHN COWPER POWYS
roy sanford

The first edition

CONTENTS

PREFATORY NOTE
1. “CERTIFIED”
2. THE FIRST GLANCE
3. THE FIRST ENCOUNTER
4. FATHER TOBY
5. THE NEXT DAY
6. MR. FROGCASTLE
7. THE TEA-PARTY
8. THE COMMANDER
9. HAMMER AND NAILS
10. THE ZEIT-GEIST
11. HITHER AND THITHER
12. PANTAMOUNT
13. THE POLISHED TABLE
14. MIDSUMMER DAWN
15. “ON ALL FOURS”
16. THE ESCAPE

To Joy Wilkins

in Memoriam

March 25th, 1921

PREFATORY NOTE

I THINK THAT any book or picture or composition of any sort, once out into the world, so to say, produces a different effect on each person who seriously tries to follow it. I certainly do not think that the author of it has any monopoly in its interpretation. In fact, Thomas Hardy, from whom I learnt so much when I saw him in my early twenties, implied once to me that other minds, if sympathetic, of course, could get more out of a work than the author had the faintest idea existed in it. I daresay, too, there are quite lawful reactions totally different from any the author could have imagined.

What I've tried to do in this tale is to invent a group of really mad people who have the fantastic and grotesquely humorous extravagance that, after all, is an element in life. When Dickens gives himself up to enlarging on the monstrous and the macabre in his characters, you don't feel that they become less real. In a sense they become more real. Reality is not equivalent to dullness. It is not equivalent to solemnity. It is not even equivalent to Matthew Arnold's famous Greek word for describing what poetry should be, namely spoudaios, having the highest seriousness, or worthy of one's most serious attention. No! There is something in reality, and not least in the reality of insanity, that is caught on the wing when you are swinging your butterfly-net about in a mood of complete carelessness or even carrying it under some instinctive impulse in a rush of haste. Curiously enough, the Greek Lexicon of Liddell and Scott begins its interpretation of this very "spoudaios" with the words "in haste", suggestive of the eagerness with which we snatch at some particular aspect of reality that hits our fancy. What might indeed be called the "aboriginal levity" of the mother of the muses insists on the recognition of a vein of pure grotesquerie and simple gargoylishness in some of Nature's most natural creations, a vein in the world that made Heine refer on his mattress of death to the "Heavenly Aristophanes There is, indeed, a vein of what might be called "devilish childishness", full of naïve terrors and wild outbursts of ecstatic merriment in many of those among us who are suffering or have suffered from mental derangement; and this humour of the insane has not yet had the aesthetic homage due to it. In my own approach to it and in my imaginary characters in this fantastic book I have no doubt been influenced by my delight, itself almost amounting to a mania, in such figures as Rabelais' "Songe-Creux", who seems to have been a real clown-singer-dancer when the great Italian Renaissance — for this particular vein, sane or insane, has always been recognised in Italy — became popular in France. In Heine's Florentine Nights we get it, and of course it was present, as Rabelais himself recognised, in Villon; and nearer our own day we can trace it in Verlaine. In Poe, also, as I learnt from a hint from Thomas Hardy, there is not a little of it. Among the most moving characters in all literature, one, Don Quixote, is an actual madman and the other, Hamlet, pretends to be mad till he comes within an inch of being really so; while is it not inevitable that an old lecturer-actor like myself, struggling to describe the ghastly levities of insanity, should find that terrific scene in King Lear, where the professionally mad fool and the pretended mad Edgar are hustled by the really mad king into the hovel on the heath, exercising a peculiar influence over his fancy?

To obtain the particular effect required, that is to say some approximate reflection of those frivolous aspects of insanity which the gravity of religion and the inflexible "heavy weather" of both morality and science seek to suppress, I instinctively discovered as I went along that three things were essential if I were to get the required atmosphere: first a simplicity of narrative to compete with the macabre frivolity of the subject, secondly a shameless exploitation wherever possible of my own personal manias, and thirdly a savage avoidance of all the modern psychoanalytical catchwords, whether quasi-popular or pseudo-scientific, as leading us away from the heart of the matter, which is not the cause of the patient's mania but how it feels to himself or herself to suffer from it.

What in fact I am trying to do in this wild book is, if I may so put it, to defend the crazy ideas of mad people — in so far, of course, as they don't run to homicide and cruelty — as against the conventional ideas of sane people. I want to show that between all manner of quite different types of patients in a mental institution there is — when you come to these crazy ones' basic philosophies — sufficient mental agreement to constitute what I would like to have the courage to call the "Philosophy of the Demented". In other words, though these unfortunates differ greatly in their aberrations from one another, they really do possess, if we drain off or skim off those details of their manias which are obviously peculiar to the individual, certain dominant attitudes to life, to nature and to the cosmos, which, though contrary to all the accepted notions of the conventional minds who make up the world's judgment, have a deep abiding philosophic truth. But this "truth", this Philosophy of the Demented, is naturally under the ban of our authorities in Church and State. And being condemned at the top level it is very noticeable that it is anathema to the underlings, whose personal power and glory depend, of course, as they mount up, on the conventional ideas they have at last, after many rungs of the careerist-ladder, come to embody and represent. Incidentally, we may remark how very contrary to the way it was in the Renaissance in Italy, where money to support science and art was provided by reckless and unscrupulous despots, is our method of parliamentary and ministerial support of these things, a support that actually comes of course from the taxes paid by ourselves. Our popular ideas about philosophy and science and art — popular ideas that are now dramatically influenced by the extravagant lengths to which Jung's followers have carried the theory of the Unconscious, a theory that in a hundred years will probably be relinquished as a complete illusion — obviously cannot extend beyond our own intellectual limitations. Thus between the sophisticated experimental processes of our modern doctors' treatment of us when helpless in their hands and our own simple ideas criss-crossed by the catchwords of psychoanalysis, there is a vast gulf, a gulf that grows daily wider and wider. But when we look at modern art it is a different story. Strangely enough, some of the wildest, queerest, weirdest experiments of modern art, though totally obscure and even extremely repulsive to our conventional and popular taste, have a startling affinity with the ideas of the inmates of our asylums. The genius of great artists has always been in their unearthly and startling imaginations allied to madness. And this was true in the past as well as to-day. Thus I find no jarring note when I introduce Rembrandt's "Supper at Emmaus" into Glint. The unearthly fancies of the Philosophy of the Demented fall in naturally with a work of art like this, though they horrify the conventional ideas of ordinary people. In fact, our ordinary ideas have become a queer patchwork of uninspired conventionality criss-crossed by flashes of genius, a patchwork which the desperate truth in the blood of the Philosophy of the Demented naturally struggles to confound. I like to tell myself that one aspect of the Philosophy of the Demented is that daring cosmological theory about a real plurality of worlds; namely the theory of William James that we live in a multiverse rather than a universe. Everyone of my inmates is a symbol of some important aspect of its truth which seems to me especially alien to the schoolmaster-taught conventional mind with its passion for unity and oneness. For instance, the Zeit-Geist is an epitome of those lonely sensations when we feel ourselves to be isolated consciousnesses at some uncertain point in boundless space and time. It is at the emptiness round us all that this mad creature points his horribly wagging finger. The Commander, on the other hand, represents that recurrent struggle of the practical prophet to use the traditional values of our older Services for the purpose of making our political rulers at once wiser and more heroic than we are ourselves. Mr. Pantamount embodies that world-old secret of exultant and humorous self-escape which may have been the secret of the Mysteries of Eleusis and which may even revert to the submerged continents of “Mu” in the Pacific and “Atlantis” in the Atlantic. Echetus is the Homeric name in the Odyssey for that cruel king of some terrible coast whose title was the “Maimer of Men”, just as the impervious head of Glint was a manner of his laboratory dogs. The personage who appears at the end and disposes of the sadistic Gewlie is a Lama from Thibet visiting this country in his escape from the Communists. It is a symbolic rounding off of what might be called the self-escape-philosophy of Mr. Pantamount that the only memorial of their time as inmates of Glint left to remind John and Tenna of their old life as they begin their new is a liberated dog called Mr. Lordy.

1. "CERTIFIED"

IT WAS ON one of the gravel paths of the institution that John Hush said goodbye to the young English statesman and his American betrothed, who at John's own request had not remained with him more than a few minutes after depositing him with the famous Doctor Echetus, the head of the place. He knew fatally well that it was a gravel path where he had said goodbye to them, because when they had driven away he felt that he preferred to stare at a small dandelion plant — flower, stalk, leaves and root — that had been weeded-up that morning and now lay withering in the sun upon that bed of immaculately raked-over little brownish stones rather than meet without a pause the scientific eyes of the well-known doctor. It was, all the same, more with his patron's future fate than with his own that John Hush's mind was occupied when the car drove off at last with the beautiful American and her handsome statesman and he found himself alone with Doctor Echetus.

"A brilliant man!" commented the Doctor admiringly. "May I enquire if you are related to him?"

"Oh no!" cried John hurriedly. "Oh dear no! No, I'm not related to him. He was very kind to my parents and I had an uncle in his service."

"A great gentleman of the old school," went on the Doctor. "You can see it in every movement he makes. You feel it before he utters a word. I think he told me your own parents were dead?"

"Yes," said John, "both of them."

"And that uncle, too, of whom you spoke?"

"Yes, that uncle too."

"You've no relations at all?"

"None at all."

Doctor Echetus was silent, contemplating John with historic rather than scientific interest, as if he were the Last of the Mohicans.

Then he said, as if offering a hobby-horse to a Mohawk, “I expect you’d like to look round a bit before going in?”

“I would indeed, Doctor.”

But John found his mind wandering away over and over again from what the ruler of Glint Hall was showing him. It kept wandering to the wonderful American lady, fabulously beautiful and incredibly rich, whom he himself with his own ears had heard fixing Midsummer Day as the day when she and his guardian should be married. And to-day was only the twenty-fifth of March; so it was a long way off!

But how well he knew — oh, how exactly and in what minute particulars! — all that it meant to this “great gentleman of the old school”, to be married to this woman from the New World!

Wandering as his thoughts were, it did strike John Hush that the grounds of Glint Hall were as well kept as they were extensive and varied. The Doctor led him through lawns and shrubberies and orchards and gardens, all of them enclosed by a high and imposing wall, till they finally reached the great southern gates.

To the left of these gates there ran a small stream which had been allowed to flow under the wall; and John couldn’t help noticing with a certain grim interest that there was a row of enormous and most threatening-looking spikes adhering to the base of the wall and descending into the weeds and mud at the bottom of the flowing water.

On the right of the gates, where the stream was crossed by an ornamental little stone bridge, was a grey-cement lodge built in one of the newest styles of artificial masonry, and to the door of this lodge the Doctor conducted the new inmate.

There was no need to knock or ring, for a tall and extremely angular woman whom John had perceived watching their approach through her parlour window hurried to open the door.

“Good evening, Mrs. Squeeze,” said the Doctor; and there was something in his tone and manner that drew to the two of them the full attention of the new arrival. Exactly what it was that startled him into taking so much notice of this bony but still handsome woman as she confronted his companion, John Hush would have been puzzled to say. One thing this arrest of his attention certainly did; it forced him to throw an analytical glance upon the master of Glint. Until this moment John Hush had experienced a singular reluctance to look at the man who now held him in thrall.

It is true he had had no very pressing need to look at him; in fact he had had no need at all. But now that the Doctor’s personality was confronted by the personality of Betsy Squeeze something in the nature of a crucial dramatic crisis, not merely arresting but actually absorbing, took possession of the stage. Doctor Echetus was a substantially built man of middle height who possessed the sort of countenance that it would have seemed natural to find on the shoulders of an extremely competent manager of a country club. He had a well-trimmed pointed beard, rather small, vague, dreamy, unenthusiastic eyes, and, finally, a mouth that was so much the opposite of a sensual one, or a jealous one, or an emotional one of any kind, that it made you think of a professional cricketer or of the general supervisor of a well-kept public garden.

Betsy Squeeze, on the other hand, in spite of her tall bony frame and long bony face, had the most searching hazel eyes — yellow-grey they might have been called rather than green-grey — that John Hush had ever seen.

The “aura”, as John’s diplomatic guardian would have called it, of deprecatory discomfort which separated the polite Doctor Echetus from this impolite Mrs. Squeeze emanated, John was clever enough to see, from the man.

“The fellow’s scared stiff of her,” he told himself.

“How are you to-day, Mrs. Squeeze?” the doctor murmured.

“How are you?” the woman returned with cheerful unction; and continued rapidly, “I was saying to Mrs. Cuddle only yesterday; ‘It won’t be long,’ I was saying, ‘before you and me, Mrs. Cuddle, will be using the term “His Lordship” when we mention the boss. If ’is ‘ealth ‘olds out,’ I was saying, ‘for only a gentleman of iron,’ I was saying, and Mrs. Cuddle knows I never exsage, ‘could bear the noise them dogs lift up when you be prodding their bowels with that fine teaser of yours what my Bill calls ‘Little Prickly’. We’d ‘ave any gent who weren’t a man of iron like our Doc,’ I was saying, ‘setting up a ‘owl, like a mad dog ‘isself some fine spring night when the moon’s in her ghost-bearing!

“‘Weak women such as us,’ I says to Tamia Cuddle, ‘would have got the Jimimas after a month of them dogs; but Doc’ll go on, you’ll see, our Doc’ll go on till he finds that dog-pearl he’s after, the dog-pearl that’ll bring us all long life and a lordship for him that found it!’”

“Well — well — well — well,” murmured the master of Glint, looking first to the ground below the feet of Mrs. Squeeze and then to the roof above the head of Mrs. Squeeze.

“He’ll be taking notice of me soon,” thought John Hush, “if it’s only to get away!”

But Doctor Echetus’s eyes in their obscure distress seemed to have gone off on a quest of their own. Since Bill Squeeze was not under the mat or on the roof he might be at the back; and it was clearly through the house and out the other side that Doctor Echetus’s blurred, obstinate, unenthusiastic, public-garden eyes had begun to search.

“Is Squeeze in?” he enquired.

“No, sir; no, Doctor Echetus. But I could soon fetch him. He’s bound to be round and about. Fact to God, Doctor, we’ve had a bit of a tell-off, me and Bill, and when Bill got to ‘ollerin’ I told ’im the best ‘ee could do was to take things easy, as you might say, in shed. Bill’s most ‘isself, you might say, in shed, same as I be in kitchen. As it ‘appened, I weren’t in kitchen this particular time; and that’s why I saw you coming. I were in parlour reading the Sunday papers. You’re the one, Doctor, to know what ’tis with me and ’im— ’im being funny and all of that, and me ‘aving me ‘eart. Not that Bill ain’t a good man to me; and I don’t say he’s not a good servant to the Hall, for he is; but he’s funny, and it’s in consideration of that that the Hall gets a good servant cheap, as you’ll be the first to allow, Doctor, though he was took over and me with him, before your time.

"But, as I tell him it's all right to get a job he can do well and please everybody, and a job nobody could get anybody else to do, and he doing it for a sum nobody else — I mean nobody who wasn't I don't know what — would consider for a moment, but it's quite a different thing to go on being funny when you're with the woman you married for better, for worse, and me being that woman, if you see what I mean, Doctor Echetus — quite a different thing it is! And when you consider, Doctor Echetus, how Bill's way of being funny is not only to go on talking about what passes through his mind — not that I'd trouble about that; for he thinks sillier thoughts than I've ever known a man to think, and I've known many — but about all he sees and hears up at Hall in his day's work; and when you consider what I do for him in house and all that and how days go by without my seeing my friend Mrs. Cuddle or hearing one word of what's going on up at Hall or whether you've took in anyone" — here Betsy shot a quick glance at John Hush— "who's been in the Sunday papers — not, I say, to talk to me of what he hears and sees up at Hall, but to talk to a wooden image he keeps in his pocket, when you consider all this, Doctor Echetus, is it any wonder—"

But the Doctor had by this time gathered together all the conglomerate substance of his personality, all the praetorian cement of his position, all the sandbags of his prestige and all the tenon'd and mortised concrete of his discretion, and he now proceeded to make a firm but benignant motion with the little finger of his left hand.

"Well, Mrs. Squeeze," he announced quietly, "I don't think I'll trouble your husband to-night. We all gain, you know, by what he does with his axe in that shed of his. My fires as well as yours, Mrs. Squeeze, depend on that axe. I know well how these little peculiarities of our good Bill can be very trying sometimes. I find them so myself now and again. But we must be patient, we must be patient. But tell him, won't you, that I'd like to see him the first thing to-morrow. No, no, I won't stay now. Good evening, Mrs. Squeeze. This way, Mr. Hush!"

But as the absent-minded young man followed this new master of his fate, this lord of destiny whom he had just watched dodging, evading, propitiating and not without difficulty escaping a somewhat dilapidated specimen of the classical Erinyes, he did his utmost to bring his attention to bear upon what was happening to himself. But there it was! Even as he dragged his steps after his guide and followed him through one kitchen-garden after another, along interminable gravel-paths under the ever-present prison-wall, till they reached the man's official residence with the monstrous annex, joined to it by a passage, where he kept his dogs, Hush still moved mechanically as if his guardian and the beautiful American had carried his soul away in the luggage-box of their smooth-running car.

It wasn't, indeed, till Doctor Echetus had led him around the whole circle of the place and they had followed for several hundred yards the barbed-wire fence that railed off an extensive plantation of young spruce-firs on Glint Hall's northern side, and shut away this forestry department from the stables and sheds and barns and the big cobblestone yard where the agricultural activities of the establishment were concentrated, that his attention was arrested by a sound that he knew perfectly well was the usual indignant cry of a blackbird angry at being disturbed in some remote part of the plantation where it was already hovering about its mate and her nest.

Since, however, Echetus had just led his new inmate past the main entrance to the research laboratory, where those experiments on living dogs were carried on that Betsy Squeeze regarded as a scientist's shortest cut to the peerage, the Doctor evidently mistook that blackbird's scream of anger for a dog's howl of pain, and with the hurried exclamation: "Excuse me, Mr. Hush, I must see into this!" he disentangled a piece of wire from a small gate, pushed it open, and hurried down a grassy path between immature spruce-firs.

John replaced the wire as neatly as he could and followed at the Doctor's heels. He was still so absorbed in a mental pursuit of his guardian and the American girl that the colours of this path, especially a particular shade of trampled earth that resembled dried blood, though they had a vaguely troubling effect upon him, hardly roused his full awareness. Indeed, until this moment his whole consciousness had been so absorbed in the emotional strain of his separation from his friends and in the deep interior effort he was making to accept this separation in every one of its implications that his own consignment to Glint

Hall had scarcely begun to impinge upon his mind; nor had the impressions so far made on him by the place begun as yet to take any definite shape.

His spirit was still trying to follow his youthful patron and his patron's betrothed, trying to imagine what the two of them were feeling as they arrived at their friend's abode, known locally as Halfway House; but there was something about this path quite apart from that bird's cry that was beginning now to bring him back to the immediate responses of his own nerves.

But while the bird's violent protests against disturbance died away in the distance, a much more intimate skin, so to speak, of his consciousness was now torn away as, at the heels of the Doctor, he suddenly found himself confronted by a horrible hole in the ground. It was clean in the centre of this blood-coloured path; and it was in a small clearing among some of the thickest-foliaged spruce-firs John had ever seen.

It was out of this hole that the Doctor had evidently fancied in his ignorance of birds' cries that the sound they'd heard proceeded. One of his assistants, the Doctor supposed, must have thrown a yet living dog to perish among the dead. For a dog's face did meet John's stare as he gazed down into that hole, and a dog's eyes answered his stare with a look of such unutterable loneliness under the infliction of pain that it revealed to him as a reality in the world what he had hitherto only ventured to approach in the imagination of exasperated nerves.

When the Doctor moved away and hurried back to the little gate in the fence, with himself following like a human dog, he began instinctively trying to cleanse his mind from the horrors suggested by that expression in the creature's eyes. And this he tried to do by plunging his own face into the foliage of those dusky-green spruce-firs; nor was the gesture an imaginary one, for he did quite deliberately let some of the lower branches of these sweet-smelling boughs flap against his mouth, brush against his forehead, and sting his half-shut eyelids.

Doctor Echetus seemed to recognise that this slight debouching to his dog-pit among the fir trees had disturbed the mental absorption of his new patient, for as they crossed the cobblestones of Glint Hall's extensive farmyard he took the opportunity to enlighten him a little about Betsy's husband.

"That fellow's an extraordinary case," he told him. "None of us have ever known a case like it before. It's a form of what I have come to describe in my case-book as perverse doll-fetishism; by which I mean the natural desire of young females for dolls perversely camouflaged in a mature male as a mystical idolatry of the inanimate. The relation between the human tendency to idol-worship inherited by us all, and the attraction of certain animals towards certain inanimate objects, is of greater importance than has yet been grasped. Where William Squeeze's case is a singular one is that he introduces into this perverse doll-mania a curious element of paranoiac superiority.

"What Squeeze does is indeed rather singular. He inflates the importance of his personality by conversing with this doll-image of his, which, if you please, he carved for himself out of wood; carved it roughly, you understand, in the shape of a classical head surmounting a six-inch pedestal.

"One of my former patients — he's dead now — was an authority on Greek philosophy, and in looking after him our friend Squeeze picked up quite a few tags from the ideas of Heraclitus, whose name, for some cause deserving further study, must have arrested his attention. As no doubt you must have observed, that tiresome wife of his, with her vulgar and ridiculous ways, is the chief reason why his cure is so delayed; though I am not ashamed to admit that we shall all be rather sorry when he is cured, for his case is a fascinating one and full of importance for all students of insanity.

"You know, I felt pretty sure as we listened just now to that tiresome woman that Squeeze wasn't in his shed at all! If he had been I'm sure we should have heard his axe. My own belief is that you'll find him in the reading-room, the place of all places about which I have taken the most trouble! If you do see him there, my advice to you would be to say nothing of our visit to his lodge. Well! I see we've been seen from our other lodge, the one occupied by the best servant I possess here, the devoted Cuddle, whose good lady, unlike our friend Betsy, is more active with her hands than with her tongue! Yes, Cogent, yes indeed; I certainly think—"

Doctor Echetus was now addressing himself to a short but extremely broad-shouldered individual who, appearing to John as if he had forced his way through a dense undergrowth of spruce-firs from a hole that led straight to Hell, now filled a space where previously there had been nothing.

"I certainly think, Cogent, that you should see Doctor Splitting if he comes at the usual hour tomorrow. But I must be leaving you both now. I need my tea; and my tea, ha! ha I needs me! We'll soon be meeting again, Mr. Hush, soon be meeting again! I leave you in good hands. Cuddle will take you to the reading-room. Yes, Mr. Hush is our new inmate and he wants to rest in the reading-room until tea-time. Will you take him there, Cuddle?"

Remaining perfectly motionless for half a minute, just as if he had been watching the retreating backs of his own words, "until tea-time, Cuddle", flick the dust from their skirts and go mincing off across the yard, the master of Glint turned his back upon them and hurried away.

Thus left to themselves the new inmate looked at the keeper, and the keeper looked at the new inmate; and an instantaneous electric-magnetic current of hostility, far subtler and deeper because on more equal terms than that between weasel and rabbit, passed from the nerve-centre of this official to the nerve-centre of this patient.

"Have you made any arrangements yet, Mr. Hush," were the first words that passed between these two antipodal human organisms, "with regard to your washing?"

"Why no! I can't say I have as yet. Isn't that sort of thing taken care of here? I mean, isn't there a — isn't there a laundry?" But even as he uttered these words there came over the newcomer a vision of himself setting out from those vast lodge-gates along a winding lane with his dirty clothes tied in a bundle and held up by a stick resting first on one shoulder and then on the other, and a parallel vision of himself returning later with quite a different bundle, smelling beautifully of soap, and wrapped around in a vast spotlessly white Mother-Hubbard's apron.

But the best of all the possible servants that Doctor Echetus could imagine interrupted these wandering thoughts.

“There’s a laundry, of course, for public patients; but we find that when gentlefolk like yourself come here they usually want to make their own arrangements. I only spoke because I know how pleased Mrs. Cuddle would be to do for you, and not only to do for you, if you know what I mean — but to have the pleasure of meeting a young gentleman like yourself and — perhaps — you never can be sure — finding she can help you in other little ways. Many’s the time I’ve heard my wife say: ‘It’s wonderful, considering everything, what a woman can do for a well-spoken young gentleman who’s really grateful for her help!’ But I see Mrs. Cuddle is halfclosing already. We are half-closing, you understand, at a quarter to five, and full-closing at a quarter past six. It’s a custom of old standing, I believe. Maybe it’s a good custom; maybe it’s a bad one. They say, ‘to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams’. But it’s not that we’ve got to consider now. We’ve got to consider now whether you would like Mrs. Cuddle to do your washing. And towards your decision on this point I can contribute an important, some people might even call it a decisive, argument: Mrs. Cuddle would like to do your washing.” And then without any pause: “I am telling our new young gentleman here, Tamia, that you’d be willing to attend to his mending and do his washing as long as he’s with us. That’s quite correct, isn’t it?”

What John Hush felt at that moment was pure and simple astonishment, the cause of which was as simple as the feeling; for if there was one art in which Mr. Cogent Cuddle excelled it was the art that in modern fiction is known as “shepherding”, and so skilfully had he practised this art on the new inmate that when the plump, active, girlish-complexioned, flaxen-haired woman, evidently a good deal younger than her husband, turned round from the half-closed gates, John felt a surprise that was by no means disagreeable.

It was a peculiarity of John’s consciousness that it possessed the power of reducing its mental landscape to so small a size or perhaps it would be better to say of reducing its field of vision to so small a size, that when one image occupied this inner space it became like a figure in a doorway entirely blocking the entrance, and making it necessary for any newly arriving thought or image to pass clean through the first if it, too, were to take its place in this exclusive enclosure. Thus it happened that just as a few minutes earlier the figures of his guardian and his guardian's girl had to endure the passing through them, in the entrance to his mental landscape, of a lot of scratching, scraping, brushing and stinging spruce-boughs and of a dog's face staring out of a horrible pit, so the kindly form of Mrs. Cogent Cuddle now had to glide into view through those boughs and across that hole in the ground. And it, moreover, turned out that this woman's face, once established in his field of vision, reminded him most strangely of his old nurse Maria, the only woman in his life, till he met his patron's American girl, whose personality he could enjoy without any physical, emotional, or nervous disturbance.

"You heard me call Mrs. C. 'Tamia' just now," the man remarked a few minutes later, after he had indicated to John how to get to the reading-room through the back of Glint, "but you don't have no notion, do you, what 'Tamia' stands for?"

It was extraordinary how disturbing it was to John's newfound comfort in meeting someone so like his old nurse to have his ignorance of what Tamia "stood for" thus emphasised by Tamia's husband. "If I could only think of it! If I could only... If I could only..." And it came into his head how he had read in some book that the way to compel spirits to obey you was to know their names. And suddenly he did know! Clearly and for certain he knew. "Her name," he thought, "is Mesopotamia"; and instantaneously he decided that he would conceal from Cogent Cuddle that he knew his wife's name, just as he would conceal from him that she reminded him of Maria Blackthorn, who had been his nurse from infancy to the age of five. "She's too good for him! She's too good for him! She's too good for him!" he thought. "No, Mr. Cuddle," he said, "I haven't the faintest idea! But I think 'Tamia' is a very suitable name. It's a pretty name, too. It sounds like Spenser's name for the Thames!" Oh, he was off now — doing what he delighted in doing — teasing, that is to say, a dedicated enemy! But as Cogent Cuddle, after giving him at the door of the reading-room a puzzled, suspicious, faintly bewildered, but also a shrewd and cunning look, the sort of look a cat might give a dog whom it left guarding its pet rat-hole, turned his back on the building to rejoin his lady in the north lodge, he caught a glimpse of himself in a mirror.

He was more than satisfied with the manner in which this mirror reflected him; and he paused for a second to indulge this satisfaction. The mask he beheld was mostly composed of brow, eyes and chin; for his human lips had so constantly been withdrawn into his mouth in the process of controlling some natural emotion that they looked as if — were the necessity for the mastery of all feeling by pure will kept up for a few years longer — they might dissolve away entirely. Meanwhile his forehead was straight; his nose was straight; his chin was straight; and even his soul, putting aside its more intimate connection with these physical manifestations of his personality, might also, according to the strictest Euclidean definition of a "line", have been called straight. It was certainly basically, ultimately, and fundamentally so; though around and above this final "straightness", in which culminated Cogent Cuddle's residual and over-all purpose in life, there ran a twisted and complicated network of devious indirections, which made up the various crooked means by which this purpose was pursued.

Contrary to the human weakness of Bill Squeeze, whose temperamental anarchism could only be ruffled into action by the force that roused it and was alone capable of routing it, namely the tongue of Betsy his wife, Cogent Cuddle had succeeded in so completely depersonalising the ideal idol of world-communism that he never permitted himself even to think of it as anything but It. He himself had been converted in a public museum and it was only when It decided that the best way he could serve It was by converting to its service some famous champion of vivisection that he married Tamia, left his arrow-heads of flint, and came to Glint Hall, first to be cured of an imaginary aberration, and then to devote himself with implacable fidelity to the tremendous task, difficult but by no means impossible, of converting half the attendants at this asylum, and, if destiny so decided, the great Doctor Echetus himself.

2. THE FIRST GLANCE

"ESCAPE FOR THE certified!" thought John Hush as he entered the reading-room and looked round the books.

"'Isles of the Blest' for the inmates!"

The door by which he had entered faced a large window in the further side of this spacious room surrounded by bookshelves, a window through which the afternoon sunshine, floating between the still leafless branches and scarcely budding twigs of a tall tulip-tree, now fell with a palpable warmth full on his face. Towards this window he promptly directed his steps.

Very curious are the impressions that reach us when we enter any sort of a room for the first time. Not only are we confronted by the "aura" of the bodies and souls of those who habitually frequent it, but something quite different from any human atmosphere makes its impact upon us, namely the combined emanations from the pieces of furniture that have been longest in the room.

But John Hush, as he threaded his way between the chairs and tables with the intention of reaching the window, was now confronted by something beyond the room's human atmosphere, and beyond the impalpable emanations proceeding from such inanimate things in the room as had their own private histories.

He was confronted by a vibration of intense and concentrated curiosity, a vibration of surprise, of wonder, of a will to guard, to steer, to warn, to protect; but of this confrontation, and of the impalpable opposition it offered to his movement towards the window, he was entirely unaware. The personage who projected it, though Hush could have seen him, and indeed had actually been warned of his probable presence here by Echetus himself, was none other than Betsy's husband, the incorrigible Bill Squeeze, whose case, as the Doctor had explained to John, was so extremely interesting that it had become advisable to delay its cure. Bill Squeeze, as he now stared with this spell-binding intensity upon John's wavering progress towards the window, offered to such intelligences as might have been in a position to observe it a countenance that in all essentials was the direct opposite to that of Cogent Cuddle. For just as the husband of Tamia and keeper of the north gate of Glint was a perfect example of Spenser's mystic dogma that soul is form and doth the body make; his countenance being entirely composed of the straight lines of predetermined conviction, Betsy's Bill had a visage literally composed of the rounded curves of arbitrary, whimsical and humorous caprices. His nose was as shapeless as a fungus on a willow-stump. His forehead projected over his nose like a wooden roller about to flatten out the dough of a pancake.

At the same time anyone watching him with as careful a scrutiny as he was bestowing on John Hush might have noticed in the fathomless curiosity of his eyes and in the incorrigible fantasies of his lowering forehead a resemblance to a well-known explorer contemplating an ensorcerised aboriginal of Central Africa.

The attention he was directing at John, however, struck its object without attracting that object's notice, while the interest of two other persons, by reason of their being directly between him and the window, could neither be by-passed unobserved nor glanced at and disregarded. Each of these two inmates, a man and a woman, must have experienced a certain unwillingness to stroll about the gardens of Glint Hall on this particular afternoon of the twenty-fifth of March in the present year. Their unwillingness, however, must have sprung from very different causes; for these two persons were almost as different from each other as were Cuddle and Squeeze.

John could easily imagine two reasons, all the same, for this man and this woman preferring to remain in this quiet place in spite of an afternoon of sunshine, reasons which it is quite conceivable did influence them both. The first of these may have quite naturally been, our friend told himself, a wish not to be accosted by, or even looked at, by any fellow-inmate; while the second may very well have been an insupportable distaste for, and an infinite weariness of, everything that this end-of-March sunshine could possibly reveal in the grounds of Glint Hall — a weariness of every flowerbed, of every shrubbery, of every rock-garden, of every lawn, of every fruit tree, of every iron post in every stretch of the iron railings that separated the gravel paths from the grassy pastures.

Other reasons, no doubt, this man and this woman may have had for remaining in the reading-room on so sunny a twenty-fifth of March, but if they were wearied, as is quite possible, even of the very meadows of the institution, even of the sleek cattle that grazed in those meadows, it is also possible that such weariness extended even as far as the half a dozen wise old rooks who were generally to be seen lurching from side to side and jerking themselves forward across those pastures with the peculiar movements of winged creatures whom necessity has induced or compelled to walk instead of flying.

To reach the window our friend had to pass quite close to these ungregarious persons, and he forced himself to do so. The man was the first who was in his path; and he decided to pass him with a friendly nod as if he were a nameless tavern-acquaintance. The man was an extremely tall lean man with a very long neck on which rested, or rather from which hung, a head of such massive proportions that it looked as if it had belonged to some formidable broad-shouldered dwarf who had compelled this feeble-necked giant to exchange skulls with him.

What this dwarf-giant saw when John approached him was a gaunt, dark-haired, hollow-eyed, curly-headed individual who certainly looked — though as a matter of fact John had never acted in a play in his life — as if he had just stepped down from the stage of a provincial collegiate theatre where he had been rehearsing the part of the melancholy Jacques.

John was indeed on the point of greeting this dwarf-giant in a carelessly-natural and unselfconsciously-easy voice when he became aware that the fellow had fixed upon him a look of shocking penetration, a look that seemed to say: “I know exactly who you are. Your friends may have kept your case out of the Sunday papers, but I know it perfectly well and so does everybody else in here!”

Hurriedly switching off, therefore, the greeting he was on the verge of uttering, John hastened forward. Nor did he make any attempt to catch the eye of the other person in his path; for he told himself that if a male fellow-inmate could see through him at the first glance, what might not a female one be able to do? He felt sure she was trembling with shameless curiosity, though as yet she had not lifted up, far less turned upon him, the lorgnette she was clasping so tightly on her black silk lap.

But it came to Hush as he glanced quickly at her that her purpose in carrying this thing was less in order to perceive obscure objects more clearly herself than to tap the knuckles of such unfortunates as might be unable to see what Providence had decided to reveal to her.

But he was at the window now, an excellently large window, and from it he could see, for it was on the first floor, the whole wide expanse of the gardens and meadows and walks and shrubberies on the southern side of the institution. There was hardly more than an air-gulf of ten yards between the window at which he now stood and the top branches of the nobly-grown tulip-tree.

Nor was this all; for extended on the grass beneath the tree and thus within the space of some twenty yards of the window-pane through which he was now excitedly staring, there lay a young woman the like of whom he had never seen in all the days of his life. And, now that he had caught sight of this girl under the tulip-tree, what had previously been the merest chance for Bill Squeeze became a certainty, the certainty that balanced on the lowest step but one of the reading-room step-ladder he would be able to watch the new inmate without being watched himself and able also to point him out to the personage he carried in his pocket.

“So that’s the new bloke, is it?” he murmured as he contemplated with equanimity the nervously apprehensive actorlike individual with the decadent Roman nose, protruding upper lip and small deep-sunken grey eyes, who was standing like a mesmerised ghost at the reading-room window.

"He's watching Tenna Sheer. That's what he's doing! No, no, it's no use thinking you're invisible, young gent, for us do know all your little ways, don't us, Heraclitus?"

Bill was muttering all this in an audible voice; but the man and woman were so used to his mutterings that they took no notice of him; and John, after one hurried glance at him in which he realised who he was, gave himself up again to the girl under the tree. Bill now thrust his hand into the side pocket of his official jacket and brought cautiously and gently to the orifice of that spacious receptacle a small image of the weeping philosopher. This image he proceeded, with the most delicate and considerate nicety, to raise just high enough for its wide-open, staring, unblinking eyes to get a good glimpse of the man at the window. Then again he recommenced his mutterings. But John Hush, having once realised who he was, did not turn his head again to give him and his philosopher a second look.

"Up to his tricks, ain't he, Heraclitus? But he can't fool us, can he, old sport? For what you dunno, I know, and what I dunno you know! Yes, she's there all right, ain't she, my wise one? Sitting under the tulip-tree she is, reading her book, and all the others afeered to go near her! What frights them so about that little girl, Heraclitus? That's what I want to know. She never talks back to none o' the lot; and when she does say anything, 'tis ever gentle and low, like Shakespeare says gals' voices should be! I don't say 'tis a warm-'earted voice, Heraclitus, old sport, and I don't say it's a neighbourly or a frolicsome voice. And yet, when you consider it, Heraclitus, you couldn't call it an icicle-proud voice. But whatever it is about that gal's voice, old tuppenny, it sure does give our poor little flock of natural lunies the tigly-wiglies. But what you can't tell me, Heraclitus" — and it was at this point that the husband of Betsy Squeeze decided that the moment had come for him to go home to tea— "is what it is that Mr. Hush finds so choosie-woosie, goosie-poosie, loosie-toosie, floosie-soosie about Missy Sheer. That's the mystery us has got to tackle, old sport, so don't jump the barriers or rush to conclusions.

"You may be a hell of a philosopher, Heraclitus, but I'm not going to have any bloody endings in this here tub of Diogenes, alias the old game-bag, alias Lizzie's temptation, alias the black hole of Glint. So be content with the peep into high life giv'd yer by Jupiter Squeeze. But home's the word, my hearty; so let's repeat the musical chairs — I mean prayers — we composed the last time we sat on the steps of Parnassus. So good night, lords and ladies, and don't forget God and his prophet."

And with a glance at the back of the man at the window and an affectionate pat to his own left-hand pocket Bill went off. An onlooker would certainly have been induced to feel that the wavering channel of destiny and the fluttering trail of fate and the indecipherably scrawled map of chance, not to mention the sealed orders of necessity, were worthy of John's simplest and purest gratitude, if only for the fact that they had given him an extremely long-sighted pair of eyes.

A less clear vision would have missed half of the effect of the old-fashioned navy-blue dress, the plain black stockings, the filmy, straight, but rather rumpled and badly-combed hair of a subtle shade of brown that hovered between sepia and burnt-sienna, the nose that was slightly too aquiline for the pale oval face but went beautifully with the indescribably subtle curves of the girl's lips.

It was the general impression of all these, carried through the air from the grass to the window, just as if the flickering sunshine reaching out through the still leafless tulip-tree were a deviously designing artist, using that soft south-blowing air to create out of some unknown atmospheric element the perfect ideal, realised at last, of John Hush's life-long longing. He could see with a telepathic clarity all the appalling sensitiveness those rare curves implied.

So quickly would they be distorted that the very secret of their beauty lay in the strange prophetic quiver of agitation that stirred in them, like the wind in budding ash-tree leaves before there was any apparent troubling of the air. Tenna Sheer's chin struck him as so frail in its modelling that it seemed as devoid of the ordinary obstinacy of human self-assertion as a drooping currant moth; while her ears seemed to him like those of an exiled elf that has been blown on the wind from an island "where every sound gives delight and hurts not", to an island 'where but to hear is to be full of sorrow and leaden-eyed despairs".

Frozen into a motionlessness that was like an icicle on the edge of Acheron, John Hush, as he stared through the shut window, felt that the prostrate form beneath that tulip-tree enshrined so absolutely the essence of all the maddening femininity he craved in his distraught idolatry, that all ordinary women, all ordinary beautiful women, struck him at this moment as belonging to a different sex altogether.

This enchanted creature struck him, in fact, as just as much more sensitive than ordinary women, as ordinary women were more sensitive than men. What in fact John Hush beheld with his long-sighted eyes was what old mediæval learning called an "Elemental", and probably in this case would have been further defined as a creature of the air rather than of the earth or of the water or of the great zodiacal bodies of heavenly fire. For though it was certainly upon the earth that this ariel was now outstretched, Hush felt that no earth-magic could keep her there long.

Standing erect at that closed windowpane — for though the afternoon was exceptionally warm for the end of March it appeared to be taken for granted by the authorities that the inmates of a home like this would rather have their reading-room windows shut than open — John Hush thought, with the rational assurance of a man who has tried to regulate certain features of life according to his romantic wishes and has not always been aware of the ill-adjustment of these attempts to practical necessity, "I must go down to her at once."

Following this impulse, he moved towards the door, giving the dwarf-headed giant a wide berth, and glancing at the lady with the lorgnette as if she were less than the arm of the chair she sat in, in fact as if she were a certain nick in the woodwork of that arm that had been caused by an unskilled furniture-mover when it was first brought to Glint Hall. He tried as he went to visualise the girl under the tulip-tree as she would be when awake and sitting up or standing up; and he continued this process of mental visualisation down the main staircase, stepping aside to let little groups of inmates pass as they went up. Through the main entrance-hall he continued it and out of the front-door, where again he had to step aside to let people enter; but by the time he reached the grass between the circle of gravel in front of the entrance and the tulip-tree, his mental vision was abruptly broken up by the sound of the bugle within the building and the sight of the girl herself crossing the grass towards him.

"Damn!" muttered John Hush with as much personally directed fury towards the jumble of large destinies and small accidents that had occasioned this mischance as if they had been embodied in the person of some preposterous rival. He opened his mouth as she passed him, but not a word could he utter; and if the mental vision of her by which he'd been obsessed had reduced the dwarf-headed giant to the nothingness of a blur and the lady with the lorgnette to the negligibility of a nitch, the way Tenna Sheer now hurried past him with her head bent low so as to see nobody and her fingers fumbling in the pages of that curst book blotted out the whole of the mental landscape that made such a vision possible.

"Swithold footed thrice the old!" was the blighted jingle that accompanied in John Hush's furious fancy the dying notes of that tea-time bugle, as he swung round to follow her across the gravel and into the hall and up the staircase. He suddenly felt a compulsion to tune his steps, and, indeed, to regulate every physical movement he made to some sort of rhyming tag.

"Follow her out," he murmured to himself as he went to the men's lavatory, "and follow her in; to follow a woman is no sin!" But later, when he discovered that the male inmates had their meals at one long table in the dining-hall and the female inmates at another long table in the same dining-room, his rhyming vein deserted him and his one desire was to find a seat from which he could see at least the back of Miss Sheer.

With a gasp of content he found one from which her face was visible. With this privilege in his possession, it was almost mechanically that he drank his first two cups of tea, though it did cross the threshold of his attention that both the attendants who carried round the tea and the attendants who followed with the milk and sugar spoke nicely if not respectfully to him and let him have as many lumps of sugar as he wanted.

Chance had so arranged it that when John's head retained its normal position as he drank his tea he could just detect the shadowy curve of Miss Sheer's small white chin between or above or below the various opaque obstacles, organic and inorganic, which intervened; and not only so, but chance had also arranged that one of those mysterious shafts of light that so often break up the symmetry of a large apartment and do so in a manner for which a considerable experience of place and time alone can account, was now flickering, full of floating dust-motes that seemed to him like tiny magnetic whirlpools of occult affinity, between the arms and shoulders and sleeves and lifted cups surrounding that white chin, which in itself was worthy of any of those exquisite modellers of virginal-angelic chins in the studio of Leonardo, and a plate of brown bread-and-butter on John's own table into which that shaft of light sank and dissolved.

Towards this plate, upon which there remained only one last piece, John now stretched out his arm. But a youth at his side, and it had already struck him that there was only one grey head to be seen among the men seated round this long table, eagerly, almost passionately, forestalled him, snatching it up and swallowing it in a couple of ravenous spasms.

"Touch down!" chuckled this playful competitor, turning upon him a bland and serene smile. "All's fair in love and war! Besides, if your dad had seen as much as my dad's seen, and sailed the seas as long, and drunk rum with as many one-eyed admirals and as many fathom-deep pirates and as many lights-burning-bright-sir able seamen, north, south, east, west of Rotterdam, and east and west of Cape Horn, you'd have learnt, as I've learnt, the truth of that great saying of the king of the Cannibal Islands: 'For women and bread a man gives his head.'"

At this point Hush was aware of the turning towards them of a good many indignant countenances round that table, and aware, too, of the similarity of the expression written in marked language upon these faces. This was an expression not unlike what would have appeared on the faces of a group of boys on their first night back at school had one of their number, breaking an unwritten law, begun bragging of his exploits in his native village.

John was likewise aware of a coming together, behind himself and the excited speaker, of at least four of the sturdy-masculine attendants, two of whom were purveyors of tea and two distributors of milk and sugar. But John's mind, full of one matter only, and burning to make friends with his youthful neighbour purely with a view to gaining more light upon this one matter, completely disregarded these omens.

"And what," he innocently enquired, "has the wind at Cape Horn to do with your taking the last piece of brown bread?"

But in place of replying to this academic question, the son of the great seaman threw upon him a reproachful and upbraiding look and with anything but a genial "Excuse me", rose from the table and, with the assistance of the four attendants, stepped over the wooden form they were sitting on, and with haughty and silent submission allowed himself to be led out of the hall.

"You see, sir," murmured his neighbour on the other side, leaning closer to John than John found agreeable, since the fellow's clothes reeked of some peculiarly pungent disinfectant, "you see, he thinks his father was the Flying Dutchman!"

Evidently satisfied that the incident had passed without raising a disturbance, the attendants were now carrying round more tea and more milk and sugar; but John noticed that no other plate of brown bread-and-butter appeared to replace the one devoured so rapidly by the son of the Flying Dutchman.

But the white bread-and-butter was still there, and since the tea and the sugar seemed both inexhaustible, and he had eaten nothing since breakfast, our friend, though still hardly realising what he was doing, began to swallow slice after slice.

But all the while he was telling himself: "I'll sit here till she goes. I'll sit here till she goes; and then I'll go, and I'll speak to her outside!"

There had, indeed, been certain shiftings and readjustings and unsettlings that now enabled him, though the shaft of light had faded, to get a clearer view of that small oval face, aquiline nose, and perfect mouth and chin. She had seated herself, as it happened, next to the lady with the lorgnette, and now that several inmates from both tables had left the dining-hall it became clear that the lorgnette-carrier was concentrating on her fragile companion. The girl's head was bent over her plate, and as far as John could make out she was swallowing her white bread-and-butter as dreamily and absent-mindedly and with the same lack of any consciousness of the pleasure of taste as he was doing himself.

It was clear that though the lorgnette lady was addressing her with a continuous stream of low-voiced talk, her response was wordless. It was, indeed, confined to a few barely perceptible nods. At this point John Hush decided to be bold. A natural instinct, however, like that of a wild animal suddenly introduced into a concentration camp of circus animals, caused him to keep a wary eye on the attendants and to make no move till they were absorbed in a lively chat together near the door of the hall. Then without turning his head as he spoke, and, as far as appearance went, murmuring his words like a ventriloquist, he appealed to the man who reeked of disinfectant.

“Are we,” he enquired at large, “allowed to talk to each other at meal-time?”

As the man began replying to this question he did turn his head towards him just a little; but he noticed with relief that the stranger from whose person, unless they crowded up much closer on their common bench, he was divided, and glad to be divided, by a considerable gap, followed, no doubt quite deliberately similar tactics.

“Yes,” the man replied, in a cautious and abstracted tone, addressing the backs of the women at the other table. “Yes, we’re allowed to talk as much as we like as long as we avoid the facts of life.”

“The facts of life?” echoed our friend vaguely; but his imagination had begun to call up several very curious memories that explained a good deal of what he now saw around him.

“I mean,” the other went on, “real life, life that’s the opposite of all the fables and fairy-tales and fancies and all the silly escapes, in which the people who shut us up here love to indulge.”

He was speaking so low now that John had some difficulty, with his head in its present position, in hearing him at all; and he knew by their voices, too, that the attendants, though still chatting cheerfully, were no longer in a group at the door.

“You mean,” said John, “that we mustn’t talk of anything that’s important. But just tell me one thing, if you don’t mind.”

"You mustn't ask me," murmured the other, with scarcely a movement of his lips, "whether the stuff is stronger to-day or whether I still smell It through the stuff."

"Do you," whispered the cunning John, breathing his words as if the backs at the other table had been the wall of a fives court, "do you still smell It?"

"Hush!" returned the other. "Hush!"

"Hush is my name, you know," whispered John, "so it's easy to hush!"

"Pardon me," protested the disinfected one, "I'm afraid I don't follow."

"Hush is my name. My father was Thomas Hush and I am John Hush."

The utterance of this simple information gave John courage, and he turned his head far enough round to enable him to see that the speaker was a pitifully humble and a pitifully inconspicuous little man with sandy hair and large ears.

"May I use your name," enquired the little man, "when they don't put enough stuff on my clothes?"

Still dominated by his one sole purpose of learning more about Miss Sheer, John replied in his friendliest voice, "Of course! I'd be proud for you to use it! Do you find they take advantage of yours? Or have you turned against it? I won't ask you what it is."

The other leaned forward. "When I smell It," he whispered in an awestruck voice, "I become nothing but It; and the worst of it is, they have to put more on my clothes every day. Did you say you were interested in rock gardens?"

This last sentence was spoken in a tone our friend had no difficulty in recognising. It was the tone of a boy who substitutes "Cato" for "catapult" when he becomes aware that the master is listening. But John experienced a thrill of crafty satisfaction. He had, it would appear, by means of all this selfish sympathy, made a friend already.

"What's that girl's name," he boldly enquired, though he knew perfectly well an attendant was already just behind them, "who is sitting next the woman who's got that eye-glass thing with a long handle?"

"That one? Oh, that's Tenna Sheer! She's been here a couple of years. She tried to kill her own dad, she did. That's what got her in here. It was only her dad being mayor of somewhere and swearing to be responsible for her that saved her from prison. And then a year ago she went for old Rumpibus with a door-scraper. He's got the scar still, and you can see it from here. He's descended from the great Doctor Rumpibus. He's the grey-haired one over there. He's a decent sort of gent and never holds it against her. I don't know him very well. He talks to everybody. He's not a bit scared of Miss Sheer. He gives her the time of day like everybody else. Jesus! If I had one grey hair I'd be fearful of being alone in a room with her! Tried to kill her own dad, she did, and he a great arch-builder and a 'sir' in his own right. And only a year ago it was that she went for old Rumpibus. You know why he's in here, I expect, Mr. Hush? He's in here because he thinks he's God. It's because we say 'Our Father' that she went for him. It's wonderful, when you come really to think about it, mister, that there should be such a lot of people in the world who can't abide their own father and their own mother. That's what I always say. If love's wonderful, hate's wonderful, too, for there isn't a person who doesn't know that if love is heads, tails is hate. People aren't as thankful for being alive and for having mothers and fathers as anyone might think.

"In our gents' lavatory there used to be — they've whited it out now — a sort of music-hall song spelled out on the wall above the third seat all about Tenna Sheer; and in this same song I'm telling you of, Sheer was made to rhyme with beer."

At this moment the disinfected one bent his back and changed his tone. "She is just like you, I expect, interested in rock gardens. No, you mustn't mind their not letting us talk seriously at meals. There is a purpose in it, no doubt, beyond playing the giddy goat with us. I can't see it myself. It seems just silly to me, but people are clever nowadays, and I don't know no think myself. You've just come, mister, I expect? Certified, I suppose. Don't take it amiss that I say so, mister, will you? There's those here, you know, who aren't and never never can be. 'Tisn't lawful to certify in all conditions. But if you ain't had it done, the visiting specialist won't need to look you over. It's the certified alone they're interested in. To un-certify a certified — that's something worth talking about! It's about that the newspaper men come here; six at a time I've seen 'em come, Mister 'Ush. But, as I was saying," and the nameless one converted his animated three-quarter face into a severely inscrutable profile, "with the smaller kind of rock gardens, especially of this season, you never can be perfectly sure."

Hush was aware of one of the attendants slowly retreating towards the end of the table. "May I ask," his companion went on, "what they've got on you, chum?"

"Me?" Hush gave a self-conscious chuckle. "Me, do you say? What they've got on me? Well! I don't mind telling you, though I don't believe in talking about it to all and sundry. My trouble's an old one. I've had it since I was a schoolboy; and the war made it worse. Well! I don't mind telling you. But the truth is—"

He broke off. All the while the other had been speaking he had been repeating the syllables "Tenna Sheer" over and over again; trying to make them flow into that girl at the other table and diffuse themselves through her and become so intimately part of her that every wisp of her hair and every feature of her face, and every pleat and hem and fold and crease and curve and hollow and wrinkle of every garment she wore, and every beat of her pulses and every stir and every stillness of every part of her body under her clothes, together with the whole atmosphere and aura of her personality, should in some occult manner be contained in the actual sound of those three syllables of her name!

His feeling became so intense as he sat there listening to this gallant but inconspicuous victim of a maniacal sense of smell that he imagined himself holding Tenna Sheer on his knee; and, with every caress he gave her, calling upon the fitful precipitation of airy mist that composed her name to identify itself more fully with the being of which it was the vibratory symbol.

"You were telling me," recommenced the disinfected one, "about the particular trouble that caused you yourself to be thrown among us? I'm afraid I turned your attention from the subject."

If John Hush hadn't just seen an inch or two more of Miss Sheer's forehead from where he sat he would have been sharply arrested by his neighbour's choice of the word "trouble".

It had occurred to him to wonder at least twice in the motor car as he sat beside the fair American how the inmates of an asylum were accustomed in ordinary conversation with one another to refer to their personal aberrations; and one of the occasions when he had been thinking of this was when the lady was speaking of the recent purchase by some American friends of hers of the old mansion called Halfway House whose lights they both assured him must certainly be visible as soon as darkness fell from any window at Glint Hall that faced the hills to the west.

"What is there about your name," enquired John Hush, "that makes you want to use mine instead?"

"My name?" echoed the other. "Did you say my name?"

"That's what I said," sighed John, with a peculiar and almost petulant irritation. "What devilment is this," he went on, "that two honest men like you and me can't exchange the simplest remark about the mystery of names without having to produce the name of the person who baptised us, of the god whose worshipper we became by being baptised, and of the king whose subject we became by being born!"

He now found without any too palpable twisting or peering that he could see quite a lot of Miss Sheer's face as she listened to the lady with the lorgnette. He even went so far as to pretend to himself that he could catch the identical expression of her face under that lady's concentration.

"Do you want really to know my name?" repeated the little man. And when John nodded abstractedly, wondering whether it would have to be in that leather-smelling reading-room that he must struggle to snatch his first exchange of words with the object of his obsession before they had to separate for the night, there suddenly took place an event which, of all the events that could conceivably happen at that moment, was the one that John Hush least expected.

He was compelled to remove his eyes from Tenna Sheer. The truth was that the insignificant little sandy-haired creature who was addressing him became suddenly endowed — at least as far as John was concerned — with an authentic power of hypnotism. It was as if he had suddenly been compelled to follow, in full daylight and in the centre of a dramatic moment that required all his attention, and not only to follow but to understand all the ghastly events of the life-tragedy of somebody else, of somebody who was not, and had no wish to be, connected in any way with John Hush. This had never happened to John before.

Living in his own insanity, if insanity it were, other people's identities — always with the exception of his guardian — had until this moment been like the sound of rain on the window, or wind in the trees, or waves on the beach. But now as he listened to this disinfected nonentity he found himself compelled to share the tragedy of a person whose weight of character was like that of a fly among a herd of bison.

The small creature told him in a rapid whisper that his name was Lordy — Osbert Lordy, he told him — and that from boyhood he'd been so used to having exclamations of "O Lordy!" addressed to him that he'd come to hate his name. His father had died before he ever saw him, and his mother had married again, and not only married but married a man fifty years older than herself.

It was this stepfather who had become the horror of his life. It was in fact because of the moral superiority of Tenna's father over his stepfather that Mr. Lordy felt critical of this young woman's conduct. She — so Hush was now compelled to learn — might have a selfish father. She didn't have to wait on a decomposing corpse who was no relation to her at all I "In the end," Mr. Lordy said, "I completely lost my temper. He had been looking forward to his hundredth birthday. I hadn't touched him — to wash him, you understand — for years. He had begun to stink. The neighbours complained. As I say, I lost control of myself. It was on his hundredth birthday, and he said he could dance for the joy of being alive. 'And dance you shall, Daddy Lug!' I cried out. And I did make him dance. I held on to him and danced him up and down. He was a big man, but I felt as strong as a gorilla. You do, you know, when it comes over you like that! Well! I danced him to death; and that began it all. Daddy Lug was dead — dead and buried! But It got out of his grave and came to make me dance. It wasn't him any more, mister. No-no. And it wasn't quite as bad as him. It was his stink. I expect you didn’t know, mister, that old men stink like corpses? You didn’t? No, I thought not I “And that’s why I have to be kept from cracking up with stronger and stronger disinfectants. It’s a pity. I don’t know what they’d do if I began smelling ‘It’ in my sleep. Perhaps you’ve never heard this, but it’s the truth. Jesus Christ goes down unto the hell of sleep where all living things are given a tiny-weenie blotto, or crazy-dazy holiday from God’s waking creation; and Jesus Christ strolls about down there as easy and careless as a sailor at the fair, and spits as the rest of us do, and dawdles round, so that his blessed spittle’s as common down there as cuckoo-spit on the longest day, and that’s why none of us poor devils, except now and again in a nightmare, meet you know what when we’re asleep! Our priest here doesn’t live round here, you know. I think he comes from Horsesmouth. Anyway, he comes every Wednesday, and his name’s Wun — Allen Wun — that’s what his name is; and Wednesday’s the day he comes. I know that because I don’t need as much disinfectant on the day he comes. I don’t say I don’t need any, mister. Even the father from Horsesmouth can’t be a total disinfectant for one like me.

“But he goes a long way; and if a poor devil could live at Horsesmouth and see the father Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays there’s no telling what mightn’t happen. Ail this bloody life might get as blotto as the hell of sleep itself. Anyway, I’ve found this out, that as Eno’s Salts are good against bunged-up guts, so Christ’s spittle’s good against corpses in the hell of sleep. I haven’t liked to ask the father why it’s not used regular — Christ’s spittle, I mean — in our waking life. Mind you, I’m not underesteeming its use in the hell of sleep; but if ever I dared ask Father Allen Wun such a question I’d ask him point-blank why the Lord don’t stroll about in our waking hell now and again. Maybe he’s got a stepfather in our waking hell who won’t let him spit.

“If I did ask—”

But John Hush interrupted him. “I’m terribly sorry, Mr. Lordy, but I must go now. Will you be having tea here tomorrow about this same time?”

But all he could catch of the little man’s reply as he stepped over their bench and hurried off towards the door was the word “disinfectant”, and even that reached him with a faint sound as if it came from far away.

3. THE FIRST ENCOUNTER

HE WAS FEVERISHLY making a little round pellet with his thumb and first two fingers from some crumbs left on the table near the brown-bread-and-butter plate as he came out of the dining-hall; but the moment he had shut the door behind him and realised that he was alone with the girl he shook this pellet to the floor, rubbed his greasy fingers against the edge of his jacket, and walked rapidly past her, down the corridor, just as if he were hurrying to the main staircase.

The moment he had passed her, however, he made a desperate and convulsive motion of his will, swung clean round, and confronted her.

“Miss Sheer!” he gasped. He could feel in his own nerves the shock that made her draw back. It was just as if he had flicked that little pellet of brown bread straight into her face.

“Oh!” she cried.

“Please, please, Miss Sheer,” he implored in a low scarcely audible voice. “I don’t want to be rude, and I won’t keep you a moment. I only wanted to tell you that I think I know — something — about the book you’re reading — that would interest you a lot, if you’d only listen to me just one moment.

“I’m fond of reading alone, too, just as you are, but there’s something I know about that book that would be — that would make — that would surprise — that would, in fact, thrill you quite a lot! Please, Miss Sheer, believe me! I have discovered something — I’d like to tell you something — about that book — that — that explains a great deal.”

She shrank back and cowered away from him like a windblown leaf that shrivels at its corners and seems to hesitate, as it gives little taps to the hard road, whether to resign itself to the cart-track or aim for the ditch. Then to his intense astonishment she stood quite still. Finally she gave him the swiftest and at the same time the most understanding look he had ever had from anyone in his whole life.

It was as if the crumpled leaf had turned into a bird — not an ordinary bird, but a bird made of some sort of living air that was more penetrating than thought itself. And this thought-bird seemed to flutter through the very pores of his skin and to dart up and down and round and round inside him, soothing with its gentle air-feathers the nervous tension of his whole being.

His cunning in walking past her and then turning so as to bar her retreat down the passage had evidently justified itself completely, though he was far too absorbed in the personality of Tenna Sheer to have any heart to glory just then in the success of his manoeuvre. But his strategy had had the effect of catching her between himself and the large window with which this second-floor passage terminated.

Behind him now was the reading-room from which he had first seen her. Behind him also was the popular smoking-room with its tables for games and cards. The only important room that wasn’t behind him just then was the dining-hall from which they had just emerged.

For various practical and psychological reasons the massively built window at the end of the corridor which now formed a grandiose frame for Miss Sheer’s small but beautifully shaped head was, among all the windows of Glint Hall, the one out of which the fewest number of inmates were in the habit of looking.

By this time the book she had been reading, which was a small thin dark-blue volume of Henry James’s Daisy Miller, had been slipped into her handbag, a receptacle which had already struck our young man as having a tendency to remain imperfectly closed. But he now forgot both book and bag in contemplating the effect of her head against this easterly view.

The window behind her revealed an undulating expanse of arable land, broken here and there by hedges and trees. But this expanse terminated in a clear-cut unploughed grassy ridge, in the centre of which rose some kind of ancient fortification surmounted by a couple of gigantic Scotch firs. The whole ridge at this moment was in the process of being atmospherically affected by what was happening to the opposite horizon as the sun went down. In that western sky, where his guardian’s lady had told him could be seen the lights of the American-purchased mansion called Halfway House, there must indeed have been visible at that particular time an unusual sunset.

John Hush’s service in various Balkan capitals in the combined role of private secretary, poor relation, and outspoken valet, hadn’t encouraged him to make any but rather feeble and sporadic efforts to correct his city-bred ignorance of Nature. He may therefore have been in complete error when he interpreted the atmospheric condition just then of that eastern ridge with its prehistoric camp and its pair of majestic Scotch firs as due to the sinking of an especially blood-red sun over the rim of the opposite horizon and consequently over the chimneys of that Halfway House that now was sheltering his friends.

But the actual cause of the enchanted look of this eastern ridge mattered nothing to John Hush at that moment. The important thing was its ensorcerising effect as a background for Tenna Sheer’s delicately shaped skull and soft brown hair. From the twilight that had begun to fall upon that prehistoric ridge there certainly emanated a heathen influence, and to the imaginative but not very scholarly mind of John Hush the small head that now appeared between that horizon and himself might have been the head of Ariadne or Andromeda or Atalanta or Arethusa or any other immortal nymph.

As he stared at the brown hair and white face before him, and beyond that head and face at all that was revealed through the great window terminating the second floor of Glint Hall, he began to feel so happy that he couldn’t utter a sound. That he’d got her to look at him, that he’d got her not to run away from him, that he’d got her to give him her sympathetic attention, was so wonderful to him that for the moment he was unable to think of anything else. He just stared at her in speechless enchantment and she noticed that his under-lip was trembling as if he were going to cry. He was clearly helpless and wholly at her mercy. Nothing like this had ever happened to her before. Here was a real person, a person as mysterious as all other persons but completely different from all others in the fact that he belonged to her. She could be nice or horrid to him. She could make him happy or make him unhappy. But beyond all this, he was an endlessly winding path that she could follow at ease and leisure, not caring in the least where it led but free to trim the branches and dig round the tree-roots and look at the newts in the forest pools.

She was an old inmate. He was a new inmate. But they fitted into each other as naturally as the shadow of a tree fits into the ups and downs of a stretch of grass. Whether men knew such things as quickly as women she couldn't tell; but one thing she knew for certain: he wasn't a spluttering, banging, stretching, creaking, stamping, shouting, boasting, laying-down-the-law sort of man! He wasn't any sort of man! He was an inanimate. He was more like a doll than like a person. If he couldn't know what she was feeling, he knew she liked him to be there and knew he liked her to be there.

"And I don't have to talk to him now I've got him," she thought, "if I don't want to! I can think my own thoughts just as I always do, and sometimes not tell him! At any minute I can say to him: 'What are you thinking?' Or I can say: 'What does that noise remind you of?' Or I can say: 'What does that taste make you think of?' Or, 'What did you feel when you first knew you were certified?' Of course, I needn't ever ask him things like that. And, of course, I'll never know for an absolute certainty how much he's hiding when he answers! He wouldn't be an inanimate doll if there weren't a mystery in him I can never, never get to the bottom of!"

To any onlooker the queer thing about this meeting between John Hush and Antenna Sheer would certainly have been the length of the time they just stared at each other between their ejaculatory questions and their slow, pondering answers! Miss Sheer was really only half listening to him when he fell into a rambling discourse as to the manner in which he would run Glint Hall if he were its chief. "I could think anything," she was now saying to herself, "with him there. I could do anything, dust anything, clean anything, pick up anything, put down anything, sew anything, weed anything, pick up leaves, trim bushes, draw pictures, make patterns! His being there doesn't bother me at all!" And by "there" she didn't mean "in sight Now she'd got him, she could talk to him whereever he was, or wherever she was! And she could never get to the end of him. Yes! that was the thing! He was her doll, but she would never know all he had in his mind, or might suddenly have in his mind, though it wasn't there before; and she needn't know it! No, she needn't!

What they thought need never be quite the same. She couldn't bear it if it were quite the same! But he must feel a lot that she felt. He must feel that things were pressing in upon her and jeering at her, and saying to her: "Yes, you see how brown I am! How yellow I am! How grey I am! You see how dusty I am, and the same as always! Yes, I am those same hairs in your comb, those same fish-bones on your plate, those same door-handles one after another in your house; I am that same dust and that same duster!"

"No! they can't ever again say those things to me! Simply and solely because I've got a thinking man-doll for my own! And I needn't bother any more whether people hate me or don't like me, or whether I'm ugly and plain, or stupid and silly! Nothing of these matters any more! I've got a walking, moving, thinking animate-inanimate of my own, one that can say to itself: 'Has she gone for long? Will she be back soon? What will she have to tell me when she comes home?'"

All this while beneath their hurried spasmodic words and queer intense silences their souls were calmly, quietly, and with infinite relief, simply enjoying themselves. But at last he told himself that he must begin to talk to her or she'd take him for an imbecile.

"What do you think of Glint Hall?" he asked.

She waved her hand. "I can't bear its name."

"Yes. It's a short name, isn't it."

"Too short. I like long names."

"What kind of names?"

"Oh, I don't know; a name like Rhyd-y-Groes-ar-Havren."

"That sounds Welsh to me."

"It is Welsh. A girl in the laundry told me it was her home. I made her write it down because I liked it."

"Did you work in a laundry?"

"Only for a week, to escape keeping house. But I wasn't strong enough. I couldn't do it. I had to go back."

"Did you try anything else?"

"Lord, yes! I was always trying things! But the nice places wouldn't keep me. I wasn't clever enough or strong enough; and in the places where it wasn't nice I couldn't stick it out."

It was at this moment that the big clock in the artfully constructed belfry of Glint Hall struck half-past six. "The bell for everyone to be indoors will ring in a second," murmured John Hush anxiously. "And, anyway, there'll be such a crowd in the garden now. Hadn't we better find a good corner in the reading-room where we can go on talking?"

Miss Sheer glanced nervously round and at once made her accustomed hurried and timid step backwards; and then, looking straight into his eyes, gave a long-drawn, infinitely contented sigh, and with her head tilted just a little to one side allowed her face to relax into the ghost of a smile.

"Wouldn't the smoking-room be better?" She uttered these words, not in the sort of whisper that is conventionally described as "lighter than air," but in a low sound that exactly resembled the fretting of one feathery reed against another on the edge of a small pond. "They'd take less notice of us," she added, "and there are heaps of games there; so we could pretend to be playing."

He clapped his hands in pure delight. "And cigarettes," he suggested, "that we could pretend to be smoking!"

"Don't you smoke?" she enquired.

"No," he confessed, feeling rather ashamed, "no; I can't honestly say I do. But I'll love to see you do it, one after another!"

"Have you never smoked?"

"Oh yes! And it's queer how I came to give it up. But we mustn't waste time talking about that now. Let's go in there quick. Better not be seen hanging about in the passage like kids at school."

He gave her sleeve a jerk, and his agitation was such that without releasing his hold on this small segment of cloth, though he wasn't dull to the fact as he clung to it with his finger and thumb that it was warm inside and cold outside, he hurried her down the corridor to the door of the smoking-room, which they found open. It had only been left a few inches open by the last person to enter, but the sound of men's voices and women's laughter issuing from the room broke upon them as they paused on the threshold with the disturbing impact of a sudden puff of unexpected steam from a stationary locomotive. The whole thing was indeed far easier than John Hush had imagined it could possibly be.

He led her nervously and shyly into the further end of the darkest corner, threading his way like a water-diviner, while she glided after him like a shadow. Between table and table and chair and chair they made their way; and when they did at last discover an empty place it was to find they could settle down there in complete isolation without exciting anything beyond a sympathetic smile.

What he had found with his invisible divining-rod was nothing less than a tiny walnut-wood table adorned with inlaid squares, squares appropriate to romantic chessmen but at the present moment invaded and successfully occupied by businesslike draughtsmen, who though of fungoid rather than of anthropoid shape seemed to John Hush to click their heels with secret joy and respectfully salute their new pair of opposing generals, as who should say: "Now we'll be having an easy time!"

And it certainly is true that the new generals and their respective men were in a secure position. They were in a recess behind two rather noisy groups of card-players who were far too occupied with their own skill and their own chances and their own flirtations to feel more than a remote flutter of faint interest over Miss Sheer and her new friend.

As to what they were supposed to do with these sturdy little toadstool-fighters, her white ones defying his black ones, neither of them had the remotest idea. Sir Warden Sheer had had as little time for parlour-games as he had had for tavern-games, and since he believed more strongly in daughters looking after those to whom they owe all than in successful builders humouring the fancies of spoilt young women, Tenna's leisure moments had a tendency to be spent rather in reiterated ponderings about her mother's death than in learning to understand the meaning of "checkmate Mrs. Warden Sheer — for this occurred before the housebuilder had been knighted for his contributions to progress — had been drowned in the over-turning of a solitary canoe, and her daughter's balance of mind, like the balance of that canoe, only in a more gradual decline, had been tilted still further on the sinister side by that event.

"Did your father ha*ve you* certified and put in here?" Tenna now enquired across the patient draughtsmen.

"God, no!" he chuckled. "I wish I had a father, if only as someone to damn and curse! No, I'm what you call an orphan. I've got no relations at all. There is a person — as a matter of fact he's a well-known political figure — who calls himself my guardian. It's he who chose my school for me when my parents died, who got me into his own office abroad when the war broke out, and in whose service — I mean as whose secretary, for he treats me like a younger brother — I stayed abroad till the end of the war. It's been since the war, since we've both been back in this country, that our troubles — mine and his too — have mounted up. I'm not blaming him, Miss Tenna. No, you mustn't think I am. Don't look so angry with him! It wasn't his fault any more than it was mine. He had to put me away. He had to put me in here! I'd have disgraced him completely, ruined him, in a sense, if he hadn't put me here. In plain words, Miss Tenna, if so I may call you, I deliberately begged him to have me certified.

"Of course, really, I'm no more insane than you are; I daresay no more than a lot of us are in here. In fact, now that I've met you, and now that you've been so nice, I wouldn't be surprised if I don't get quite cured of my mania, or crazy-wickedness, or nervous complaint, or whatever you like to call it. Yes! I really mean it, Tenna Sheer. You don't know what you've done to me."

She bent down sideways and squeezed the life out of her latest cigarette by pressing it against the wooden edge of an empty waste-paper basket that was so large and solemn and grandly recriminatory that it made John think of a certain second chamber in a Balkan republic.

Then she said with a frown: “But, Mr. Hush, you must have met hundreds of girls far cleverer, far prettier, far smarter, far more lady-like, than me—”

Her frown deepened and she made a vague gesture with her hand as if constructing a little viaduct through the smoke of the dead cigarette along which her soul could cross over the heads of the lazily listening draughtsmen.

“Say ‘John’” he broke in. “Don’t mister me!”

But she went on without heeding the interruption. “And far better able to interest anyone like you — and not only that, but far nicer than I am; for the truth is—” Here she began the gesture of pointing a finger at her own ribs, but thinking better of it she bowed her forehead low down over both her hands. Then she pressed her slender palms and widely-divided fingers against her cheeks, rubbing the skin as if such friction removed some teasing and irrelevant train of thought. “For the truth is,” she went on, taking her hands from her face and sitting up straight, “you’ve no idea how far from nice I am inside!”

She sank back after this confession and looked steadily at him as if challenging him to go on being the friend of a creature so monstrous.

“She’s got an absolutely elfish face,” he thought. “It’s not human. It’s I don’t know what! It’s a leaf on the water-face, a root in the hedge-face, a frost-picture on the window-pane face, a feather on the wind-face, a foam on the wave-face, a ‘Virgin of the Rocks’ face! I’ve seen something like it somewhere; but I can’t think where!”

Antenna Sheer was indeed watching him at this moment with an expression completely different from any expression he’d ever seen on a human face. It gave him the feeling that at any moment she might vanish altogether out of his sight.

“How terrible,” he thought, “if I were really and truly insane and she were only a fancy of my madness?”

He couldn't help noticing that as a smoker of cigarettes she had the peculiarity of making more smoke, thicker clouds of smoke, than any smoker he'd ever known!

As they whispered together across these orderly ranks of opposing draughtsmen, their thoughts seemed to swim in and out of their quaintly contrasted skulls like fish between a couple of under-water rock caves.

In his skull the question was now swimming about as to how she managed to create such a cloud of undulating smoke. Was it, he wondered, because she swallowed less and inhaled less than other smokers, and drew at the same time much more desperately at her cigarette?

And what an extraordinary number of cigarettes she possessed! And she appeared to be keeping them all quite loose at the bottom of this handbag, into which Daisy Miller had retreated. And the handbag itself, as he surveyed it shyly, respectfully, surreptitiously, and with a queer sense that it was a sort of indecency to notice it at all, how unlike all other handbags he had ever seen it was! It made him think of certain sacred objects used in extremely ancient ritualistic observances, objects of which the symbolic significance had long ago been lost; but objects which retain, so he told himself, like the ghostly notes of Roland's horn in the forest of Fonterabia, some inner quintessence of the actual matter, in that case the "matter" of sound, in this case the "matter" of fabric or gold or silver or bronze or ivory or semi-precious stone with which the "object of mystery" had been — during long centuries of time — ceremoniously charged.

"Is your father — I mean your guardian," was the next question she asked, "a married man?"

He looked at her in astonishment. "Why do you ask that?"

"You needn't tell me," she replied, "if you don't want to." He thrust his arm clean across the draughtsmen and touched, not her hand, for he felt she wasn't a person to be lightly touched, but, as an Israelitish ox or mule might have done, that ark of mystery, her handbag.

"Of course I want to! I want to tell you everything.

There's not one single least little thing I wouldn't like you to know. That's not why I asked you why you asked me. It's only that it makes you such a witch! No wonder you like Welsh words! For, do you know, it's just because he isn't married, and wants so awfully to be married, that we agreed I really had to be shut up!"

Antenna Sheer's face became at that moment what some of the old writers in the shelves of that reading-room from whose window he had first seen her would have called a palimpsest. Her perplexed and slightly suspicious frown didn't vanish, but it was overtaken and, as you might say, overlapped by a flickering smile. Beneath this smile it was still just discernable, like the scaly back of a small crab seen through disturbed water.

"Go on," she said; and it was clearly all she could say.

"As I told you," John went on, "since he's been back from abroad he's become much more important. They need him, you know; I mean this present government needs him, needs him terribly. In fact there's nobody else who can play with the other side as he can, and make them hop and skip with their own weapons! You will say, I expect — ("Mercy!" thought Tenna, "I have nothing to say!") you will say that a man as clever as he is ought to settle down and write books and not fool about with politics; but the thing is he's not good at writing books, and he has a perfect gift for politics, and if he married this lady they'd have the best drawing-room in London and she swears she'll marry him on Midsummer Day if by that time he's got a constituency."

It was Tenna's turn to lay a rapid hold on her bag. She extracted a cigarette and began to breathe forth, like the elfin daughter of a dragon, clouds of white smoke. She even had a temporary coughing fit. But how could her companion possibly know that the word "constituency", though its connection with the building-trade might be obscure, brought Sir Warden into her mind; and along with Sir Warden there came as so often happened the whole problem of her mother's upset canoe.

"Do you like her? Is she nice to you?" she enquired, rather painfully.

John Hush pondered. It was all very well to want to tell Tenna Sheer everything; but how could he get it into that angelic little forehead rising before him through its cloud of smoke as if it had come straight into Glint Hall from those rock-caves that "kept the fallen day" of such dangerously "deep seas" about them, the worldly fact that once having embarked on the fatal ship of politics, the influence, the insight, the discretion, the social power of some wise and tactful and, for such was the truth, wealthy woman, were absolutely essential to a prosperous career?

But the girl with feminine intuition had touched the danger-point. "I told him," confessed John Hush, "that he'd better keep me out of it altogether — not mention me, you know, or anything! Why should he? He's only my guardian; and anybody can be a guardian to anybody. I might easily be a black man from a cotton-patch in Alabama. He didn't like what I said. He's a real one, I tell you, but I kept at him. I told him that when he was in Parliament and had what they call 'a stake in the country', and had children of his own, and had 'saved civilisation', he could get me out of here, have me de-certified, or whatever they call it. And I kept reminding him what luck we'd had" (Miss Sheer thought she'd never seen anybody's eyes shine so bright or any face become so transparent as John's became now) "in keeping me out of the papers; and what he'd feel like if at tea somewhere they'd seen — you know? — a picture of me in the — the act of — oh, but of course I haven't told you yet—"

Tenna gave a shiver, dropped her cigarette on the walnut table, pressed the joints of all her ten fingers, including the thumbs, against her navel, gazed nervously round to make sure no one was listening, watched with relief while the uniformed attendant, who had recently appeared on the scene, turned his back to them in the course of his march up and down the apartment, and at last murmured hoarsely: "I'd rather not hear about it if you don't mind."

"But you must hear, Tenna! I want you to hear! It's important to me you should hear!"

Tenna was aware of a dark wave of familiar misery mounting up on her horizon. This was the sort of thing she dreaded: a man bent on telling her about his sexual peculiarities! It made her feel all that she really and truly was, all that Sir Warden took for granted she was, and all that Sir Warden — and to this she could have sworn upon her mother's drowned body — secretly gloated over her being!

But the light had gone out of John's face and his eyes were slowly becoming glazed. Wearily and mechanically he was stretching out his arm over the draughtsmen, not to draw virtue from her handbag but simply to pick up her smouldering cigarette; and, just as he had recently watched her do, he now began to extinguish it by rubbing the crumpled blob of white paper flecked with brown fibre up and down that inchwide rim of the recriminatory waste-paper basket.

Antenna suddenly felt as if the man opposite her were himself that blob of matter he was squeezing into a little ball and as if the fingers pressing the blob against the rim of that calmly-yawning Avernus were not his fingers but hers.

She suddenly felt that at all costs she must save that little brownish object from rolling down into that horror-pit of lost and discarded sentences — sentences of torn-up letters, sentences of torn-up newspapers, sentences of torn-up books, sentences like hibernating butterflies drowsing in dusty rafters, sentences like dead flies on the window-sills of unopened windows, sentences that wanted to be set free, to be blown through the air, or over the water, or into the fire — anything but to be carried off with the garbage in the cavernous dust-cart to the smouldering rubbish-heaps of Glint Hall!

As she looked at his glazed eyes and squeezing fingers, and at that whitish-brown blob on the point of being flicked into hell, she suddenly felt such a rush of protectiveness towards John Hush that she could not remain inactive a second longer.

Biting her under-lip, in a reckless abandonment to her impulse, she flashed down with the swoop of a shrike, snatched the round blob from those squeezing fingers that seemed to be her own, and opening her handbag quick as thought dropped this paper-ball of damnation among the virginal cigarettes that strewed the sweet-scented leather-tapestried bower of Daisy Miller.

"No, no, Mr. Hush," she whispered in an impassioned and excited tone, "I didn't mean at all what you think! Oh, not at all! I can't wait to hear exactly what you felt and did; what indeed you had to do since you felt as you did, and just how you came to do it."

The change in John Hush resembled the emergence from his shroud of the resuscitated Lazarus.

He licked his fingers and began vigorously rubbing at the mark left on the walnut table by the recently burning cigarette. But he didn't wait to finish this ablution of the battlefield of the draughtsmen. He broke into a fountain-jet of rapid murmurs, the words issuing pell-mell, in a disordered flight of narration.

"It was a mania for girls," he explained, using expressive words as he went on, and yet words so refined and delicate and fastidious that they couldn't have offended the ears of the chastest of women.

"Everything about them," he declared, "since I was a boy, has thrilled me so that I could hardly bear it! The way they're made, the way they move, the way they speak, the way they dress, the way they do their hair, the way they look, the things they do, the things they say, have grown to be more and more exciting to me; so exciting that I couldn't stand it without throwing my arms round them and hugging them! The moment they stopped being children — for female-children had no interest for me at all — I didn't give a damn whether they were pretty or not, whether they were tall or short, plump or thin, dark or fair! Just the fact of their being girls was all I bothered about, all I cared for!

"Well! you can guess how far this obsession of mine led me. I used to go down to the beaches and sands of all the seaside resorts available from London and stare like a crazy hypnotised vampire at some particular girl whom I discovered I could watch without attracting hostile attention.

"I had acquired the habit when I was abroad of searching public places for the sort of figures to which I was specially attracted; for as time went on I wasn't equally attracted to every aspect of them in the indiscriminate manner I had been at first. And even among the particular things about them which I made, as they say, into a fetish, I began to discriminate.

“And then, beginning about this time last year, a mysterious change appeared in my mania. It was curious. I can’t explain it; and these doctors who ask us all these questions have never explained it — at least not so that I can understand or can associate — you know what I mean — what I feel with the words they use! But I reached the point when the only thing that gave me the real ecstacy I’ve always had from something or other about girls was to carry a pair of scissors about with me and cut off a tiny little lock of hair when I saw the kind I wanted, the kind I had this queer mania for. Isn’t that an odd thing? But its oddity isn’t the point! The point is, or was, Tenna, my Tenna, for I shan’t call you Sheer ever again because there’s something frightening to me about the name Sheer; and though I don’t know any of your people, nor have ever seen anything about them in the papers, there must be something, mustn’t there, to make me feel like I do? — but the point is that a girl’s curl is like the curve of a wave, or the tail of a bubble under ice, or the crest of a wisp of foam or the smooth arch at the top of a waterfall!

“And girls with curls never get caught. They always turn and laugh at the great helpless hunters who are hunting them! They are like foam on waves, ripples on lakes, currents on rivers, feathers on precipices, thistledown on winds, leaves on waterfalls. Girls with curls always escape! That was the whole idea in carrying a pair of scissors wherever you went. You only had to creep up behind one of them and — snip-snap — it was done!”

John Hush gave utterance to a quaint little murmured chuckle, light and low, husky and yet airy, like a wrinkled piece of bracken crossing a dry flat stone as it worked its way along a path of spruce-needles under a roof of dark-green spruce-boughs. “Snip-snap!” he repeated, “and it was all done!”

Antenna Sheer had kept her eyes earnestly fixed on his face all this while. When he stopped speaking she lifted her hands to her head and ran her fingers gravely and scrupulously through her own hair, as if to ascertain, once for all and beyond all question, whether it was straight or curly.

“Oh, I’m quite different now,” he whispered eagerly. “Since I’ve met you I’m quite different! When I had that crazy mania for curls it was because I wanted Undines and nothing but Undines! I changed completely this afternoon when I saw you under the tulip-tree. I've never seen anyone in the least like you, Tenna. And you've made me into a different person.

"I've come to my final conclusion about girls, Tenna. And shall I tell you what it is?"

Deep in her heart — while with her elbows on the table and her frail long-pointed shell-brittle chin, propped on her two clenched hands, gravely supporting her small skull, from whose metaphysical frontal-lobe she had pushed back the hair — Tenna thought:

"Yes, he's mine. He's my doll. He's the one I've waited for all my life. I never thought I'd find him. I thought I'd die and he'd die without one ever knowing the other. But there he is, sitting opposite me in this smoky, noisy place, with that keeper walking up and down, pretending not to be thinking of anything, while he gives a suspicious peep into everybody's face, trying to read their secretest thoughts.

"But let him peep and peep into my face He'll never read mine! Nobody, nobody, nobody, nobody will ever know what my thoughts are! There he sits! There sits my actual doll! And does God think, and do the doctors think, and does that devil who calls himself my father think, that I shan't know what to do with him now I've got him? Oh, you'll all of you soon see whether I do or don't! But there's no hurry about it. We're both here for good. We're both certified.

"We're both under control. Under control? Don't you be afraid, my precious doll, what they can do to us! They can't do anything to us as long as we're both certified, both under control! It's the ordinary outside world that's liable to hurt us!

"Oh, take care, my only doll, oh, take care! Isn't it beyond all hope that we should be as safe as we are? That's to say until he comes at midsummer to make sure there's no chance of my running away!

"And it's at midsummer you said your guardian hopes to get married. Well, there's plenty of time to think everything out before then. And I'm the one to do it! So slow's the word, Antenna, my girl. There are days and days and days; and if I want the nights to think in as well, there are the nights too!

"What a good thing days are so long and nights are as long as days! I never did justice before to the length of days! Now I love to think of them stretching out, one after another and full of such a lot of hard things and soft things and of blue things and green things and of things that go in and of things that stick out. And I love to think of the nights all black and white and full of things that don't matter and things that don't count, and you just following things, and things just following you, and him, the great devil, never there at all, and they stretching out and out; and no hurry about anything!"

Miss Sheer's private thoughts had by this time been accompanied, though not interrupted or disturbed by yet further revelations from John Hush, who had reached the point of explaining to her that the beautiful brilliant lady his guardian hoped to marry on Midsummer Day was an American born and bred, when the tallest of the attendants announced with benignant authority, a little as if it had been a council-of-war and he the chief-of-staff to a commander-in-the-field, and a little too as if it had been a London pub and he an imposing but kindly landlord, that it was time for bed.

John and Tenna rose to their feet like a couple of animals who have been disturbed, not so much by a dog, as by some harmless pedestrian; and hurrying between the tables and the groups of players so as to get out into the passage and to be alone as quickly as possible, they discussed in an hurried colloquy as to when and where they could meet on the following day.

John Hush was by no means pleased to learn that an able-bodied young man and an able-bodied young woman, such as they confessedly were, would not be free to enjoy each other's society till after the midday meal. "I'll have to help in the house," she explained to him, "and you'll have to do something in the stables or in the garden. This special Bedlam is half an expensive school and half a luxurious hospital. It's not like a workhouse — at least I don't think so; nor like a prison. I can't imagine prisoners being allowed to go about together as we've been doing, can you?"

As she spoke to him thus hurriedly in that dimly-lighted passage, Tenna Sheer presented to the enclosed world of John's awareness as indeed she would have done to the unenclosed world of his guardian’s awareness, a contented and satisfied countenance. Had the head of Glint Hall, to whose experiments on dogs the scientific journals had been of late more than responsive, seen her face at that moment he would have been at no loss at all to explain this profound change for the better in a patient obsessed by a patricidal mania.

But his explanation would have had little to do with what actually went on in the conscious soul of this evasive young woman. That she regarded John as a doll she had had all her life without knowing it, or rather as a doll she had lost in the desert and that now had come back to her of its own accord, wouldn’t have drawn the ghost of a smile from the famous doctor; while that John Hush regarded her as a miraculous combination of the elementals of air and water, that is to say of an Ariel and Undine, though confided to him by John Hush himself, would have aroused not the faintest comprehension in the water-tight pigeon-holes of his mind. That to follow the actual feelings of his patients’ afflicted nerves as they felt them themselves should be one of the first steps to any real cure was the last thing the famous doctor could imagine or conceive. Indeed, it could be said of him that he owed his high position to his gift for making himself not only immune but absolutely impervious to what might be called the imponderables of his cases, whether canine or human. He possessed, indeed, the two supreme qualifications for success in this world: an undeviating one-track mind and the power of putting first things first.

But though the expression upon the face of Miss Sheer as she gave her hand to John and bade him goodbye “till two o’clock tomorrow under the tulip-tree” would have conveyed little to Doctor Echetus, it conveyed a great deal to John Hush as he followed the girl with his eyes till she vanished at the top of that staircase to the left, on the wall of which were written, in unmistakably clear letters, the words “Ladies Only”; and only then, and not till then, did he begin ascending the staircase to the right, on the wall of which were written, in equally clear letters, the words “Men Only

4. FATHER TOBY

IT HAD ALREADY been conveyed to the new inmate, though through whose mediumship he had now entirely forgotten, that supper at Glint Hall only consisted of milk and biscuits, or, for those who preferred it, of a bowl of hot bread-and-milk, and that this modest repast was served in the dining-room, when, as at this moment, the reading-room and the smoking-room were closed for the night.

But John had been led to understand that only a small number of patients partook even of this light supper; most of them preferring to retire to their solitary bedrooms where they all discovered awaiting them on their toilet-table quite a substantial stick of chocolate. This had been a bequest to the institution by a certain great and wise chocolate manufacturer who had found in the course of his long and charitable life that in prisons and mad-houses, and other places where people pine, the only sticks held in greater veneration than sticks of dynamite are sticks of chocolate.

But even beyond finding chocolate in their bedrooms, the inestimable privilege at Glint Hall, and one held sacred by all inmates both male and female, was the rare and heavenly privilege of having bedrooms to themselves.

And it was with this thrice-blessed custom that the chaplain of the institution, Father Toby Tickle, was associated. It was not Father Toby himself, however, who was mainly responsible for this supreme solace. It was his extremely ugly and extremely good-natured wife, Mrs. Ursula Tickle, a personage known to the whole establishment both indoors and out-of-doors as “Ursie Mum”. Mrs. Tickle had acquired this nickname in a very natural fashion, and she was constantly justifying its use. There apparently existed for her only one unpardonable human fault, and this fault was fastidiousness.

“Didn’t your mummy teach you no better than that?” she would say when in the presence of this weakness. “Did Snow-White come into the world,” she would say, "between powder-puff and soap-dish?"

"Mr. Pick-and-Choose," she would say, "never got to Heaven." And it was the same when instead of scolding, she was praising some unfastidious inmate. "If I were your mum," she would say, "I'd be proud of anybody working with slops till you're as muddy as sin, and messing with filth till you stink like a sewer!"

John Hush was still standing in a sort of daze on the third step of the staircase marked "Men Only", letting the loitering and arguing stream of men pass him by with casual and friendly "good nights" when Ursie Mum, accompanied by her husband, appeared as his side. The pair were pursuing their blameless way to their bedchamber, an apartment that could only be reached by ascending the same staircase that led to John's.

Observing the dazed condition of this newcomer, Mrs. Tickle indicated to Father Toby that it might be a good thing if he escorted the young man to his room; and, even as she made the suggestion, proceeded, as you might say, to put on steam herself so that in her own peculiar movement, which was as if she possessed at the centre of her being a mechanical engine that gave her complete control over the whole of her unwieldy frame, she projected herself forward so rapidly that she was already half-way up the staircase before John had time to respond to anything but the presence of her husband, which made itself felt as if it were an old-fashioned battleship rather than a person — a ship of the line, we might say, heaving-up beside him rather than approaching him, and throwing out, in place of grappling-irons or the voice of a speaking-trumpet, a peculiar shipyard fragrance that suggested a newly-painted lion and unicorn at its prow, as well as an ancient mainmast steadying its deck, from whose historic pennon, representing our island of sea-dogs, more sacred emblems had evaporated in the free-blowing airs.

Father Toby was indeed a striking figure, and John Hush stared at him in astonishment. He was quite as tall if not taller than John himself, and his weather-beaten leathery face, though it might have struck some who saw it as having a resemblance to the Emperor Hadrian, was in reality a physiognomic composite made up of the expressions of old-fashioned squires, poachers, keepers, farmers, hedgers, ditchers, cattlemen, shepherds, fishermen, timbermen, pictured in passing by field and forest, grassland and cornland, downland and moorland, fenland and marshland, from Carlisle to Colchester and from Shrewsbury to Penzance, a typically insular face, stamped with the diurnal endurance of the most changeable weather on this planet, gathered up from all the counties of Britain, caught anywhere and found everywhere, confused together for the confounding of enemies and the comforting of friends, moulded into a mood of incorrigible resistance to everything alien, a weather-created mask of obstinate defiance to every veering of the weather that created it!

"Hullo, young gentleman!" cried Father Toby. "Didn't I see you arrive this afternoon with those Americans who've bought Halfway House?"

John felt in such a dazed condition after his talk with Tenna that he would have willingly confessed to arriving at Glint Hall that afternoon in the company of the Emperor of Constantinople. He emerged at once from his confused lethargy and indulged in an outburst of violent politeness.

"Yes, sir," he responded eagerly, "yes, sir, yes, Father! I hadn't the pleasure of a proper talk with you just then; but I look forward to one later, Father. I'm afraid more people want to know you better, Father, than you'll ever know."

Whatever the Father knew, or didn't know, upon this particular point, few could have possibly surmised — certainly not his present interlocutor — that he had already guessed correctly as to the cause of this same gentleman's unnatural excitement.

"I was very glad to see—" went on Father Tickle. "No, no! We mustn't stay talking here. I'll come upstairs with you. We live in the same wing. My wife's just gone ahead. By the way, I'd like to give you the general hang of things here if I might — if it wouldn't annoy you — so that you'd feel more at home—' at home from home', and all that — when you wake up to-morrow."

"I'd like it very much," murmured John Hush, not having the faintest notion what this weather-beaten cleric was talking about or with what "general hang of things" he was to be made acquainted.

But he hadn't to wait long. When they reached the floor above and had passed the open door of the Tickle apartment where Ursie Mum, upright in the middle of the room and free from her conventional outer garment, had already assumed the voluminous house-wrapper with which the females of the establishment had come to associate her endearing hideousness.

Father Tickle always told her that her ugliness was a thing of magic; and that what she really was was one of those "Messengers of the Grail" who one day — so he would say — would "drop the mask".

At this moment all that Ursie Mum did was to wave them away with an exaggerated gesture of outraged modesty; and on they went down the passage.

It was only when they had passed John's own small room, the door of which was also open, and its unappealing though neat appearance revealed to all it might concern, that the nature of his guide's intention became clearer.

It was a very long passage and there were many other doors on both sides, from a few of which came voices, but from most of them only those various less significant sounds, hard to particularise, made by human beings of the male sex as they prepare for bed.

At length the passage terminated in a small, squat, covered-in tower, barely lifted a storey's height above the rest of the wing, but raised high enough to contain a square chamber empty of everything but flowerpots, some intact, but most of them broken, and the intact ones containing not very promising and extremely chilly-looking cuttings and seedlings. This squat tower-room, John soon realised, overlooked the whole massive structure of Glint Hall. It possessed four windows each of which opened on one of the four quarters of the horizon.

There was no moon that night; and the starlight was obscured in certain directions by floating grey clouds, blown listlessly and sadly upon a chilly wind; but there was enough light in the sky to give John Hush a rough if somewhat blurred idea of what the handsome chaplain of Glint Hall meant by his queer expression "the general hang of things".

The first thing Father Toby did was to light a small wax-candle that stood securely fixed on its own dried wax on a rough wooden bench among scattered potsherds. The second thing he did was to light a short clay pipe and begin puffing out clouds of sweet smoke. This latter was in itself a sufficiently simple act, but it was one that Father Toby performed in so challenging a manner that it made John feel like a degenerate uncle in the presence of a manly schoolboy.

Emitting one defiant puff after another between his set teeth as if he were a moral locomotive, Father Toby guided John to the particular window of this tower-room that looked south. Here he could see directly beneath them the tulip-tree under which he had had his first sight of Tenna. Looking further afield he realised now that the whole landscape round and about Glint Hall was dominated by the river. The importance of this river was a surprise to him. He had grasped, with an odd satisfaction, the nearness of that ancient heathen camp with its two Scotch firs that lay east. He had been thinking all the evening, save when too stirred by Tenna's presence to think of anything else, about the massive stone manor called Halfway House that lay west; and where his guardian and the American girl were now with their American friends.

But of the river he had taken no thought. Now, as he surveyed the whole southward-stretching landscape, he noticed how, although the lawns and flower-borders and shrubberies and the railed-off green meadows and vegetable-gardens of Glint were enclosed by the institution's towering prison-wall, the height of the wall itself seemed considerably reduced from this observation-point.

Thus reduced, however, it served rather to accentuate than diminish the peculiar appeal of the unusual river. John realised, indeed, that the natural protagonist of the whole scene in this particular place was neither Glint Hall nor Halfway House, nor even the pre-historic camp with its monumental pines, but was simply and solely the winding river.

And, moreover, there was, he suspected, some mysterious link, perhaps in the very act of being created, between this monstrously walled-up citadel and the river that so nearly surrounded it.

As they stood side by side before this southern horizon John realised that more than smoke was issuing from the formidable game-keeper jaws of the tall chaplain. “Of course, it’s not a deep river and it’s not a fast river. But what makes a river the kind that satisfies a person has to do with the nature of the water.”

As John listened to these murmurs he got the feeling that he was being conducted through the intricacies of a scene more seductive than anything in real nature: a scene like an ideal print in some old romantic masterpiece; a Holbein illustration, for instance, of More’s Utopia.

“Our river,” Father Toby went on, “often makes me think of a place I once visited in South America. Those reedy ditches and pollarded willows have the sort of look — though of course the particular trees and the particular reeds are quite different — the sort of look..”

But as John watched the man’s face in that criss-cross mingling of light and darkness, he received the impression that this river-worshipping chaplain of Glint had no more idea of what ordinary human beings go through in their diurnal endurances and nocturnal nightmares, whether the vegetation runs to bulrushes or to bamboos, than has the south wind that moans round their patience or the north wind that rouses them to revolt. “Toby of Glint,” so he rhymed it to himself, “has a heart of flint, though he smokes a pipe of clay; and Ursie Mum would have taken to rum if she hadn’t had her way.”

But the new inmate of Glint Hall was not allowed to spend his time shifting from foot to foot in that tower-room composing rhymes about the authorities. He might have been a visitor to some four-square lighthouse on some historic ocean rock, judging by the polite persistence with which he was now conducted to the eastern window.

Here he was encouraged to observe, though from a loftier position, all that he had already seen that evening with Tenna’s head in front of it. The curves of the old camp would have scarcely been distinguishable at all under the cloud-dimmed stars if there hadn’t been that couple of Scotch firs whose monumental old age divided the ridge into three sections — the one to the right of the two trees, the one between the two trees, and the one to the left of the two trees.

It indeed began to occur to John Hush that there was something like theological unction in the precision with which his self-appointed guide was mapping out the cloudy horizons of Glint Hall; and the impression was increased rather than diminished when he noticed the perceptible rapidity with which the view from the northern aspect of their tower was slurred over.

This view embraced what he had already seen of the abode of Mesopotamia Cuddle, the woman destined to do his washing, and who had already made him think of his childhood's nurse, and it comprised the cobble stone yard surrounded by stables and barns and pigsties on which his bedroom-window looked.

It also included a wide sweep of the hideous prison-wall, broken, as he had already discovered, by the same type of model lodge and terrific lodge-gates as had confronted him, beyond the gardens and the meadows, on the southern side of the grounds.

"Why is the fellow," he thought, "so unwilling to give me any time to take in what he calls 'the hang of things' from this outlook?"

John Hush was not an unmitigated fool. Possibly by reason of his birth in Derbyshire, one of the most central of our counties, he carried about with him a conjunction of geographical and astrological birth-seeds that endowed him with a peculiar kind of cunning.

This was a cunning that certain particular animals and a certain class of human neurotics alone possess. It is a cunning hard to define, and not at all easy to catch at work; and on the occasions when the herd, or the pack, or, in more conventional language, public opinion does discover its base of operations, it hunts it down in a savage rush of fury.

It was this special kind of cunning in him that led John at this moment to delay the slurring over of the northern outlook from the tower of Glint and to compel Father Toby to pause in his circumnavigation of the four horizons.

Whether it was by pure chance, or, as seems more likely, by the passing of some sort of hostile vibration between them, John obtained this delay by a reference to the unusual appearance of the river from their high observation-point. “It looks like a huge white serpent,” he murmured, “like that world-snake in Norse mythology. You’d think it was working its way closer and closer to us with the aim of eventually making a leap and squeezing us to death!”

As if in reply to these sinister words of his visitor, Toby Tickle pressed the switch of an electric bulb in the wall of the tower-room. By the light of this bulb John could see that his guide’s expression had changed. He now looked grave and slightly worried. John could have sworn that across those weather-beaten features that had become so representative of life on British soil under changing British skies there even passed a flicker of something like fear.

“What a pathetic crew we educated people are!” thought the new inmate. “There isn’t one of us who hasn’t got some bruised spot in the landscape of his soul, where morbidly sensitive moss or perilous grass or electricity-charged lichen grows and where the mere approach of an alien presence sends a shiver through our whole being.”

But the chaplain was protesting vigorously now: “Oh, you mustn’t, my dear lad, you really and truly mustn’t speak of our Glint river like that! Serpents — snakes — dragons — squeezings to death? Oh no, no, no! I cannot allow such expressions to drop into the air from this observation-post of mine! I must confess to you at once, my dear boy, that that river down there, about which you talk so lightly, is my whole life in this place: well, of course I can’t quite say that, for obviously my work here is the reason I am here at all. But I can say — and you’ll forgive me, won’t you, for taking you into my confidence? — I can say that the river is my whole life when I’m not at my job! I go down there practically every day and all the year round. It’s the fish, of course, chiefly. But it’s everything else, too! Though the fish are the only creatures I kill. Coldblooded, you understand, Mr. Hush. I mean the fish, of course, not myself! I’m extra hot-blooded, as everybody who knows me would say. But I don’t shoot. And I’ve never hunted. Fishing’s my one and only! And it’s mostly coarse fish, too; perch and roach, you know. Though I often catch quite good-sized dace with a fly. I've really become quite a specialist over the flies that dace will take. I'll show you when you're free from this little temporary trouble.

"I'll take you on what I call my round. It's the nature of the land that makes the river curve so. Oh, I assure you, Mr. Hush, there's no serpentine malice in it! Purely the lie of the land.

But it's unique, you know. Nothing like it in all the British Isles! Why, it curves clear round the whole place except for one little quarter of a mile!

"I sometimes think it's these curves that make me love the river as much as I do; and, of course, the fish I catch in it. In God's truth I sometimes hardly could say whether I love the fish for the river or the river for the fish! Cold-blooded they are — the fish I mean — and the worms, too, of course! That's why they don't feel, though they wriggle and flop. Coldblooded — that's what worms and fishes are.

"And yet it's curious how when the juice comes out of them — out of either worms or fish — it doesn't feel cold. And, do you know, Mr. Hush, I've asked some of the cleverest scientists in the kingdom why it is that the river curves round this place, and do you think any of them gave me a sensible answer? Not a one! I mean not an answer that a simple chap like me, whose only sophistication is to put worms on a hook and catch great greedy old perch through their tough gills, can understand.

"My rival cleric here, the Roman priest from Horsesmouth, pulls my leg about this river. He makes out she was once a heathen goddess — yes, a real heathen goddess! It's funny, isn't it? I expect our good Doctor thinks I've become infected — affected, shall we say — by my concentration on the work here. But that's absurd, of course! I've always been eccentric in these things!

"The truth is I've got my own idea as to what the Church should be; and this idea includes quite a lot of things that would shock some people. We're all Christians nowadays. Christ, by 'being lifted up', as he himself predicted 'has drawn all men unto him'; but the reason why Communism has grown so strong is that it has stolen half the thunder of Christ.

"And who is the chief enemy of the Roman Church? Communism? Well, Communism you will say, has stolen the other half of this divine arsenal. But notice this, my dear boy — notice this!"

"Don't worry, master," thought John, "I'm noticing quite a lot of things!"

One of the things he was noticing had no direct connection, though doubtless many indirect ones, with the ecclesiastical ideal now being communicated to him by this hot-blooded killer of the cold-blooded. It had to do with the way in which this formidable clergyman with his barge-pole physiognomy was lighting his clay pipe. He lit it like a pilot, he lit it like a boatswain, he lit it like a gamekeeper, he lit it like a yachtsman, he lit it like the oldest member of the oldest white-man's club in Central Africa.

And with every pressure of his broad thumb he seemed to be saying: "To hell with your aesthetes and ritualists! What is needed to-day to keep up the old historic church to which we have dedicated our lives is more of our national character. What the world needs isn't pious United-Nations martyrs. The world needs adventurous Americans, scientific Germans, inventive Italians, practical Frenchmen, independent Australians, and strong, tough, sporting English!"

John Hush couldn't help allowing his mind at this point to recall a discourse of his guardian's at a club in Belgrade on the varieties of religion in the Church of England. "You can catalogue them," his guardian had declared on that occasion, "by the way they eat and drink and smoke. For example, if you want to understand the beautiful simplicity of the Evangelical party in our Church, you ought to see them at a Sunday-school treat eating strawberries and cream. The High Church, on the contrary, imitates the Papists and goes in for bouts of poetic alchoholism. But it's the Broad Church who are the most representative of us. They're the sporting parsons, and with them a weakness for the wriggling of worms on hooks and the flapping of dying fish on grass naturally coincides with the grimness of strong teeth biting the stems of sturdy pipes."

"God doesn't want," this river-lover continued, for by this time he seemed to have accepted John's diplomatic politeness as the first stage of a convertite's interest, "God doesn't want an emasculated world of planetary puppets. He wants a world of richly contradictory and finely complicated individuals to whom every country has given its quota of special peculiarities!"

John Hush stared in wonder at the only official guide supplied to him in this home by his national government. Toby Tickle's countenance automatically assumed as it met his gaze the expression it must have worn afternoon after afternoon in sun and rain and mist and drizzle and sleet and snow and through many a dull day of composite neutrality along the banks of his obsessing river.

During the passing of quite a number of moments of reciprocal personal scrutiny, the Reverend Tickle tried more definitely than was usual with him to sum up the character of this young man whose nervous and sulkily philosophical appearance suggested nothing so much as a would-be actor dedicated with any luck to be allowed to play Hamlet.

John's mind, on the other hand, had never been less restricted by what we have been taught to regard as the fatally procrastinating tendency in Ophelia's lover. His thoughts were of the kind at that moment that no possible action, however swift and successful, could embody. The bronze head in front of him became a microcosm of the whole round earth, while the four horizons visible from this tower-room, one of which alone — that is to say the eastern one — was entirely free of the ubiquitous river, became four infinite recessions of uninterrupted space.

The peculiar thing was that the imaginative urge in John's mind, an urge that was electrified by a considerable amount of emotion, was so pathetically devoid of all logical and mathematical and even metaphysical machinery that once having seized upon the notion of four corridors of space receding endlessly northward and southward and westward and eastward, always with Glint as their common point of departure, he felt absurdly puzzled as to how to fill up the four gaps between these four corridors so that the natural rondure of the earth's complete horizon should remain unbroken.

He decided that towards the circumference of this vast ultimate spatial rondure there must be for ever emanating from their centre at Glint, and for ever arriving at their destined point on this far-off tremendous circumference, just as many streams of magnetic energy as are required “to go”, as children say, “round And thus, according to his pictorial but extremely unscientific cosmology, John Hush visualised his four great spatial highroads as a four-fold objectively parcelled-out stratification of this perpetually streaming radiation. Consequently, as he went on staring at the bronze physiognomy of his country’s fish-hooking representative of the absolute in Doctor Echetus’s home of rest, he found he was able to follow the spatial corridor behind the chaplain’s head, which happened to be the one to the east and the only one free of the river, as clearly as it was possible for him, without indulging in any particular acrobatics, to visualise through the back of his own head the one to the west, the Halfway House one, which he himself just then liked as little as the chaplain liked the riverless one.

Never in his life had John’s thoughts whirled through his head as fast as they did at this moment; and the thought that dominated all the rest was strictly rather a nervous sensation than a thought, namely the present physical position of the curious entity he felt to be his conscious soul at an actual point in space from which four infinities radiated. It suddenly struck him as positively comical that such a wavering, fluctuating, and morbidly shrinking creature, as was the living thing in which dwelt the consciousness of John Hush, should possess a zodiacal position in space at all; but that it should also find itself confronted at this dizzy planetary centre, where four such pendulous space-roads met, by such a sturdy home-bird as this fisher in perch-pools, seemed to be carrying comedy into burlesque.

But his thoughts were now scattered as completely as if they’d been a swarm of midges dispersed by a cast of the chaplain’s fly. Father Toby took his pipe out of his mouth, strode to the potsherd table, and snatching up half of a flower-pot pressed it down upon the flickering wax-candle and held it there until that troubled flame, spluttering and hissing, was transformed into a thickly oozing, rapidly dissolving cloud of reeking fumes.

This drastic action, like most actions of such a kind, not only broke up the pregnant moment that had enveloped these two human forms as a long drawn-out operatic syllable envelopes a pair of lovers, but completely changed the atmosphere of the whole situation. With the firm and quiet authority of an experienced moral leader, Father Toby now conducted the new inmate to the western window of the tower-room. It became clear that of all the four horizons visible from his watch-tower the chaplain felt that the one best adapted to the troubled soul of his new recruit was this one to the west.

He pointed out to the newcomer how upon the upward slope of the hills dominating this view, which was indeed exactly what John had been told before he ever caught sight of the place, could be seen the flickering lights of Halfway House.

It certainly gave John a queer feeling, full of conflicting currents of emotion, when he was thus encouraged to admire the lights of Halfway House.

“Nothing like knowing the ropes,” said Father Tickle. And he repeated the words with yet greater emphasis as they descended the half-dozen steps into the passage. “When you know the ropes,” he concluded, “you’re ready for anything.”

At the door of John’s room he stopped again. “It’s curious to think,” he remarked in a contemplative tone, and as if the idea had just come into his head for the first time, “that today’s the twenty-fifth of March. Do you know, Mr. Hush, I believe I’ve really twigged at last what the Church had in mind in putting the Annunciation into this week.”

“Have you, Father?” murmured John respectfully, while in his heart he thought, “Why is it that High Church clergymen always make you feel uncomfortable? This fellow’s what’s called a decent chap. He wants to put me at my ease. He wants to heal my trouble. He wants to make me happy in this place. Why in the name of God, then, must he use the word ‘twig’ in talking of Mary and the angel?

“It’s our class system that does it. The public schools don’t aim at making Christians. They aim at making self-controlled, brave, polite, modest, chivalrous pagans. They teach us to be courageous, honest, patient and enduring. To be stoics, in fact. And then we expect our clerics to be as unselfconsciously Christian as Irish or French or Italians who have lived in religion, like minnows in a stream, from childhood, and to whom the poetry of Christianity is as natural as eating or drinking, and its restrictions as natural, though sometimes as annoying, as relieving ourselves."

While these thoughts passed through John's head, Father Tickle, who had the quick psychological perception of a man who has wrestled all his mature years with a tendency to paederasty, decided that it would have to be through that extremely difficult young woman called Antenna Sheer, and only through her, that any successful approach to this polite young man could be made.

"Yes, but," the chaplain went on, "it's too nice a point — too human a point you might almost say I — to be discussed as late as this! Oh, by the way, you saw where the men's lavatory is? You saw the door, didn't you? We passed it at the top of the stairs. To tell the truth, we've got quite a nice well-kept lavatory in our wing. I confess it's a little too near my wife's apartment — but she doesn't mind. She's a remarkable woman. You will meet her in due course. She's in the women's domain all day, and we're pretty quiet up here during the night.

"But you and my wife will get on like a house on fire when you do meet.... Oh yes, you can open your window still further if you like, Mr. Hush. Or you can keep it entirely shut. It's just as you like. Those bars? Yes, I know; they are rather like a nursery-window, aren't they? You see, it wouldn't quite do, would it, to have people roaming the countryside all night? Here's your electric switch. May I turn it on? Well! Sleep well, Mr. Hush."

Very carefully and meticulously, the moment the Father was gone, did John explore every aspect of his small room. There was a neat little chest-of-drawers with a couple of deep square drawers at the top into which had been carefully put not only his collars and handkerchiefs but also his socks; and in the same drawer as these latter and placed there with equal care he found the books he had brought with him.

And he responded with quite a little glow of satisfaction as he noted that these books of his — which had been selected with some nicety and consisted of Hesiod in the Loeb Classics, a French volume of Selections from Paul Verlaine, Walt Whitman's leaves of Grass, Longfellow's Poetical Works, The Mabinogion in Lady Charlotte Guest's translation, Milton, and Edgar Allen Poe — hadn't been shoved together or stuck in at random but had been carefully isolated from one another and laid to rest apart, as if the person who unpacked them desired to treat them with some special kind of respect.

"I wonder who arranged these?" he thought. And then — and, as it happened, quite correctly — he attributed this to Mesopotamia Cuddle. There was no wallpaper on the walls, but they had been newly whitewashed, and though this whiteness would have thrown into effective relief any crudely coloured picture, the only picture actually hanging there — and it was a very little one — was a reproduction of Rembrandt's "Supper at Emmaus". This picture, in any case, depended for its effect on something other than colour.

It struck John, indeed, when he approached close enough to it to get the almost disturbing effect of the light thrown by the electric bulb as it encountered that other light diffused by the small central figure under that massive arch, that there was something in the expression of this resurrected deity that reminded him of the look he had caught in the dead eyes of one of those dogs in that horrible pit among the spruce-trees. It was as if that small figure were totally unconscious of the divine light that was filtering and leaking from him and drifting away to the ends of the earth.

"But though he doesn't know it," thought John, "it is there — man's hope against hope — under that cavernous arch which hides all the oppressions that are done out of sight of the sun. But while that very homely Son of Man breaks the bread of — damn it all!" — thus did John interrupt John— "if I'm not in the picture myself! On my soul, I believe I'm that boy there who's changing the plates for them!

"But what does that fleshless fish-head on the plate he's changing think of it all? That boy certainly looks as if he felt friendly to these queer guests; but he also looks as if he wouldn't be sorry for this supper to be over I "As to that little god-man with the light leaking out of him, he looks as if he were too sodden — no, not exactly sodden, too saturated with suffering to understand that he has redeemed the world. He certainly looks far too humble to believe he's the Second Person of any Trinity, and too shocked and puzzled by what they’ve just been telling him to have any heart left to enjoy her resurrection!”

John Hush began walking up and down between his chest-of-drawers and his bed. “Oh, dearie I! Oh, dearie I!” he kept muttering. Then he thought: “But I’ve got Tenna. That poor fleshless fish-head on the dish hasn’t got her! That young dish-washer hasn’t got her! That pipe-smoking cleric with a wriggling worm on his hook and a dying fish in his basket hasn’t got her!”

He crossed the room, and going to the window opened it as far as it would open. Then he began to shake the bars with his clenched hands. One after another he shook them, making an ugly face each time he did so. Then he shoved his hands deep into his pockets and leaned forward, pressing his stomach against the window-sill and his forehead against those upper panes that refused to move, just as the obstinate stone of Sisyphus, bewitched in the same sort of purgatory, refused to cease moving.

He tried to forget his anxieties by taking in every pool of liquid dung and every heap of befouled and bedraggled straw. The cobblestone yard out there was certainly a large one; and the number of stables and barns and sheds was beyond what anyone would have expected in a place like this. From the yard his gaze moved to the dimly lit upper room of the northern lodge. Was the woman who resembled his old nurse already in that upper room? Yes! yes! he could see “vast formless things moving the scenery to and fro” up there.

“What a mystery it is,” he thought, “that it should be in our power to look or not to look at what strikes us as unbearably horrible or as intolerably alluring! But I fancy,” so John’s thoughts ran on, “I’ll grow so practised in these mental tricks before I get out of this incredible place that, weak fool as I am, with about as much will-power as a pond-newt, I’ll steer my own mind and regulate my own feelings quite as successfully as that pathetic perch-catcher.”

But he left the window now and extinguished the electric light. Irritably he tried to throw off, with coat, waistcoat, shirt, collar, tie, braces, trousers, drawers and socks, as if they had been scales growing upon the skin of his very soul, his odd vague misgivings not only about Father Tickle's hurry to by-pass the northern view, which was the view from this window, but about those shadows he had seen through the yellow blinds of the Cuddles' upper floor.

Safe in bed, he stretched himself out at full length and remained for some minutes on his back wondering whether to yield to his cowardly desire to turn away from the window or whether to lie boldly on his side facing it. It was a fear that cowardice might hurt him more than courage rather than any courage that made him decide to face it, and it was facing the window that he finally closed his eyes and set himself to think of Antenna Sheer.

But though he faced the terrifying window, and though he closed his eyes and used all the visionary energy he possessed to summon up the precise appearance of Miss Sheer's small head and clear-cut features against the peculiar rich blackness encrusted with zigzags of dazzlement that had been substituted for ordinary sight by his tightly shut eyelids, what he felt impelled to do, as he lay thus with his knees bent and his fingers clutching his lean thighs, was to envisage not merely the lineaments of the daughter of Sir Warden Sheer or of the rising young statesman he called his guardian, but of that dramatic mask of destiny which was his own life.

He pondered on his passionate devotion for the man who was spiritually so much more than a father to him, and on the curious fact that, though his feeling for this person was completely devoid of every sort of homosexual vibration, it was extremely intense and desperately jealous. He also pondered on the odd fact that, jealous as he was, he found no difficulty in making friends with his guardian's betrothed, or even in feeling a certain affection for her, though — and this rather bewildered him — he experienced not the faintest attraction towards her.

Gradually these thoughts about Tenna and about his guardian lost their personal intensity, and it was not long before the faces of both his girl and his friend were absorbed into those dizzy encrustations of dazzling light that kept appearing and disappearing against the inky blackness.

And it was then that the palpable body of his life itself rose up, not as a memory of anything, nor as a hope for anything, but simply as a huge, shapeless mass of pain-bearing and pleasure-bearing substance, pressing upon his consciousness, yielding to his consciousness, wounding and caressing his consciousness, like the shores of a vast continent opposed to an inflowing sea-tide. The "I am!" behind this consciousness that flowed round his experience was certainly an entity of an extremely evasive kind; but the consciousness itself was a sequence of very definite impressions, moving and tossing up and down, many of them very delicious and many of them horrible.

"It is a battle," he told himself. "It has always been a battle between me and the whole pressure of my experience as to whether I can enjoy life or not. Yes, it's a battle between me and life. 'The wrestling of this world asketh a fall', and, when I'm dead, either the world will say: 'That crazy little weak silly creature of a John Hush got me down', or I shall have to say, 'Well! You beat me, you damned world, and that's the truth. I tried to enjoy being alive, but I simply couldn't; and I'm glad it's over! Life, World, Existence, whatever you prefer to call yourself, you've won, and John Hush is beaten!'"

He clutched at his thigh still more tightly and bent his body still more firmly into the shape of a buried skeleton in a cist or of an unborn embryo in a womb. And as he did so he sought to envisage in one amorphous "lump", as it were, the varied reactions he was feeling to all that surrounded him at this moment. "I will enjoy my life!" he kept repeating, as he obstinately wrestled with this enormous swaying and heaving mass of mingled impressions. "I will enjoy my life!"

What he felt at that moment was that it was really possible for him to force himself to enjoy this battle with life even if he couldn't enjoy the particular experiences with which life was challenging him at the moment.

Although he actually continued in that bent position, clasping sometimes his ankle, what he felt in his imagination was that he was moving about quite freely over the surface of the earth. "I've got to hold my soul in readiness," he thought, "for struggle after struggle. But no struggle, however intense, need prevent my enjoying it, and if I enjoy life

— I mean enjoy the struggle to enjoy life — nothing else need come into it. That's the whole thing: to reduce the battle to its simplest elements. But how can it be thus reduced?"

And John answered his own question as his lean fingers tightened his grip upon his lean thigh. "It can only be thus reduced by concentrating my mind on my mind's own power of enjoyment as if this power were a magnetic stream of invisible energy drawn from unfathomable reservoirs in myself and turned upon outward things like a moving searchlight, a searchlight that is transforming by its magical force" — and certainly no buried skeleton and no unborn embryo could have worn a look of more self-satisfied relief than John's face assumed when to himself he used the word "transforming"— "of painful as well as of pleasant things; and forcing them all, pell-mell and en masse, into the enjoyment circle!"

Having thought of the word "transforming", John suddenly, and without knowing it, came near the ocean-brink of sleep, and his thoughts reverted to Tenna.

"I've got her," he thought, "and that's the great thing. If I decide to enjoy my life under any condition, under that condition I can make myself enjoy it! It's all in my power. But what wasn't in my power, what was a matter of fate or of providence or pure chance, was my meeting Tenna at all!...

> 'Childe Rowland to the dark tower came
> His word was still
> Fie, foh, and fum,
> I smell the blood of a British man.'"

5. THE NEXT DAY

JOHN HUSH SLEPT until three minutes after four on the morning of the twenty-sixth. Then he awoke with a groan and a gasping cry; but, for all his struggles to recall what had troubled him, he was unable to remember.

"I believe I've had a nightmare!" he told himself, as he lay staring into the darkness with his fingers trembling and his forehead sweating, while his whole soul jerked itself back in spasms of relief to a shaken but normal consciousness. "It's some weakness in my heart, of course," he thought, and he repeated several times over: "But the heart's nothing; the heart's nothing." And while he repeated these reassuring words he did his best not to think of a monstrous, heavily moving luggage-train that had got mixed up in some way with an appalling mass of darkness pressing in upon him from every side. "I mustn't think of it," he told himself. "I mustn't think of it."

And although this "mustn't think" was quite as definitely concerned with the intolerable weight of darkness around him as was his "nothing" with the pounding of his heart over the luggage-train, it was attended by much more serious apprehensions. And this was proved by the fact that each time he told himself he "mustn't think" of the darkness, his whole power of mind hovered on the edge of a panic-stricken sensation that made him draw back in terror from the black darkness round him and mentally try to push it away with both his hands.

An old, old trouble with him it was, this spasm of night-terror. It had to do with an imaginary difficulty in breathing; difficulty that sometimes took possession of him with such horrible tenacity that, although the whole thing was entirely mental, he would feel on the point of rushing wildly out of the house, while he shouted with a terrifying cry: "Air! Air! Air! Air!"

On this occasion — though it did not seem to increase his nervous tension — he was thoroughly conscious that it was impossible for him to rush out of this house or even to break his neck by throwing himself out of a window. But he had recourse to an old device of his, that had often proved successful, as indeed it did now. He set himself to breathe consciously. He did this by drawing his breath through his mouth and disregarding his nostrils completely. He became, indeed, an animal that possessed no other aperture for imbibing air except a mouth; and by the trick of making each particular motion of inhaling and exhaling a separate undertaking, and of carrying through this undertaking in triumphant defiance of the darkness, he reached a condition wherein by continuing his monotone of vocal dichotomy, "in-out, out-in, out-in, in-out", obstinately repeated, he began to feel that his own secret, private, unique consciousness was a match and more than a match for this ink-black cuttlefish of not-being, this huge epitome of ultimate negation, this mother of nothingness, this absolute of nonentity, this unspeakable hole in the bosom of Abraham, this grandfather of chaos, this paradigm of the final abyss that had taken into its fearful head to swallow him up!

"The great thing," he thought, "is to have faith in your own power. If you have faith that you can get on happily without God, you can get on happily without God! If you have faith that by some trick or other, or just by waiting till your chance comes, you can marry your love, or kill your enemy, or live till you've outlived your friends, you can do all those things. Faith is everything! It's infinitely more precious than hope or love!"

All theology, like other exquisite things, is allied to madness; and had the soul of Tenna Sheer been watching over her new friend's pillow, under the compulsion of driving away devils, she might have witnessed, for at night in Glint Hall there were strange symposia of telepathic dreaming, a curious dialogue between the spirit of Father Toby and the spirit of Father Wun, in the course of which the schismatic priest, defending himself against the orthodox priest, protested that had this aggressive mystery of Faith really possessed a magic denied both to hope and love, the only way of making certain of this superiority would simply be to wait till the horror of darkness were actually at our throat and then boldly and desperately try out this power in the soul to hypnotise the soul; and see what happened!

But even if in this conjectured vigil of Miss Sheer it happened that the magic of faith did work the miracle and thus prove itself more god-like than hope or love, there would remain much more for it to do. The actual nature of the faith-power thus exerted would have to be experienced — and this also would be, if not an act of, certainly a labour of faith — so fully, that there would inevitably come to pass an intensification of the link between the consciousness enjoying the struggle and the struggle enjoyed.

But whether if was the mental concentration implied in forcing himself to be conscious of each breath he drew, or whether it was his faith in the hypnotic power of his own soul over his body, John Hush did fall asleep and managed to remain asleep till he was roused by a violent beating of a gong in the passage outside his door. The state of his mind when he awoke astonished him. Instead of any feeling of horror at being where he was, he was instantaneously aware of a childish thrill of simple interest and excitement. He felt as he might have done when instead of being twenty-two he was eight, and instead of hiding Leaves of Grass in his collar-drawer he hid his catapult.

He awoke, indeed, with a vague sensation of extraordinary happiness. He felt as he had once felt at the seaside when his childhood's nurse, with whom even after he had gone to school he still spent his holidays, had let him make friends with a little girl who was a relative of hers, on a well-known beach in East Anglia. That particular fortnight on the east coast had indeed been the period of the most perfect happiness he had known in his whole life. It had even surpassed those thrills when he first snipped off those entrancing curls with his scissors.

Nor did the whole morning of that twenty-sixth of March, long though it was, play him any trick or grow sandy or gravelly under him, as he trod his appointed round and did everything he was directed to do in the stables, in the cowsheds, in the woodsheds, and in that big cobblestone yard.

At breakfast only about half the men and only about a third of the women were present in the dining-room at the official hour, and Tenna was not among them. So it was with a lively excitement at one o'clock, though he was both hungry and tired, that he stared at a segment of her oval little face at dinner while he talked with more sympathy than he had dared to hope he could muster up to poor little corpse-haunted, badly disinfected Mr. Lordy.

He learnt from this latter that Father Allen Wun, the Catholic priest, had had an unexpected invitation to lunch at the American-owned mansion that afternoon and might possibly drop in for a cup of tea at Glint Hall with his handful of believers in the older faith.

“If the Father does do this,” Mr. Lordy explained, “I’ll get him to sit here with us and we can hear all the news about that house. They say some very grand people from London are stopping there this week. Anyway, it’ll be great to hear what the place is like.”

“It will indeed,” Hush heartily concurred. And he wondered whether his guardian and the lady had decided to spend a couple of nights there before returning to London. Mr. Lordy was authentically sympathetic.

“What kind of night did you have, Mr. Hush? To some people their first night here is the worst they go through, and I only pray that wasn’t your experience.”

John hesitated for a second; and then he thought: “But, after all, what’s the point of being reserved and superior with a decent chap like this?”

But Mr. Lordy had gone on quickly; and it was obvious that the little man felt happier than yesterday. The truth was, John told himself, that everybody was so hungry, and the Irish stew was so good, and even the vegetables on the side, such as mashed potatoes and cabbage, not to mention turnip, were so well cooked that there was little fear, if they spoke low, of attracting the attention either of their fellow-inmates or of the attendants.

“If I can persuade the Father,” Mr. Lordy went on, “to have tea with us here, there’d only be a few other gentlemen — and I’m sure you wouldn’t mind crowding up a little so as to fit them in — and it would be such a perfect chance for our telling him something of what really goes on behind the humbug these people talk.

“The Catholic Church has its faults, Mr. Hush. Please don’t think I’m bigoted; but with it — I mean with us — religion does really come first. And it is genuine religion. In fact it's so genuine that those who hate religion call it superstition. But superstition or not, Mr. Hush, with us it comes first; and isn't that what all the great world leaders are always telling us to do — in the papers I mean — put first things first?"

John fixed the little man with all the power he could throw into his look and words. "I'll be eternally grateful to you, Mr. Lordy, if you do get the Father to have tea with us tonight. I heard of 'Halfway House' before I ever knew there was such a place as Glint Hall; and I long to hear about it from someone who's been inside. It's one of the great historic houses of these islands. They taught me all that's true about it at school; and they taught me all that isn't true about it at college. And now from Father Wun Allen—"

"Father Allen Wun, if you don't mind," corrected his neighbour, "for it's the Father himself who makes jokes about his name, for he's full of fun, the Father is, and All-in-One, if you catch his meaning, in a manner of speaking is what he means—"

John nodded more energetically than irritably; for he was as desperately grateful to this murderer of a life-loving stepfather as he was disturbed by the disinfectant that drove off that old gentleman's ghost.

"And from Father All-in-One," he thought, "I'll really get what this Anglican chaplain, Tickle, who showed me round last night, called 'the hang of the place' — but shall I?" They finished their Irish stew, in spite of Mr. Lordy's having a second helping, in silence after this; but as soon as the pudding appeared, which consisted of hot apple-dumplings, to which could be added all the creamy milk and brown sugar anyone could possibly want, Mr. Lordy, who had clearly, from the frown on his expressive face, been thinking things out, began again with intense seriousness.

Fortunately for John's reputation for courtesy, Tenna Sheer, out of some obscure feminine impulse, or even, perhaps, intention, had been trying for the whole length of that hungry meal to avoid meeting John's eyes, and even to avoid if possible — at least so it seemed to him — his catching sight of her at all. Thus as he tipped up his plate with his left hand — a childish trick of which his nurse could never cure him, and in which his guardian from one Balkan capital to another had shamelessly encouraged him — and scooped up with his spoon — his guardian was only waiting, he once told him, to see him lift the plate itself to his mouth — the last drop of milky juice and melted sugar, destiny — for this really was not chance — enabled him to give his full attention to his excited neighbour.

"There's something I'd like to ask you, mister," began Mr. Lordy gravely, "on this twenty-sixth day of March, now that the Announcement of the Immaculate Miracle is already a day old; and you not being a Catholic, but being what you might call an outsider, makes it easy to ask you, whereas in a matter like this, a heaven-and-hell matter if you follow my meaning, another Catholic might misunderstand what was up, and seek to acquire merit with the blessed saints by blabbing to the nearest Father or even to the Lord Bishop, if the Father was scared of going outside his orders and borders in such high matters.

"Well, it's concerning what I heard Doctor Echetus say to that sly devil Cuddle when they were talking in the fir-plantation, and me all the time aloft in one of the tallest firs like the little short man in the Holy Gospel. Cuddle was asking whether he knew the kind of devil that fellow Gewlie actually was, and the Doctor was saying what did he think he was if he didn't know Gewlie to be the worse case of a sod — only he called it 'sard' but it rhymed with 'lard' — he'd ever handled; and Cuddle was going on about the games Gewlie were up to all the time, when Doctor asked him straight out, flipperty-flap, straight from the tap, didn't he know that these sorts of crack-ups were always hiring themselves out to places like this?

"And so what I'm asking you, mister, you being a free-thinking man and one who don't believe in Church or Judgment, is just simply this: whether I ought in fairness to our fellow-inmates to give the Father a straight tip about friend Gewlie, who, to tell you the honest truth, is a practising Catholic and will be sure to be round here at tea-time, sucking up to the Father and putting the idea into his head that any stories he may hear about him are ridiculous nonsense."

"You mean..." began John hesitatingly. He was anxiously waiting the faintest move Miss Sheer might make to leave the hall. He felt as if he had already exhausted all the springs of unselfishness in his soul by just listening sympathetically to Mr. Lordy and treating him with the attention of a fellow conspirator. To be responsible for the man's actions or to give him advice as to this stand of his between the appalling Gewlie and the formidable All-in-One were imperatives of social behaviour that just then seemed to be retreating to outside the circumference of his conscience. "You mean," he repeated, "that we might decoy the great Catholic Church herself, in the person of this good Father, into exposing Doctor Echetus's tolerance of an active sadist among us when his English chaplain, Father Tickle, either doesn't realise what's going on or is powerless to do anything to stop it? But has there ever been" — he interrupted himself to make a movement of rising, but sat down again, for his training as half-valet and half-secretary to a diplomat in the Balkans had taught him that to leave any building with a girl and to descend any staircase with the same girl and then to drift casually into any garden together would be less noticeable than to hurry from a hall alone, and to await the girl under a tulip-tree—" has there ever been a case, Mr. Lordy, when the word of an inmate of an asylum, or the words of a lot of inmates of an asylum, were accepted as evidence against a warder, still more of a warder supported by a doctor? Has there ever been such a case, my friend, and can we imagine —

But forgive me — I have an appointment — we'll meet at tea — and I'll be interested" — he was on one foot now with the other suspended above their bench— "to see the Father — and friend Gewlie, too, if he comes. So long, Mr. Lordy!"

Not a word of greeting did the lovers exchange, in fact not a word of any kind, till they had rounded the laurel hedge at the first curve of the nearest gravel path. Then Antenna said, speaking rapidly and low, and gazing gravely into his face as she swung her big-brimmed brown hat by a string of loose elastic inside it, "I stayed awake a long time wondering whether you'd be able to sleep. I slept my first night like a dead rabbit hunted to death, for he had come here with me; but my second night they had to give me a drug, I screamed such curses at him. But after that, when I knew he was back at home and was all those hours away and there was no chance of his coming back — for he never leaves his business unless he's forced to — I settled down quite happily. In fact, except for certain times when I hated him so much that just for him to be alive spoilt everything, I was happier than I'd ever been since she killed herself to escape him and left me alone with him. Think of her doing that — leaving the child she'd brought into the world alone with him! Oh, this place has been a heaven to me just simply because I've escaped from him! Before yesterday I had only one happiness — to be where he wasn't! And only one misery — that Midsummer Day would h*ave* to come, when he'd be here again — only for an hour or so — for he'll hardly sit down he'll be so keen to get back to his houses — but just to see him — but I mustn't think about it! You're here now; and everything's different. But did you sleep all right? I don't seem able to stop talking when I'm with you! But did you?"

John Hush nodded. "I certainly did," he said, "but I confess I had a nightmare later on. I don't know how much later on, for I went to sleep again. But you know how it is when you wake up with a nightmare and it's still pitch-dark. But I went to sleep again and stayed asleep till the morning."

"I won't ask you what the nightmare was," said Antenna. He stood still, and she stood still by his side. He looked at her closely.

"Better not, perhaps," he said. "Though I could try to tell you. I could try to tell you anything, Tenna."

She looked away from him; but standing as they were, she couldn't altogether hide her face from him, and he was shocked by the nerve-strain that was upon it, that was in fact drawn tight and quivering over it, like a new skin over a palpitating sore. "I don't believe," he burst out, "it is fair for me to go on telling you things when you don't tell me anything of the same sort!" He saw her bite her under-lip. He saw her lower her head and stare at the ground. He saw the sun throw the shadow of her skirt and the shadow of his trousers upon the well-weeded gravel path and the shadow of their heads upon the smoothly clipped laurel hedge. Then he saw her lift up her head and fix her resolute eyes full upon him.

"What you and I, my friend, had better do," she told him in a calm low voice, "is to get to know each other as quickly as we can! But, on the other hand, if we tell each other too agitating things at the start — it's a queer thing, my dear, but then we are a queer pair — I have an odd sort of feeling that it'll get in the way of our knowing each other, rather than help us.

I'm bad at expressing myself. I'm not clever like you, John, and I'm not educated like you.

"But I can feel things like this; and you being what you are to me, I know I've got plenty of time. And, after all, John, there's a lot in us both — more than a lot — that all the agitations in the world can't change or turn into anything but what's — well, I needn't go on, need I, for you know all this? — what's important to you and me is just our own ordinary selves, not all these terrible things we've been through!"

She had got as far as the sentence, "what's more important to you and me" before she realised that he had ceased to listen; the sudden manner in which this revelation arrested her increased the shock of it. But the relief that went through her like wine through a sieve when she realised the extremely practical, masculine, and even military reason why his mind had wandered from her words, was so great that she seized his sleeve between her finger and thumb and pinched it violently.

"Stay just as you are," he whispered stiffly, "and don't look as if I were telling you anything that I oughtn't to be telling you! As a matter of fact, I've come to the conclusion that, if we ever decide to escape from here, this is the place where we could do it. Only, we'd have to go slowly and get ready slowly! Take a good look at it, my dear." He lowered his voice. "But we mustn't be caught standing here and staring like a couple of frogs at a water-snake! I'll explain later; but if we went in with that water and came out with that water we couldn't be more than a couple of minutes at the whole job. But we'll have to get those real spikes out and we'll have to slip some artificial ones in, and we'll have to deepen the bed of the stream a bit to make sure there'll be room for us to get through that great hole and come out on the other side. But come along now, for Christ's sake!

"Yes, I know that's the south lodge over there where that fellow lives who was watching me in the reading-room yesterday when I first saw you. But come along! Don't look at it! And don't say anything aloud here about the water, or the spikes, or the hole under the wall."

Antenna hurriedly quickened her steps, and as she passed the south lodge she swept its windows with her eyes; and there, sure enough, just within the porch, serenely mending her husband's woollen drawers, but keeping her eyes fixed in a patient dreamy reverie upon the gravel path, sat Betsy.

"'Ow are you to-day, Mr. 'Arsh?" she cried at once, in her clear ringing voice.

To John's nervous companion this voice became at once a living creature, a creature something between a flying-fish and a water-rat; and since Tenna's eyes were reluctant to glance at those spikes in the stream, it was precisely there that she now was conscious of the oily and polished spine of that embodied voice that was now being scraped by those same spikes as it followed the stream beneath the wall.

But then, in a still louder tone, Betsy went on: "We must all join together, mustn't we, Miss Sheer, in making a nice young gentleman like Mr. 'Arsh feel a 'ome-from-'ome feeling amongst us 'ere!"

"He's going to show me the cattle in the field that he was looking after this morning. He's made friends with your husband already."

These words were uttered by Miss Sheer in the voice that all the Glint attendants had come to know well, and Betsy cursed her savagely in her heart.

It was not concealed from John that there was danger in the air, and he raised his voice accordingly. "I tell her," he cried, "that it's going to be 'round and round the mulberry bush', the sort of walk I'm going to take her!"

With this he drew Tenna away, giving Betsy no chance to utter another word; but when they were beyond her voice and yet were still well under her eye, he allowed a discreet space to appear between himself and Tenna, a space almost as wide as a whole yard, and as if well satisfied with this outward and visible sign of propriety, they quickened their mutual pace, he swinging a last-season's dead artichoke stalk, of which he had possessed himself, he couldn't have told how, as they approached the south lodge, and she "arranging", by plucking at them with the fingers of her right hand, five or six short-stemmed clover blooms and a couple of wisps of ground-ivy that she had snatched up as they walked and now held captive in her left hand. Thus following the gravel path that ran along the edge of the meadow, they vanished from the resentful eyes of Betsy.

"Snobbish little bitch!" thought that lady ferociously. "I'd give her the gallows with a look of my eye, I would! Try and kill the poor old dad what begat her, would she, the proud little hat-pin? If I were Master Doctor I'd soon uncertify y*ou,* you little toss-head, and give your case a good re-trial, too, and when the judge was talking about attempted murder and telling you you was in luck not to be hanging by the neck till you was dead, do you think I'd have looked away and been sorry for you?

"Not on your life, Missy Too Proud-to-speak! Not on your little life! I'd be glad you'd got what you ought to have, getting let off like you've been, and being cooked for and waited on like you are, by them that's known how to restrain they selves!"

But another thought followed hard on this one. "Yes, restrain theyselves, I tell you, when they might right and proper have killed their old men over and over, so aggravacious are all men and so much have us poor women got to suffer from them!"

As soon as they were out of sight of Betsy the new inmate drew close to Tenna Sheer. "I don't think that good lady is very partial to us!" he remarked.

But the girl didn't reply. Nor did she lift up her head or look at him till they'd come to the end of the railings separating them from the grazing cattle.

"What's the matter, Antenna?" John asked her, standing still and trying to look into her face.

"Oh, nothing particular!" she murmured, fidgeting with the flowers in her hand and still avoiding his eyes.

"There is something," he went on, "I feel certain there is. Please, please, Antenna, tell me what it is?"

But how could she tell him that the light, frivolous, indifferent tone with which he had referred to Betsy as "that good lady" had been a curious shock to her. She knew from what he had already revealed of his past that this upper-class tone wasn't, so to say, native to him — wasn't, that is, the tone he had heard in childhood. It was an acquired tone, imbibed like a special atmosphere, through his senses, though not through the pores of his skin, while with his guardian in those Balkan embassies.

As a matter of fact, Antenna's mother had belonged to identically the same class as John's own relatives in the crowded body of our wave-tossed social ship; while in spite of his financial success and his knighthood, Antenna's father belonged to the same class as Betsy herself, whose parents had for years peddled geraniums in south London.

If John hadn't lived on such intimate terms with his guardian he would have been more careful about his tone on an occasion like this. For he would have been more class-conscious. He would, in fact, have resembled his own parents and Antenna's mother; all of whom had been what used to be called decayed gentlefolk. The atmosphere of these embassies, on the contrary, was anything but old-fashioned; and if it was decayed it was teeming with parasite life. It was on the crest of time. It positively tripped and tumbled into the future. Thus it was with an air artificially acquired from a closeted clique of devil-may-care cadets of historic houses who were more at home with ex-royalties and ex-conspirators than with retired florists, that John had cleared his mind of Betsy.

"Well! I won't tease you, child, if you don't want to tell me!" he announced gravely. "But come on! I want to follow this damned wall all the way round to the other lodge, so that we'll know exactly where our cage ends!"

He gave a gentle tug at the sleeve of her grey jacket, while with his left foot he kicked out of her way a dead branch that had a thick knob at the end of it.

"Don't do that!" she cried in a voice that he hadn't heard from her before.

He swung round at once. Sorry, Tenna! he muttered. Then, after gazing at her bent head with a puzzled frown as she raised the branch to examine it: "Is it something you've seen before?" he asked. "Does it remind you of anything?"

She made no answer. All she did was to drag the thing off the grass and thrust it with deliberate care under a new-leafed elder-bush.

“That wasn’t where it belonged!” he grumbled. “What’s the idea?”

Again she made no answer. And this time he grew troubled. Was she really vexed with him for something? What the devil was there about that piece of dead wood with tiny little fungi on its underside?

“Please, my dear!” he pleaded. This was the first time since her mother’s death that anyone had called her “my dear That Welsh girl in the laundry had called her “ducky”, but that was different; and here, at Glint, Ursie Mum’s endearments by one of those cruel laws of nature that tend to flatten out familiar things, seemed hardly to count at all.

But hearing this man of hers, who was now her wooden doll for all eternity, utter these two syllables, an almost intolerable happiness seized her. The spasm of rapture that shook her was like a Maenadic cry, and for a moment her two arms shot up into the air as if they had become bird’s wings and were going to fly off by their own volition, leaving her human body staring after them.

Her head was thrown back; the expression on her face could only be called a contortion of ecstasy, but as soon as her arms sank down and she had clasped her hands behind her head, there rose from her lips a sign of such supreme contentment that it seemed to expand into a vast vaporous cup, capable of containing the whole dim, windless, warmly-chilly, misty green atmosphere round them, lifting up the sap of a million stalks and a million grasses and a million buds towards a sky that was so old and sad and weak that it looked as if it might melt into grey, tasteless, colourless water and drip and drop and drain away over all the horizons of the world from pure weariness of having seen so much beneath it and so having to see so much more beneath it before the end.

And John Hush thought: “She’s not human! God knows what she is, or what she’s got in her mind! What was she up to, pushing that dead thing under that elder-bush? Can young elder-bushes put new life into old rotten black stumps? Or did she see a face in that knob? Did she think it was doing something to that elder-bush? Or was the elder-bush jeering at it with its new leaves?”

But he felt, as he stood there before that thrown-back head, as if Nature were offering him, for once and for once only, a glimpse into one of her strangest, most terrifying, and yet most healing secrets, but a glimpse which, by some weird necessity of life’s peculiar ways, when once it has been offered, when once it has been received, irrespective of whether it has been understood or not, can never return again.

Antenna’s eyes had been wide open as she stood like that, and they had been facing him; but it struck him as though she were neither seeing him nor thinking of him. She seemed in fact to be seeing and feeling something that baffled her own mind and yet at the same time completely absorbed it. Was she feeling happy or unhappy as she stood like that staring out of this world into something else? It was impossible to tell.

Hush watched her as an astronomer might watch a star, a hunter might watch a deer, a fisherman might watch a trout, a prophet might watch a bird of unknown augury, a monk the parted lips of a miraculous virgin, and a laborious creative god the frantic antics of irresponsible and chaotic chance.

Suddenly her arms sank down, her head hung, and feebly, weakly, and absent-mindedly she pushed the stalks of the flowers she’d been carrying into her belt.

“Well,” she sighed, as if waking up in a hospital bed on the sudden apparition of a privileged relative, “I feel as if I’d just come back from sailing round the world! Do you ever feel like that, John — falling asleep while you’re on your feet? But, come on, my friend, I do want to go the whole circle together on our first day in this place.”

6. MR. FROGCASTLE

IT ALMOST SEEMS as if certain particular human thoughts associated with certain special human feelings often remain hovering in the air, or slowly dissolving into the air, above certain particular tracts of ground. This does not imply that everybody who passes or crosses such a spot is affected by these bodiless “revenants” or invisible creations of intense feelings that have come and gone; but when destiny brings people to these places who are dedicated by their special sensibilities to respond to these derelict emanations curious and startling results can come of such encounters.

The place which John and Tenna were now on the point of leaving could hardly be said to possess any very remarkable characteristics. It was a chance-given spot on the fringe of a crowded and flourishing plantation of young spruce-firs with a sprinkling of other trees.

With their backs to this spot, what they faced was the gravel path by which they had come and the green meadow, with a few healthy-looking cattle grazing in it, which was terminated by their impregnable prison-wall.

What exactly it had been that caused the unloved, and many would add the unlovable, Miss Sheer to be seized with such an ecstasy because a neurotic young man answering to the name of John, with the look of an old-fashioned Shakespearean actor, had called her “my dear”, must, of course, remain conjectural, but an element of not altogether negligible value in interpreting it might be found in the fact that the head-gardener of Glint, who lived outside the walls and whose name was Frogcastle, had paused this very morning, as he passed this spot after listening to a quarrel between Betsy and Bill, to thank the gods that he had remained a widower.

As the two now moved away, with the gardener’s unuttered cry of gratitude to fate clapping its wings like a bird caught in the girl’s hair, it was she this time who put her hand on his arm; but he noticed that before they went on she gave a nervous glance at the end of the dead branch which could be clearly seen protruding from beneath the fresh leaves of the elder-bush that grew so low that they touched the grass.

She walked fast after that; and he noticed that she was absorbed in some difficult train of thought, for she kept silent, and the lines in her forehead kept deepening and twitching. "Do you mind if I ask you something, Tenna?"

"Of course not! What do you take me for, John Hush?" She turned to him without slackening her speed, and he was struck by the grave intensity of her look. "She believes I'm going to reveal to her some extraordinary secret of superhuman endurance," he told himself, "whereas what I really must get from her is a practical idea of the points of the compass in this infernal hole!"

"Do you know if that south gate we've just passed — that gate between the stream where we looked at those spikes and the lodge where we saw that chattering female — is really south? What I mean is this. Suppose there weren't any wall at all, should we now be able to see Halfway House where I fancy my guardian intended to stay the night?"

"Halfway House?" she repeated vaguely. "Oh, I suppose so. Yes, of course! At least I think so. They've often shown it to me — I know that — from the window of the linen-room on the top floor. I suppose the west's over there!" And she made a careless gesture with her free hand — the hand that wasn't clutching his coat-sleeve with all its five fingers — a gesture that swept the horizon from south-west to north-west.

John made two resolutions: firstly to avoid rather than cultivate the habit of referring to his guardian; secondly to make careful and exact investigations of his own, quite independently of Tenna, as to these ticklish compass-points in regard to Glint Hall and its surroundings.

"Yes," he replied, in answer to that extremely comprehensive wave of the thin arm in the grey jacket, "yes, that must be just about where it is."

"Is that the creature you were going to show me?" enquired the girl, pointing to a large deep-uddered grey cow standing by itself under the shadow of the enclosing wall and beneath a couple of small silver poplars.

“No,” he replied, “I don’t think so. No, I’m sure it isn’t! The one I took a fancy to was grey — certainly it was very grey — purely grey, not light grey, nor dark grey, but just grey. There! There are some more of them near that haystack. Perhaps the one I wanted to show you is with that lot. It had longer horns than the one over there — yes, much longer horns! And I think it was greyer, too, than the one over there — yes, longer horns, and greyer still — you’ve never seen a cow so grey!”

Hush was silent; and, as far as Antenna could tell, his mind was completely absorbed in estimating the comparative greyness of Glint Hall’s grey cows.

Her own mind was following very curious patterns of thought, patterns whose effect upon her companion, had he been able to apprehend them, would have startled her as much as her thoughts would have startled him.

“Longer horns,” the girl was thinking, “and greyer cows!” And instead of the actual cattle before her she saw in her mind wide-stretching meadows extending under a sky even more mistily sun-pearled and even more vaporous with golden interstices than the one now above them; and, feeding in these meadows, beyond all the rivers she knew, beyond the reedy water-courses and the deep weirs, beyond the salt tide that carried down her mother’s canoe, she saw grey cows that moved among the tall shadows of leafless poplars and white horns that kept piercing yet whiter mists!

But as she walked on by his side and he kept rejecting one particular grey cow and then returning to it, and kept rejecting one pair of white horns and then returning to them, his curious absorption in this unimportant game began to get on her nerves. Why must he be like this? Why couldn’t her newly-discovered lover, who had so much about him that was like a helpless, puzzled, bewildered inanimate, walk about these gardens without comparing white horns with white horns and without worrying and fussing whether he was showing her the precise creature whose shed he’d cleaned that morning.

So intensely irritated with the absurd fuss he was making about his precious cows did she become at last that she flung one thought at least against such a jagged block of blue-black ice in the sluice of her consciousness that it broke into sharp-edged bits of ice. And then as she clung to the railings, while he hesitated and stared across the grass, she felt as if her mind were being pricked by the horns of cows wherever it turned; not only so, but her imagination began playing tricks with this tedious talk until it made him say the most silly, crazy, and grotesque things.

And at last her mind actually began twisting his words and mixing up his words and using his words as leaping-off places for sheer madcap fantasies. For John, by reason of having all that morning looked forward so much to telling her about these cows and to showing her their peculiarities, was agreeably lingering over the lengthy business of resolving into proper order their various shades of greyness and their various lengths of horns without, as happens so often when men talk to women, noting her reaction to his words.

Tenna's imagination, indeed, began playing with these ubiquitous horns till they seemed to tear themselves and their owners' heads and rush about in an independent pack. They seemed to be joined by the horns of the moon, by the horns of the deer in Windsor Park, by the horns of every tricorn and unicorn in the forest in Broceliande.

And then she suddenly wanted to stop them in their mad rush. For she saw where they were heading, these horns without a head! They were heading for the brick-yards, gravel-pits, saw-mills, and cement-works, of the Firm of Sheer and Shot, house-builders and estate-agents.

But when the actual horns he was pointing out to her began leaving their owner's heads she felt compelled to turn her own head away from him lest he should see she wasn't properly listening. She felt as if her mind were doing something that was wicked and wrong; so before she had the power to stop herself she began crying out: "I see the one you mean clearly! I see her! I see her! I see her! I see her! And oh, how grey she is!" But she dared not look him in the face as she uttered these false and treacherous cries; for though in her mind the rush of horns had been swallowed up in Sir Warden's brickyard, there was left behind one old grey cow, like a creature of painted wood, and this old cow was sitting up on its hind legs in the manner of a performing dog, while the grave John, himself looking like a wooden figure from an old-fashioned Noah's ark, was milking her into a child's seaside bucket! And all this while the real John Hush was saying to himself: "She's here! She's here! She's here! And I'm telling her just what I swore I would tell her! Yes, she's the one I can tell all my thoughts to, and everything I do! Nobody else in the world would care to hear what I've been doing in the north yard all those long hours!"

And then he spoke aloud, swinging round happily towards her and away from the cows.

"Come on!" he cried, pulling her forward by the sleeve of her coat. "And what about it being your turn to show me something!"

"Sure! I'll show you something!" she murmured cheerfully; and indeed it was really such a relief to her to wipe those comic Noah's ark creatures off the slate of her mind that she could actually smile at him as they moved forward.

"Oh, there's Mr. Frogcastle," she whispered presently. "I'm so glad. I'd like you to meet him. He's not an inmate. He comes from the village. He's an expert gardener. And do you know, John" — Hush noticed she spoke with more eagerness and animation than she had shown all this afternoon— "he's been the one and only person since you and I met yesterday who's taken the faintest interest in me, or gone out of his way to discover anything about me, all these two years!"

Hush followed her with willing alacrity, and they advanced quickly along the gravel path under their prison wall. He didn't feel in the least jealous of the man they were approaching. He felt nothing but pure unmixed gratitude; and he contemplated Mr. Frogcastle with alert equanimity and friendly interest.

The gardening expert was halfway up a short ladder fastening little bits of soft woollen cloth round thin sprays of old indented peach-branches and tender young nectarine-twigs; but as soon as he heard them approaching he began hurriedly to descend. They met at the foot of his ladder and the girl introduced the two men.

Seldom had John Hush seen a person more entirely satisfying to his taste in human beings; and if the other wasn't equally reassured, he answered John's greeting with a friendly handshake. Mr. Frogcastle wore a flimsy, very new cloth cap at the back of his skull. The whole of his head was covered by a thick crop of close-cut grizzled hair that so much resembled a wild beast's skin that John's first thought as he surveyed him was that the neat cap was his natural skin and the rough hair some savage creature's fur. Frogcastle had hollow, rather pallid cheeks, a wide friendly mouth, an extremely low broad forehead, and very pale greenish-grey eyes.

These eyes supplied the whole clue to the gardener's character. They were so wide apart that they appeared to focus in a completely different way from ordinary human eyes. Instead of concentrating upon any particular point in what they surveyed, they seemed to take in the whole length, breadth, height and depth of the object. The object wasn't isolated from its surroundings but absorbed and included in all its peculiar relations to its position in the world, so that a considerable segment of the object's environment, together with a fair stretch of the causes and antecedents that had made the object what it was, were embraced in one glance by the unnaturally wide scope of Daniel Forecastle's vision.

If this had the effect of diminishing the intensity of the gardener's gaze, it also had the effect of giving it a weight, a balance, a dispassionate consideration that seemed to challenge the cosmos to catch such a gaze off-guard. It was largely for this very reason that Miss Sheer felt so comfortable and relaxed when she talked with Danny Frog. She felt as if he treated her like a shrub rather than a girl.

In fact she forgot she was a girl when she talked to him. She felt that, while she couldn't bear either Father Toby or Father Allen to come near her, still less Doctor Echetus, she wouldn't have minded having her hair cut by Mr. Frogcastle.

"I've just had a scene with that fellow Gewlie, Miss," said the gardener presently, after answering some questions that John put to him about wall-fruit. "You remember telling me about his meddling with Mr. Tackle and Miss Tutty and frightening them by following them about and saying things to them? Well, what do you think? I caught him at it yesterday; and when he grew insulting and even accused me of being jealous over poor Miss Tutty, do you know what happened, miss? Something very rare with me!"

Tenna glanced quickly at John, and then she burst out with a little laugh. “You didn’t hit him?”

“That’s exactly what I did! I knocked him down!”

It was John who intervened at this point. “But I’ve got to meet this awful chap at tea today! I’m glad you’ve dealt with him already, Mr. Frogcastle, or I might be forgetting I’m an inmate and not a visitor! It’s through my good neighbour in the dining-room, Mr. Lordy, that I got the invitation. He’s a Catholic, and so apparently is this awful Gewlie. Well, I’ll be well primed with the facts; and if I don’t give this same reverend Father a few hints about his dear son, my name’s not John Hush.”

“Will you be at this tea-party, miss?” enquired the gardener; and it struck John that he spoke rather anxiously, but it was hard to tell, since the wide gaze of his eyes was such that it turned a person’s attention away from any expression there might be upon his face to follow the faintest hint of his meaning from his voice, which always tended to resemble the voice of an oracle speaking out of the air.

“Well,” the girl murmured with the fleetingest shadow of a smile, “I’ll be in the same room, anyway. And you may depend on it, Mr. Frogcastle, I’ll take in all I can of what’s going on.”

There was something in the wide stare of the gardener’s eyes when she had said this that created a curious silence round all three of them. This silence continued even after Danny Frog had bidden them goodbye and had reascended his ladder. It even accompanied them till they were well out of the far-flung shadow of that high southern wall.

“Can we get back without passing that tiresome woman again?” enquired John Hush.

Antenna hesitated. “Of course,” she said to herself, “there is that twisting path I found last year through this damned wood, but it led—” And Antenna shivered at the memory of what she had found. “No, John,” she said, “not to-day. Another day — perhaps — but not on our first day. But old Betsy will have gone in by this time. She’ll be in her kitchen. I know she will! And, anyway, we’ll walk quickly past the lodge. She’ll not bother us, John. I swear to you she won’t.”

“But we’ll get back too soon if we walk so fast,” he protested.

“Well” — and she looked at the wood on their right and the meadow-railings on their left— “we might—”

But their discussion was interrupted by a party of their fellow-inmates — about half a dozen of them — who came laughing and shouting and giggling past them, slapping and pummelling one another. Some of this noisy band shouted at them; others laughed at them; others waved to them with genial friendliness. There were a few of them, however, who actually hunched their bodies into knots and tightened their garments round them as if in desperate fear of contagion.

When they had gone and the pair had turned to each other with the same unspoken wonder as to what Mr. Frogcastle would do when these people reached him, whether, for instance, he would remain on his ladder with his back to them or swing round to greet them, they became aware that two more Glint Hall inmates were advancing towards them, evidently as unwilling as they were themselves to get entangled in any group. But unlike themselves this pair was not walking side by side, for the rear one was clearly pursuing the foremost one, who was striding forward with her head in the air and an expression of haughty disgust on her face.

Nor was this all: for at a little distance behind this couple there strolled one of Glint Hall’s tallest attendants, a man with a countenance that reminded John Hush of the profile of George Washington on a five-cent postage-stamp. This man was indeed as clearly bent on doing to a nicety what he regarded as his duty as was the first president; for his immovable face seemed to say: “Let the grass and the railings and the grey cows and the birds and the bushes, as well as that noisy set of people who have just crowded past, understand once for all who I am and what I am: I am here and I am not here. When anything goes wrong, behold! I am there. When all goes well I am as though I were nowhere.” Getting rid very quickly of the erroneous idea which at the first moment crossed his mind, that this tall attendant was none other than the egregious Gewlie, John was able to give his entire attention to the woman who was now approaching them. And he now knew her as the person he had come to think of as “the lady with the lorgnette”.

He recognised her luckless follower, too. He turned out to be that first inmate he had encountered after he had been deposited in the reading-room by Mr. Cogent Cuddle. He was the man who might so well have been a foundling from a circus, of which his father was the giant and his mother the dwarf.

And it was upon this freak of nature that the lady with the lorgnette, swinging suddenly round on both her polished heels, now turned the full ferocity of her terrifying fashionscope. She turned it upon her bewildered follower as if it had been the shining muzzle of a machine-gun, and its effect on the giant-dwarf was instantaneous. Being the sport of Nature that he was, he was peculiarly sensitive to the heat of the sun, and this was especially so — though nobody in Glint Hall except Ursie Mum would believe it — in the month of March. He had therefore placed upon his head, when he followed the lorgnette-bearer into the garden without time to get his hat, an enormous blue handkerchief, bought at a fair in the County of Essex, of whose border he made a fresh knot, snatching it from his head and replacing upon his head every time the lady paused in her march.

There must have been latent in this poor manqué some abortive germ of an inspired diarist after the fashion of Pepys, and these knots in his headgear were his method of recording the momentous pausing places of his idol. His appearance, however, was not improved thereby as every new knot reduced the blue handkerchief in size. Never had a lorgnette revealed such a grotesque apparition.

But the giant-dwarf was as unable to cease celebrating the lady’s pauses by tying knots as the lady was unable to prevent her expression from saying: “How dare this peripatetic abortion cross my horizon?”

But it was the lorgnette that won. The infatuated freak suddenly flung up his great hands to his head, dragged the handkerchief down over his eyes, staggered as if he’d had a sunstroke, and retreated in shuffling panic towards the south lodge, whither, John noticed, it had also become the apparent whim of the Washington-like attendant casually to direct his loitering way.

As soon as they were alone again between the railings and the thick plantation of small firs, they both stopped.

“Tenna!” John whispered, as if Mr. Frogcastle, with his eyes wider apart than ever, were looking down on them from his ladder against the wall. “Tenna! What are you —?”

But Tenna’s eyes, as John now saw, and every nerve in Tenna’s body that could be reached through her eyes, were absorbed in the slowly approaching figure of the woman with the lorgnette. This singular creature, whose whole body and soul appeared to be drawn inwards out of the surrounding air towards the proud protrusion of her under-lip, displayed herself to Tenna as a perambulating symbol of all those forms of British snobbishness, whether of blood or of taste or of moral judgment, that her father — long before he had become Sir Warden Sheer, long before he had become the head of his firm, long before he had married Doctor Cataract’s only daughter and begotten Tenna — had worshipped as the true Shekinah or Cloud of Divine Glory into which money, and money alone and yet more money, could enable a self-made man to thrust his reverential head.

What never ceased to fascinate Ursie Mum Tickle in her work among the inmates of Glint Hall — a work that was more than saintly, that was in fact goddess-like, for if saints redeem, goddesses recreate — was the fact that, though nobody else among the authorities in Glint Hall seemed to notice it, there were no two inmates in the whole place even faintly resembling each other in the nature of their mental afflictions.

Now in Britain, as we all know only too well, there are degrees of ladyhood. Some are born ladies; some achieve ladyness; and there are — though this may be hard to believe — those who have it thrust upon them! Miss Arabella Bolster belonged to a fourth category — those who worship the Middle Ages.

And it was this interior, spiritual pride in Miss Bolster that Sir Warden Sheer, that thick-skinned master-builder, dimly and dumbly felt with uncomprehending awe.

Unluckily for Miss Bolster's mental balance she actually did have in her veins a drop of blood inherited from Boule d'Enterre. This noble gentleman, who was himself a Crusader, is known to have claimed descent, when his right to the family's coat-of-arms was challenged by Ralph Boylestarre, from Baron Boltstraigne of Bolt who was killed at the Battle of Hastings.

Miss Bolster's half-brother, when a handsome boy of fifteen, had fled from her devoted care and escaped to the Continent, where after many ambiguous adventures — for his hobby or mania had nothing to do with the Middle Ages — he was finally befriended by a benevolent Turk. It was under this Turk's protection that, rendered prematurely old by the life he had led, he settled down as a sort of door-keeper at a villa on the shore of the Sea of Marmora.

From this neo-Gothic retreat he despatched once a year to the only other descendant of Boule d'Enterre a picture-postcard upon which was written an affectionate but stiffly conventional greeting, "couched", as Miss Bolster told Father Toby, "in language of Oriental restraint".

The number of these cards — that were pictorially always exactly the same and in their pious brevity might have been composed by Boule d'Enterre himself — now amounted to thirty-three; but as Miss Bolster re-read them more than thirty-three times every year their romantic value for a victim of the medieval frenzy was beyond the science of numbers.

And there arose in Arabella's "noble mind o'erthrown" the desperate illusion that a certain blotch or blur or disfigurement that was in reality a flaw in the printing, and which always appeared, as the picture remained the same, in the same place, in the Turk's garden, was a ruined wall of Gothic rather than of Turkish masonry. To this heap of stones, or rather to this defect in the print, the authentic though very thin and wavering line by which Arabella "deduced her lineage" from Boule d'Enterre had now been destined to lead.

The blur was a wall. The wall was a Crusader's castle. And the castle had been built by Boule d'Enterre. And to say that this discovery endeared these unchanging tokens from the boy she had brought up to Miss Bolster's heart would be to underrate their effect upon her. If they buoyed up her heart they intensified her pride to the breaking point.

Thus, with her lorgnette elevated as if it were at least a broken handle—" gules in bend between two cross-crosslets sable " — of a Crusader's sword, she advanced upon our two friends like the avantgarde of Charlemagne, not of course really seeing them at all and, indeed, seeing nothing at all but the infatuated offscouring of the old-fashioned circus known when she was a child as the "Tom Thumb Circuit", alias "The Roystering Laxatives".

Tenna's mind was diabolically clear about her danger. Her feelings were writhing like insect-dogs under their vivisectors terrible microscope, but she held them down. It would have been an ecstasy to her to snatch the lorgnette from the advancing woman and hit her — thud, thud, thud, only that wouldn't have been the sound — full in that contemptuous face. She ceased to be Tenna Sheer, exercising self-control: she became the wild clutch with which she seized John's arm; she became the frantic fling-away of her whole body; she became the desperate pull with which she dragged him after her among the thickly planted spruce-firs. She was forced to let him go in a minute or two because the branches so hurt her face, but that was all right, for now she knew he'd follow her!

Nor did she force her way in a straight line through those firs. One mad terror strove with another in her nerves; for she hadn't forgotten what she had once come upon in this plantation — that very pit for dead dogs that had shaken John to such a point. At last, completely exhausted, she lurched forward for a few paces bent double and then crumpled up and lay motionless, her chin against her knees.

John Hush knelt down on the ground at her side. The ground was damp, though fallen spruce-needles made it much less so than it would have been in any other portion of the earth encompassed by the great wall of Glint.

"She'll be gone in a second, Tenna, my Tenna!" John whispered in her ear — though there was really no need to whisper— "and they'll all be gone in ten minutes!" He looked at his watch. “Yes, sweetheart, in ten minutes the first bell for tea will ring. So we’ll have a quiet walk back!”

Tenna was hit to the heart by his calling her “sweetheart Flashing like forked lightning, her mind zigzagged back to the days of her girlhood when she used to play a game with all the twigs and sticks she could pick up under the poplar trees in Corncrake Crescent. She would pretend these sticks were people. She would turn one of them into her father; and that stick was always destined for some horribly ignominious end. And one of them would be her lover. She had never had a lover and never expected to have one; but she was an inexhaustible reader of love-stories.

And though all that the proud, thin twig with a little grey lichen on it that she chose for herself would allow to her heroic warrior, covered with moss, was to lie with its head — that is to say with its club-like end, whereon the wind that tore it from its branch had left a knobby oblong excrescence — resting upon her foot, which was the point of the Tenna-twig from which the bark had been peeled she was reminded of these solitary games when John Hush threw himself down by her side, and a queer thrill ran through her that was compounded of a variety of tremendous and exciting shivers.

There was real alarm in what she felt, for though he had confessed to her as if she were sexless the peculiar nature of his obsession for young women, she couldn’t help being a young woman, and although it was impossible not to feel herself different from those others, different in herself and totally different in her relation to him, she felt that in these things the shrewdest intuition that any girl had might easily fail to predict what could happen.

But as if he read her thoughts and had resolved to show her that from the sex-mania that affected him she had nothing to fear, all he did was to clutch tight with the finger and thumb of his right hand the fringe of her coat; and pinching this fragment of cloth with such intense violence that thumb and first finger soon began to grow numb, he turned over upon his face, so that the feeling of the ground beneath him gave him an obscure sense that in clutching the hem of Persephone's garment he was, like the impious Jasion, enjoying the Great Mother herself.

But that inch or two of cloth, just because it was unyielding cloth and not responding or relucting flesh, reduced his maniacal vice to a quite controllable measure; and though he was, you might say, after his own crazy cerebral fashion making love to her, it was all so remote from ordinary love-making that it wasn't calculated to draw from her any faintest trace of the automatic response that the ordinary sex-excitement of the male is wont to arouse in the nervous system of the female; and he himself was able to do what he never could have done six months ago in the crazy obsession of his ringlet-snatching, that is to say he was able to enjoy Tenna's nearness to him and his worship of her in widespread sensuous connection with the immediate surface of the earth.

It had always been an integral element in his erotic temperament to embrace figuratively and imaginatively, but with every sense he possessed, the particular expanse or segment of the earth's body which happened to be the geographical background of the human contact he was enjoying.

And at this moment, therefore, with his whole nature absorbed in the cerebral ravishing of Tenna's evasive spirit, he derived a complicated satisfaction from reminding himself of all he had discovered in the last twenty-four hours as to the elemental foundation upon which his new temple of Eros was rising. The temple itself might be inchoate, cloudy, shadowy, wavering in outline; but its base, at any rate, was solid and four-square.

Bending over his girl's form, as she lay on her side on the ground facing him, it gave him a peculiar satisfaction to remember every geographical detail of this river-circled plateau on which they were stranded at Glint. His mind pieced together for itself a sort of spiritual helicopter upon which he proceeded to fly north, south, east and west!

He flew in a straight line, for instance, though all the while he was anchored by her side, to that pit of horror on the northern fringe of this fir plantation. He even flew across that appalling spot to the vast farm-buildings and cobblestone yard where this morning he had worked. He visualised the way in which the lodge, where the woman lived who reminded him of his old nurse, confronted the yard beneath his bedroom-window and guarded the hideous iron gates beyond which the road stretched away through a patch or two of fir-plantation like the one in which he was now lying by Tenna's side until it reached an expanse of willows and rushes and a bridge across the river. Then he thought of the two enormous Scotch firs on the crest of the ancient British camp to the east of Glint Hall. That prehistoric fortress seemed to possess the power of holding back the river and hindering its approach.

And again, completing his exploration of the four-square foundation of his tower of Eros, for where they lay now was on its south side, he visualised to the west the park-like upward slope, where, beyond a more stately bridge than any of the others, rose the singular mansion owned by his guardian's American friends.

Returned from these aerial journeys to the four sides of the imaginary square, upon which, disregarding both the wall and the river, he was resolved to build his temple to the son of Aphrodite, it occurred to him to wonder what connection there could possibly be between his depraved mania for girls, that until yesterday had made it impossible for him to fall in love, and the curious magnetic attraction he had for such things as ruinous bridges, obliterated mile-stones, fallen breakwaters, forgotten boundary-posts, broken park-pailings, moss-grown weir-dams, derelict boat-keels, stranded barges, crumbling walls, indecypherable signposts, obsolete mill-wheels, deserted wharves, earth-sunk grave-stones.

In some weird way all these things seemed a natural, an inevitable background to his feeling for Tenna, who was now all girls in one. Yes, a natural background; and yet he now began to feel as if this four-square elemental foundation, upon which, along with Tenna, who so strangely resembled them, all these half-ruinous things, that had been lying there for a thousand years, could be lifted up, Tenna and himself with them, not by any violent eruption or any startling miracle, but easily, naturally, smoothly, quietly, as if they were figures carved in stone and soon to be poised between heaven and earth, as oblivious of the walls of Glint as they were of the waters of the river — that river with Father Tickle catching its perch, that river that would have encircled them clear round, if it had not been for some unknown deity in the old hill-camp who kept thrusting its waters away!

What was Tenna thinking about now as she lay facing him with her eyes so tight shut and her breathing so steady and even? Well, you could love one of these strange creatures to the limit and yet have no idea of what went on in that delicate brittle skull or beneath those maiden breasts. Absolutely no idea! No idea whether she was angry or indifferent; no idea whether she was full of rebellious devilry or full of infinite resignation!

"I don't even know," he thought, "whether at this second she's fast asleep, or watching me, as in the stories they always say they watch you, through their lovely eyelashes! Sometimes I could even wish" — he made a face as this thought danced like a goblin through his head— "that I were a stone at the bottom of the brook that goes under those iron spikes and under the wall! I'd be a stone then that couldn't slip or sink or roll or slide among litter and rubbish! I'd be safe then in a niche, a ledge, a crack — and I'd be safe from the spikes and I'd be safe at the bottom!"

She was lying all curled up, with her high white forehead, which suddenly made him think of an old print his guardian possessed of Bernard De Fontenelle, author of The Plurality of Worlds, almost touching one of her knees, knees covered by extremely old-fashioned black stockings, things that were almost unattainable that spring, as John, an expert upon girls' attire, knew very well. He himself, now seated on his haunches with his hands clasped round his shins, was gazing down at her, endeavouring to conjure up a plurality of universes to help him exorcise the thought of nail-scissors.

The recoil of his mind from this temptation had the same effect upon him that pushing with a punt-pole against a verdurous bank might have had if he'd been in a boat on Father Toby's river. It started him thinking of barges and bargepoles and encircling rivers and exhausted females prostrate upon pine-needles: examples certainly rather than symbols of the plurality of life's dimensions. And he said to himself: "I believe the chief cause of madness is our absurd admiration for personality. Everybody longs to have a striking personality, a personality full of humours and whims and fancies and prejudices and eccentricities and grotesqueries.

"Everybody would like to hear it said of them: He or she has got such a great personality! That's what does all the harm! A great personality? A great ass! This whole damned place is simply chock-full of great personalities, the whole lot of us simply wallowing in our bloody personalities! I'd like to collect together the whole crowd of the inmates of Glint in that reading-room up there and give them a discourse that would astonish Father Toby, but with which I believe old Ursie Mum would entirely agree! I'd tell them that the whole business of being cured and getting out of here consists in ridding ourselves of our blasted personality!

"I'd tell them we should reduce our lives to two dimensions, and cut out this damned personality once for all: Be in your bodies, I'd tell them — be in your bodies to the limit, and then when your bodies don't satisfy you, be in the spirit! You ask, my dears, I'd say to them, what I mean by being in the spirit? Well, I'd say to them: That's just what I'm telling you now!

"You've heard all this chat, I'd say to them, about evolution producing civilisation? Well! What did Jean-Jacques Rousseau tell us, eh? To pick up a few home-truths from the trusty savage, and let evolution tread water for a time! In other words, instead of letting this blind conceited idiotic evolution-impulse do what it likes with us, why not play at being gods ourselves and do a little wholesome self-creating on our own? Yes! And begin, too, I would say to them, with the nature of our own being! What drives us mad? I'd say to them. And I'd answer: The over-complicated nature of our own identity!

"Of course that's the exact truth; for it's the real truth that always has to be dug up from the pit, like Aristophanes Eirene, when you're going to improve things. These are grand days for manufacturing what they call Robots.

"Well! Why not substitute creation for manufacture; and play at being gods ourselves? Why not, I'd say to them, start creating a different kind of human being than the one that can only be scared by hell-fire into behaving properly? That crazy fellow Kirilov in The Possessed says that the human race has to be physically changed.

"Well! Let's be the ones to change it. That's what I'll tell them! And I'll add: Where in the name of Holy Jesus could be found a better place for changing it than Doctor Echetus's home for lost dogs? But how to do it? Ah! There's the rub that makes calamity of so long life!

"But listen, my dears, I'd say to them. Here we are, all together, in this nice comfortable reading-room, with the biggest tulip-tree in the United Kingdom outside the window. Isn't it natural to us all, though not always easy, I admit, but isn't it natural to us all, to change our nature by getting rid of certain fancies, caprices, whimsies, mischiefs, furies, manias?

"We've all heard of conversion, haven't we? We all know what the Salvation Army can do for the souls it saves? But that, you'll say, means faith in God! Of course it does! But let me tell you this, my dear. The thing that works these miracles isn't God, but the faith which these people have in God. It's faith, I tell you, that does it. Jesus is perfectly right there, and so is Paul. What works the miracle is faith. And whose faith, I'd like to know? Ours, of course!

"And faith in what, you'd like to know? Faith in our power to change ourselves! All right, I'd go on, so far all is granted. The change is to be made, this terrific, this terrible, this startling change, this change that's as extreme as a physical change, this change that the Salvationists call 'a change of heart'. But the change I'm telling you about is more than a change of heart. It's a change of dimension. It's a metaphysical change.

"In our human mental world it's like splitting the atom! In plain words, I'd tell them, in language you can all understand, my dear fellow-inmates, what we've got to do is to reduce the embodiments of our identity from three to two!

"And just here, my darlings, so I'll say to them, lies the miracle. What took theology — starting with Plato, long before Jesus was born or Paul had preached in Athens and converted half the household of Caesar — what took, I'll say, about two thousand years for theology to do we must do, like spiritual atom-splitters, in a few months, in fact, I would add, before midsummer I "And what we must do, I would go on, coming now to the essential point, is to liquidate completely from our individual human nature this preposterous and troublesome something in each man and each woman, namely that grandiose projection of ourselves that we are in the habit of describing as our personality.

"It is this part of us, so I would tell them in my speech in the reading-room, which is at the bottom of all the worst troubles and quarrels and misunderstandings in life.

"Of course it's with our bodily senses that we enjoy things and suffer things and it is over the appetites of the body that in our most animal moods we fight with each other both individually and as a pack. But wasn't it from the frustrated desires of their flesh and blood as individual men or animals that Alexander and Caesar and Hannibal and Tamburlaine and Ghengis Khan and Frederick the Great and Bismarck and Hitler brought such devastation to so many?

"I'll tell you, fellow-inmates; I'll tell you in one single word. These famous men weren't more lecherous or treacherous, more cruel or hard-hearted, than the rest of us. They were probably less so! They were certainly more hard-working and in most cases more magnanimous. How, then, is it that their names have become so satanic that the smoke of them mounts up to heaven? What brings down this doom upon them that they should be accounted worse among men than plagues or famines? In one single word, fellow-inmates, in one single word: personality!

"These murderers of thousands, these manufacturers of widows and orphans, these burners of roof-trees, these blackeners of hearth-stones, these sackers of cities, these scorchers of the earth, don't do what they do because of their bodies. They don't do what they do because of their appetites and sensations. Far less do they do what they do because of the spirit that exalts all men and makes the souls of all men equal! They do what they do because of this accursed third dimension of our nature, this thrice-accursed devil or a thing we call Personality!

"This, brother-inmates, this, sister-inmates, is the 'abomination of desolation' set up in the holy place — that is to say, between the sacred animal-earthly body and the sacred human-planetary spirit; in other words, brother-and-sister inmates, between the dust that returneth to the earth from which it rises and the spirit that returneth to the air from which it descends.

"There are many worlds and many universes, fellow-inmates, but we, human beings, are constructed of only two dimensions — matter and mind, body and spirit. All the horrors and evils in life come from the accurst Platonists or Gnostics or Prae-Christian mystics, whoever they may have been, who confused the whole issue by inventing, out of some subtle confusion in the mysterious relation between our conscious self and our bodily self, this proud, insolent, ambitious, indecent, arrogant, and entirely illusory concept of personality.

"Don't you see, brother-inmates and sister-inmates—"

Here John realised that in his ambassadorial pride in subtle distinctions he had begun murmuring aloud this "counterblast", as the old covenanter would have styled it, to history's great men, and that Tenna had opened one eye and had fixed it steadily upon him. The reading-room and its imaginary audience vanished completely then, as John's two eyes encountered this dazed and puzzled stare.

But like a man who has long been practising a particular jump and has thrown himself so absolutely into this practice that all other mental energies must remain numb and void till the contest is over, John Hush didn't stop murmuring this imaginary speech. Nor was he content with his position by Tenna's side. Rising on his knees, he swayed above her for a moment, his two eyes fixed upon the eye she had opened, an eye which, just because it was only one, didn't seem to be fully aware of the nature of the situation, and then he sank forward across her, plunging the palms of his hands and the undersides of his wrists into the spruce-needles on the further side of her. In this position, Tenna's body being so thin and her dress being so flimsy, there was nothing of her he could really see, although to his fancy the sepia-coloured fir-needles, a few miniature funguses, a spray of yellowish moss, and a patch of grey lichen became a firmament of staring puzzled brown eyes.

As for Tenna, she lay like a dead sycamore leaf that all the winter had been blown from spruce-fir branch to spruce-fir branch, hating the rich incense-heavy Christmas smell of their massive green foliage and longing to sink down amid funguses and damp moss and those fine thin patches of grass-blades that seem to rise out of larch-needles, like the spears of fairy warriors sown by the tender gums of lizards and slow-worms and secretive toads.

She was fully awake now, but hesitated to open her other eye lest this man of hers should start doing in this perfect hiding-place whatever it is men do to women. Those were the exact words she made use of in her curled-up blind soliloquy, and the unspoken words were followed by a fretful, petulant, troubled protest against the whole nature of normal life which apparently refused to make it clear to one like her, who had nothing to go upon, except the vaguest virginal fancies, what at such a moment it were best for a girl to do. She had never felt quite so confused and bewildered as she did at this moment.

Hitherto there had only been one Tenna in her heart, head, her neck, her stomach, her bowels, her legs, her arms. Now to her consternation there seemed more than one "queen of the castle". There seemed indeed several Tennas within her, and these different Tennas wanted different things.

None of them, however — and this was the most troublesome part of it — had a clear idea of what it did want. There had been a Tenna — could it have been only yesterday morning? — whose secretest and deepest ideal was to have a mate who was barely human, who was in fact the extreme opposite in human polarity from the hard-working, hard-climbing, maleconscious, class-conscious, race-conscious, brick-yard owner, who had been made a "Sir" for his services to society, and for whom, not only because he'd begotten her, and not only because her mother drowned herself, but simply and solely because he was himself, because his eyes were his eyes, his nose his nose, his ears his ears, his hands his hands, his smell his smell, the hairs on his head, on his hands, on his chest, and everywhere else where there could be hairs, his hairs; for whom she had a loathing as if he were "the worm" Jesus talks of "that dieth not" — yes, there had been a Tenna whose ideal mate, in order that he might be the extremest possible opposite to Sir Warden Sheer, resembled an inanimate doll, of human size and human appearance, of course, and certainly not in the least effeminate, but so much her very own that he could be trusted never to touch her when or where she didn't want to be touched, and who could be trusted when she wanted to be quiet never to ramble on in a tiresome, pedantic, stupid, tedious, obscure way about white cows or spikes under bridges or Halfway Houses belonging to rich Americans!

But last night, after they separated, and once in the night when she woke and stayed awake, she had found that her heart, her senses, her nerves, her whole body, had come to be, in a manner that caused her several queer shivers and tremors, not entirely satisfied with a companion so completely inanimate.

And yet there was still a Tenna struggling for the mastery against the one that made her open her left eye. This Tenna, though her body was so feminine and so soft, was the fierce man-hater who, a couple of years ago, had got herself into Glint for trying to kill her father. Had it been Mr. Frogcastle rather than Mr. Gewlie who had been the one to be spying upon the inmates of Glint that cloudy end of a warm-breathing day, it is hard not to believe he would have paused in a humorous reverie as he spied on those two human forms, one bent like a new moon on the ground and the other bent like an arched bridge across her body and both ensorcerised in a queer unnatural silence. The convulsive tremors that had passed through them separately before their bodies assumed this queer almost zodiacal position would have been unknown to him; but it would have struck him that some serious tension vibrated in the atmosphere about them, a tension that suggested the approach of an unusual nervous crisis or at least that such a crisis was on the wind.

But no such crisis, whether projected by the terrible urge of Eros or by the terrible necromancy of Nemesis, occurred at that time; nor, indeed, was there anybody spying on them. But, all the same, a startling change in the situation did occur, of which the cause, though it had nothing to do with human emotion, was a simple and natural one. It was, in fact, a series of long-drawn exquisite notes from an unseen blackbird; and under the impact of this recklessly shrill yet liquidly raindrop sound, the tense, opaque, heavily covered, humanly compact bodies of those two inmates of Glint were magnetised into a vibrant alertness.

John’s body instantaneously stiffened and straightened. He drew his fingers out of the thick mass of pine-needles and knelt upright by Tenna’s side, listening. She remained prostrate, but turning round she now lay on her back, and drawing up her knees clasped them tight with her clenched hands. Extended like this, he kneeling with his hands clasped behind him and she on her back with her hands clasped about her knees, they both listened to this invisible bird which had flown across the Glint meadows on an exploring expedition, but at this moment was tempted to take a holiday from the nesting-season’s labours and to make a little music for the pure pleasure of making it.

The two listeners to this divine burst of aesthetic selfishness were queerly affected by what they heard. As there is an irresistible and fatal regularity in Nature’s pulsings and throbbings and spasms of erotic sound, so there are also in the recurrent motions of the ebb and flow of the life-stream certain unexpected, unaccounted-for in-rushings of completely incalculable forces. These forces, although they are forces “that Nature makes”, disturb and interrupt the normal rhythm of things; and when in their startling unexpectedness, like “bolts”, as we say, “out of the blue”, these extra-normal invaders from far outside the ordinary system of life’s ebb and flow rush upon us, it is as if we felt a sudden cosmic crack in the thick rondure of our universe, through which the-devil-knows-what invasion takes possession of us.

To these highly-strung lovers of two days’ acquaintance it was as if there came rushing on the notes of this unseen bird an airborne shaft of unnatural revelation, in fact a revelation assuring them of the irrational fact that the madness that had lodged them in this weird walled-in place was not in its essential nature an evil thing at all, but, on the contrary, a sort of miraculously winged ichor or elixir which as it came fluttering down from some completely different dimension had overflown its mark and had hit the wrong nerve in each of them, so that she was not inspired to start a revolt against the cruelty of old custom but only to try to kill complacent old men; while he was not inspired to perform some miracle of valour for a maiden but only to cut off the curls of provocative maids.

"Oh, my one of all," he thought, "it doesn't matter whether I touch you or don't touch you as long as we are together, as long as you are alive and by my side!"

And she thought: "I don't care whether he makes love to me or not. From the heart of my skull to the heart of his skull there's some kind of air-bridge and over that bridge our thoughts keep passing, not speaking a single word, but — what's that?"

She sprang to her feet, and so did he, for quite close to them they heard gaspings and pantings and a desperate scrambling. Before they could decide what to do, a pair of inmates, a man and a woman, people just known to her, but quite unknown to him, rushed wildly past, evidently in a pitiful panic, while behind them came a uniformed attendant.

John Hush knew at once that in all the days of his life he had never seen any human face more appalling in its possibilities than the face of the person who was following these frightened inmates.

Tenna, of course, knew well who it was, but she had no time to explain anything to her companion. With a movement as swift as the blackbird, who with an angry scream broke off its impassioned celebration of solitude and noisily flapped away, she flung herself between pursuer and pursued. Her instinct had risen to the occasion.

"Oh, how lucky it's you, Mr. Gewlie!" she cried. "Mr. Hush here — Mr. Hush, this is my good friend Mr. Gewlie — Mr. Hush was telling me he hoped to meet Father Wun at tea to-day. I believe they have friends in common at Halfway House. Will you help us to get back to the path, Mr. Gewlie? Mr. Hush and I have begun to feel nervous in this wood. And we feel we have been trespassing, too! Please be so good as to take us out of the wood, Mr. Gewlie!"

The man removed his hat with his right hand, wiped his forehead with the palm of his left hand, and stared at Tenna hesitating. John also stared at her in absolute astonishment. "What a thing a girl is!" he thought.

And then he, too, addressed himself to the man, carefully and deliberately, using his most pronounced Embassy voice.

But still the man hesitated, glancing in the direction whither the panic-stricken pair had fled.

Then Tenna “took”, as Homer would say, whether of a mortal or an immortal, “other counsel”. She, too, glanced in the direction followed by that panic-stricken pair.

“I hope,” she said, speaking slowly and clearly, “those excited people who have just passed us won’t come out from the wood exactly where Mr. Frogcastle is nailing up fruit trees — because I’m sure he won’t at all like to be disturbed.” She had done the trick!

Into the countenance of the attendant, Gewlie, came an expression of a terror even greater than that which she had seen on the faces of the two fugitives.

“Follow close behind me!” he gasped from his distorted lips, and, swinging clear round, led the way back towards the south lodge.

7. THE TEA-PARTY

JOHN'S ADMIRATION FOR Tenna was as boundless as ever when, in the watchful but extremely respectful company of Mr. Gewlie he entered the dining-hall and made his way to his usual place. Yes, there was Mr. Lordy, keyed up to an intense excitement of expectation; but no sign as yet of Father Wun.

As for the man Gewlie, it was clear that the departure of Tenna had restored his equanimity. He assumed the role of introducing John Hush to the expectant group of Catholics. “And here,” he announced, “is our nice, good, new gentleman, most comforting to us all, I'm sure — aren't I right, Mr. Lordy? — so healthy and strapping and upstanding — aren't they the words Miss Bolster herself would use? Except ‘strapping’, perhaps! Do you know I once asked Miss Bolster if she liked the word ‘strapping’ as applied to a handsome spirited young man, and do you know what she said?”

It was at this point that Mr. Lordy paid John one of the greatest compliments he had ever received in his life. John hadn't been in Balkan embassies for nothing; and well enough did he know that the humbler, shyer, more timid and less self-assertive a person is, the greater is the honour of such a person's confidence.

And now Mr. Lordy lifted him, with a gesture like a delicate accolade, into the innermost circle of his friends! This he did with a flicker of his left eyelid across the breast-bone of the man Gewlie. It wasn't that he gave John a wink. That would be to put it grossly. It was rather as if he took the eyelid-flicker with which a wink would naturally begin, caught it with impalpable fingers and released it, like an invisible thought-moth, in the kitchen-garden of John's brain.

Meanwhile the man Gewlie went on. “She said ‘yes’! Yes, Miss Bolster said ‘yes’! She willingly admitted that the word ‘strapping’ gave her a nice feeling and was one of her favourite words. She told me it made her think of football!” By this time John and Mr.

Lordy had already devoured between them almost half the whole plate of brown-bread-and-butter; and it was clear that Gewlie, who, though in uniform, was obviously playing the part of an invited guest, was too nervous to do more than nibble at this feast.

John could catch only an occasional glimpse of Antenna from where he sat, for she had taken a place at the furthest end of the women's table. She had found Miss Bolster's society too reminiscent of that particular social ideal that always hovered before Sir Warden's "inward eye" and which, though beyond the reach of bricks and mortar, had been one of the main inspirations of his undeviating, undistracted, and, you might almost say, devoted struggle to become rich.

As for the man Gewlie, he also kept giving troubled glances at the unfilled gap on the further side of Mr. Lordy which had been clearly reserved for the Father; for beyond this gap there were about half a dozen inmates who were murmuring among themselves in a manner that had for an onlooker, even for an onlooker who had so recently been "certified", a curiously unpleasant effect. Hush would have been hard put to it to define this particular unpleasantness. It wasn't an indecent effect. On the contrary, it was nervously proper. But in some peculiarly ghastly way it struck Hush as if all those half-dozen people, though so strictly correct in their gestures and in their sentiments, had no modest covering of ordinary skin between their clothes and their bowels, lungs, bladder, gall, kidneys, liver, and several other familiar human organs!

Was this due, he wondered, to their carrying the ancient psychoanalytical habit of confession much further than it could possibly be carried in Catholic countries where everybody was a Catholic or an atheist; or was the Catholic Faith itself such a protection against the religious element in all insanity that there was something almost indecent about a mad Catholic?

Some inmates who had come in while John was occupied with Gewlie and Mr. Lordy now entirely concealed Tenna from him. This was a serious matter, for the agitating conclusion of their afternoon walk had prevented them from arranging together where they would meet after this meal; and John would have liked to have signalled to her by some sign she would have recognised at once — for instance by treating bits of bread-and-butter as if they'd been draughtsmen — to suggest that they should meet in that same corner of the smoking-room.

He felt sure Antenna was only hidden by those newcomers. She couldn't, surely, have slipped out of the hall altogether without his having noticed it? But all the same he felt extremely nervous. He must arrange with her a minutely circumstantial plan of campaign for an occasion of this sort!

He made a feeble attempt now to enter into the Gewlie-Lordy dialogue by forcing himself to turn upon them both a certain engaging and beguiling smile, a smile full of the aristocratic roguery of diplomatic confidence-tricks, to show he had heard what he hadn't heard, caught what he hadn't caught, divined what he hadn't divined, and understood what nobody but God could possibly have understood, but the only result of this almost feminine manoeuvre was to involve him still further in the ghastly and tragic chatter, like the twittering of a flock of purgatorial long-tailed tits, at once weirdly jocular and reverentially apprehensive, of these half-dozen Roman Catholic inmates.

They even struck John, though he was anything but an Homeric student, as if they were gathering to meet Father Wun as the Homeric ghosts under the earth gathered to greet Odysseus — pathetic shadows of their own past, longing to do, to say, to feel, in fact to play, the living part which they no longer had the substantiality to fulfil.

He couldn't follow what these men were saying. Indeed, they spoke very low. But it almost looked as if they were conversing with the empty space on the bench which would soon be filled by Father Wun, for they kept throwing quick glances at that unfilled gap and then looking hurriedly and reverentially away, until Hush began to feel that he would experience only a faint surprise if some shadowy manifestation of at least the lower portion of Father Wun's material envelope had been revealed to them for a second, even though it had been withdrawn in a flash.

But what was this? All the inmates who were having their tea in that hall, not merely the men at John's table but the women at Tenna's, had ceased to talk and were gazing awestruck at a group of people who had just entered. It caused John a sharp pang that he couldn’t be absolutely sure, since only a few inches of a girl’s shoulder and about an inch of her sleeve were all he could see of his friend at this agitating moment, that these adjuncts did belong to her, or that she was there at all.

He had reached that crucial point in a love-affair when a lover feels that all those extra-dramatic occasions which normally he would appreciate with his whole nature could only reach half of his attention if the object of his attraction were not there to share them.

But even with half of his nature, waveringly combined with those two inches of feminine attire, John Hush did note with no small interest the impressive group that had now entered. One was Doctor Echetus himself; and rarely had any of the inmates there present been more conscious of the greatness of their lord and master. He was an impressive-looking individual; and the impression he made was certainly one of great authority. Authority, perhaps, would be a better word for the head of Glint than any other. The impression he made at first glance couldn’t in any sense be called an impression of distinction.

To the man’s essential quality of self-centred assurance had been added, as I have already presumed to hint, a curious air of integral officialdom like that possessed by the established overseers of parks, public gardens, and even of royal castles; and Doctor Echetus certainly looked at this moment, as his calm gaze moved from visitors to patients and from patients to visitors, as if he were an embodiment of all the most formidable insignia of authority from the Black Forest to the Gobi Desert, and from all the imperial ante-chambers from China to Peru.

But it was the Doctor’s companions that drew John’s interest most vividly just then and made him snatch almost angrily and with the eye of a shrike at that morsel of sleeve and that reverted shoulder-tip to make them share what he felt. For one of the visitors was a lady. This lady John felt sure must be the new owner of Halfway House and the identical person under whose roof his guardian and his guardian’s betrothed had spent last night.

It seemed to him that her gaze, though she was a short plump personage who looked decidedly short-sighted, took every chance it could of scanning the faces of the inmates at the men's table; but he hurriedly told himself that even if this were true it might easily be that his friends had respected his pride and had scrupulously refrained from referring to him at all, and that this kindly creature who bore, he now decided, a striking resemblance to a picture he had once seen of the youthful Queen Victoria when under the escort of Lord Melbourne, was simply behaving as she always behaved.

There was nothing about Doctor Echetus in the least like Lord Melbourne, and as for Father Wun, he was the mortal antipodes of any conceivable British statesman, but it was quite clear to our well-trained diplomatic friend that this short plump uncomely American lady possessed that imponderable feminine quality of regal magnetism which enabled Victoria to out-queen it even over the Empress Eugénie. She was now advancing to the bottom of the table, where Hush was painfully and desperately trying to snatch a glimpse of more than his friend's sleeve.

As the American advanced, she asked one question of Father Wun and another question of Doctor Echetus in such a manner as to transform both these gentlemen into organic ornaments upon the prow of that exquisitely-steered ship which was herself under reduced sails.

John was so absorbed in his guardian's hostess that he only gave a cursory and fleeting glance at Father Wun, and it wasn't till both Echetus and the lady had disappeared that his attention returned to his own table.

Oh, how fearful he was lest Tenna shouldn't have been there at all, and not only so, but should have gone without their having made any definite arrangement as where they would spend their evening!

But he had to deal with the immediate situation now, for he was being introduced to the Father by Mr. Lordy, and he was particularly anxious to notice the effect of the priest's presence upon the egregious Gewlie.

No sooner, however, was he alert to what was happening round him than he saw Tenna. Yes! There she was! And, oh, how thankful he felt! Two or three women had suddenly moved away from that end of the table, and there was Tenna clearly exposed to his view — yes! and actually smiling at him, and watching what was happening at his Catholic tea-party as closely as he had been watching the entrance and departure of the queenly American!

"No doubt," he told himself, "she will wait now till I make a move, and then we'll be together in the passage near that end window as we were yesterday."

Father Wun greeted him in the friendliest manner, but he clearly had so many of his own faith on his hands that he couldn't remain in conversation with him for more than a minute or two. But the Father did reveal the important fact that his guardian had spoken about him. What had he said about him? Not very much; so at least he gathered from the priest's brief words. And John was glad that it hadn't been very much!

But now the whole situation was moment by moment becoming much more dramatic, and John could see across the two tables that Tenna was missing nothing of what was going on.

Mr. Lordy, who had begun to treat the pot of freshly-made tea brought by an attendant as if it had been made by himself to be served by himself at a party presided over by himself, now proceeded, without the slightest preliminary warning or challenge, to plunge into his appalling charges against Gewlie, who, perfectly unmoved, and with a patient, protesting, wistfully indulgent expression on his face, appeared to be assuring the Father that there was no reason why they should permit this agreeable meeting of fellow-religionists who knew one another so well to be seriously disturbed by the unfortunate manias of a person as unimportant as this voluble epitome of all that is negligible.

While Mr. Lordy plunged on and on into further and further details of Gewlie's sadistic behaviour, John had time to study at close range the whole figure and countenance of Father Wun. No one had told him that there was any oriental blood in the priest, but "Wun" certainly sounded like a Chinese name, and soon all sorts of obscure odds and ends of information about the ancient Chinese classics of Confucius and Mencius if not of Laotze and Kwang-tze came drifting into John’s head in vague association with Jesuit missionaries.

And yet somehow he couldn’t imagine the authorities appointing a priest with Chinese blood to a parish in so populous and important a town as the one which was now the centre of the Father’s activities, though for himself John saw no reason against it.

But whether or not he had any Chinese blood, Father Wun’s face was as impenetrably polite as if he’d been a direct descendant of Confucius. It gave no sign of annoyance or of impatience. It betrayed no anxious concern about Mr. Lordy’s plunging into such dangerous matters.

John thought he detected at one point a movement of the priest’s expressionless eyes — not of his head — in the direction of a couple of attendants who were discussing some private matter of their own, but who now and then directed a faintly amused glance at the group of Catholic inmates gathered round their spiritual guide; but even of this glance he wasn’t certain.

John’s own chief preoccupation, as this scene appeared to be intensifying to a point where an explosion of some sort was unavoidable, was to keep his eye on Tenna, and if possible exchange with her some sort of wordless commentary on what was happening, while he missed nothing of what actually was happening. Unfortunately upon one of these occurrences he couldn’t comment with Tenna simply because, by reason of the distance between them, she couldn’t possibly see it. This was the curious way in which from having been slightly paler than usual, the egregious Gewlie — for there was a sort of comical abominableness about the man that possessed a lurid attraction, and John didn’t conceal from himself that he derived peculiar satisfaction from mumbling the phrase “the egregious Gewlie’: — now displayed at various places in the skin of his face certain dark-red spots.

“It isn’t, Father, believe me, it isn’t” — Lordy was now explaining— “that I’ve any malice or hatred or any personal grudge against Mr. Gewlie! What I have seen, I have seen, and what I dread seeing, I dread seeing, and the truth is, Father — yes, you may smile your sneering smile, you cruel wretch, but you can't stop my telling the Father everything! — the truth is there are certain unfortunate people in this place this smiling devil won't leave alone. He has the whole place, as all the attendants have, to wander about in just as he likes. He has a pass-key to all the rooms. Don't you see, Father, how horribly wicked this whole system is, and how dreadful for this demon's victims? Mind you, Father, I'm only telling you what everybody in this place knows to be true, only they're too afraid — and naturally enough they're too afraid — to tell any outside person what's going on here all the time. Yes, you can smile and tap your head." At this point John was able to exchange a completely understanding look with Tenna; for it was evident that the last thing the egregious Gewlie felt like doing at that moment was tapping his head. He was, in fact, rather absurdly straining his neck, so as to be able to keep an eye on the nearest group of his fellow-attendants, where, though they were still talking among themselves, there was one man who by some tacit agreement never took his gaze away from the encircled figures of Lordy and Father Wun. "But the truth—': Mr. Lordy now burst out, "the truth is that instead of this place being a place of healing for the wretched people singled out by this man for his devilish tricks, it has become a place where people on the edge of being cured are driven back, harried back, hunted back into raving fever!"

Mr. Lordy's voice had a definite touch of hysteria by this time, and his fellow-religionists began to huddle closer and closer to Father Wun, like a woolly flock suddenly aware that in their midst is a creature not entirely sheepish; an insignificant beast, but a beast with at least a drop of the blood of a yak or ibex.

And the eyes of John Hush and Tenna Sheer, meeting across the two empty tables, told each other how the faintest quiver of hysteria in any voice attracts human attention to the exclusion of everything else.

The attendant, who was, so to say, in the crow's-nest of that near group gave a quick glance at his companions and they all moved forward. Parallel with this forward movement of his fellow-keepers, the red spots in the countenance of the egregious Gewlie faded away, and he resumed his original smile, so volubly saying: “Isn’t it touching how insanity creates such monstrous accusations in simple minds?”

But the hysterical quiver in Mr. Lordy’s tone rose higher yet, and as it rose the man himself became more and more negligible, till, as that high-pitched cry ceased to be composed of coherent words and became like the discordant quavers and semiquavers of a bar of broken music, there did not seem, at least to the eyes and ears of John and Tenna, to be any Mr. Lordy at all, but only a thin quivering gnat-like vibration in the air that kept repeating, “Let me alone! Let me alone! Let me alone! Let me alone!” and then, on a yet wilder and more defiant note, like a whirring of invisible grouse-wings over a rain-soaked moor, “Go away! Go away! Go away! Go away! Let me be! Let me be! Let me be! Let me be!”

The moment was a very painful one to John, and not less so, he could clearly detect, to Tenna, for they both could see that in another minute the attendants would surround this vibration from the void and hustle and rustle it back into the darkness, as if an abortion had presumed to criticise creation and had to be hugged to death on the downy bosoms of celestial midwives!

But — and for the first time to-night — the weary, inscrutable countenance of Father Allen Wun moved like a mountainous sheepfold to protect his frightened flock of huddled sheep.

“Mr. Lordy and Mr. Gewlie,” he remarked calmly, “have anticipated by a few minutes the talk I have begged them to have with me after tea in Mr. Lordy’s room upstairs. You will excuse us, the rest of you, I know? If I hadn’t to catch the eight o’clock bus I would have joined you all in the smoking-room presently, but as it is, I’m afraid I must bid you good night. Both Mr. Lordy and Mr. Gewlie belong to our Saint Patrick’s Dramatic Club and their different approach to all these difficult mental problems has begun to extend, I’m afraid, to regions where, quite naturally and properly, we laymen — I speak as a novice in the presence of so many expert ministers of the great healing profession — must confess to being out of our depth. But it is as a priest of the Church that I must insist, if you’ll permit me, to have a little talk with my two sons here — with you, Mr. Lordy, and with you, Mr. Gewlie — so if you don't mind, gentlemen... and Father Wun turned his eyes in his buttressed, bastioned and bulwarked face without moving his skull by the faintest flicker of an inch. He turned then towards the stealthily advancing but obviously hesitating attendants on one side of him and the fidgety, furtive, feverish group of frightened fellow-Catholics on the other.

It was, as John saw, and as he realised when he caught the expression on her face that Tenna had seen, a crucial moment. The attendants, in spite of the Father's rock-bastioned skull, were still advancing, with the evident intention of laying their hands upon Mr. Lordy and removing him, by the exertion of irresistible though patient force, bodily from the dining-hall, and of conveying him to the particular wing of the establishment where unruly inmates were encouraged to develop second thoughts.

It was clear to John that in these two or three beats of the dragging pulse of time a very great deal was happening, and happening, it seemed to him, to the advantage of Gewlie and to the disadvantage of Mr. Lordy. Gewlie's face had triumphantly petrified itself into his superior smile and there was a movement of his lips as if he were articulating the words, "I will see you later, Father. Yes, a little later, when I have attended to the removal of this ridiculous individual."

Gewlie's eyes were in fact now alight with a sinister magnetic power that seemed to be actually drawing the attendants towards Mr. Lordy. John found himself so absorbed in his recognition of what was going on that for the moment his mental contact with Tenna was broken, and he missed the fact that the girl had moved forward and was now standing alone, half-way between the women's table and the spot where Father Wun was holding the enemy at bay.

John's fear that Mr. Lordy was on the point of losing this terrible tense struggle was now accentuated by the fact that Father Wun himself suddenly moved. This movement arrested John's full attention. It struck him in a curious way. It was as if something much more than an Oriental-looking personage in a dusky cloth suit and a round collar were changing a physical position.

The priest moved so close to Mr. Lordy that the lower portion of a notably ecclesiastical, tightly buttoned, gastronomical abdomen touched one of the disinfectant-reeking side-pockets of that feverish nonentity.

John himself had actually begun to shiver with sympathetic apprehension. This physical change in Father Wun's position troubled him greatly. He felt convinced that it wouldn't have occurred if the priest hadn't been pretty sure that the attendants would carry off Mr. Lordy, and that he, priest of Omnipotence as he was, would be forced to catch his bus without having achieved anything in the service of his God, or of his Church, or of his conscience.

John's one hope, though he would hardly have dared to confess such a crazy thing even to Tenna, was that the contact of that almost episcopal abdomen with Mr. Lordy's coat-pocket might somehow, in the mysteries of magnetic transference, whirl the man out of danger.

It was at that extremely crucial second that the voice of Tenna Sheer, sounding like the wind through a husky, threshed-out hollow straw almost at John's elbow, became audible. There had been a cessation of talk among the Catholics when the priest made that paternal move to Mr. Lordy's side; and it was therefore in a silence that gave to her words a startling emphasis that everyone heard her say: "I think I saw Mr. Frogcastle just now crossing the grass. He must be going to see Doctor Echetus."

It was like the explosion of an occult bomb. Thrusting himself between the two attendants who were nearest to Mr. Lordy, the panic-stricken Gewlie dragged them off towards the only window in the hall.

As for Tenna, she hurried back to the women's part of the room, where, completely indifferent to Father Wun's momentous tea-party, a group of female inmates was listening with not a few nudges and giggles and chuckles and spasms of delight — for it was evident that the springtime aura of this twenty-sixth day of March was as active inside as it was outside Glint Hall — to a scene between a big plump bouncing girl, whose real name was Lavinia Tatters, but who from a very early age had been christened Tottie Creambo, and the elderly gentleman whom, as Mr. Lordy had pointed out to John at their first encounter, because for some reason he'd reminded her of her father, Tenna had on her first appearance at Glint Hall blindly attacked.

But fortunately for everybody except Gewlie, Tenna had turned her back on the women's table before the appearance of old Rumpibus and Tottie. It was, therefore, with a free mind that she could join the alliance, not unknown in history, between orthodoxy and insanity and assist them, for the time being at any rate, to defeat the Devil.

John himself had switched his gaze from the girl to Gewlie, in time to mark before the man dragged the attendants away the look of ghastly panic on his face. Gewlie's features had indeed contorted themselves into a horrible mask of terror.

"What does he suppose," John foolishly asked himself, "that a pruner of peaches and a planter of raspberry canes can possibly do to a medically approved attendant at a scientifically conducted lunatic-asylum?"

But as Gewlie's victims forgot, or they wouldn't have been where they were, and as Father Allen Wun seems to have forgotten or he wouldn't have been where he was, the inflictors of physical pain in this world are, as a rule, save under special conditions, less deft in their poignant art than their brethren the inflictors of mental pain.

That the opposite of active sadism is passive masochism is undoubtedly sound logic, but the appallingly intimate link between a distorted imagination and the horror-nerve which the power that creates our particular dimension of the multi-verse has inserted in the human-animal nature, as the vivisectors in their research laboratories know well, is by no means confined to sex-perversity.

The expression of horrible terror that convulsed the features of the man Gewlie at that moment lodged itself in John's secret gallery of memorable images, and became a memento crudelitatis and a lasting warning against projecting the faintest sadistic vibration into the ebbing and flowing ocean of floating subhuman thoughts that surrounds us all.

The red blotches on Gewlie's face increased as rapidly as the skin between them became deathly white. It was as if all the blood in his body, rushing inwards to quench the mad thirst of the terror-monster in his soul, had lost its way, and while drops of it had got caught in various skin-holes, other projections of it were drumming at his eyes, pounding at his ears, gurgling in his chest, and, like condensed steam in an engine gone wrong, were not only causing the nerves in his face to give mechanical twitches but had even gone so far as to force certain muscles in his throat to utter inarticulate terror-sounds that were not only beyond anything human but even beyond anything animal.

It was as if the unfortunate man's paroxysm of terror had reached such a point that it had broken down some biological barrier between animal sensibility and the sensitiveness of such inorganic planetary substances in the stellar galaxy as can be imagined shrinking at the threat of some atomic explosion that could throw them back into the void of non-existence! The unhappy wretch had returned from the window, leaving the other attendants to watch the scene from a distance; for it was clear that Mr. Lordy was now quite calm and that Father Wun had the situation well under control.

Gewlie was in fact now standing in baffled, frustrated, defeated helplessness, like a convicted criminal, who, having exhausted every vista of assault, was watching the closing of every corridor of escape. And yet nothing about the man's figure or about the expression of his face suggested any change in his essential nature. His defeat had nothing to do with what we call conversion. It was merely a reduction to temporary helplessness.

"Well, my friends," Father Wun began, looking steadily at Mr. Lordy, who with his mouth dribbling and his eyes dilated, was staring at his dumbfounded enemy much as a spell-bound rabbit might stare at blood-sucking weasel, half of whose head has suddenly been blown off. "Well, my friends, will you let me say good night now, good night to all of you here? My sons, Lordy and Gewlie, are going to talk matters over with me upstairs. Come, my sons, we will soon find out what's wrong with Glint from the viewpoint of the blessed saints. 'Tis they, after all, isn't it, who are the true astronomers and the true discoverers who know where to look for the real zodiacal signs in our human darkness? Come, Gewlie! Come, Lordy!"

And incontinently, taking advantage of the abnormal and almost embarrassing quiescence into which everybody had fallen, including the attendants, who now acted like well-drilled troopers who had been disbanded, Father Wun led his submissive captives away. Past the other table he led them, past the group who had collected round Tottie Creambo and old Mr. Rumpibus, past the loiterers drifting towards the reading-room and the smoking-room, until he reached the foot of the stairs leading to the men's quarters.

It was as soon as Tenna turned her back on Gewlie and Lordy that she perceived old Rumpibus and Tottie. At the sight of them she forgot John altogether and walked straight towards them. John followed her somewhat anxiously, and the Catholics from the tea-party followed John.

Meanwhile the discomfited attendants, talking in a less confident and less casual tone than was usual among themselves, came slowly behind.

"These gentry," thought John, as he became aware of their presence bringing up the rear and caught their murmurings, "will be giving short shrift to any other signs of revolt among us! Father Wun, is he? Well! With the help of Tenna, for to-night at least Father Wun has won!"

8. THE COMMANDER

"YOU DID IT," whispered John to Tenna as soon as they stood together. "I thought that devil had beaten us! And he sure would have if it hadn't been for you. You're a wonder, you really are! Do you think the Father will put a spoke into his wheel?"

Tenna made no reply, and when he bent down to get a look at her face he was surprised and distressed to see an expression upon it he had never seen there before. It was an intent look and yet an abstracted look.

It was an awe-inspiring look and yet it was a wild and reckless look. It was the look of an agitated revolutionary torn between two very different if not opposite methods of revolt. In fact, Tenna's face had become an arena where a gladiatorial struggle was going on.

John followed her gaze. It was fixed upon the dignified and venerable old gentleman whose first name he had already discovered to be Zedekiah, commonly shortened to Zed, and whose surname was Rumpibus.

And suddenly John remembered Mr. Lordy's words about Tenna's crazy assault upon this old man soon after her arrival here two years ago. Yes, Tenna's eyes were fixed on Mr. Rumpibus now, and her whole body, as he could feel when he took hold of her arm above the elbow with his right hand, was quivering.

But that she was struggling valiantly against her obsession was clear, for he could see the twitchings in her forehead, and he could see she had drawn her lower lip tightly into her mouth. This time he began to pray that the grumbling attendants behind him would intervene and pack Tottie off to the reading-room and old Rumpibus to the smoking-room — at any rate, separate them. Wasn't that sort of thing exactly what these cursed attendants were for?

Missy Creambo was obviously teasing her old gentleman with every accusation, tantalisation, provocation, instigation, manipulation, implication, improvisation, monopoligation, desquamation and titillation that came, it could hardly be said into her head, but into whatever nerve-centre connected with the head is dedicated to the exciting and provoking of what are popularly known as “the senses”.

Although John had come to suspect from what he had already heard about him that the “Dean” of Glint Hall was an expert at drawing to his person every vibration of persecution, every brand of mockery, every gesture of provocation that occurred in his neighbourhood, it had never crossed his mind that this insanely masochistic old gentleman could have any effect on Tenna or revive that weird storm of perilous feeling that had swept through her when she first saw him two years ago.

“I must get her away,” he thought. “I must take her to our corner in the smoking-room.”

“Shall we—” he demanded of his companion in a tone sufficiently loud to be heard by those who were near and sufficiently conventional not to arouse the attention of those who were further away, “shall we have another game of draughts, if our place of last night hasn’t been stolen by anybody?”

As he spoke he offered her his arm with as much natural ease as if they had been in a dancing-hall rather than in an institution, but she snatched at the wrist he offered and began whispering to him in a low, concentrated, agitated voice. What she was saying as the spluttered syllables and broken sentences, each one of them growing more disturbing and more startling, as it followed its predecessor, was a dramatic denunciation of Mr. Rumpibus.

“He leads her on,” Tenna murmured. “Can’t you see what he’s doing? He’s driving her crazy. He’s forcing her to go further and further! He’s drawing her on to make her strike him; and when once she does that, it’ll be all up with her. She won’t be able to restrain herself! She’ll pick up something from somewhere, don’t you see, that will really hurt him before them all! Oh, it maddens me to see him do it! He oughtn’t to be allowed to do it!”

Tenna’s silence when her whispers ceased was more agitating to John Hush than her words, for her clutch at his wrist tightened and the pressure of her pulse upon his pulse united them in a dim, blood-dark, cowering riot of throbbing dread that gave him the feeling that they were both wrapped in the same bundle of hunted guilt, a bundle that only wanted to roll, of its own volition, out of the room into the corridor, and out of the corridor down the staircase, and through the door into the garden, and out of the garden under those spikes under the bridge!

It was for John the most unpleasant moment he had had since his arrival in the place. And his discomfort was increased by the way the attendants were now obstinately pressing upon them from behind, longing — he could actually feel the vibration of this longing — to reassert themselves over the inmates after their defeat by Father Wun.

And John had also begun to be troubled by something much more serious: namely by the fact that he had begun to look at Tenna in a way he had prayed to avoid. This was due partly to the vibratory aura of Mr. Rumpibus and partly to a telepathic wave of suspicious viciousness from the attendants behind him, who were obviously jostling both Tenna and himself towards the reading-room in the manner of silent but sharp-toothed sheep-dogs who can hardly wait for some of their flock to behave badly so that a modicum of barking if not of biting might be in order.

Until this unfortunate minute his feeling tor Tenna had been entirely ideal and romantic. He worshipped the startling originality of her mind; and as for her strange, aloof, evasive face, it reminded him of the angel in the Virgin of the Rocks with the long-extended finger pointing towards the divine child.

But now at this confused and disturbed moment he couldn’t resist staring at one particular wisp of her hair disarranged in her present agitation and twisted into the special kind of tangle, that, for some fabulous cause which none of the doctors who had dealt with his case could discover, his demon made him so desperate to clip, cut, carry off, and keep, till, perhaps — oh, madness! — he burnt it with a match.

Yes, this was the first time since they had met that his curious perversity had brought her into the circle of its casting-net. John Hush was not one to miss the appalling seriousness of this shock to his feeling for Tenna. The danger hit him a blow in his most vulnerable place.

“This will never do!” he groaned, and in the strength of his trouble he uttered these words aloud.

“Never do, never do, young man,” echoed one of the attendants with a patronising chuckle just behind his back. “No, it’ll never do, will it?” the man jeered on. “Never, never do, will it?”

When they had all been projected into the corridor, and John was beginning to feel just as if the two of them really were in serious truth the congealed and aggregated bundle he had imagined them, they were accosted, or rather Tenna was accosted, by the only inmate of Glint Hall who actually behaved as if he were out of his mind; that is to say, who behaved in the manner in which most visitors to lunatic-asylums find the inmates behaving — not as ninnies, freaks, antics, and mountebanks, nor as howling, ranting, gesticulating, gibbering, posturing, dribbling, chattering maniacs, nor acting like so many perambulating images of absolute silence or moving masks of irrevocably sealed damnation, but very much as ordinary people.

This was the ex-naval officer, Commander Serius-Ocius, who, after his famous infatuation for Weeny Wimple, the beautiful Tahitian dancer, had retired to the Canary Islands. It must have been his unfortunate return to London from this pleasant retreat that disturbed the balance of his mind. For, once in London, Commander Serius-Ocius got into the habit of behaving in such a manner outside the entrance to Parliament that his conduct compelled the Cabinet to introduce a Private Bill, the passing of which enabled the Home-Secretary, in the interests of the state, to place the gallant gentleman in some appropriate home.

“Are you two people going,” enquired the Commander of our friends, bowing before them, as the poet says, most politely, “to the reading-room or to the smoking-room?”

At this point-blank and perfectly direct challenge John Hush would certainly have extemporised some absolutely fantastic excuse, if he hadn’t just then had the double shock of discovering that not only his new girl-friend but his new-made self — yes, the unfamiliar new self which had been born of his resolve to make the way smooth for his guardian’s union with the beautiful American — were both liable, quite apart from their private affinity, to relapse into their original and totally different aberrations.

So disturbed, indeed, were both our friends by the scene that was going on between Mistress Creambo and old Rumpibus that they were forced to gaze blankly at each other for a second or two in order to realise what these places were to which Commander Serius-Ocius was referring when he talked of reading-rooms and smoking-rooms. Then, speaking simultaneously, and far too impulsively to bother about what words they used, they assured him they were going to the smoking-room.

“Not to play cards, I hope?” remarked the officer from the Canary Islands.

“Oh no!” cried Tenna. “Mr. Hush and I aren’t at all sociable. If we did anything, we’d play draughts.”

“Will you let me share your draughts for half an hour?” enquired the Commander.

Again they were compelled to look at each other; and their looks carried the bewildered blankness that a boy and a girl might have displayed if in the midst of sailing toy boats on the Serpentine they had been suddenly accosted by a foreigner in a turban, who wanted to know the way to the Tower.

“We can find — we can show — we can share,” responded Tenna, with what was at once a curiously eager and a completely absent-minded voice.

“By all means,” John assured him. “We’ll take you straight to where we were sitting last night. It’s a quiet corner, and there’ll be no need to play draughts or indeed play anything else if you don’t want to. There’ll be no need to do anything at all! It really is a quiet corner, isn’t it, Tenna?”

But the girl, with her fingers still clutching his wrist and, if it is permissible to say so, teleporting him forward by a sort of streamlined vibration of invisible will, was far too absorbed in watching Tottie Creambo and Mr. Rumpibus moving towards the reading-room, from which already came the sound of piano-playing, to take any part in this propitiation of the Commander from the Canaries. Miss Creambo’s yellow hair had never been twisted more loosely round her small head, nor had the old black-silk dress that clung to her voluptuous torso and rounded limbs ever given its wearer a more languorous droop or a more enticing allure.

John found it difficult not to imagine himself entering the lists against old Rumpibus, for there could be no disputing Tottie's lecherous desirability. And though he couldn't bring himself to share Tenna's solicitude for Miss Creambo, as opposed to the subtle provocations of Mr. Rumpibus, he was intensely fascinated by that gentleman's exquisitely ascetic features and by the indescribable deftness with which he manipulated his clean-shaven spiritual profile, causing it to cut its way like the prow of a wave-clipping vessel through all those siren enticements, even while he dizzied himself and dazzled himself and dallied and dangled and danced in the aura of that heavy yellow hair and those luxurious caress-inviting curves.

But the Commander from the Canaries, now that he'd grappled with them, was not to be lightly thrown off; and it only needed a second or two of uneasy tension before the disappearance of Miss Tottie's yellow hair and silk-swathed limbs, followed by the incisive and almost papal profile of Mr. Rumpibus — just in time, John couldn't help thinking, to avoid being beheaded by the reading-room door — threw the two friends completely into his power.

And the Commander lost no time in boarding the vessel he had captured. There was no great stir, nor any particular flurry of speculation as the three of them entered the smoking-room and made their way between the tables to last night's corner. Yes, the waste-paper receptacle was still there, and the draught-board with its opposing black and white bodyguards was still there; and it was easy for John Hush, who for all the Commander's quarterdeck presence of mind was much more socially alert, to borrow, with hurried apologies, an empty armchair, a chair much more suited to a philosophical symposium than to a round game; and ensconced in this throne "out of time", as Father Toby might have called it, or "out of space", as Father Wun might have corrected him, Serius-Ocius of the Canaries dropped anchor.

John Hush and Tenna Sheer sat as still as mice listening to the murmur of his hypnotising voice and struggling with all their concentrated attention to follow his startling ideas. They kept their eyes fixed upon him, never once, as most lovers would have felt compelled to do, exchanging a glance of sympathetic bewilderment, and never once, not by as much as one timid question, interrupting the flow of his words.

The Commander was no mean exponent of original ideas when once he was fairly launched. He was a clean-shaved man of about fifty, with closely cut grey hair; unusually small ears, growing as near to his skull as seemed possible if they were to fulfil the purpose of ears; a large, leathery, weather-beaten face; a mouth that was permanently open with a painfully striving look that suggested hard-drawn laboriously-taken breaths and an intelligence concentrated, at the cost of a well-concealed strain and at the risk of the snapping of some secret muscle or dynamic valve or metallic spring, on the single and sole purpose of keeping the ship afloat.

Since every inmate of Glint Hall had strong ideas about every other inmate's most intimate case-history, it was a commonplace of gossip that Commander Serius-Ocius had officially been directed to take a prolonged holiday under Doctor Echetus by reason of a peculiar habit he had fallen into of waylaying Members of Parliament of both parties on their way to Westminster and informing them of the absolute necessity of being more philosophical in their attitude to public affairs if the ship of state was to weather the present storm.

Little did the incorruptible officer know that this wisdom of the ancients to which he desired to recall the rulers of our lives to-day had never been more realistically justified than in the immediate effect of his personality to-night on these two agitated friends.

John Hush, as he listened to him, was telling himself that his own particular mania, a purely erotic one, was no illusion, no hallucination, no fixed idea of an erroneous kind. The curls of girls were alluring. Only fanatical miscreants and ferocious misogynists could deny it. His trouble was therefore purely a matter of degree. To look at a girl's hands or knees or mouth or neck or bosom or ankles or eyebrows or hair with delirious and dissolving ecstasy could not be called insane. It was legitimate fetish-worship and had multitudinous roots in Nature; indeed, as used by Nature in a myriad ways for the propagation of life.

But was insanity used by Nature? Well, maybe it was! John sucked in his lower lip in a grimace that with him took the place of that mysterious mental gesture that people call "smiling to themselves". But at any rate for to-night, with Tenna herself so upset by her lack of degree, or proportion, or whatever it was, in her particular mania, it was hardly a moment to dally with the limits of Nature's indulgence.

In a fierce effort to forget what deliciousness it would be to snip off that maddening brown tress which at the moment wasn't only "disarrayed", as the poet Spenser would call it, but was damp with the perspiration of agitation as well as of the heat of the room, John Hush now set himself to stare at the Commander's mouth, which revealed what his eyes and nose and chin and the whole shape of his skull did their utmost to conceal, namely the desperateness of the man's obsessed concentration.

At several of the card-playing tables in their neighbourhood people looked at each other between the moves of their game with a vague faint quizzical amusement, as much as to say: "Poor wretches! That's what comes of being kind to the father of all bores!"

What the card-players couldn't see, and what the Members of Parliament he waylaid couldn't see, was that this competent and experienced naval officer, whose eyes and nose and chin and forehead were to the highest degree professional, conventional and class-conditioned, revealed not only by the words that issued from his mouth but by the form and imprint, by the psychological tension and stress-moulded expression of the mouth out of which they proceeded, a power of spirit that was positively apostolic. They couldn't see that in the course of every single day and in the course of every single night, whether he were awake or asleep, for it was a peculiarity of Commander Serius-Ocius to practise his philosophy in his dreams, the spirit of this man gave orders from the quarterdeck of Nature to the rudder of the human ship, directing its course and navigating it through windless calms as well as through water-spouts and typhoons.

"I've been waiting for you two," was what he was now telling our friends. "Yes, waiting for you; for I knew by the law of averages that, if I stayed in this place for as long as they let me stay, the chances were that I should find the undivided persona humana. As somebody says in the Symposium of Plato, men and women were once one person, a person who must have moved through life in a circular manner... in fact like a wheel... and I have learnt from this inspired hint that an 'undivided persona'... such as is formed by the conjunction of certain unusually harmonious lovers like yourselves... is bound to understand me... for when this person... I mean the 'undivided persona'... who advances into truth like a wheel... hears my message... yes, when this circular person, this undivided person, this 'persona humana', as you might say, 'in the round', this real two-in-one who is much more divine, as Pythagoras taught, than any Trinity, being wholly free from the diabolical taint of odd numbers and wholly embodied in the divine potency of even numbers... when this two-in-one catches, that is to say when you two, my dear friends, who are now listening to me, catch the drift of my message, you will understand why the truth has been delivered to me once for all by great creative Nature and why it is that she compels me to tell the rulers of land and sea how to rule and the creatures of land and sea how to be ruled."

He paused at this point and looked in turn at his two hearers. He looked at Tenna first and was at once aware of a wave of tenderness towards him, but at the same time was conscious of an intangible spiritual something, a sort of shimmering opalescent resistant object that was about the size of an ordinary dish-cover and which she seemed to have the power, while she shot at him eager, hurried, sympathetic, and even appealing glances, of projecting from her bosom, like a Highland target or Homeric buckler, as if to make sure no unfair advantage was being taken of her yielding mood.

Oh, how well did Commander Serius-Ocius know the various sensations of pride, some exciting, some soothing, some just there, to be put up with, as he would put up with the advertisements in an absorbing magazine — that he experienced now! But his pride soon had a fall. With his left hand resting on the rim of the waste-paper receptacle, and his skull pressing against the side of the raggedly-covered wooden back of his faded armchair, his exultation made his receptivity so intense that his conversion of our lovers actually began to be seriously interrupted by the sub-human consciousness of this same ancient chair whose last-century mischief and antiquated malevolence began obscurely teasing this polite occupier of a piece of furniture formerly used by chair-ridden great-aunts with large tabby cats on their laps.

The Commander now surveyed the young couple before him with the neatly arranged draught-board pressing against her silky black sash and against his silver watch-chain, and it struck him how easily at a signal from some Doctor Echetus in the world of the inanimate that draught-board might obediently cut them both asunder and reduce them to a half-woman and a half-man!

Ah, and how well did he know the sensation he now experienced as he watched those young heads in front of him and saw behind them all those card-players so absorbed in their games that they were like a fleet of little skiffs in a great mist, diminishing, dilating, advancing, receding, outlining themselves with menacing clarity, and then again vanishing like phantoms!

And then the Commander looked from the young woman to the young man, and as he did so a whole set of disturbing memories assailed him. His own grey sleeve about the wrist of the hand that dallied with the rubbish-box exchanged itself for a much darker one with gleaming official stripes, and he felt as if he ought to be uttering brief, clear, practical, technical words of command; anything but strange intimations of mystical wisdom!

But now instead of those old mechanically jerked-out laconic syllables such as, “yes sir! no sir! three feet to starboard, sir!” what he heard from the young man opposite him were the diplomatic words: “I don’t want to tire you with questions, Commander, but if you could put into a plain and simple sentence the chief points of your new philosophy it would be of the greatest interest to us both. Miss Sheer has been very good to me since I arrived yesterday afternoon and I hope you too, sir, will help me with your advice. It isn’t easy, is it, sir, to get reconciled to the routine of a place like this? But Miss Sheer tells me the worst feelings come after a patient has just got through the first settling down. There's a revulsion, she says, that comes then, that is worse than any of the first shocks, because there's an unpleasant sense of the thing going on — if you can follow me, sir? — for a rather long time — going on, in fact, if you will let me put it crudely, for ever."

From its expression of simple concern Commander Serius-Ocius's face became a living mask of heroic compassion. Both the young people opposite him were regarding him with the look of a pair of precocious children who in the midst of an elaborate game have got themselves, for all their cleverness, into such appalling trouble that they can't get out of it without the help of a competent as well as a kind policeman.

"Well, well, well, well!" he repeated sympathetically. "It's clear that you two are born — yes; I can't refrain from saying so — born to be recipients of my doctrine. And it's very simple. That's the beauty of it, my dear children; it's so very simple. All you've got to use is your mind. And, mark you, it needn't be a clever mind. It needn't even be a sane mind. That's what people are too stupid to understand. It can be a crazy mind or a silly mind. It can even be an idiotic mind."

At this moment John Hush made a scarcely perceptible movement with his head so as to get one of his eyes, his left eye as a matter of fact, into focus with one of Tenna's.

"The mistake," the Commander went on, "that everybody makes, is to assume you have to be wise and clever and intellectual to get at the truth about life. My philosophy teaches the opposite of all that nonsense! You've got to clear your mind at the start of all other ideas. In fact you've got to clear your mind of all ideas! You've got to use your mind: that's what I teach. But not for the purpose of thinking. You've got to use your mind to stop yourself from thinking! What do you suppose our minds were made for? For the low, corrupting, insidious, perverse, drug-like vice of thinking? The gods forbid! The mind is far too rare a thing, too delicate a thing, too subtle a thing, too complicated a thing, too noble and sacred a thing, to be used for thinking! That would be like using a magic wand for a walking-stick or a porridge-spoon to move a manure-heap.

"The mind's everything. But you don't want to wash your feet in everything! The mind's air, water, earth, fire. It's life; it's death; it's the world; it's the end of world. A mad mind is simply a mad world. A weak mind is simply a weak world. There's nothing else, I tell you, my children, except reservoirs upon reservoirs of surplus matter.

"And don't forget this, my friends, you are your minds! When people talk about the soul surviving the body they're only reminding themselves of the importance of their minds! Our minds are our souls. Whether any of them succeeds in surviving death is a question none has ever answered or can ever answer. Our minds are surrounded by what used to be called 'matter' and now is called by a lot of other names.

"But calling it other names doesn't change its nature. Only one thing changes the nature of matter, and that is the diving into it of mind. It is by plunging your minds, my dear children, into what you touch, hear, see, smell and taste, that you endow poor, patient, humble, passive, enduring matter, which by itself is nothing, with all its magic attributes. They are all in you, for you are a multitude. Every self is a multitude and every self is a mind, and the plunging of every mind into matter creates a new world.

"That is why it is ridiculous to say that there is only one world. There are as many worlds as there are minds to plunge into matter, and these are beyond counting.

"And don't you see what a revolution this makes in our whole system of life? What do we all want? Only one thing, children, only one thing! To enjoy ourselves! But do we want to enjoy ourselves in the same way? Of course not. For no two of us are alike. Well then, what are the things that hinder us from enjoying ourselves? Who doesn't know the damned list? Pain first of all; then cold and hunger; then fear; then illness and discomfort; then disappointment, frustration, humiliation; then sex, sex in too big, or too little, or too eccentric doses; then some mental disturbance, such as those that get us here; and finally — and this is far the worst of the lot, save raving frenzy or extreme pain — what we call boredom, ennui, feeling dead-sick of everything!

"Now let me ask you a plain question, my children. Is there any way, even for a very short period of time, by which we can shake off these obstacles to enjoying ourselves?

And, if there is, what is it? Well, children, I would answer this question at once. There is such a way. And I'll tell you what it is in one word. Forgetting!

"Great creative Nature has given us the power of forgetting everything except extreme pain. As we know well enough from our life in this place, madness doesn't necessarily follow a person into his sleep. Nobody sleeps sounder than a certified lunatic.

"Before you're certified you suffer from two quite special horrors. The first of these might be called the fear of insanity in general. The second can only be called by some very queer name known to the person who feels it and known to nobody else. In fact this horror I will call our personal and particular mania.

"After you're certified — at least this I understand to be the usual experience — you lose the dread of madness in general but in place of this you begin to experience an increased terror of what I might call your 'old particular'. And now I come to a very peculiar phenomenon, and it is this. Though your horror of your 'old particular' is increased, when it is actually upon you you can endure it much more easily when you're 'certified' than you could before. And there is a curious reason for this. There emanates a certain aura from the pressure around us here of so many souls exerting their divine power of forgetting!

"There isn't an inmate among us here — no, nor an attendant" — and Commander Serius-Ocius gave a little jerk of his close-cropped gentlemanly skull in a direction that might be described as backward and upward— "who is not concentrating on forgetting. Nor is it concealed from any inmate of any asylum in this country that the attendants grow very quickly more dangerously demented than their patients. Thus, taking patients and attendants together — and of course it wouldn't do to exclude from these creators of such blessed clouds of oblivion the illustrious head of our institution — thus there is created here an aura of what might be called retrogressive nihilism, or the power of uncreating the created, the power, you might say, of unliving life, unsolidifying matter, unactualising reality, and of reducing the is to the level of the is not.

“Further than this, in the sublime art of ‘retrogressive nihilism’, it would be difficult to go, unless we reduced the historic was to what never under any condition could possibly have been. But now I will tell you, my dear friends, what we’ve got to do with our minds instead of letting them give way to this worse than bestial vice, this human vice of thinking. I tell you we have perverted the true direction of Nature’s spontaneous movement.

“Some devil has done it, some proud morbid degenerate depraved-perverted devil who has hated the large free motions of the stars in their courses, and of the constellations, and of the galaxies, and of the nebulae, and of the revolving planets! What we must do, my dear friends, is to break away for ever from this vicious, stinking, polluted, maniacal habit of using the mind to think!”

At this point the intense emotion surging up behind the Commander’s own mind brought it about that his tone ceased to resemble either the tone of a quarterdeck voice, or the tone of a lights-burning-bright-sir voice, and became the kind of fatally well-known tone that in a second drew the two tall attendants towards the utterer of it.

“Pardon me, sir!” whispered John hurriedly, bending forward over the elbow of the Commander’s armchair. “Pardon me, sir! I believe those officials are going to meddle with us!”

The naval man screwed up his eyes as if to look through a telescope. Then, turning his neatly-shaped head a little to one side, he closed one eye and surveyed the tall attendants through the other, as if he were measuring them from the mouth of a turret-gun in preparation for giving them a broadside fore and aft.

Relaxing after this, as if he really had disposed of them, he continued his disclosure in a quieter voice. “You will say,” he went on, “that there’s nothing for the mind to do if it stops thinking. I reply there is everything for it to do!”

As John listened, with his eye on the attendants and on some of the tables, too, where people had paused in their game, he began to wonder whether the leading statesmen of our island, as they were arrested by this ancient mariner on the threshold of Parliament, actually heard a single word of what he said ere they looked round wildly for a policeman.

“Sane people are really rather stupid,” John said to himself, “to take no interest at all in our ideas. If Hamlet pretended madness and Don Quixote survived madness and Ajax died mad, madness can’t be a negligible thing.”

But Serius-Ocius had begun again. “A mind virgin to all thought,” he said, “can become a diving-suit for the soul to enjoy itself in! I am not asserting that the mind is independent of the body. I’m only saying that it can take from our body, and from the bodily senses, and from time and space, all it needs to form a diving-suit, which, though remaining attached to the body by a sort of umbilical cord, has the power of plunging into any substance it likes outside itself.

“And now I arrive at my central point. What we all live for is happiness. And what is happiness? Happiness is a series of pleasures, of pleasures that in the long run satisfy us completely. Without a number of single pleasures, delicious in themselves, it’s impossible to have any satisfying sequence of pleasures.

“And of what do single pleasures consist? They consist of simple pleasures; and here we reach what people call the heart of the matter. All matter is a mass of material outside ourselves. All pleasure is the sensation we experience when we plunge into something outside ourselves. Mind is the self within us and matter is the self without us.

“This plunge of the self into the not-self is what we call pleasure; and the more we enjoy this plunge, and the more often we make it, the more pleasure we get from life. Therefore we must struggle to disregard and forget all the impressions that hinder this plunge and we must force ourselves at every possible moment, and along with whatever else we may be doing, to keep a portion of our mind free not only to make the plunge but to immerse itself in the element into which it plunges.”

Commander Serius-Ocius’s voice had again risen to a disturbing pitch and again certain of the groups of card-players had stopped their play to listen. The two attendants had now become three attendants and were clearly only waiting to pounce till it was unavoidably evident that the ex-naval man had gone far enough to justify his being placed in the punishment wing of the institute.

And suddenly the Commander, grown aware that there was opposition to him in the room and a hostile silence, leapt to his feet.

“It is my duty,” he cried in a thundering voice, “to announce to everyone here the beginning of a new world! The new world will not be given us by religion, nor will it be discovered for us by science, but it will be created by ourselves as if we were gods! We shall create it out of the reservoir of ever-fresh material which lies at the back of space and time. I have only been able to discover this because of my training in the Navy, and it is as a discovery of the Navy that I announce—”

But to John’s and Tenna’s consternation the attendants had laid hold of him now and were taking him by the arm as he stood confronting the whole room as if he was quelling a mutiny at sea. With his compact close-cropped skull, his straight figure, his square shoulders, his hands in the side-pockets of his grey well-fitting jacket, he looked as if he were the Admiral of all the West defending the Straits of Gibraltar from an armada of Mongols.

9. HAMMER AND NAILS

THE TWO ATTENDANTS who had seized the Commander by his arms were not his only menace. There was a third person there, who was already beginning to unfold with scientific nicety what Tenna from her experience of the place knew well as a special kind of strait-waistcoat recently invented by Doctor Echetus and which had the peculiarity of being able to be compressed into so small a space that it could be carried about in the pocket of any attendant who understood how to slip it neatly and quickly over a patient's unruly torso and rebellious arms.

But suddenly the attention of each of the three keepers as well as of their powerful antagonist, was diverted by an excited inrush of a new crowd of inmates who bursting into the room began calling out: "Where is Commander S.O.? We want Commander S.O.! The Father says Commander S.O. is mentioned in the paper this morning! The Father says the paper says Commander S.O."

Undeterred by the presence of the three attendants, the newcomers, whom Hush recognised at once as the group of Catholics he had met at tea, were soon hurrying and scrambling into our friend's corner. They were all excited and they were all in high spirits.

"Had they," John asked himself, "been crowding round the door of Mr. Lordy's bedroom in the hope of seeing in the flesh some palpable exorcism of Satan? And had their enthusiasm for righteousness taken the form of hero-worship for the Navy?"

Suddenly John Hush saw Mr. Lordy among them. But it was a Mr. Lordy in a transformed mood. The cloud of predestined insignificance which habitually emanated, like a subhuman aura from the man's eyes, nose, mouth, forehead, cheeks, chin, head, neck, shoulders, hips, legs and feet, had, so to say, changed its colour. It was still there, this emanation of something as typically and normally insignificant as the smell of a fox is foxy or the smell of a fish is fishy; but it was no longer blurred by the smoke of self-contempt.

It was as unobtrusive as ever, but it was satisfied to be itself. Its radiation, like a wavering flickering of light following the dragging footsteps of some unknown tramp-saint, caused its possessor no embarrassment.

He felt no pride in it. But if he ever were conscious of it, it gave him a faintly agreeable sensation, like a small acid-drop in the mouth.

"This must be," thought John Hush, "the magic of the Church of Rome. How on earth can that Father have worked it? Did they all see him putting the fear of God into Gewlie? No, that wasn't the way the Church of Rome did things! Father Wun must have won again by some subtle appeal to some secret virtue in this horrible man known to nobody else; and this momentary release from his obsession must have created such a vacuum in the soul of the egregious Gewlie that the living waters of natural feeling must have rushed to that spot from every quarter of the compass and brimmed up so over poweringly in the soul of everybody there that they had to find an outlet in some traditional popular channel, which of course the accident of the Commander being mentioned in the paper had beautifully supplied."

But that gentleman's voice was being raised again to its more than quarter-deck resonance and John Hush noticed that one of the attendants, the one with the Doctor's patent strait-waistcoat, had vanished from the scene; doubtless to fetch reinforcements for the forces of order.

In desperation he turned to Tenna, who was standing by herself with a strained and troubled frown and with her eyes on the door of the room. She clearly was listening intently; and John's imagination began conjuring up a sea-fight wherein the rest of them were all engaged on deck while she alone at the stem of the vessel was scanning the horizon in the expectation of the spouting of a whale.

Alas! John knew only too well who his friend's whale was! It was a human person. It was that old gentleman who not only derived satisfaction from being teased, tormented, and tantalised by Tottie Creambo, but would have derived a similar satisfaction from being beaten up by Tenna for permitting such liberties to be taken with him by Tottie!

“For God’s sake, tell me how to quiet him!” John now kept whispering in Tenna’s ears. “Listen to me, Tenna! For God’s sake listen to me! We must quiet him before any more of them come! They’ll keep him shut up for months if we let him go on, and you know how he’ll feel if they do that!”

At last she heard him. With a deep sigh that seemed to shake her whole body, her tension relaxed, and very slowly, as if on the countenance of a patient recovering by degrees from an anaesthetic, a whimsical smile flitted across her face. What puzzled John as completely as it delighted him was that she didn’t seem to need any further elucidation of that moment’s crisis or of what had to be done. She seemed to awake from her own private grief straight into the Commander’s private grief, and to understand them both equally well. She was like a sea-bird who has dived after a fish, and who now, safely returned to the surface, flies through the air with as much knowledge of what that more rarified element requires of it as it displayed beneath the water when it caught the fish.

And what she did now was as astonishing to John as was the calm and collected assurance with which she did it. She went straight to Mr. Lordy and had a hurried word with him; a word which John, who was watching her with as much anxiety as he was feeling for the Commander, felt impelled to overhear.

“Can you remember, Mr. Lordy,” she asked him in a clear whisper, “what it was you told him?” — and she gave her head a little jerk in the direction of the Commander, who was now standing, though the men were not actually touching him, with an attendant on each side.

“I mean,” she continued, “that night he was so excited on the staircase and what you said calmed him down so completely.”

Seldom had John Hush felt more respect for a living creature than he felt for Mr. Lordy at that second. The intense guilelessness of the puzzled and baffled gaze the man turned upon Tenna would have made anyone, he decided, trust him with their wife, their child, their country, and their country’s gods!

"What did I say to him? Oh, Miss Tenna, please believe me when I tell you I had nothing I could say to him. But wait — wait! Doesn't it say in the Bible or in Shakespeare, 'Nothing can come of nothing?' Oh, but I do remember now! I told him about Lieutenant Lordy, a member of our family in the what-do-you-call-it century when there was a hole in the ship and the water was rushing in and our relative said to him — I mean to the captain, or admiral, or whatever he was then — I mean to Lord Nelson— 'If you please, sir,' our relative said, 'we'll be in Davy Jones' locker by this time to-morrow!' And all Lord Nelson answered — and our relative remembered his very words, because when he was paid off and back home, as you might say, he was took by what in those what-do-you-call-them days they called 'horse's fever' and he repeated Lord Nelson's very words to the Reverend who was anointing him, and that's how he came to be called 'Lord Nelson's Pint' because you'd only to treat him to a pint and the admiral's very words were yours—"

By this time not only John Hush but everybody within hearing, including Commander Serius-Ocius himself and each of the two attendants, was listening intently; nor did it take John very many minutes to become aware that the attendants had begun to edge away as rapidly and imperceptibly as they could, and had even begun to present the appearance of having no longer any particular interest in that corner of the room.

It was at that critical moment that John perceived that the man with Doctor Echetus's latest invention in his pocket had returned, but was now whispering rather foolishly and even crossly to his reinforcements and was clearly sending them off whence they'd come.

"And what," enquired Tenna, who had gathered up, John could see, into an invisible ball of gossamer thread the whole psychic aura of this improvement in the situation, "did Lord Nelson actually say to your ancestor, Mr. Lordy?"

The little man shut his eyes as if to shut out a world made up of imaginary horrors created by the activity of those accursed "thoughts" whose perilous frivolity the Commander wished to restrain. "What our relative told Lord Nelson," he announced, "was that they'd all be dead men by that time to-morrow; and what Lord Nelson replied was: 'Pump at the water — hammer at the nails! Leave till to-morrow who sinks or sails!'"

John stepped back a pace or two then, and so did Tenna, for it became clear that Mr. Lordy's tone in uttering this quotation, quite as much as the quotation itself, had saved the day. It was a commonplace tone and it was a conventional tone, but it was a tone that in its very conventionality conveyed so clearly the familiar picture painted by the Lord of Hosts himself all over our old island of brown beer in pewter-mugs, of leather-trodden sawdust on uneven floors, of mongrel dogs lifting grateful legs against whitewashed posts, of creaking sign-boards, and finally of "the wind and the rain and a little tiny wit making content with our fortunes fit", that it swept into Doctor Echetus's laboratory for lost dogs and demented men as if it brought a nepenthe that could redeem all sorrows and assuage all pain. At any rate, the strait-waistcoat expert and his colleagues had vanished, while the attendants who had been at the Commander's elbow had not even resumed their perambulation of the room but had seated themselves at a table near the door and were now sedately smiling at each other as they alternately shook a dice-box.

All this, John Hush soon realised, was no miracle. He had only to lend an ear to what the Commander, who had reseated himself in his armchair, was now saying to Mr. Lordy, to understand what the strait-waistcoat man, the second he came back, had realized in a flash, that — pro tem, anyway — the devil of insanity had been driven out and Commander Serius-Ocius was once more a quiet and competent ex-officer of the fleet.

Mr. Lordy himself, who had worked this temporary cure of the most distinguished of his fellow-inmates, solely and simply by becoming a medium for all the undistinguished persons who, from the furthest Hebrides to the Scilly Isles, had in the last hundred years uttered, and with no particular emphasis, the word "Nelson", was only anxious now that these well-meaning but abjectly heretical pair of friends should not altogether miss the significance of the coming among them, even for a brief hour or two, of a priestly successor to the apostolic revealers of the one Truth.

It can be believed that neither of our friends was lacking in interest in the fate of Attendant Gewlie nor at the same time very surprised to learn that since the particular kind of wickedness in which the wretch was such a master was not a "mortal" but only a "venial" sin, this weasel-like pursuer of human rabbits had not even been threatened with dismissal from Glint Hall. Well, he would only have gone to another asylum if he had been dismissed from this one; and, after all, there was his maniacal terror of Mr. Frogcastle to restrain him here, not to speak of Father Wun's awareness of his horrible vice.

"You were saying, sir—" John hesitatingly observed, for though the last thing he wanted to do was to arouse the officer's nervous eloquence again, he knew from his own feelings that while Tenna and he were, so to speak, in the psychic attitude, sitting at the man's feet, it would be embarrassing and difficult to attempt any sort of ordinary give-and-take conversation, "you were saying that the purpose of life is to enjoy ourselves. I didn't want to interrupt you then, but I'd be so grateful, sir, and I'm sure my friends Miss Sheer and Mr. Lordy would say the same, if you'd tell us a little more about your ideas as to the enjoyment of life and where we young ones are apt to get things mixed up.

"I don't want to bother you, sir, if you feel too tired to talk any more" — John added this after a pause, a pause too craftily short, however, for the officer to take advantage of it — "but I'd like to know, and so, I'm sure would my friends here, a little more about this 'plunging' you spoke of into all these various forms and colours of matter, and why it is that this brings us pleasure so deep that such pleasure can be regarded as the purpose of life."

The expression upon the officer's face as he listened to this crafty rigmarole touched John Hush to the heart. He longed to exchange glances with Tenna, who would he felt sure share this spasm of tendresse. Chance was as tender to him, however, as he felt towards the Commander, for had he met Tenna's look he would have found it unsympathetic. She was prepared to help the officer against the authorities, but when she perceived on his face the masculine unction of mental superiority and the philosophic pride of being in a position to "lay down" as we say, "the law", a fierce jet of rebelliousness shot through her veins, and the officer's face, that face which to John held a touching revelation of boyish simplicity in its glow of triumphant exposition, became an epitome of all she loathed most in the world; became, in fact, what the world loves to call "benign and fatherly John's chance-given luck certainly held out during the whole length of what followed, for if he had glanced but once into her face he would have been thunderstruck by its expression.

Mr. Lordy did glance at it; and what he saw compelled him to say to himself, “I wish the Father knew what a good Catholic this girl would be! I’m sure he’d try to convert her. She’s the sort of girl who’d make a perfect mother to half a dozen obedient souls. She knows that all insanity comes from pride and can only be really exorcised, as the Father said upstairs just now, through that slit in the skin we call ‘humility’, that slit in the skin for which the angels have a heavenly word of their own!”

What had specially struck Mr. Lordy about Tenna was something that John, just because he was listening to her so intently, hadn’t noticed — namely the startling difference between her profile and her full face. “She’s a queer one,” thought Mr. Lordy. “She’s both a profile-girl and a full-face girl!”

And, indeed, Mr. Lordy’s verdict approached the truth. Tenna was both these things. In profile, her soft dead-white skin was emphasised by the way her brown hair, hair that was so fine and filmy that it naturally clung together in smooth masses, fell so thickly, like a heavy shadow, over her ear and across the side of her face. Her delicate aquiline nose and small soft chin, together with the tender fluctuating lines at the corner of her mouth, indicative of the exquisitely childish curves with which her lips would part, composed a living portrait that simply and entirely vanished, like the vanishing of a lovely ghost at cockcrow, the moment she turned her head and you saw her full face. Then you realised how pitilessly her unbalanced sensibility, her subhuman shyness, her morbid shrinking from contact with events and people, hurt her and lacerated her; then you realised how all the complicated habits she had acquired of taking life so much harder than others took it left her suffering from a malady that might well have been called the malady of being a skin short.

The more he studied the girl’s look, the more sorry for her Mr. Lordy became. It must be, he told himself, the absence from her life of the help of a good priest that caused her front-face to differ from her side-face and to be lined with an anxiety so far beyond the natural wont of her years. She had four deep perpendicular lines descending her forehead and no less than four horizontal ones — very faint, it is true, but the carefully concerned Mr. Lordy was able to count them in that electric-lit corner — crossing her forehead, while her eye-sockets were so deep, and the troubled brown orbs within them so swiftly moving and so glittering with a dangerously intent lustre, that Mr. Lordy experienced a sympathetic shock as she talked to him and even began vaguely wondering if there were anything that a simple person could do to ease her agitation.

One thing he could see clearly. The interest that her young friend Mr. Hush appeared to be taking in this voluble gentleman from the Royal Navy was extremely painful to her. All seven frowns, both the perpendicular ones and the horizontal ones, obviously deepened every time she looked in the Commander's direction, while her eyes in their hollow sockets almost ceased to be brown and took to themselves a peculiarly alarming golden tint as if she were some weird kind of metamorphosed bird — a sandpiper, perhaps, Mr. Lordy thought, considering her long thin limbs! — who might suddenly begin flying round the room and beating its wings against the walls!

But the officer's words, as fascinating to John Hush as they were infuriating to Tenna Sheer, were now beginning to arrest Mr. Lordy's own distracted attention.

"We can't get away from it," Serius-Ocius was saying. "The 'I' in us — and that is of course the mind that uses our body and its senses — is the only soul we've got. The first great mistake a typical Member of Parliament makes is to assume that, because thought can't function without a thinker, there must be within the body, though quite capable of slipping out of it in sleep, or in a trance, or at death, a queerly functioning, formless entity called a 'soul'.

"According to this idea we are presented with the quaint situation of not only possessing two thinkers for one set of thoughts but with the danger that if one of these 'thinkers', for instance this fantastic butterfly called the 'soul', were to slip out of the body and take a holiday, whether in a sleep or a trance, it might take the mind's thoughts — that is to say our thoughts, the thoughts of our mind-self or the living thing that says 'I am I' — along with it, so that we should be left with nothing but a dumb, deaf, blind unconscious self, every one of whose thoughts have been stolen by the runaway soul.

"I well remember being told once by one of these political rogues — I think it was the Member for Wash Lane, the second son of the first Lord Antimacassar — that his soul always left his body when he was asleep.

"'You don't dream, then?' I said. 'Oh yes,' he cried, 'I'm a terrific dreamer!'

"'But how,' I protested, 'can an animal body deserted by the creature inside it which thinks, that is to say deserted by its own consciousness, have any dreams at all?'

"That did stump him, and he began at once, as they always do when defeated in argument, looking round for a policeman. You see now, don't you, my children, the mistake our preposterous rulers make? They are convinced that all thoughts must be the thoughts of thinkers — whereas, of course, there isn't a single traveller by sea who hasn't come upon derelict thoughts drifting on the waves like seaweed, and there isn't a traveller by road who hasn't come upon wind-piled ridges of desert-sand where thoughts are buried thick as the shards of beetles in the cracks of forgotten sepulchres.

"What these same Members of Parliament — good easy men I — are inclined to do, in their anxiety to fob off their thoughts upon their butterfly soul, is to forget that what we call our 'thoughts', speaking in the plural, are really only another name for the inexplicable phenomenon, speaking in the singular, that we call our consciousness. You can find lost 'thoughts' drifting about like fallen leaves or floating seaweed, but it is only from the consciousness in some sort of living creature that they are originally born."

Mr. Lordy had completely given up any further attempt to follow the peculiar reasoning of the man who thought he could teach philosophy to Members of Parliament; but it came rushing into his mind how quaint it would be if the souls of people really could leave their bodies and go roaming about! "Suppose," so he thought in his secret heart, "Father Wun were at this minute watching our proceedings and listening to our conversation; and suppose Father Toby came floating by, like a sea-urchin, mounted upon some great squidlike jelly-fish thing, would I be glad or sorry to see them fight?

"And what would they look like? Oh, how queer it all is! Why are people so odd-looking, anyway, quite apart from their souls? And why should there be people at all? Or a world at all? Or anything at all?"

At this point the Commander bent forward eagerly in his chair and the weird thought crossed the consciousness of John, who was watching the man's worn handsome excited face very earnestly, that his own ambassadorial politeness, learnt in the Balkans and which he knew had become a habit with him, was acting upon this honest sailor like a magic spell, and indeed was having an extremely curious effect on him drawing out from him, as if by an hypnotic process, thoughts and feelings such as in the natural course of events he would have hesitated to express even to those indignant Members of Parliament he was wont to waylay.

"A person's mind," the officer went on with impassioned vehemence, "is himself, his identity, his individuality, his conscious ego. We all of us feel this mind-self within us to be connected with our body, but yet at the same time we feel it to be independent of our body. But what we do not feel is that its self-consciousness, its power of realising its past as well as its present, its future as well as its past, is the self-consciousness of a living thing within our body, a living thing that could leave our body and go moving about quite freely through time and space. We do not feel this because it isn't there to feel.

"There is no soul to go rampaging about. What exists is our self-consciousness, our mind-self, and this, though we feel it to be independent of the body, we also feel it to be dependent upon the body. It is more than the body; but, while the body lives it can only escape from the body in imagination and in dreams. And thus I come, my dear boy—"

Mr. Lordy, who was growing more and more concerned by the expression of Tenna's face, by the gleam in her eyes and by the deepening lines on her forehead, told himself at this point that it was only just in time the officer had thrown in "my dear boy" and had lowered his voice and concentrated so definitely upon John Hush. "She'd have flown at him in a second," Mr. Lordy told himself, "just as she did at old Rumpibus that day."

“Thus I come,” went on the Commander, “to my answer to your question about pleasure and happiness. These things indeed are the whole purpose of life. Faith, hope, and charity; truth, beauty, science and art; passion and compassion; all these are precious to us only in so far as they make us happy, only in so far as they enable us to enjoy life. And the point of it is that the nature of our ego, of our mind-self, the nature of this ‘I am I’ that is not lurking, like an ambiguous parasite, under our skin, but is the companion and mate of our old familiar doomed-to-perish dust-and-ashes body, the nature of our mind-self is such that when it plunges into the forms and colours, the sounds and scents, the atmospheres and wandering airs, of the elements that surround our body — when, I say, it resolves itself into these things, sinks into them, immerses itself in them, loses itself in them, and yet, by that mysterious principle in life, which Jesus seems to have snatched from the air, draws out of them a magical nourishment, then and then only is it happy and content.

“It is this immersion of the mind-self in whatever it may be it chooses to feed upon, that constitutes its secret of enjoying itself; and we must never forget—”

But here the Commander was compelled to drop his dominating flagship tone; not because anybody contradicted him, still less because anyone was jeering at him, but solely because there wasn’t a single person at that moment listening to a word he said. Not that the Commander’s voice ceased at that point. It went on. He was a determined gentleman and he had a message. And this message was to the broken intellects and drifting wits of the entire world. But he had ceased to lean eagerly forward, staring at John Hush. He had relaxed. He had stretched himself out in his armchair. He was twisting a large signet-ring with a Roman goddess engraved on it, along with the words “Sooner or Later”, round and round the third finger of his left hand.

Nor would it be true to declare that, though the three persons he imagined himself converting had ceased to listen, and though Tenna was hating him, and Mr. Lordy was puzzled by him, and John’s mind was wandering from him to Halfway House, the words he was uttering were wholly lost.

On the contrary, while Tenna held her hands over her face without being able to stop herself from glaring through her own fingers at those seafaring fingers twisting that classical ring, and while John thought, "Will she agree to marry him before Midsummer Day comes and changes everything?" Mr. Lordy, who had caught the phrase "constitutes the secret of enjoyment" discovered that the word "constitute" had a potent effect upon him. Mr. Lordy felt compelled to repeat the word. "Constitute, constitute," he muttered. "Constitute, constitute."

And it seemed to him as if the word "constitute" were a giant crane that had the power of seizing upon him and hoisting him up to heaven. Not unkindly nor clumsily was it ready to hoist him the moment he wished to be hoisted.

It hadn't intruded on him. It wasn't pushing itself forward. It had nothing in common with a bulldozer. It was just there, ready and able to hoist, anxious to hoist, but with no intention of hoisting until required by the hoisted.

Mr. Lordy began to feel faintly sleepy. "Not quite yet," he told the great being whose name was "constitute"— "I'm not quite ready to be hoisted; but I soon shall be — constitute — constitute — constitute."

10. THE ZEIT-GEIST

WHEN JOHN HUSH and Tenna Sheer had separated for the night, and John was once more alone in his bedroom, the first thing he did was to go straight up to the Rembrandt picture of the Supper at Emmaus and begin deliberately talking to the newly resurrected Christ as if he were Mr. Lordy; and, indeed, there was a remarkable resemblance between the unique painter's idea of how Jesus looked under that stone arch in the old inn and the way Mr. Lordy looked when seated at any meal in the Glint dining-room; and it struck John Hush with overwhelming force that the rays of divinity which were emanating from that timid, nervous, and unassuming person with such embarrassing persistence were a disturbing bewilderment to the man himself.

"Well, well!" John muttered. "So you can break bread in Doctor Echetus' research laboratory as well as anywhere else, can you? And that serving-boy can do his bit of day's work, can he, bringing you that fish's head to eat without bothering whether the fish-hook's still in its gill or not? Yes, by God! that boy can go on just the same, waiting at table and saving his wages and going to the bazaar to find a girl who can be kind, and feeling no necessity to be more righteous than his parents or his playmates or to be so wise that he could say 'Rabbi' to the man under the arch when the others hailed him as master, and yet not be an absolute idiot in Israel!

"Yes, yes! Nor is there need — no need at all, is there, my little Lord Jesus — for this honest serving-boy to run round to the stable to see that the asses have water in case of their being wanted. He can bring the fish's head in, can't he, Lord Jesus, and carry it out, too, after the hungry travellers have scraped it clean, without worrying whether it was caught from the common beach or from the promontory preserved for Caesar's household?"

His mood changing again, John moved back to the door and turned off the light. This proceeding converted his bedroom into a twilit chamber in a city-wall, and he rushed across to the barred window and clutching the top of it with his hands where it was open and where the smell of trodden straw and lately dropped dung was blown in along with a vague waftage from the invisible sap of millions of misty grass-stalks and thousands of wet wind-stirred withy-buds drooping above the weirs and the dams and the muddy ditches where the unseen river made its sweeping curve to the north, he began pressing his forehead hard against that portion of his window that had been designed to be unmoveable.

And just here upon the steel frame of the windowpane he now proceeded to give several sharp taps with that portion of his skull out of which, if he had been the Devil, or even if he had been the humblest of the angels who followed the Devil, there might have sprouted, indeed there would naturally have sprouted, a fine pair of horns.

He could detect the light in the upper window of the north lodge where his friend the wife of the gate-keeper slept, that chamber which twenty-four hours ago had filled him with such frightening thoughts. Then, without turning on the electric light, he began rapidly pacing his room from wall to window.

The curious greenish light that washed back and forth in his chamber like an unpalpable estuary of air seemed, as he marched up and down, to pass through him as if his body were the plasm of a newly born spirit, or rather, if spirits can die, of a newly dead spirit. He was desperately wondering now about the four quarters of the dark sky; and the problem that particularly absorbed him was the question as to how far round this place the sweeping curve of the river went.

He had been strongly reminded just now of the river by the smell of damp mud, and he decided that Glint Hall must be surrounded by its flow in a vast curve of several miles, stretching from north to south across that western horizon where shone at night the lights of Halfway House.

If he were right in supposing the river's curve to be as extensive as this, there would be only one of all the four horizons free of this encirclement, only one with what you might call a dry approach. But which way, he kept asking himself, did the river flow? Did it flow from north to south across this western horizon? Or did it flow from south to north?

And there was another question that bothered his mind. What was the mysterious something that stood between those two Scotch firs that were growing side by side on the crest of the ridge, where that prehistoric camp was? He was sure there was something there in addition to those firs. What the devil was it?

It was something monumental, poetical, and very important; and it was something that separated those two trees! Ay, he remembered now. It was the sun! But he hadn't seen it himself. That's why he'd forgotten. Someone had told him that at a certain time in the year the sun rose exactly between those two Scotch firs as you saw them on the crest of that ancient camp from the windows of Glint looking east.

Yes, that was what it was — the sun! And he'd been told that it would soon be the time of the year when you could see the sun rise between those trees.

He suddenly stood dead-still in the middle of the room. Why the devil was it so extremely necessary to him to get the precise geography of Glint Hall and of the position of his room in regard to the points of the compass?

He concluded, but without much assurance of finality in the idea, that it had something to do with a queer fear that had come over him ever since Tenna had been so upset by Mr. Rumpibus, namely the fear that his own mind was on the edge of playing him some outrageous trick! "Normal people," as he had grown accustomed to call the bulk of his fellow-creatures since he had become obsessed by the indescribable thrill of his peculiar use of nailscissors, "normal people" always seemed to take geography and the points of the compass for granted.

And yet they were assisted in their successful struggle to keep their mental balance far more than they realised by their dependence on the points of the compass. "I must get it clear! I must get it clear!" he told himself; and he began making a deliberate effort to put himself, naked and passive and free from every human purpose, into the power of the four winds.

He obstinately turned round as if he'd been a lighthouse on one of those mysteriously turning castle rocks, the idea of which and the planetary explanation of which, lost in an engulfing antiquity, keep reoccurring in the ancient Welsh books.

In this crazy process of behaving like a "turning castle" with four sides, he faced, first the north through his barred window, then the south through his closed door, then the west through the wall behind his bed, and lastly the east through the wall behind his chest-of-drawers. The Rembrandt picture was against this final barrier to the gulfs of space, so that it was from the direction of the old heathen camp that there had appeared, as if straight from the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, and in as deep a daze of wonder at being resurrected as he was in a maze of wonder at being accounted a god, that Jesus of Nazareth had entered the research laboratory of Doctor Echetus.

And now as John Hush stared for half a minute at each of his four walls — at his window, at his door, at his bed, at his chest-of-drawers — he forced himself to call up before his mind's eye all that he could remember of each particular stretch of country between Glint Hall and its four horizons. Alder-swamps and willows and a flooded river lay beyond the gates to the north. Alder-swamps and willows and a flooded river lay beyond the gates to the south. Alder-swamps and willows and a flooded river lay beyond the walls to the west, where rose the roofs of Halfway House.

Meanwhile to the east there were only dry, heathery, sandy plantations of young firs and pines, spruce-firs, Douglas pines, and Siberian larches, all of these mounting up to that heathen camp on the top of which were the two gigantic Scotch firs, between whose trunks, so he now remembered being told, the sun rose at this time of the year. It was only when he had entirely satisfied his desire for revolving like an idolatrous weathercock to the four quarters of the sky that he approached his chest-of-drawers. This he did with a view to ascertaining if it contained a packet of cigarettes he had placed among his collars, not as a bait for a thief, but simply because it contained a particular brand that had been a favourite with his guardian and that out of a sort of piety he enjoyed as a special celebration on particular days.

Yes, the cigarettes entitled "The Smoke of Heaven" were in their place; and John felt, as he folded four of his collars in a consecrated half-circle about the box of pale-blue cardboard which contained them that as long as he had the job of keeping quite a lot of material objects clean and neat, while at the same moment he could "plunge", as the commander had recommended into the nonhuman elements of Nature, he would daily advance in wisdom.

It was at this moment that he found himself confronted by the fact that, not only was one of the round brass corner-knobs of his bed missing, but that one of the polished mahogany knobs of the drawer that held the cigarettes was badly chipped. He gazed at these mutilated things with an overpowering urge to do something to patch them up and heal them. After his fashion he had to analyse even this compulsion and to do so while he was deciding to yield to it. "It must be a reaction," he thought, "from that officer's talk about plunging into things! No, I really can't undress and get into bed with that unhappy screw craving for a knob and that knob so miserably chipped. It's things like this waiting to be properly fitted and united that cause so much misery in the world. The whole world of Glint Hall is simply full of inanimate inmates!

"Oh, I can't understand how living things can be so indifferent to inanimate things! Damn their souls! Till the bits that are broken off, and the pieces that are divided, and the parts that are lost, are joined together again, what's the use of talking about federations of the world?"

With a rush of more happiness than he had felt since he first saw Tenna under the tulip-tree, he now set himself to unscrew the chipped wooden knob. It yielded at first, then was recalcitrant, then yielded again; and while he worked at it he couldn't help deciding that there was a great deal in what Serius-Ocius had recently been asserting. "But," he told himself, "where the fellow went wrong was in not realising that any work you do, when done naturally, such as removing this chipped knob, means using the mind; and, though it doesn't mean thinking, it means being conscious, and, moreover, being conscious that you are being conscious!"

When he had removed the chipped knob from his collar-drawer, he found that it was a hard job to fasten it to the protruding screw at the corner of his bed. But his wrists were strong, and though the mahogany knob didn't completely conceal the base of the exposed screw, it hid the top of it quite successfully, so that his bed now possessed three brass knobs and one wooden knob.

This gave him extraordinary satisfaction, and he stared triumphantly for several minutes into a world of broken things that were no longer broken — spoons with restored handles, dolls with restored heads, horses with restored hooves, cups with restored saucers, teapots with restored spouts, chimneys with restored chimney-pots — while it seemed to him that all the animae of these inanimates, as they crowded round him, were crying aloud in a multitudinous chant:

"Hail, mender of mendicants!
Hail, furbisher of fetishes!
Hail, tailor of totems!
Hail, mortiser of mascots!"

But soon, coming out of this godlike trance, he sat down on the edge of his bed beside the latest of his four knobs and gazed round his room. The strong electric bulb seemed to be saying all the while: "To the healthy all things are healthy!" and "Be strong and sane like me!" and "Let there be light, light, light, light!"

The divine Mr. Lordy watched him out of the great painter's chiaroscuro as if through a miraculous hole in the wall; and though he felt that the shadows were twisting and twining with shadows in that upper room of the north lodge, he could see nothing but the square panes and the imprisoning bars of his own uncurtained window. But it was at this moment that silence itself, eldest of all things, began to throb and beat and pump and pulse and bulge and rumble at him.

"Is it," he thought, "just my nerves that I hear sounds in the passage? Damn! That's the worst of these institutions. They're all right in the day. It's in the night that the thoughts and dreams of the sleepers come out of their rooms and shuffle about, and shiver, and squeak and gibber. Yes it's in the night they sob and go moaning up and down."

"No! No!" he told himself. "That's not nerves!" He had heard a door open; and now there were shuffling feet! Oh, there was no question about it. He listened intently. Yes, the person, whoever it was, must have seen the light under his door. "That's the worst of these electric bulbs," he thought, "you can't turn them down. You can only turn them out."

He rose from his bed and, with the intention of locking his door, turning the light out, and going to bed by the pallid greyness that came in through the window, he took two and a half of the three or four lazy steps he would have to take to reach the corner between door and wall where protruded the knob that worked the electricity. Then he suddenly became a waxwork image in the centre of which thudded a panic-stricken heart.

The door towards which he had moved opened a couple of inches, and about level with his face and near it, too, for he was only a yard away, a finger inserted itself as if it had been the snout of a peculiar animal. The finger had large knuckles and it had particularly long intersections between these knuckles. It could not have been called a deformed finger nor did it look like a finger dedicated to the service of actions that had, as the poet says, "no relish of salvation in them. But if it wasn't a devilish finger no one could call it a "good" finger, it was just a finger. It might have been a symbol in heraldry. It might have been a symbol in some occult pack of prophetic cards. John regarded it with fascinated horror.

But now the finger began to bend at its thick knuckle. It bent towards him. It waggled at him. It did more than waggle. It wriggled. John had seen terrifying objects in his time. He had seen ghastly objects. He had seen appalling objects. But this wriggling finger directed towards his face was different from anything he had ever seen.

And his consciousness as it contemplated this "moving finger" felt as if it were absolutely alone with it, in some cosmic vacuum beyond all worlds. But an atrocious idea now came gently sliding into his head. He was an agile performer with nail-scissors; and he had noticed just now, when he went to his collar-drawer to see if his package of "The Smoke of Heaven" was still there, that since they'd got him safely certified it hadn't occurred to them to search his toilet articles and remove those glittering snappers. Why, therefore, shouldn't he grab that wagging finger and cut its nails for it, cut them to the quick! But it was all very well to think of these terrestrial performances. Here he was — and, in spite of Serius-Ocius, or any other king's officer, for him the mind was everything — floating like a vast mass of indivisible squid on an ocean without bottom, without horizon, without a ripple, while against his heart, his breast, his solar plexus, his mental nerve-centre, wriggled eternally, like the undying worm that Jesus beheld devouring those who wouldn't love him, the tumbling finger of the background material of the deepest abyss known.

The thing was more than obscene to John Hush. To his mind there was something about it like a monstrous ribaldry and as if an outrage were being perpetrated upon the inherent decency of matter itself. The spotted nakedness it embodied wasn't a phallic nakedness, and yet in some shocking manner it was super-sexual. It suggested the self-ravishing and self-impregnating sex-organism of some abysmal being in the process of whose eternal spawning the copulating opposites of mind and matter and male and female were as yet undifferentiated.

"Cut your damned nails for you — that's what I'll do!" he muttered aloud; and, swinging round, lurched heavily, for he felt weak in his legs, towards the collar-drawer from which he had just wrenched the chipped knob, leaving a lamentable hole behind.

Even in the midst of his perturbed state he experienced, and was surprised to observe himself doing so, a puzzled amazement at the unconcerned complacency of the thing's twin-handle. But before he could reach the outraged hole or its unsympathetic twin, the door of his room very slowly and very silently opened, and a middle-aged man in blue-and-white pyjamas waddled along the floor towards him, advancing on his haunches and his heels with his arms working like bargepoles, as if he were trying to imitate the motion of the circular man-woman of the Platonic symposium.

John’s first feeling at the approach of this apparition, who was breathing hard and whose spasmodic movements were already losing their initial fling, was one of profound relief. And with this relief he got back his calmer wits to such a tune that he began to enjoy himself. “It shows,” he thought, as he stared into the eyes of the creature on the floor, “that what I’m really afraid of is simply the vacuum; yes, simply the void, the inane, the empty, the vacant, that shocking gap or gulf concealed behind every motion of the consciousness that apprehends and every aspect of the thing apprehended.”

Having in this manner stated his view of his own fear he suddenly began to continue his thoughts concerning it aloud just as if he were conversing with the intruder on the floor.

“I was thinking about fear,” he murmured. “And I’m now convinced that what frightens us — well, frightens me anyhow! — is not what we actually see — you, for instance, playing the giddy goat in my room when you ought to be asleep — but the empty space, the vacuum, so to speak, of the future moment, the hollow place, so to put it, of the as yet unfilled gap in time, into which the whole caboodle, I mean the whole panorama of experience, is moving, to become, directly it occupies that gap, like yourself who are now interrupting my going to bed by acting the fool, to become something that may be annoying and may make us angry but which is not in the remotest degree what we call terrifying.”

With a deep and extremely theatrical sigh and a shrug of his shoulders that had a somewhat foreign air, the man in the elegant pyjamas picked himself up and sat down on the edge of the bed.

“And now—” the fellow began, jerking up one of his feet under him, and tapping the floor with the heel of the other, both feet being tightly encased in embroidered slippers ornamented by green beads; “and now—” and he threw into his words the satisfied tone of a man just come to his club and with the best hours of the day stretching out like golden sands in front of him, “and now we can tell each other to our heart’s content all about ourselves! And it might, don’t you think, be a good thing if we shut the door and turned on the electric heater?”

John, who was now standing with his back to the door, closed it as silently as he could, and feeling very irritable and repeating to himself over and over, "I'll turn the chap out in a minute and go to bed," began vaguely looking round. Till this moment he had never realised that there was an electric-heater in his room. But there it was; and it was situated between his only chair, a chair which had its back to the wall, and his now somewhat reproachful chest-of-drawers. He turned it on; and seating himself upon the chair beside it, soon began to feel that he really did owe something to this preposterous person for indicating to him this fountain of agreeable heat.

He pulled the chair away from the wall, and keeping nothing but his profile directed towards his visitor and repeating to himself over and over, as a kind of incantation, "going to bed... going to bed... going to bed," he tried hard to put some authentic cameraderie into the tone with which he begged at least for the honour of learning his visitor's name.

"Name?" cried the invader of his bed. "Did I hear you utter that goose-girl word 'name'? Don't you remember the words of Faust concerned the Spirit? 'I have no name to give it — feeling is all in all — the name is sound and smoke'! But, since I am here, and we are alone, I may as well confess that I'm generally known in this absurd place by my title."

"And may I enquire what that is?" John murmured wearily, thinking, as he surveyed the coloured beads on the slipper with which the fellow was tapping the floor, that he would talk quite openly to Tenna to-morrow, when they met after the midday meal, and make her see that it was absolutely essential, however they might have to act or speak or dissemble with regard to the rest, to be completely frank with each other; and if they had — as no doubt they had — unusual peculiarities of their own, they must confess them freely to each other, and each obtain the aid of the other in getting them under control.

It indeed began to strike John very strongly that if, after only two nights in this place, a man like himself, who had served in all the embassies of the Balkans, could be so shocked and startled by the wagging of a finger through the crack of a door and in full electric light, and long before midnight, there was little to wonder at if Tenna's nerves had grown shaky after two years of this sort of thing? And he thought: "Can anything in our whole normal way of life be crazier than this throwing of extra-crazy people together with the idea of getting them back to normality? Of course, really it's just to get us out of the way!"

"Well, sir," he repeated, as the occupier of the bed remained silent, "and what is your title?"

The man on the bed hesitated. His manner was that of a disguised monarch who is not absolutely sure whether his confession of identity will be made to a friend or an enemy. Then he said, "My title, good friend, is an unusual one; but not, I fancy an altogether unknown one, to a gentleman and a scholar like yourself."

Here the fellow leapt to his feet and gave John a dignified bow.

"I am the Marquis of the Fourth Dimension," he declared, "and I am, of course, much more than human. History doesn't contain me. I contain history. I am real and yet I am ideal. Some thinkers call me 'the Zeit-Geist'; but I prefer, as that German said, to be superficial out of profundity."

After this bold revelation of the riddle of personality, the Marquis of the Fourth Dimension drew back a step further, making, as he did so, a gesture that reminded John of a woman's curtsey. It must have been some kind of choreographic compulsion conveyed by telepathy from one mind to another, combined with the propitiatory training of an ambassador's secretary that brought it about that John, with an even lower obeisance than that of the Zeit-Geist, slipped into the precise position on the bed vacated by the other, imitating him even to the extent of drawing up one foot under him and tapping with the other upon the floor.

Moving, therefore, in this magnetised circle of reciprocity, the Marquis of the Fourth Dimension approached the bed and touched the knee which his host had just bent beneath him.

John surveyed this outstretched finger with a curious interest. It was the same finger, composed of bone, flesh, blood, and rather wrinkled skin, terminating in a horny but in this particular case a very clean fingernail, that had frozen his heart with terror ten minutes ago.

The very same finger! And yet he regarded it now with a quiet, humorous interest, but an interest that was not very lively or intense, and might, indeed, pretty soon change into complete indifference. What conclusion — such was his thought as this nobleman from a Dimensional House of Lords kept his finger upon him, and kept it in the position and, indeed, with something of the gesture of that pointing finger of the Father of Gods and Men in Michelangelo's picture where He is conveying the breath of life into Adam — what conclusion was he to come to in regard to pure fear?

For in this case that is what it was. It wasn't fear of death, or fear of a fall, or fear of a bullet, or fear of cancer, or fear of pain. Could it be fear of the supernatural? Not in any ordinary or traditional sense! He had never for a moment doubted that it was the real finger of a real person. "No; the truth is," John told himself: "this thing, fear, is as much a part of the original constitution of our souls as attraction and repulsion, advance and retreat, love and hate. If to be born is to enter battle, it is also to endure fear. The only creatures wholly free from fear are the dead."

"Well?" enquired the person who declared himself to be, as Homer would put it, the Time-spirit, "I came in dancing, and dancing I must go out!" Here he removed both his Michelangelical finger and the magnetic radiation that excited reciprocity. "But I can't go back to my pillow till I make you realise as a gentleman and a scholar exactly to what a pass human history has come in realising its final identity in me; for let me tell you this, my good sir, and see that you lay it to heart. They used to talk of the Peers of Christendom. Well, now they must deal with us, the Peers of the Fourth Dimension! And scholars like you and me" — here he lowered his voice— "know very well to what in reality all this fuss about evolution amounts!"

Here he approached so close to John that the latter felt a shivering in his stomach, like the under-the-skin shudder of an old maid compelled to contemplate a rape. The visitor put both his feet on the floor and struck the palms of his hands together with a smart shock as if he were killing a flea or summoning a waitress.

“It amounts,” he whispered hoarsely, “to a bubble! And this dance you have had the privilege of witnessing is the dance of history, that is to say the dance of a bubble!”

At this point John stood up, and, straightening his shoulders, discovered to his amazement that he was considerably taller than the Zeit-Geist, whose personal appearance, now that he had ceased to be afraid of him, he was free to take in. The man was nearly bald and had a plump round face with prominent ears. His chin was small and had a deep dimple in it. His eyes were pale grey, and they were so pale that as the electric bulb shone down on them they looked positively white. In fact, as John continued to inspect them, they seemed almost devoid of eyeballs, and the effect of this was to make them really ghastly.

John had never seen any eyes like them, and he made up his mind, then and there, to ask Tenna for every detail she could give him of this weird creature.

“When we meet again,” he now presumed to enquire, “is there any ordinary name by which I can address you?”

To his surprise the plump round visage before him broke into a smile. “Well, well well! Think of that! And so you’ve never even heard of Professor Zoom of the College of Doom?” John could only bow gravely; but when the fellow had danced himself to the door, and John had opened it for him, both the men began whispering. John whispered, “I hope you’ll be able to sleep.”

And Zoom whispered: “Oh, I’ll sleep all right. I’ll sleep like a — like a—”

“Like a top?”

“Like a burst bubble!” replied the Marquis of the Fourth Dimension.

11. HITHER AND THITHER

JOHN WOKE UP before it was fully light. In fact he woke at the hour when human beings usually feel at their lowest level of courage, energy, and confidence.

The actual dawn could hardly be said to have begun, and yet the infinite restfulness and restorative anonymity of the all-obliterating night had vanished. It was that hour, or half-hour, or even that quarter of an hour, for the length of its lasting as well as the degree of its quality varies in proportion to what the clouds and the mists and the winds are doing in any particular locality, when a pallid diffusion of light enters our sleeping-place—” lumen intra limen”, “light across the threshold” — and affects us in a manner quite different from any other phenomenon of nature.

As he awoke to consciousness this pallid light struck John Hush as if it had been a fifth element, as different from air and water as these are different from earth and fire.

John could see by means of this presence the objects in his room, and clearest of all he could see the window-panes through which this presence was entering his room; but there was nothing that it revealed to him in his surroundings that was more startling, more strange, more solemnising than itself.

The queer thing about it was that it didn’t make him think at all of the radiance of the sun’s rays. Nor did it make him think of warmth in general or of the delicious sensation of being warm. It struck him as a thing in itself, as an absolute, as something which, though it may have been a normal apparition, was the essence of pure light, of very light of very light, and, as the creed says, “begotten not made”. This fifth element that ere the coming of dawn was now establishing itself both outside and inside the weak barrier of his window seemed to him, as he watched it, to be the physical embodiment of some ultimate disillusionment that was older than the orbits of any of the stars yet known to us, older than the inhabitants of any planet revolving round any of those stars. He felt at that moment as if this strange, cold, prae-dawn light had nothing to do with the rays of any sun or with the rays of any star, and yet was totally different from any legendary psychic event, like the Fall of Man or the Revolt of the Angels. It struck him now, this prae-dawn light, as if its far-off origin had nothing to do with any war in Heaven, or with any prehistoric rallying of mankind to the cause of the devils or titans.

Something had happened, something had gone wrong, that was much further off and longer ago than any wars between Jehovah and Satan. And it had happened in the process of creation itself. Something like a ghastly cosmogonic blunder had been made by whatever demiurgic power it might be that had originally projected the "background material" of our dimension into overt existence.

The impression of immemorial antiquity made upon him by this cold white light that seemed so much older than sun, moon, or stars was indeed an impression of abysmal disillusionment; but it was the disillusionment not of the created but of the creator. This prae-dawn light was the diffused sigh with which the original world-builder had lamented some huge catastrophic mistake and with little hope of redeeming it had obstinately set to work to start all over again.

Thus did John Hush work it out to his grim satisfaction that this white light of disillusionment, which had recurred at irregular and intermittent dawns from the beginning of the world, could still communicate to us the oldest secret of all, the secret of the endurance of the burden of existence by inanimate things.

John, indeed, felt that the effect upon him of this faint prae-matutinal light was sobering rather than inspiring; and, though not saddening to his spirits, was a patient and stoical influence rather than an exultant one. He remembered a talk he'd once had with a Bulgarian scholar about their personal reactions to this particular prae-dawn light, and how the man had told him that each of the ancient classical races had special names for the influence of this hour, the Roman goddess of the light before sun-rise being named Matuta, whereas the Greeks had called her Leucothea.

This goddess, he explained to John, was, by reason of her own tragic experiences before her apotheosis, liable to have an unlucky effect upon any child of one's own, but a very lucky effect when a mother brought into her presence a neighbour's child.

"My feelings just now," thought John, "are certainly what you might call Leucothean. They are benevolent and yet totally irreligious!"

He soon found that, as his present mood intensified itself and established itself, it excluded all human emotions except those of a mild expectation, a mild enjoyment, a mild pity, a mild amusement, and a strong desire to get Tenna and himself, together with as many of the other inmates and dogs as were still redeemable, out of the hands of Doctor Echetus.

In this cold, enduring, sobering, prae-dawn light the bubble-dance of last night's fourth-dimensional nobleman struck him as scarcely more real than two half-forgotten dreams whose scattered members he now vaguely began to reassemble; but save that one of them had to do with a dead sycamore-twig and the other with a little heap of rabbit's dung, the first associated with some terrible unknown fear, the second with the redemption of all matter, he could not summon them back.

"It's about time to go down to those sheds," he thought. "But one thing's clear! I mustn't think of girls' curls, even if such thoughts are, as I daresay they may be, a legitimate enticement of Nature. Tenna's my sweetheart, and I won't mix her up with my manias!"

He got out of bed quickly now, and stood for a second or two hesitating as to whether to put on his faded blue-and-black dressing-gown to go to the lavatory, or his overcoat. He decided on the latter, so as to feel less conspicuous in case he met anyone; but he couldn't resist drawing his fingers across the agreeable texture of the former.

"So the moment has come," he thought, addressing his dressing-gown as if it had consciousness, "when the deliciously safe tightness of your collar when its top button is buttoned, and all those things you make me remember when you flap round my legs, have to be hung up on a hook!"

And even as he touched it there came over him one memory after another of precious moments when the rainbow bridge of man's precarious monochronos hedone, that flickering perfection of the Ideal Now, spanned the abyss between the two horrors, the former of which our French drawing-rooms call ennui and the latter of which our German class-rooms call angst.

He met nobody on his way to the lavatory or on his way back, and he only met men who were complete strangers to him as he went down to the yard. Once in the yard, nothing occurred to disturb his equanimity. He enjoyed his work out here at this hour. Oil-lamps and gas-burners, in addition to electricity, played their part in the illumination of the stables and sheds, where the less aged and frail among the male inmates helped the hired farm-hands from about half-past six to eight. Chance had so arranged it that John's particular job, into which he had been initiated yesterday, was singularly adapted to his complete lack of any sort of knowledge of cattle and horses. It was to clean out an airy shed and the couple of capacious stalls in which two white cows and two grey cows were milked every morning and evening.

The woman who milked these particular four cows was a sturdy creature of about thirty who "answered", as they put it in Glint kitchen, to the name of Nancy Yew, and to whom the gods had given an extremely passionate, though an indescribably ugly, physiognomy. It was her only child Seth by whose work with pitchfork and shovel this shed was kept clean and daily supplied with fresh straw from the neighbouring straw-stacks; and it was to help the frail and youthful Seth with the maturity of his own manly strength that Hush had been selected by the asylum authorities to work in the particular shed called Delta.

Why the sheds at Glint had been named from the letters of the Greek alphabet, nobody to whom John had so far put the question had been able to say. Some professor with a philological mania must have taken Greek mythology too lightly and the Greek alphabet too seriously.

Nor apparently had the learned man — for, as Doctor Echetus himself admitted, "the alphabet can lead anywhere" — confined his nomenclative mania to the inanimate. The most beautiful of these four beasts had in some way or other acquired the unusual soubriquet of Clyde, which at once suggested to John's mind the name Clytemnestra.

It was with electric light that the stalls of Clytie and of her sister-cow were lit these March mornings, and John had derived a good deal of pleasure from the various quite startling "chiaroscuro" effects that resulted from this modernistic illumination of prehistoric labours.

Nancy Yew's son was a bastard. He was also not entirely "there". But since to be not entirely "there" was likely to be less noticeable here than elsewhere, and since she herself was milking both Clyde and Clyde's sister, Whitey, in the shed, it was Seth's business to keep clean, Nancy Yew felt that though she couldn't always be there to keep an eye on him, there was bound to be a definite aura of maternal protection hovering over that Delta stall.

"And to you too, sir!" Mistress Yew now murmured in response to John's greeting. "And there'll be a nice drop"— "tling-tirroop! tling-tirroop!" went Clyde's milk into the pail— "a real nice drop of rain, I wouldn't wonder, by nick of noon this day, if I've not lost my what-do-you-know, if you catch my meaning, mister."

"Do you mean it's going to rain, Mrs. Yew?" enquired John, plunging his fork into several heaps of dirty straw, one after another, and trying to make a solid mass of them, thick enough to be transported out of the shed.

"Mummy's thinking," intervened young Seth in a gently explanatory tone, "of turn-ups."

John added yet another layer of dirty straw to his transfixed mass, and pressing it against the floor of the shed threw his whole weight upon the handle of his pitchfork. He perceived in a flash that, like other innocents, young Seth had the wit to see that what sane people always have at the back of their minds is their own concern, their own affair, their own purpose, their own interest.

"You'll be," he added with a sudden illumination of his long, sad, weary, resigned face, "wanting to see how this here place looks in sunshine."

John confessed that such was his desire.

“Me garding,” murmured the idiot’s mother, to the resounding noise of Clyde’s milk, “be too dry for end of March.”

John continued leaning on his fork while he watched the long thin wavering shape of Seth insinuate itself, like a patient slow worm endowed with the power of perpendicular motion, between the stool on which his mother was sitting and the hindquarters of Whitey.

What passed through John’s mind, as he watched the boy carry his shovelful of dung out into the yard, was the idea that on some far-off day when Tenna and himself had a house of their own, far from all their friends, they might have Seth as their retainer. Then he glanced at the rough, red, wind-tanned, rugged cheek of Nancy Yew, as it pressed itself against the incredibly soft side of the creature she was milking. “Maybe it would be all right,” he thought, “if I asked Tenna straight out if she wouldn’t mind my snipping off — now I’ve got the scissors in my drawer, and since I’ve got them it seems mad not to use them — just that one single little tiny curl? Yes, I must think, think, think, think, very carefully about this.”

And while Mistress Nancy milked Whitey, and while he did quite a lot of Seth’s share of the stall-cleaning in addition to his own, he went on wondering whether it wouldn’t be quite a natural and sensible thing to do, since he had found at last a girl who suited him, if he used her as a lightning-conductor for this mania of his.

“His poor dear head,” as Mrs. Toby Tickle would have said; but of course it wasn’t his “head” at all, it was that desperate thing in him that was the bowsprit of his whole life’s intention— “was ringing” with this idea when the asylum bell proclaimed that it was time for breakfast.

This bell began ringing at three minutes to eight, and went on until three minutes past eight, and it might be said that these six minutes were to some of the inmates of Glint the most precious of the whole twelve hours, if not of the whole twenty-four.

And they were this for a very powerful reason; namely that the clanging of the great bell of Glint produced such hurryings, scramblings, rushings, scurryings, jostlings, that those who weren’t hungry, and those who wanted to avoid the notice of others, and those who were half-asleep, and those who were on the look-out for a minute or two's pretence that they were still free-agents and could come and go as they liked had the sort of interval not often offered to the inmates of an institution.

As John propped his pitchfork against the wall and with the help of a wisp of straw set himself to clean his boots, he noticed the devouring yearning in the one single round grey eye which, during all the while she was milking, Nancy kept fixed upon her offspring. Glancing from her to the lad himself, he became aware that Seth was now watching with an absorbed and fascinated interest one of the inmates who had strayed quite far from the sacred purlieus of the farmyard and was now skipping and dancing and nodding his head and taking fantastic leaps as he made towards one of the tall iron posts of the big gates guarded by the north lodge.

Seth's own long thin greyish face wore the intense expression, undisturbed by any need for action, which some spell-bound onlooker might have worn in a religious picture by El Greco.

"Who is that fellow, laddie, dancing up to that gate?" John enquired of the boy. The moment he'd uttered these words, though he hadn't spoken loudly and the noise of the squirted jets of milk came near to drowning them, he felt he oughtn't to have uttered them. Seth was so polite that it was pain to him not to answer at once, and yet he was so absorbed in the queer figure at which he was staring that it was worse pain to look away or to make any response.

But when the figure stood still between the dazzling sunshine and the dark velvety shadows on the green grass, he did at last turn to his questioner—" It's Twin Hither, "he said. "It's the one as hunts shadows! If you hadn't got to go and eat sausages in hall, mister, you might have seen Twin Thither, too! She's the clever one, she is! She has got to have water or something like water for her hunt. And do you know what her hunt is, Master Hush?"

John looked at him gravely and shook his head.

“Reflections!” cried the boy. “Twin Hither’s after shadows, and Twin Thither’s after reflections! They’re a funny pair, they twins! He be a boy and she be a girl, but they look awful-much the same!”

Seth’s long sad narrow face with its perpetually raised eyebrows and its life-weary detachment from everything that other human beings long for, was now to John’s astonishment transformed by a radiance that seemed to reach it directly, instantaneously, and with an immediate physical contact, from the skipping and capering figure that was now approaching the northern gate of Glint. The towering gates themselves contained elaborate iron bars that had curious ornamental portcullises at intervals, answering each other in a sort of pattern of heraldic symbolism, as though they were perpetually chanting in metallic reiteration: “Stay where you are! Stay where you are! Stay where you are! Don’t try to escape! Don’t try to escape! Here is your world! Here is your world!”

But this was not all. The gate-posts of these vast erections rose considerably above the complicated ironwork of the gates themselves and were terminated by dull specimens of that sort of totally meaningless ornamental foliation which at one epoch carried the very stamp and seal of successful builders of the type of Tenna’s progenitor; and from both these tall gate-posts, if so they could be described, though they resembled gigantic metal lances that had been used to pierce titanic puffballs and had retained what they had transfixed of these cryptogamous growths like the spiked heads of condemned felons, there stretched across the sunlit grass two long narrow wavering shadows, and it was along one of these early morning shadows that Twin Hither was now skipping.

“What on earth will the boy do,” thought John, “when he reaches the gate?”

John looked anxiously at Seth; and Seth looked anxiously at John. They knew by each other’s eyes that they were both deeply concerned over what was going to happen; though the idiot was still exultant with his faith in the spirit that inspired that airy dancer.

Suddenly Twin Hither swung clean on his heel and went skipping back along his shadow-path towards the rear entrance of the building. When he came to the spot where the shadow ended, with a reproduction on the sunlit grass of that shapeless terminal, he took a run, and leaping over the gap which separated this object from the sun-illumined mat in front of the open door, he seemed literally to dive into the passage with his hands clasped in front of his face.

All that was left for the onlookers to do was to follow back with their heavy gaze the dancer’s shadow-path as it returned to its monstrous origin, that “leave-all-hope symbol in shoddy cast-iron!”

“See you again in an hour,” murmured John, “and good luck till then!”

But noticing the idiot’s eyes and the desperate look in them, “Don’t ‘ee mind too much, Seth, my friend. He’ll be out here again this afternoon.”

“It isn’t that, mister.”

“Not that? What is it, Seth?”

But all the answer the boy gave him was a faint movement of his head towards the silken flanks of Whitey, which in that curious criss-crossing of artificial light with the long dazzling rays and deep shadows of the newly risen sun, made a perfect background for the profile of Nancy and the indrawing possessiveness of her insatiable maternal eye.

“I might have guessed it!” thought John. “Before we know where we are, it’s on us again — the Holy Family!”

He swung round and bolted; yes, the private secretary to our country’s special representative in four sovereign states bolted like a rabbit from the irresistible power of the loving eye. This particular projection of possessiveness was harmlessly pillowed against the silken side of Whitey; and it wasn’t that he feared anything for himself, or that he had any thought that Nancy was a witch. He knew she was a good, kind, hardworking honest woman, who doted on her idiot son.

“And it isn’t,” he told himself, as he took his place beside Mr. Lordy at the dining-room table and commenced hungrily devouring his oatmeal and brown sugar, “it isn’t as if there were anything unnatural or morbid in this mother’s love for her offspring. It is a perfectly normal and natural feeling!” Why then had a shiver of terrible sympathy shot through him when we saw the boy's glance at that round shameless feminine eye staring at him out of the very belly, so it seemed, of that patient beast?

There was no escape. He had to face the truth. He might have to deceive a lot of other people, but it was silly and ridiculous solemnly to set to work deceiving himself. And what was the truth?

Ah, there was the rub! Well! He decided that since they had now both finished their porridge, he would consult Mr. Lordy. Mr. Lordy had quelled the storm in the breast of a naval commander; why should he not be able to settle the problem as to where "love" ought to yield to common sense?

"Will they bother us," he began, not exactly in a whisper but in quite a low tone, "if I ask you rather a crucial question; if I ask you, in fact, how far we ought to carry our obedience to love?"

Mr. Lordy must have taken stronger measures than usual to protect himself from the ghost of the old gentleman he had shaken to death, for John's first taste of the copious helping of scrambled eggs which was now on his plate, in spite of all the pepper with which he had freely sprinkled it, carried with it a perceptible smack of powerful disinfectant.

"In all well-managed institutions," replied Mr. Lordy in a firm voice, and John knew at once that the loyal little man was quoting from some printed sermon of Father Wun, "it is imperative to keep quite distinct what we say from what we think. Thoughts are one thing. Words are another thing. The space between thoughts and words must be kept like carefully preserved grass. This space must be cut. This space must be weeded. This space must be rolled."

Putting down his knife and using his fork like a spoon, in the American manner, and pushing to the side of his plate with the extreme tip of his longest finger, as if it were a piece of carpet upon which a corpse had been lying, the square of toast upon which the scrambled egg had been placed, Mr. Lordy drained his teacup to the bottom and continued his quotation. "When we talk of 'love' we talk of a thing so slippery, so fluid, so erratic, that there's nothing to which it can be compared except those moving bubbles under cat-ice which have, as everybody must remember, so striking a resemblance to wriggling tadpoles."

It was only with a slight shake of the head that Mr. Lordy refused an attendant's offer of more scrambled eggs. John, however, though fully aware that the satisfying of his hunger did to some extent diminish his attention, felt sure that as long as he imitated Mr. Lordy by keeping his profile at right angles to his interlocutor there was nothing in their conversation to draw "those men" a step nearer — John, I say, acquiesced quite shamelessly when he had the chance of a second helping.

"No one in this place," began Mr. Lordy, addressing his words to the distant row of female backs up and down which John was pathetically moving his lack-lustre gaze, not with any hope of seeing Tenna there, for she had told him that she was one of the lucky ones for whom Mam Tickle had coaxed from the authorities the privilege of going to the kitchen for a tray and carrying their tea and bread-and-butter up to their bedrooms, but with a foolish lover's fancy that, having been seen there once, she might be seen there again.

"No one in this place," quoted Mr. Lordy, becoming a little confused as he went on, "has the right to use the word ought in connection with that listing wind referred to in the Gospels or possibly in the Epistles, or even in the Acts, but referred to anyway as a precious something that comes and goes where it listeth, and none can increase it or restrain it by any effort of will, and none can bind it or loose it or create it or destroy it. The Church regulates marriage and overlooks the begetting and the conceiving of children. The Law regulates possessions and overlooks the acquiring and the inheriting of possessions.

"Conscience regulates our behaviour to all other living creatures. The State regulates our intercourse with other nations and takes upon itself the prevention of crime, and the certifying of — well, of people like us! But love is no more under our control than the clouds or the winds or the rain or the sun or the tides of the sea." but don't people tell us, Mr..Lordy, John remarked in the particular diplomatic tone that conceals beneath a quiet emphasis the mischievous shaking up, like peas in a bag, of che whole subject, "that the opposite of love is hate; and that, if everything important to life is connected with love, everything dangerous and deadly to life must be connected with hate?" But no ambassadorial niceties could side-track a man who had danced his stepfather to death like a badly-made puppet.

"Hate," said Mr. Lordy, with unruffled concentration on the row of feminine backs, "is not the opposite of love." He paused. One of the nearest attendants, and he could not be called very near, was at this moment removing the chief weight of his body from his left foot and transferring it to his right foot. Such relaxings, such rest-giving physical movements, such shiftings of bodily weight, such yawns and sighs, can in an unconcerned bystander have a momentous effect upon the manner and even upon the substance of a prophetic revelation. But when the bystander is an attendant employed to safeguard the nerves and moral sense of the public from untimely and improper revelations, the greatest of prophets has to be careful.

And Mr. Lordy had long ago learnt to take no chances in this danger-zone of official attention. "What I always say," he interpolated gravely in a firm, clear voice, "about Ayrshire cattle, is that you mustn't keep them too long in the same field." Then, when it became clear nobody was listening, "The point is," he went on, "that hate, which is just as much out of our control as love, has no connection with love at all. It resembles love in the sense that it is as completely beyond our power as the wind or the sea or the clouds or the rain. But it is no more the opposite of love than miserliness is the opposite of honesty or treachery is the opposite of extravagance."

"Well then," burst out John with some impatience, for he had become angrily conscious how many the hours were, and how slowly they were likely to pass, before he would have a chance of being with Tenna again, "what becomes of our behaviour to our parents, to our wives, to our children, to 'ur neighbours and friends?"

Mr. Lordy moved his head round apprehensively as if he were expecting a physical assault from all these directions.

“That,” he murmured, “is as the Church decides. It is the Church that teaches us how to behave in this world so that we can inherit the world to come.”

Here Mr. Lordy hurriedly crossed himself and carefully looked down at an elegantly bound volume of Milton which he had pulled out of his pocket and placed between the empty plate of brown bread-and-butter and the untouched plate of white bread-and-butter.

“You won’t think I’m presuming on your kindness to me, Mr. Hush,” he said, speaking shyly and in a low voice and pushing Milton against the untouched plate of white bread-and-butter, “if I confessed to you a fancy of mine? You really and truly won’t? Well, it is this. I feel that the souls of original writers — for the more original a writer is, the more powerful is the pressure of his projected soul — are real presences that have their dwelling inside the printed pages of the author’s books; not more than one, you understand, Mr. Hush — I mean not more than one soul to each separate book, though if the book has several volumes the author’s soul will naturally have to flit from one to another of these separate volumes. You understand, Mr. Hush? — one, that is to say, for each volume.”

John gravely inclined his head, indicating that he had no quarrel with the creative energy for thus confining the number of living souls in each book to one apiece. Encouraged by his friend’s nod, Mr. Lordy now went on to explain that each book-spirit had its own natural appetite for appropriate nourishment, and that white bread-and-butter, thickly spread and thinly cut, was exactly what the fastidious soul dwelling between the covers of Milton’s works would enjoy most.

“You see, Mr. Hush, though I am no good at Greek and Latin, I used to blow for the organist in our church; and I must take it for granted that when a spirit is very particular about the arrangement of poetical words it will be fastidious and even finical about what it imbibes of material sustenance.”

John Hush instantaneously forgot the attendants and incontinently turned his full attention upon Mr. Lordy. “If there is,” he thought, “an exacting spirit between those covers ready to imbibe some ethereal essence from a plate of bread-and-butter, I’m damned if I’ve not got in me some still more fastidious and exacting spirit! Mine is not perhaps so austerely particular as Milton's; but by God it's more delicate in its taste! My spirit, in fact — I mean as opposed to Milton's, though they say at Cambridge he was called 'the Lady of Christ's' — is the spirit of an old maid.

"I want to protect that heavenly wine-coloured leather-bound book as if it were a vestal virgin. In fact I can't stand the sight" — here he looked round almost ferociously— "of pages full of the subtlest verbal harmonies in Britain, being jostled by two great greasy plates, one of them greedily empty, and the other repulsively full." Thinking in this way and with an irrepressively urgent movement of hand and arm, Hush seized upon the poetical works of John Milton and inserted them in the nearest sanctuary he could see, which was one of Mr. Lordy's well-disinfected coat-pockets. This done he boldly leaned sideways towards the ear of the coat's wearer.

"Who the devil," he whispered, "is that fellow? And what bug has he got in his bonnet?"

In portentous gravity Mr. Lordy whispered back: "It's poor old Pantamount. He's perfectly harmless. Wouldn't hurt a fly. But they don't like him. They keep him in 'the Wing' all they can. It's in 'the Wing' for anything, with poor old Pantamount. You see what he's like. Wouldn't flap at a fly. Wouldn't 'shush' at a midge. Wouldn't worry a woodlouse. Mam Tickle says he's the saint of Glint, but Father Toby don't like him and Father Wun can't abide him. He's been here as long as anybody, but lots of us have hardly seen him. They keep him in 'the Wing'. If he goes on as he's doing now, for instance, he won't last out the day. Back he'll go!"

John Hush sat up straight again, staring fixedly at the extraordinary figure thus presented to his attention.

"What does the Commander think about him?" he enquired. "He? He's probably never seen him or heard of him."

"Doesn't everybody talk about him?"

"I should say not!"

"What do they say about him?"

“Tottie Creambo says it’s lucky to look at him, dangerous to meet his eye and fatal to speak to him. She says there are four of the rooms in the men’s quarter — that where you and I sleep — empty because of him.”

“You mean they died after speaking to him?”

“That’s what Tottie says.”

“What ridiculous nonsense!”

“Well, I’m not going to sit here any longer; and I’d advise you not to. In fact, Mr. Hush, only you mustn’t think me impertinent, I beg you to come away with me.” With these words Mr. Lordy rose to his feet. “If you’re here at dinner I’ll tell you more. I really am sorry, sir, but sometimes we just have to be rude.”

And so now there was only Mr. Lordy’s empty place by his side; and in front of him was the full plate of white bread-and-butter and the empty plate that had been full of brown bread-and-butter. There was also Mr. Lordy’s empty cup and his own empty cup; and these two cups had the look of being absorbed in metaphysical speculation about nature of human fear.

“Have to be rude, have we,” said John to himself. “And have to be frightened, too, eh? Here am I, a perfectly sane person save for a trifling sex-mania, so dominated by the deranged mind of this quaint individual whom I’ve been confusing with Jesus at Emmaus, that under the power of his crazy influence I am absolutely scared of even looking at this chap who’s making now these extraordinary noises and who was just now on his knees! ‘But I’m not going to yield to this crazy fear. Only I must fight it in my own way and nobody else’s. Go on, you over there! Go on praying in hissings and scrabblings and rustlings and scrapings such as grass-snakes and slow-worms make when they pray! I’ll look at you in a moment and, by God, I’ll speak to you in a moment! “Whatever Mam Tickle may say, my room up there looking north, my room where the redeemer who’s scared of being a redeemer comes out of a hole in the wall, won’t be empty to-night, won’t be empty for many a night, won’t be empty till I’ve decided I’ve had enough of this place and am going to leave it; yes, and perhaps not only leave it, but leave it with all its rooms empty!"

And then while he could hear the slow steps of the two breakfast-attendants marching up and down, up and down, and while he wondered how soon they would start meddling with Pantamount, he set himself to find some mark, some sign, some crack, some blemish, some flaw, some stain, some defect, some deformity in one or other of the empty cups over which he was now bending so that he'd be able to distinguish them and know them again after they had been washed and dried.

And find it he now did! It was a small chip, a chip taken from the curve of the cup's handle just where the handle touched the side of the cup. The second he saw this chipped curve he knew that if there was a soul in that volume of Milton, a soul now safe from greasy plates in the left-hand pocket of its owner, there was also a soul in this chipped cup which was now from henceforth totally, inexorably, ineluctably, irremediably, separate from all other cups.

It might be broken, it might be thrown away, it might be flung to the bottom of a river, it might be thrown into the dog-pit among the spruce-firs; but its separate identity, its difference from all other cups ever made or ever destined to be made, was now, once for all, unalterably, fundamentally, absolutely established.

"It is a cup, take it for all in all the like of which — a cup is a cup: therefore it possesses a soul and from the depths of this soul I am draining enough courage, like the ichor from the veins of an immortal, to do what I want to do; enough courage, in fact, to face the man-god Pantamount, who at this moment is hiding his godhead by the simple device of kneeling upon a bench and pretending to pray."

12. PANTAMOUNT

LAYING THE FINGERNAIL of his longest finger for the palpable passing of half a second on that chip in the cup, John now boldly rose to his feet, stepped backwards over the bench and walked casually towards one of their two attendants. While he did so, he noticed that the other attendant, with a casualness equal to his own, had languidly seated himself near the door. The attendant towards whom John now directed his negligent steps was the one who struck him as intending to approach the kneeling man, not directly but indirectly, in fact with that encircling movement that had already, even in the space of the forty-eight hours of his sojourn here, made John think of a dog-fish rounding up a shoal of mackerel and of a nakednecked vulture hovering round a corpse till the right moment to come down for its feast.

"Won't you try one of mine?" he now remarked, addressing this perambulating official. His silver case was in his hand and he was wishing for the first time since his guardian had given it to him on his twenty-first birthday that it was made of solid gold.

The man smiled agreeably but shook his head.

"Oh no, sir! Oh no!" he murmured. "Our regulations are very strict on this point. You see, sir, if once any of us permitted such a thing, the fat, as they say, would be in the fire."

"I understand perfectly," conceded John in his most ambassadorial tone. "'The fat and the fire.' Yes, I believe I have heard that before. It's a powerful saying. Yes, indeed, I can see what a lot of regulations there have to be to run a place like this with any kind of smoothness. But about that queer chap kneeling on the bench over there? Would he be angry if I said good morning to him? Would it be — all right — if I spoke to him? Of course, I know I mustn't ask you questions"; and as he said this he removed a couple of cigarettes from the left side of his still open silver case and transferred them with exquisite nicety to the right side, bending his head a little towards the case as he did so and lightly blowing away a few feathery shreds of tobacco that in the airy fashion of wisps of cloud in a halcyon sky were flecking the polished silver. “Not personal questions, of course,” he went on, “though I can’t believe the poor fellow’s name is really Pantamount. I expect that’s a nickname, eh, like Tottie Creambo; one of those school nicknames — for, after all, Glint Hall is a kind of school, isn’t it? — a school from which we poor inmates that you chaps are treating for our various manias are hoping — I’m sure I am” — and the crafty John straightened his shoulders and threw a wistful and nostalgic glance towards the window— “to soon return cured into the ordinary world! It would be more polite, I expect, don’t you fancy so, Mister officer, if I were to address him by his real name? Some name, I expect, like Brown or Smith — though, of course, it might be, for we never know in these confused days, Romanoff or Hapsburg. In fact I might chance it, mightn’t I, and call him Mr. Jones?”

The attendant had been regarding John as he talked in this style with an expression of suspended judgment. It was not an expression of serious suspicion and it certainly was not one of intimate trust. As he waited for him to reply, John hurriedly told himself that if there were not psychological training-schools for asylum servants there certainly ought to be; and then he told himself just as hurriedly that training in psychology was the last thing needed.

“All that is needed,” he told himself as he watched the man’s eyes and mouth, “is natural human sympathy, and reservoirs upon reservoirs of instinctive tact!”

But in a second the fellow had to answer! He couldn’t go on looking at him with that peculiar expression whether he had learnt to look like that or whether it was an inspiration of his own. “Oh, chipped cup,” John found himself silently praying, “if you inanimates have any soul at all, make him answer me!” but aloud he said: I may be quite wrong, but my impression is that Pantamount was the name of a hobby-horse in the nursery of King Arthur.”

Suddenly the attendant turned his profile to John and began talking to himself. “One thing’s clear,” he muttered audibly: “Brown-Smith must come off his bloody knees!”

After thinking aloud in this surprising manner, the attendant resumed his circumambient stalking-match.

But now on the strength, John told himself, of a single chipped teacup, whose soul, like that of all souls, whether vegetable, animal, mineral, human or divine, was “totus sensus, totus visus, totus anditus, totus sui generis”, he moved straight to the side of that kneeling figure. The neighbours of Mr. Brown-Smith alias Pantamount, who sat at their breakfast nearest to the man, were to John’s surprise paying very little attention to him. Every now and then they whispered to each other; but though John couldn’t be sure their whispers had nothing to do with the kneeling man, the fact that not one of them so much as glanced at the attendant seemed to suggest that their minds were far away from him, and very likely far away from the present moment.

Mr. Pantamount’s own mind seemed far away, too, for his eyes were shut and his lips were moving in his concentrated prayer to some invisible hearer. The first thing John noticed about the man’s face was that it was composed of eery hard flesh. This flesh wasn’t stretched out taut over prominent bones. It was just hard flesh where most people have soft flesh. The man had an aquiline nose, and the colour of his skin seemed yellow rather than white or brown, and though John looked at his head pretty closely, he found himself completely unable to decide whether his skull was bald or whether it was covered, like that of a baby, with very fine, very filmy, whitish-grey hair.

But the general effect of this hard-fleshed, strongly moulded skull, tilted upwards and a little backwards, was that it was not composed of human flesh at all, but was a very ancient image carved in some kind of hard-grained wood, the image, so it struck John’s mind at that first moment of encountering it, of some sage from the lost continent of Atlantis.

“No, no! I don’t mean,” so he decided he would interpret Mr. Pantamount to Tenna when they were together again, “the image of an Atlantean god; I mean an image, or, if you prefer, a statue, cut in hardwood and petrified, if that’s a permissible word, by aeons upon aeons of aimless drifting, back and forth, to and fro, up and down, in the tides of the salt sea.”

John’s mind was in an odd state that morning, a more confused state than he had experienced since he first saw Tenna under the tulip-tree. He couldn’t expel from his consciousness that possessive, in-drawing, in-sucking, maternal eye of the mother of Seth, issuing forth from the half of the face whose other half was hidden against the body of the milkgiving cow.

He could see all the time with horrible clarity the pitiful helplessness of the desperate little jerks which that unhappy idiot kept making, with the obscure hope of originating some independent life, some seminal sex-life, some self-chosen life, of his very own, that wouldn’t at once, that wouldn’t ever, be lapped up and swallowed up and drawn up into the veins and sinews and maternal juices of his doting parent.

How to deal with the terrible force of normal love was a problem John Hush felt he was himself spiritually too weak to undertake either for himself or on behalf of another; and when it came to abnormal or perverse love it would have been grotesque for anyone as degenerate as he knew himself to be to attempt a syllable of advice to another person!

But though he had spent the whole of the precious unreturning bloom of to-day’s early-morning hours, hours that always had the effect of throwing him into a mood of almost painfully virginal receptivity, watching, watching, watching, with a dreadful absorption the vampirising suction of maternal love as its youthful victim squirmed beneath it, it still seemed to him that for him — though other men might risk such things — the only course was to dodge, with all the subtlety at his command, every conceivable kind of responsibility. But though he indulged to the limit a pitiful and almost wistful craving to escape responsibility, none of this mental spreading of wings seemed able to save him to-day from seeing before his inmost vision that insucking maternal eye, that eye wherein this much-praised “love” could be observed, in the serpentine coils of its devouring insatiability, swallowing its offspring’s freedom to live a life of its own and exciting itself to swallow the more voluptuously as its own pity for the helpless thing’s struggles draws forth more maternal saliva to smooth the path of its re-enwombing.

And yet this question, John told himself now as he stared at the kneeling Pantamount, was a matter of cosmogonic psychology. Should the maternal eye, turning so quickly into the eye of a virtuous vampire, be violently put out, or could it be, so to say, philosophically diverted or even perhaps metaphysically hoodwinked by the evocation of some primordial illusion with the help of creative nature?

It was for help to meet the life-challenge of this demonic beautiful-horrible thing that he had come to Mr. Lordy this morning; but Mr. Lordy had failed him. Of course he ought to have known that Mr. Lordy, as a worshipper of the Mother of God, was bound to fail him.

“My irritation with Mr. Lordy,” he told himself, “isn’t quite fair! The Mother of the Redeemer has been worshipped for so long with the crucified on her knees that to rebel against mother-love as something deadly to natural life has become an unnatural gesture.

“But a carved wooden image of the last of the Atlanteans, an image capable of keeping itself upright on its knees on an ordinary schoolroom bench for something like twenty minutes, is an entity, call it Pantamount or Tom Thumb, or Tamburlaine the Great, that I can’t afford to ignore when considering the crucial point whether in its essence love isn’t a curse to the human race—”

What he felt at that moment was that if he could only explain to this Atlantean creature just exactly what that mother was doing when she kept her eye on her idiot boy, he might persuade the man to go out with him into the yard now at once and address a word of warning to the woman.

“Mr. Brown-Smith!” he accordingly began.

But he was so obsessed by the indurated woodenness of the man’s appearance that it gave him a very curious feeling when the fellow lazily, easily, comfortably and quite casually opened his left eye and fixed it upon him. The eye was a heavy-lidded eye. It was an ichthyoid eye, and it gave John Hush a look that made him feel as if he had been dead twenty thousand years and in his ghostly peregrinations, while stumbling along the bottom of some prehistoric ocean-bed, had stumbled on a volcanic crack in that horrific floor of the universe and out of this crack had been arrested by the fixity of this eye. Then the other eye opened and then the mouth opened.

“Sit down and explain yourself!” said the mouth; and, as the creature who owned the mouth spoke, it itself slid down into a sitting posture and made room for John at its side.

Not one of the inmates who were finishing their breakfast at that end of the table gave John a glance; and as for the attendant who had encouraged him to speak to this “revenant” from before the Flood, he had calmly taken himself off and was now standing with his hands in his pockets quietly talking to his companion near the door.

“Mr. Brown-Smith!” began John again, as soon as he found himself comfortably seated beside this enigmatic fragment of antiquity. “What I’ve been wanting to ask you ever since I first saw you is this: Wouldn’t it be a good thing to invent some other word in place of the word love?”

The piece of driftwood that had become immortal in its aeonian tossings on all the seas of all the world allowed its Atlantean head to wag slowly from side to side in an emphatic “no”, “Why not?” John persisted.

“Because,” responded Pantamount, “words have magical power; and since the word ‘love’ has been used so long for all the meanings we give it in this part of the world, it would be silly to use another word unless we decided to break the spell.

If we decided to undo all that this magic word has done, then we would have to use a word that was opposite in meaning; and not only so, we would have to try hard to feel whatever it was that the new word meant.”

John looked at him uneasily.

“Would we have to say ‘hate’?” he enquired.

But the driftwood man only smiled at him. Not a word did he answer.

“You mean,” answered John, “that hate isn’t the opposite of love?”

But still the driftwood man only smiled; and now his smile made John think of a queerly shaped piece of wood that he had found once in a rock-pool near Lulworth and that a fisherman had told him must have been carried backwards and forwards across the ocean for a million years.

"You mean," said John, "that hate is some kind of perverted love, and that the real opposite of love would be indifference; and that if we found some appropriate word either biblical or classical implying anyway the condition of complete imperviousness, we might if we used such a word for a few hundred years gradually turn off, before we knew what we were doing, the electric current that moves the entire world?"

Pantamount didn't even smile. The features carved in driftwood, from which John had never taken his eyes, remained as unmoved as a universe from which the dynamic polarity of positive and negative electricity had been totally withdrawn.

John felt frustrated and baffled. He felt like a boy who had at last found the way into the circus of his ideal desire only to be rejected as incapable of even collecting the dung of the elephant he longed to ride.

"I had hoped you could help me," he murmured rather pitifully. "It's this woman from the village who comes to the sheds to do the milking. She's got an idiot boy, you know, and this boy—" He fancied he detected a flicker of interest cross the man's face, and so he dropped the Brown-Smith and boldly called him Pantamount. "And she loves this kid, Mr. Pantamount," he said, "to such a tune that I saw a look of positively sick longing on the boy's face when he wanted to follow one of those twins — you know the pair, Mr. Paramount? — as he danced over the shadows."

Once more a smile flickered over the piece of driftwood that had been crossing the Atlantic for a million years, and along with this smile there drifted into John's ears what sounded like a proposition of some elemental Euclid, a proposition that had come together out of the lines and curves of foam left by the ripples and eddies of half the tides of the Atlantic.

"What we tend to forget," murmured this elemental subhuman Euclid, "is that our choice is not between the chaoticism of 'love-hate' and the monotony of 'love-nothing'. It is between a less or a more of this lively and magnetic ‘love-hate’, that is to say a less or a more of the natural magic we’ve all been practising for a million years!”

John shuddered through his whole body and soul. He had never in his life felt so compelled to stiffen his whole being, and at the same time to bend it, metaphorically speaking, in that crouching movement, described by the Homeric word aleis, of a desperate creature at bay. He had never felt like this before, anywhere, or about anything. He sat straight up. He clenched his lean knuckles upon his hard, pressed-together knees. He felt as if in another second he might be compelled to butt with his head, as well as struggle with clenched hands and bony knees, against the impact of this cosmic ‘love-hate’ about which the man was talking.

“I don’t think—” he gasped, in a voice that to his own internal hearing was like a rending and a splintering crack, cleaving its way through some vast, compact, adamantine rock, thick as the world, “I don’t think I agree with you!”

He was astonished that the half a dozen men who were still lingering over their breakfast didn’t rise and crowd round them. He was amazed that the attendant with whom he had been talking didn’t come rushing up. But what was this? The arm that came round him was not the arm of any indignant attendant, nor was it the arm of any agitated neighbour. It was the arm of Mr. Pantamount himself; and no sooner was it about him than he was aware of the fact that he had totally and entirely misunderstood the man’s meaning.

The arm thrown round him, the arm supporting him, the arm that was now leading him across the dining-hall towards the entrance to the passage and the stairs, wasn’t at all the kind of “loving arm” the mere idea of which as approaching him and as touching him made him feel as if he could utter a scream that would crack “the thick rotundity of the earth “You misunderstood me completely, my dear boy,” said Mr. Pantamount, allowing John to lean against the banister while he himself, relaxing his hold upon the young man, permitted his own arm to sink limply to his side and stood awkwardly and obviously very uncomfortably on the second step of the staircase.

"You don't perhaps realise that what you call 'love' and I call 'love-hate' is an electric vibration, with an ebb and flow and a less and a more, as if it were an actual fluid, but a vibration whose activity, though not its essential nature, is affected by the amount of it you use.

"Thus while an ordinary amount of the 'love-hate' vibration or invisible fluid leaves things to all outward appearance very much the same as they were, the use of twice as much of this fluid has a totally different effect and a very sudden and sometimes a very surprising one. Can't I make you see, my dear boy, that in all these ultimate things in nature and life, it is not the difference of substance, but the difference of quantity that is the important thing? This nectar, this ichor, this miraculous semen of the gods, is simply the result of doubling, yes! and perhaps of more than doubling, the amount of love-hate you are using. This doesn't change the quality of the thing's creative magnetism; but it changes completely its effect. Can I make you understand? I tell you when you shudder, as you did'just now, at the idea of the appalling power of ordinary human love mixed, as it always is, with ordinary human hate, you are entirely justified.

"And you are entirely justified in crying out that you don't agree with the abuse, examples of which we see on all sides, of this divine force and power. Experiment with it yourself, my dear boy! Only the living experience of it will show you! And don't you see how easy it is? You don't have to say to yourself: 'Now I must mix my love for this person, for this stone, for this stump, for this grass, for this plant, for this mud, this rock, this empty air, this gulf between the stars, this horizon of moving ocean, this wall, this carpet, this bird, this cloud of gnats, or for these legs and arms that are yours, theirs, or my own, with the proper amount of hate!" I tell you you don't have to think what you're doing at all; or to understand what you're doing at all; or to stop for a moment to ask yourself 'what am I doing?' All you've got to do is to do it.

"And if you say to me, 'To do what?' I answer, 'To "love-hate" more than you've ever love-hated before!' That's all. To do it more. To do it more each time you do it!"

At this point Mr. Pantamount gave John a look; and this look John, in the quarter of a tick of the big clock just below them in the hall, decided that at all costs he must fix in his memory, exactly as it was so that he might recall every quiver and quirk of it, every up-lift and down-droop of it, to Tenna, when they met in the afternoon. It was, he decided he would tell Tenna, the most perfect example he had ever seen of the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove, fused in something else, something that John, whether Tenna understood him or not, could only describe as magian.

At the moment, however, John had no time to think out all that the man's look implied, since the words that followed it required instantaneous action.

"Better go down a couple of steps further," suggested Mr. Tantamount, "and let's both lean on this rail, so that you can keep watch past my shoulder on all who come up, and I can keep watch past your shoulder on all who are coming down. Our watchword, of course, is 'Inmates pass!' But if they're not inmates we'll both hurry down and be out of the front door before you can say 'Jack Robinson!'"

Hush obeyed him in every detail; and certainly if Doctor Echetus had appeared at the bottom of the stairs and Father Toby Tickle at the top of the stairs, they would never have given a second glance to these two active, practical, competent, energetic men exchanging a casual morning's greeting as they passed each other on the main staircase of Glint Hall.

"Forgive all this fuss, my dear sir!" murmured Mr. Pantamount. "And before I go on, let me assure you I don't give myself away to everybody like this; only I knew, even before you spoke to me, that you and I had a lot in common."

Meanwhile John's mind had been whirling round fifty times faster than the big entrance-hall clock, whose chief peculiarity compared with other institutional time-pieces was the bare, unbroken, unadorned whiteness of its face and the unvarnished blackness, an opaque dead blackness, more like soot than ink, of its broad flat hands, hands that resembled the gloved fingers of an implacable great-aunt raised to her face in mechanical prayer the moment her knees touched their familiar accomplice the straw-stuffed hassock.

"He's on the track of something," John thought, "but he's taken the wrong road to get there. This damned 'love-hate' business, however much he piles it up, can never get him there. He may be right that they're not opposites; or, if they are, that they depend on each other for their very existence; but I don't see how he can deny that they cancel each other out, and that no amount of 'more', 'more', 'more', 'more' can really fuse them together or produce the required magic. No amount of 'more' can change the quality of a thing's essence." John felt like a mediaeval theologian who has just nailed up a challenge on the gate of the university of the universe. But it was as if that far-carried fragment of Atlantean driftwood had read his thoughts.

"It is not," recommenced Mr. Pantamount, "that the hate-fluid neutralises or freezes the love-fluid, nor is it that the psychic-chemical atoms of love work upon the object to which we direct them in alternate activity with those of hate. To think in that way is to misunderstand the nature of both. The love-element or love-fluid or love-magnetism in us possesses as the larger portion of its nature psychic-chemical atoms that are identical with — and I have proved this from many curious experiments on these delicately mixed atoms in my own nature — identical with the psychic-chemical constitution of the hate-element or hate-magnetism in us. When we direct them towards any person or any thing, they create a link between ourselves and that person or thing. And this link, whether a love-link or a hate-link, or both together, as is usually the case, is not easy to break.

"And now consider this, my dear sir. The whole of our life is divided into two halves, the first action, the second contemplation; and the curious thing to note is that though they both tend to overlap each other, there is about twice as much over-lapping of action by contemplation as of contemplation by action.

"For instance, I am going out now to help trimming some young firs. My chopping and sawing is unquestionably action; but, as I do it, are my taste, my eyes, my ears, my nose, my touch, entirely absorbed in this action? Of course not!

"And what about women? A woman, let's say, is washing up at her sink. She is rinsing and drying; but while her fingers are at work she can see a stream of sunlight striking the woodwork at her side or striking a rack of clean plates over her head, and she can note a leaf blown across the bricks at her feet, while the sound of rooks is reaching her through the window from somewhere outside, or the long-drawn whistle of a train.

"We are thus compelled — as the academic logicians would put it, though, of course, really, we are anything but compelled, for all the world does the precise opposite! — compelled to recognise that contemplation occupies about three-quarters of our life, while action — though we may be supposed to be working twelve hours every day — really only occupies, that is to say entirely fills, our living consciousness for about a quarter of our life, or perhaps only a tenth. And now I come to my point—"

But at this moment a group of specially fortunate male inmates, favoured, as Tenna was, by being allowed to have their breakfast on trays in their bedroom, came leisurely downstairs, each one of them, without exception, John noticed, surveying Mr. Pantamount with fascinated interest as they passed.

"He must," thought John, "be some kind of a celebrity, perhaps a famous criminal of whom in those foreign places I never heard!" and he began conjuring up the most monstrous "Jack the Ripper" crimes, trying in vain to imagine his companion committing them. Then he told himself that perhaps Mr. Pantamount had a mad fancy that he was once a salamander who slept in a warming-pan under the stairs all day, but at night scurried about from room to room, all over the building, swallowing all the big black spiders it could catch by one leg and gobbling them up alive.

"But it must," he thought, "have been all a pure fancy! He may have crawled about in the dark all night for years with his head near the floor and his mouth open; but as for catching a single spider. I can't see him ever doing it. And whatever his crimes, whatever his manias, whatever his crazy delusions, whatever Jesuitical or Taoistical defence of 'love-hate' he may invent, calling it a 'magnetic vibration', I like this Pantamount. I feel a physical attraction to the fellow. But where the devil are my thoughts off to now?" He asked himself this when he realised that he was rubbing the slippery banister with the palm of his hand and imagining himself caressing the sea-polished, million-years-drifted woodwork of Mr. Pantamount's battered frame! That gentleman was now speaking once more, and speaking with a queer creaking sound in his voice that really did seem to John like the creaking in the skeleton ribs of some fantastic vessel from the ports of lost Atlantis, or even from the drowned harbours of Mu, the flood-city of the Pacific, a vessel that had drifted for aeons of time across one, or both, of these two oceans, and in drifting had been scraped and scratched by huge extinct devil-fish and hammered by the frontal bones of marine mammals larger than any leviathans as yet recorded in the annals of the sea.

"Three quarters of our life," creaked Mr. Pantamount, "is contemplation; and so much does our happiness depend on those three-quarters of our life that even if we are incredibly deft and adroit in our daily job we can be the reverse of happy in our lives!

"Now suppose, my dear sir, that that aggravating old clock ticking away down there were to recognise that you and I were both unhappy; and, further, were to decide like some shrewd old Nanny to tell us what to do to recover our spirits, what would it tell us? Well! I contend that it would tell us, as it saw us against this banister, that we must intensify our love-hate for everything in our consciousness at this moment. It would, in fact, tell us not to confine ourselves to the woodwork under our elbows or to the carpet-covered boards under our feet or to the sun's rays falling upon the marble squares upon the floor or to the heavenly scents of leaves and grass reaching us through some open window downstairs, that is to say, not to confine our intensification-scoop to what is round us at the moment but to include, in addition to the moment's plunder, all the most pressing images of pleasure, yes, and of pain too, that at this moment are disturbing, delighting, harassing, agitating, thrilling or lacerating us from our immediate past — that is to say, from the past that has power to hurt us still; the events, for instance, that brought us to Glint Hall and the personalities, both engaging and detestable, that were connected with our coming here."

At this point John Hush suddenly became aware of the countenance of that keeper of the north lodge whose sleeping-quarters and those of the woman who resembled his old nurse he could see from his bed. The man was staring at them with concentrated interest; but the moment he realised that John had recognised him he turned his head, shrugged his shoulders and went off.

“What makes up the larger part,” continued Mr. Tantamount, though John Hush knew he had seen the man, “of everyone’s life is our love-hate for the people of our life, for our wives and husbands and friends, for our parents and children and neighbours, for our employers and employees. Thus whenever we are oppressed by sadness or by annoyance the cause is our love-hate for other people, either a momentary and transient, or a permanent and abiding love-hate, with the stress on the hate, or on the love as circumstances dictate. Therefore, if the art of life consists in the supremely easy and yet supremely difficult art of being happy, it becomes clear that our deliberate intensification of the nervous magnetic flow from our soul into the clothes, the faces, the gestures, the bodies, the ways, the words, the expressions, of the people of our life will be associated with the material things immediately around us.

“For instance, at this moment I am myself grievously affected by two faces, faces that I love and hate, faces that swim about in my spleen and burrow in my bowels, faces that I know so intensely that I feel as if my own face, as I think about them, comes to resemble first one of them and then the other! Well, my friend, these faces mingle with these stairs and these banisters, with that pool of sunlight, with that old clock’s ticking! Yes, and I’ve got to mix them with all the air around us and all the earth about us, and with the airy space beyond, and with the empty spaces beyond the airy-spaces, and with the great void itself.”

Pantamount’s words melted into so much before they died away that John’s mind was left flying in circles over the things into which they’d sunk, like a seagull over miles and miles of wet sand.

But for John the oddest thing about that particular montent of his clinging to the banister of the main staircase of Glint was that suddenly, and without warning, his own life-consciousness which till now had felt completely dominated by this human eidolon of ghostwood that had drifted for a million years over the antediluvian cities of Atlantis and Mu and about whom heaven knows what sea-birds had floated and what flying-fish had flown, rose in revolt. Yes, the almost insanely humble life-consciousness in John's Shakespearean actor's frame, from feeling like the consciousness of a fly, of a gnat, of a midge, of a worm, of a newt, of a spider, of a flea, began to feel as if it were the life-consciousness of some great magician capable of making any enemy he might have wish to the devil he were his friend before it was too late.

And with this totally unexpected sense of power there came a clear memory of what, when he left the milking sheds and came into breakfast, he had wanted from Mr. Lordy and been unable to get from him because of his being a Catholic, namely some device, some trick, some incantation, some miraculous formula, by means of which he could liberate — spiritually, of course, not physically — that idiot village-boy from his possessively devoted mother.

"Oh, by the way, Mr. Brown-Smith" — he noticed that at the sound of those syllables Pantamount made a humorous grimace, screwing up his features in the most grotesque manner till he caused them to resemble the features of a sea-serpent to whom has been offered a dish of pond-eels; but John shamelessly went on—" what I want you to do now is to win the confidence of no less a person than the village idiot of this hamlet. Yes, this is serious, Pantamount. I want you to attract this boy to yourself, as I know you could if you only would, and draw off a little of this same 'love-hate' — intercept it. I mean — as it flows between this possessive mother and this possessed youngster. Come on, my dear sir, and let me introduce you. You'll soon see just what I mean."

He laid his fingers on the man's sleeve.

"I don't know," he began again, as they descended into the hall, "whether you have a mother living, Mr. Pantamount? I am an orphan myself; but there are cases, I assure you, when — cases when—" He broke off suddenly; and then, in quite a different voice, a voice that rose almost to a harsh scream:

"There are cases, Mr. Pantamount—" He stopped abruptly.

"Cases when," he went on after a pause, during which he was clearly trying to control himself, "it makes anyone murderous!"

The sound of this dangerous word startled both of them; and it was with an access of caution, reticence and discretion that they crossed the threshold and walked out into the air. Oh, how clearly John could remember afterwards all that passed through his mind as he led the man from the front of Glint Hall clear round to the back and guided him into the particular portion of the big north yard where were the couple of sheds in and out of which Nancy and her son looked after their cows.

He imagined himself founding, with the money he would receive from a brilliantly savage book on the way Glint Hall was run, a completely new Glint Hall, in which all the attendants were men he himself had trained and among whom it would be impossible to imagine such a creature as Mr. Gewlie.

The wind had entirely gone down when they reached the cowshed, and the smell of dung and hay and grass and milk and oil and grease and sawdust and stagnant water and horse-piss and disinfectant and river-mist and new paint all mingled together in the windless warmth to create a morbidly agreeable earthly Hades quite as pleasant if not more pleasant to John's peculiar taste than any earthly Paradise of which he had read.

The brooding sunshine heaved and quivered and wavered and languidly floated between the buildings as if it were a diffused essence of pot-pourri drawn from the fecundity of the whole of the British Isles; and the singular notion now edged itself into John Hush's brain that the cockleshell creases of Pantamount's figure represented a cosmic reversion to some purely mineral world against which the friendly, animal-vegetable world had long ago revolted.

To John's fantastic speculation at this moment the ocean-drenched driftwood of this weird person's bodily form, to which just now on the staircase he had been so strangely attracted, had grown to be something not merely petrified, but transformed into some element older than uranium or helium or hydrogen or nitrogen, older than all the scoriac dust from all the extinct craters of the world.

But his crazy thoughts were now impinged upon by their arrival at the shed, and their vision of Nancy and her offspring, the sweat running down the ruddy, plump apple-hard cheeks of the one, and the sad, hollow, elongated, Quixotic cheeks of the other, while the former worked with bucket and mop at the cribs, racks, receptacles for grain, and bins for mixing food and fodder, and the latter, with the biggest pitchfork Hush had ever seen, was shuffling back and forth, carrying the cow-dung and the trampled straw to a great heap in the corner of one of the small fields which were inside the walls of the institution.

So fast had John's imagination run ahead of what he was practically achieving that the process of introducing his friend to Nancy was well over, and the buxom middle-aged woman was already becoming infatuated with this refugee from before the Flood, by the time he himself had begun to talk to the idiot.

When his conversation with Seth, however, touched the performances of Hither and Thither, John had an agitating shock with regard to his own personal mental state. He suddenly experienced the extremely disturbing sensation that he was living in a dream that was inside another dream. There was terror for him in this. He had been dreaming and now was awake; but he found that he had awakened into a new dream, out of which he now had to escape again through any aperture, postern, skylight porthole, arrow-slit, airshaft, that in his desperation he could hit upon!

But what had happened to him? A minute or two ago, as he presented his new friend to the idiot's mother, and himself began talking in so mellow a tone to the boy, he not only felt that he was master of a very difficult situation but that he was master of it by the use of his own secret way of life that was totally outside the bounds of race or creed.

Yes, a minute or two ago he was on the crest of a great wave of life, in a Flying Dutchman of his own, and able to ride any storm and give any orders — like yesterday's crazy Commander — but now — Jesus Holy! — there was nothing to stand on, nothing under his feet, nothing to stop him going down, nothing to stop him going up, nothing to stop him going sideways, whether to left or right, and, with this, his senses had gone all askew, so that he saw sounds, heard smells, felt colours, tasted shadows!

"What on earth has happened to me?" he asked himself. His actual body was swaying and lurching about; though it wasn't only in the outer world that things had become very queer. He kept asking himself, “Is this the proper way to breathe?” For the notion had crossed his mind that he ought to be breathing through his skin, but that he’d forgotten the trick of this! And then he thought: “Didn’t I know how to fly when I was little? Weren’t there once feathers on my wrists? Yes, yes — feathers! Didn’t Plato talk of feathers? He’s a good fellow. Where is he now?”

Everything in John’s mind was rocking like bilge-water in the hold of a ship. He had begun talking to the idiot about love-hate. And now he was demanding of himself why it was that it had become impossible for the world ever to come to an end while there was so much love-hate to draw upon. What was the matter with him? Something must have gone wrong! “Is it possible that when I was getting sleepy and struggling and beating against sleep I broke through some barrier and slipped down some crack leading into a completely different world?”

And then in a flash of realisation he knew what it was! The whole atmosphere of psychic disturbance in Glint Hall — that is to say the magnetic cloud of derangement under treatment — was something totally different from the natural tradition of world-old rural aberration such as is rooted in the common earth along with rocks and stones and trees.

Yes, John Hush now saw clearly enough what had happened. Coming straight from insanity within Glint to insanity outside Glint, he had indeed quite literally slipped into a different world. The truth was that the insanity of the free outside world was capable of producing many startling effects upon Doctor Echetus’s imprisoned patients. To them it seemed doubly real. It was real in its insanity, which the inmates naturally held to be a very especial form of truth; and it was also real in the manner in which it was taken for granted and given its particular and special place in the free, noninstitutional life of the ordinary world. This idiot boy he was trying to assist in freeing himself from his possessive mother had managed in some subtle and indescribable way to hypnotise him into the poetically accepted and taken-for-granted aberration of a simple idiocy that was as old as the human race. This boy was, in fact, what in ancient races was called an “Innocent of God”, and in the presence of this planetary human derangement that was older than Homer or Hesiod, this derangement with whose sacred innocence even Hippocrates dared not meddle, this derangement that affected every aspect of the human flesh, every member of the human body, every impulse of the human spirit, all these modern psychiatrists about whom his guardian and his guardian's friends were forever talking seemed frivolous and superficial and trivial and altogether unsound.

Yes, John realised now what had happened to him. By trying to help this rustic Innocent, this incarnation of all the traditional simplicities of all the Simple-Simons of the immemorial village-greens of England, he had given himself up to a lad whose whole soul longed to catch, to take hold of, to feel between his fingers, some wild free creature that he could make his own, and only in this way obliterate his secret knowledge that to his mother he himself was just such a wild creature, and that all this craving was born of his own flutterings and quiverings as he was pressed to his mother's heart.

And John saw that by giving himself up to this lad — for he told himself that what might be called "the insanity of nature" was a more powerful force than what might be called "the insanity of nerves" — he had himself taken the part, in this mad drama, of those airy-fairy twins for whom the heart and spirit of the lad were crying.

"Well, Nancy my dear," he could hear Pantamount murmuring in that peculiar tone of his that seemed to introduce into the actions of an hour the feelings of a thousand years, "I must get off now to my spruce-firs; but I'll see you again to-morrow and we'll talk more about that little matter!" It was indeed with these words repeating themselves over and over again at the back of his brain— "that little matter, that little matter, that little matter!" — that John decided as he worked by the boy's side that what he was really doing for him was offering himself as the wild goose, as the wild lizard, as the wild shrew-mouse, or even as the wild hedgehog, for the idiot's imagination to overtake and hug to its heart, though its embrace killed the thing it loved!

But he knew he had contracted the last thing he wanted just then, namely a heavy human responsibility; and what if he had started towards this unknown Atlantean a foolish fancy in the breast of Nancy that might end by making the woman seriously unhappy?

"I must tell Tenna," he thought, "every word of this." And then there came over him a ghastly desolating sense that what he had particularly dreaded with regard to himself and Tenna was the very thing that had been brought to pass; namely that their individual manias should be swept into the current of their friendship — for he was actually beginning to wonder which of her locks he would most like to snip off; and there she was, scarce able to control her fury with that absurd old Rumpibus!

"I must have it out with her," he thought, "I must persuade her to enter into a sort of solemn league and covenant with me, so that I restrain myself about her curls and she restrains herself about that ridiculous old doddipole."

13. THE POLISHED TABLE

THE DAYS AND weeks and months at Glint Hall went by with their scrapings of nerve-strings, their loosenings of nerve-knots, their meltings of nerve-glaciers, their combustions of nerve-dams, their scoopings out of nerve-cisterns, their crater-eruptions of nerve-volcanoes, their ice-fields of nerve-corpses, without any startling change in the average tempo of the affinity between John and Tenna, until the revolving whirligig of fate, following its own rhythmical polarity of obsessions, brought time's pulsing locomotive to a pause on Saturday June the sixteenth, just a week before Midsummer Eve. The unequalled solstitial twilights of this particular summer, although entirely natural, were not without their temperamental effect upon the inmates of Glint.

This effect was primarily nervous, but it was emotional, too; and that open-minded scientist, the master of Glint, studied it just as carefully as he studied the recurrent effects of the waxing and waning moon.

It was as a consequence of these studies that he discovered that when subjected to a succession of twilights patients tended to become absent-minded and indulge in those vague daydreams in which all dangerous obsessions are lost. He was, indeed, famous all over Europe as the only authority who insisted on allowing protracted twilights their therapeutic effect.

This was on the principle of like curing like. For as Nature in her northern twilight falls into a mood suspended between a romantic worship of light and a romantic worship of darkness, so also does her paragon, man; and as Nature's temperate zones are healing and restoring to her poor creatures of earth, so nothing but good could come, the Doctor argued, from letting loose, so to speak, this solstitial suavity upon agitated human nerves.

And under what conditions, he must have asked himself, were his certified bedlamites most apt to be soothed by the innocuous daydreams of nature's twilights? Obviously when reading! And reading what books? Obviously old-fashioned books. From the pages of modern books the minds of readers seldom wander. It is from old-fashioned books that these touchingly abstracted heads are lifted up in their trances of absorbed daydreams.

Doctor Echetus never hesitated to rely upon the sound judgment of his chaplain, Father Toby, as to the difference between disturbing books and soothing books. Thus it was brought about that the chief inciters to insanity, to whose devilish influence, according to John and Tenna, these aberrations were due, namely religion, sex, and blazing sunshine, were all barred from this group of patients from whose carefully-shaded lamps, and from whose books chosen by Father Toby, not a few wholesomely dreaming heads were lifted up in the peaceful dusk.

The grand piano was an innovation. It had been steadily advocated for the reading-room by Ursie Mum; but for a long time Doctor Echetus had refused to consider it. It was only when Ursie Mum persuaded a specialist from Budapest to explain to the Doctor the value of adding good music to good books, and both to the influence of prolonged twilight — and then only when she herself offered to pay for the piano — that Echetus yielded.

In regard to the smoking-room, nobody interfered with the Doctor's method. Here he was startlingly original. Here he followed the purely empirical and experimental method. He insisted on the shutters being closed and the curtains being drawn and all the electricity being fully turned on. Thus when a patient moved from the reading-room into the smoking-room it was like leaving one hemisphere to enter another! There was no card-table in the room that wasn't brilliantly illuminated, and there could never be a doubt in the mind of the blindest player as to what cards he held in his hand.

It may be imagined it was found necessary in spite of the Doctor's experiments in normal nightclubism to open a couple of small windows near the door when the smoke-filled warmth of the room became too overpowering; but, that the Doctor's original idea shouldn't be interfered with, the particular windows letting in the air looked to the east and consequently opened on the darkest twilight that could be found round Glint Hall, and although in the twilight the old heathen camp could be seen, the lights in the room were so glaring that the view outside was considerably dimmed. The Doctor's idea in this whole scheme of the smoking-room was to evoke, as far as it could be done, an environment of metropolitan normality, thereby inducing the patients to forget that they were patients.

On this particular night of the sixteenth of June John Hush and Tenna Sheer were facing each other over the same familiar untouched draughts-board as had been their inanimate companion every night since Lady Day. "Nothing," John was earnestly whispering to her, "can stop my reading your feelings in your face. We know each other too well, my precious one, and we can't be put off by words. You can repeat that bravado till midnight and you won't make me believe you. I know you are as tense as a bowstring, and so are the rest of us, and every day now till we're off it'll get worse and worse. Tottie and Thither and Miss Bolster are just as strung-up as Mr. Lordy; nor are the Commander and the Zeit-Geist any better. Pantamount is the only one of the lot of us who seems unruffled, and, of course, it may be self-control even with him.

"I don't have to tell you, my treasure, what the worst danger is!" Her eyes, which had been growing larger and darker and rounder all the evening and had begun to surround themselves with cavernous circles that steadily grew hollower as the flickering orbs within them grew darker, now emitted a startling glitter that shot from their centre to their circumference as they reflected the rays from the nearest electric bulb in the ceiling.

"You mean ourselves?" she murmured. "Well!"

"Well! Not only you and I, my dear. I mean the whole lot of us who're in the secret. I mean all the Confederates."

Tenna bit her lips and was silent. Then, unable to restrain herself, she began speaking rapidly, though still in so low a voice that he found difficulty in following her.

"What's so unfair about you, John, is that you treat my instincts as if they were no more than your own manias which have merely to do with yourself! Do you know I sometimes feel I shan't be able to get into that plane at all with that abominable old man! I feel as though if he were there I'd throw myself out, or throw him out!"

John looked at her exactly as a devoted elder brother placed in charge of the "little ones" in the absence of their Nanny might have looked at the most excitable of these troublesome infants.

"Please, please, my treasure, listen to me for one second! Don't, for heaven's sake let it be like it was that awful time in May when neither of us could utter a word at the Confederates' table, and they all saw we'd had one of those lovers' quarrels at which — as I told you then — they say Jove laughs, and Miss Bolster said—"

Tenna gave him one of her most furious looks. "Who cares what Miss Bolster said? And you've no right to call it a quarrel in that stupid schoolboy way when naturally anyone's feelings would have been hurt by what you said."

"What did I say? No, no! I'm not trying to tease you! I really do want to know. It's very important I should know. Don't you see, when we're all so sensitive about certain teasing views of what we feel so strongly, it's maddening to be quite in the dark! We know that something we couldn't bear to be said is being said about us and yet we don't know what it is! Please, please tell me what it was I said that hurt you so! I know I could explain it."

But the only reply she gave was to turn her head away. She had come to know, by the experience of a quarter of a year, that nothing put him at her mercy so quickly as the simple gesture of turning her head away from him and keeping it turned away.

At this particular moment her head was turned in such a manner as to cause the electric light from the bulb in the ceiling to isolate, like shadowed ivory, from the rest of her face the white portion of her left eye, which, since the brown of Tenna's eyes was a very deep brown and a good deal deeper than the brown of her hair, gleamed, by reason of the contrast, with an almost phosphorescent whiteness, a whiteness so pure that it possessed a power of reflection.

This power of reflection possessed by the intense whiteness that encircled the brown of the girl's eye, and which at this moment, because of her half-averted head, was all John Hush could see of it, was now made use of by the nearest electric bulb shining down from the ceiling to reflect mysterious gleams of an unusual lustre.

The truth is that, as in the case of certain historic women whose faces have come down to us in poetry and painting, Tenna's appearance, evasive and shadowy as it was, had the peculiarity of something transparent. Her inner soul, her astral identity, showed through.

It was through the sharp outlines of her profile, through the bony structure of her cheeks and eye-sockets that this was now emphasised. It was emphasised by the merest chance, by the most trifling and negligible accident.

John was hopelessly unobservant in these things. This mysterious golden lustre now reflected in the white penumbra of Tenna's eye as she kept her face half-averted was entirely due to something abnormal and unusual about the particular electric bulb above them from which the light fell. There was certainly something peculiar about this bulb, but John didn't glance up at it or give it a thought; though he yielded himself wholly to the effect it produced.

The bulb may have suffered some slight accident to its pure spotlessness and translucency that caused it to emit an uneven ray, or by some quirk in its glassy substance it may have flung down a more intense light than its original purpose warranted.

In any case it was a negligible accident in this hot illuminated chamber, where the intermittent airs from outside smelt of the thyme-scented grass of the high camp-ridge and not of the muddy reeds of the river that encircled Glint Hall in every other direction, that such a mystic gleam, or demonic gleam, or gleam from some temporary crack in the adamantine walls of our present dimension, shone from the delicate features of this old-fashioned girl that it never occurred to John Hush that the accidental concatination of a half-averted profile with an erratic electric bulb could be its sole cause. No revelation from the confounding workshop of Nature takes longer to establish itself in a clever diplomatic mind than that the greatest emotional events are often spontaneously generated by the flips and flurries of chance stirring into life the fecundity of chaos.

As he gazed at her now John Hush made up his mind never to allow his reaction to any conceivable caprice of hers to divert the obstinate steering of the mental ship of his life towards the north-star of fidelity; and this in spite of any new mania of his own or any new madness of hers.

"We've only got a week more, dear heart. I implore you to remember that; only a week more before the moment comes for you to escape the visit of your father and for me to cut to pieces my jealousy of the American woman! Let's make a bargain, my one of all, that we can never break!

"But the important thing now needn't be as serious as that. It need only be a simple, honest, faithful bond between you and me for these few agitating days! Don't be angry with me any more, I beg you, my sweet, because of that wretched mania of mine. I frightened you unnecessarily about it.

"You see, Tenna my treasure, I have to confess all my manias to you; and that must give you the idea that I'm all manias, nothing but manias, whereas it isn't like that at all!

"I yield to them pretty often, I know. But I don't always yield to them! No, by no means always! You must remember that it's only three times in these three months — April, May, June — that I've done you-know-what! And I've got all three of you-know-what safely upstairs in my collar-drawer. I haven't done to them you-know-what. Well, as you know, I needn't talk like that — I mean I haven't put a match to any of the three, so as to lick up the smell of their burning, and so lick up my girl till she's part of me, though I've wanted to so much that my knees have knocked together and my stomach — you know those feelings! — has sunk inwards till it felt like a broken soap-bubble!

"Oh! I've come near it Tenna! I've lit a match and held it to one of those heavenly curls, closer — closer — closer —

But I didn't burn it! I tell you, Tenna, my precious, I really must have a much stronger will, now that I've met you, than I ever had before! Why, in the old days nothing on earth would have stopped me from burning those wisps of hair of yours! You don't mind my calling them curls, do you? I know your hair's only wavy really and not properly curly, Tenna, but nothing has made my will stronger than this temptation! They're all three in my collar-drawer upstairs. One's in Leaves of Grass, one's in Don Quixote, one's in the Odyssey in Loeb's Classics. And though, of course, I've thought of burning them time and time again, I never have!

"It's extraordinary, really, when you come to think of it! Here am I in 'the very lists of love', as it says in Venus and Adonis, only it isn't exactly 'love', not love in the ordinary sense, anyway! But here I am, surrounded by people who have followed their personal manias to the limit — and there, in my collar-drawer are three of your darling curls" — he lowered his voice till she could barely catch the words— "yet I can't—"

He stopped. But had Mr. Lordy instead of being deep in chess in the reading-room with Mr. Candlemas, the mad lexicographer from Sheffield, been seated near them in the smoking-room listening to their talk he would have noticed the hurried, instinctive movement with which Tenna's hand went up to her head at the words "three of them".

But John was far too full of his own obsession and of his pride in controlling it to notice the fainter and more attenuated effects of his words. "I tell you my will has become what I never thought possible — really strong and powerful! It's queer, isn't it, my precious one?" His whispers were growing louder as well as more intense. "But, of course, it's all due to being really in love for the first time in my life. If I weren't in love it wouldn't have been long — in April probably! — that I'd have done the worst, and let myself go, as most of us here have done, to the limit. But you mustn't imagine, my one of all, that it's been easy to restrain myself. You'd scarcely believe what power of will my love for you has developed! Only last night I was on my feet three times in the night: once for the curl in Leaves of Grass, once for the one in the Odyssey, once for the one in Don Quixote! My will became a gigantic pair of tongs — I could feel it holding me. Yes, little owlet! I stopped being your gladiator-slave. I stopped being your emperor at Capri. I became your simple lover transported by a will as powerful as a pair of iron tongs; and I took myself up and put myself down as I decided I could best serve you and be your faithful bodyguard.

"I don't want you to think of this new will-power of mine as if it were using its power to pick up and put out of the window a vicious old rat who has already swallowed his granddaughter's tail and is nibbling at more of her. But don't you see, my treasure, how unfair it is — surely you must see! — for you to let yourself go about that old fool Rumpibus till you risk endangering our whole escape? I can't see how you can do it, Tenna! It seems unlike you. You become a different person when you do it.

"And don't you see the danger — danger to yourself in doing it? Don't you see what I mean, Tenna? Sir Warden Sheer will have made all his arrangements to come. We can't get off before Midsummer Day because my guardian won't be married before that day and the American plane won't be starting till he's married. And we must give them time to motor here from London.

"And don't you see that if you let yourself go as you're itching to do — and don't think I don't know it, my precious, and don't think they haven't noticed it, too! — let yourself go, I mean, to the limit, and do old Rumpibus in, as you easily could, don't you see they'll put you up there, in 'the Wing', and when the moment comes we shan't be able to escape with the rest, and our miraculous chance will be over and have come to nothing and can never return. The American plane will be gone without us! You and I will be separated and kept apart till we die of old age, or manage to kill ourselves; and that, you mad nymph in antro, is no easy thing here where all the windows are barred and they've taken everything away!

"Shall I tell you something, Tenna, that you'll be surprised to hear? I've been lying awake half the night for the last couple of weeks — oh, more than that! — telling myself horrible stories about what'll happen, what can't help happening, in case your self-control breaks down and you attack old Rumpibus! It's gone so far with me, my treasure, that I've actually — but never mind that!

"The point is, it's simply cruel of you to be so unfair as to let yourself go, when for your sake, I mean for both our sakes, I've turned myself into a pair of tongs and have lifted myself up and put myself down and carried myself out into the yard as if I were a dead rat! Why should you let yourself go and I restrain myself?

"Answer me that, girl of my heart! Answer me that! For it's unfair, unfair, unfair!"

There had come to be something so like a sob in that “unfair, unfair, unfair” that one of the two attendants, after a glance at his mate, began stealthily threading his way through the card tables towards their corner.

In spite of his emotion it was John and not Tenna who noticed this movement; and in a voice completely different from the excited feverish whisper he’d been using, a voice so perfectly under his control that when Tenna heard it she couldn’t — in spite of her agitation, and though she felt more inclined to cry than laugh — couldn’t resist a flickering smile, “Come, little lady,” he said, “it’s time we stopped quarrelling over our sins!” and rising from his seat and stretching a hand across the draught-board to help her to do the same, he boldly and brazenly led her between the tables, clear past the nonplussed attendant, and out of the smoking-room into the long passage that ended, as John knew well, better indeed than any other inmate, with a view to the east where rose the ridge with the two Scotch firs and the ancient British camp. Thence, turning their backs upon the staircase to the bedrooms above, they moved slowly to the door of the reading-room.

“Sorry, kid,” John murmured humbly, “I oughtn’t to have got so worked up. I expect it’s the terrible nearness to the time. But it’s no good my warning you and then getting so excited myself! I wonder if we were idiots to go and call our little group the Confederates? I don’t like what you tell me about Ursie Mum asking what Miss Bolster meant by saying to those women, ‘No, I’m not a Catholic. I’m a Confederate’.”

Tenna pressed his hand. “I’ll try,” she said gravely and simply; and it was clear to him that in her mind she had never felt the real danger, but now was seriously promising him to struggle against her fury with old Rumpibus.

No one interfered with them when they took their places at the round mahogany table in the centre of the reading-room, near which, as was his habit before locking up the room for the night, Bill Squeeze was taking his Heraclitus-doll, for that was one of the parts the bearded little image played in his life, on its good-night inspection of the bookshelves.

So accustomed had all the habitués of the reading-room grown to the murmuring sound of Bill’s nightly dialogue, wherein silence represented philosophy and a series of “obstinate questionings" ordinary humanity, that only a few readers ever looked up from their books, and of those who did so to-day it was only Tottie Creambo and Arabella Bolster who smiled at the pair on the step-ladder.

There was only one attendant in the reading-room. It was clear that the opinion of Doctor Echetus that the most effective of all sedatives for the disorientated and distraught is an old-fashioned library had influenced the official arrangements in this case.

The attendant upon whom by some natural law of spiritual selection had fallen the duty of superintending the reading-room was the oldest of all the attendants at Glint Hall. His name was Davy Jones and he looked exactly as if he had reappeared from a locked sea-chest deep down in the ooze, where fabulous gems had glimmered from his skull with mysterious gleams, and pieces-of-eight had tinkled against his ribs with every movement of every fish's tail.

Davy Jones took no notice of any particular inmate except Pantamount, towards whom his attitude was extremely peculiar. It couldn't have been called hostile, nor could it have been called friendly. It might have been described as humorously and gravely self-protective.

Davy Jones would throw the same sort of glance on Pantamount as a dignified gentleman quietly following his accustomed path through his own wood but suddenly tripped by a stone, or a root, or a bramble, might turn to cast, in reproachful but amused astonishment, at the object which upset his equilibrium. "If," thought John now, "Pantamount has flesh like a drifting log, and Davy Jones like a ship's keel, with a precious chest embedded in it, is it not natural that the latter should be apprehensive at the approach of the former?"

Since he had first met Pantamount John had been obscurely conscious that the man's fellow-inmates were uneasy in his presence. That the attendants were hostile to him was clear, and it gradually impressed itself on John that he himself was the only person among all the men and women in Glint who felt an unmistakable attraction towards this weird individual.

As to the solitary attendant in the reading-room, John felt nothing towards him except a lack of interest so extreme that it would have reached that dangerous limit of boredom that drives certain unbalanced natures to commit indecent crimes if it had not been for another element in the thing.

But just as the suggestion of immemorial driftwood in the flesh of Pantamount was a magnet of attraction to John, so the suggestion of sunken gems about the sleepy skeleton of Davy Jones produced in John a quite special kind of irritation.

One of the most startling conclusions he had reached as a result of his three months' incarceration was that the physical peculiarities of his fellow prisoners was a thing of much greater importance to him than their mental attitudes. These latter seemed arbitrary, fitful, fanciful, and unilluminating; whereas the former seemed to spring from terribly deep and tragic movements of human life.

Thus it was not Pantamount's theories about "love-hate" and the crucial importance of it's "less or more" that arrested John. It was his corporeal frame. And in the same way the kind of ennui that hovered in the air like a desolate sprinkling of grey sand whenever he contemplated Davy Jones was accompanied by a curious physical irritation with the old attendant's sleep-drenched flesh, flesh that concealed, fold upon drowsy fold, layer upon somnolent layer, unshared, unrecognised, unenjoyed, piled-up palimpsests of hoarded memory.

Davy Jones had the longest and whitest beard John had ever seen. It was a very thin beard, and when the old man twisted it, as he frequently did, round his wrist and even round his longest finger, where it shone like the silvery mane, caught in a tamarisk, of a lost and riderless Bucephalus, it gave some of the frequenters of that reading-room a curiously uncomfortable sensation.

It struck them, in fact, as possessing a sub-human life of its own, the life of a creature resembling a sea-anemone, whose tentacular filaments drew their lustre from the gradual dissolution of fathom-deep masses of gem-breeding scum, scum too heavy to stay on the surface, but since it was not heavy enough to sink to the bottom could only dissolve very slowly. Once in their places at the Confederates' table, and if not under the eye of Davy Jones, at least within the charmed circle of his imperishable beard, John and Tenna could hardly be deaf to the sound of the piano which as usual was being played softly and gently, but like most of the others who were gazing either at Bill Squeeze on his step-ladder with Heraclitus or at the tulip-tree framed in the open window, they were neither musical enough to be annoyed at the sound or placid enough to enjoy it.

The Confederates had now, for at least a month, entirely monopolised this round bare mahogany table. It was a table for whose particular polishing a servant called Mrs. Wohntscher, the only servant in Glint who wasn't an inmate, had a predilection that amounted to a passion.

Mrs. Wohntscher's wages were small enough, but if it hadn't been for Ursie Mum they would have been smaller still, for the simple reason that when once in her daily round of dusting she arrived at this big bare table in the reading-room she couldn't leave it. To polish it was to the soul of Mrs. Wohntscher such a heavenly delight that she could only be parted from it by the end of her day's work. But her rapt labour was certainly appreciated by John, if by nobody else. For when after the glare and heat of the smoking-room he saw Tenna's fingers sink to rest beside his own, and remain at peace folded upon that polished mahogany surface, which really in those June twilights resembled a magic pool, a calm deep as a deep sea used to descend upon him.

As he led Tenna to their table of conspiracy this particular night and took his place by her side between the Zeit-Geist and the Commander, he deliberately tried to divide his receptivity to what was around him into two spheres of sensitiveness, so that with one he might enjoy the air that was coming in through the window, and with the other guard his girl from getting worked up over poor old Rumpibus and Tottie Creambo, for there they were, playing their usual game across the table, he on the further side of the Commander, and she on the further side of the Zeit-Geist, who certainly, as far as he was concerned, took no more notice of her than if she had been a belated specimen of the plump fluffy moth known as the "yellow-under-wing Apart from the danger to Tenna's nerves, both persons and things as John looked about him, were soothing to his spirit. Mr. Lordy, snugly ensconced between the twin dancers who were whispering across him, was smiling with an expression of unruffled benignity as the Commander expounded to him the absurdity of using the mind to think; and as John watched the youthful faces of the girl Thither and the boy Hither at such close quarters, for it was unusual for them to sit down with the other Confederates, he was struck by the complete absence of all ordinary human interests in their faces.

Their lovely little features — for lovely they remained in spite of this surprising lack — were absolutely devoid of expression. They looked neither sad nor happy. They looked as if they had no desire, no ambition, no fear, no hope, no regret, as if they were totally unaware that such feelings existed.

With most of the persons sitting round this table and with nearly all the rest in other parts of the room, our friend had struck up during his three months in Glint a friendly acquaintance; and, indeed, he would have found it hard to explain what it was about the twin dancers, of whom the rumour ran that it was the irresponsible indulgence of a titled father that had affected their wits, that had made him so cautious in their case and induced him to draw away from any close contact.

The whole experiment of this music-and-twilight cure naturally implied that there should be as little exciting discussion of politics, crime, sex, or the cinema, as it was possible to avoid, and Davy Jones seemed endowed with the power of lifting his head and opening at least one of his eyes when any of these agitating topics emerged in the offing.

After glancing quickly at the peculiar ceremony proceeding on the step-ladder, where apparently Heraclitus had to utter an evening benediction to various heavy-weather sages of our feather-brained race, John allowed his attention to wander to the familiar window and the branches of the tulip-tree floating out there upon the flowing sea of twilight.

It seemed to him that what the air was bringing into the room that night was much more than the scent of flowering trees and fragrant shrubs. There was a scent upon it that was like an exhalation rising from a mass of cold grey water into which had been diffused long ago in aeons beyond all memory the souls of dead water-plants whose very shapes, not to speak of their names, were today totally extinct.

But from the tulip-tree under which he had first seen her John's spirit was now jerked back to Tenna. He shifted a little in his chair so as to be able to watch her face more closely. He had learnt by experience that such scrutiny was irritating to her even when it expressed nothing but the fascination of a lover; but he felt he had to risk it now, for he had already decided that at the first sign of her self-control breaking down he would get her out of the room even if he had to carry her in his arms.

He suddenly discovered that he had an ally in Pantamount who, with a sagacity and subtlety that bewildered him, had already sensed the danger and was leaning across Mrs. Wohntscher's circle of magic mahogany with his great bare arms outspread and his heavy king-log visage drooping as if across the rowlock of a ten-thousand-years-old Boat of Charon.

John soon realised that he'd been emptying "some dull opiate to the drains" and had "sunk lethe-wards" longer than he had intended while Tenna had been arguing with Pantamount.

When he became aware of their talk he found that though she had grown unusually excited she was keeping her head better than he had feared. Anyway, she was too absorbed to notice how he was watching her, so he could go on doing so without any fear of annoying her. She was gesticulating freely with her hands, as she always did when excited, but since when she was alone with him, and he took good care she should be alone with him most of their free time, he was absorbed in watching her face and listening to her words, these gestures were as a revelation to him.

And since she was now facing Pantamount and giving him her full attention, John was able to "take her in", as we say, in unbroken entirety, like a river-pool free from the ripple of a breath of wind, the rising of the smallest fish, the falling of a single leaf.

He noticed how relaxed her whole slender body was as she talked to Pantamount. It gave him the impression that it was the body of an exhausted dryad who had been on her feet so long as a captive odalisque in a tyrant's tent that she could only respond with her fingers to the call of her confederate-tree.

Her whole body suggested helpless weariness, and yet the life in her wrists and fingers was quiveringly electric. But not only had her body this look of helpless relaxation. Her brown hair was of so fine a texture and each strand of it so filmy and thin, that it sank across her high forehead with the massed effect of drifting seaweed, lifted and released, released and lifted, on the smooth surface of a recurrent wave.

The aquiline tilt of her nose and the old-miniature curves of her unreddened lips accentuated John Hush's feeling that she really did belong to those creatures of the elements known in the old books as Sylphs and Undines and that there was about her that sort of closeness to the more rarified aspects of planetary chemistry from which must have originated the weird fairytales about changelings.

John Hush had already discovered that there were aspects of Tenna Sheer that were as alarming as they were alluring.

Indeed, the better they had come to know each other the more intimately had his obsession for her become associated with a boy's awareness of mysterious vistas of recondite adventures, while hers for him was more and more like a little girl's desperate craving to possess an inanimate companion that was absolutely and entirely her own.

It was the movements of her hands and fingers that carried him away now as he watched her for they were completely unlike any hands or fingers he had ever seen.

The extraordinary and even startling thing about them was the abnormally wide spaces between the fingers and the girl's power of moving them in a sort of rhythmic dance while her wrists and arms, whether recumbent or lifted, seemed to partake of the strange lassitude of the rest of her body.

Pantamount, as Hush could clearly detect, was finding his task of keeping her attention growing harder every moment. The man couldn't see as clearly as could her lover from his place at her side that in the midst of her gestures — which were merely being used to emphasise her discourse, a discourse that itself carried danger, for it had already begun to be directed without distinction against all old men — she allowed her mobile fingers to play round a heavy water-bottle which as a missile of retribution might have knocked a horn off the skull of Satan.

And she was getting dangerously worked up. She was now assuring Pantamount — and John didn't dare to put that water-bottle out of her reach — that devils are always waiting to enter the souls of men the moment they approach seventy and their natural strength abates.

She asserted that a new Act of Parliament ought to be passed decreeing that automatically, at the age of seventy, and without appeal to any Court or any official board, all old men without exception should be sent to prison; to pleasant, comfortable prisons, of course, and more agreeable than Glint Hall, but still to prison, where they, along with the vicious devils that take possession of their souls, could no longer do any harm.

There might even be, she explained to Pantamount, special faraway islands in the Pacific reserved by the united Nations for the purpose of keeping these devil-possessed Strulbrugs in comfortable isolation for the rest of their days.

The unfortunate thing was that Pantamount took human emotion so casually and lightly that it was very difficult for him to imagine anyone getting agitated by the absurdly simple game that was going on between old Rumpibus and Tottie; a game that consisted as far as Hush could see in the former trying to steal a bit of bread from the girl's plate, while she, watching like a cat the approach of that long predatory finger and thumb across the polished table, would clap one of her plump little palms upon these extemporised tweezers and her other palm upon the bit of bread with a childish chuckle of triumph.

And then just what John most feared happened. The fingers of Tenna's right hand tightened upon the neck of the water-bottle and, leaping to her feet, she lifted it in the air.

John had never seen any human action performed with less time for human thought than Pantamount's action now. In the beat of a pulse he was on his long legs. In a second beat he'd caught the bottle before she had drawn it back for the fling. In a third beat he was leaning across the segment of polished mahogany that divided him from the girl, and then, while all the faces round that table turned towards them, he lifted her in the air and, heedless of her wild hysterical laughter, turned to carry her from the room.

Very rapidly now, however, but quite calmly and clearly and quietly, he spoke to John; and his words, below Tenna's laughter and all the hubbub in the room, sank into John's consciousness like a quick series of bullet-shots.

"Don't give me the lie. Don't contradict any of their nonsense! Let them take me upstairs. I can cope with anything they do. If I'm left behind when the time comes, it won't matter!"

All John could do was to follow them to the door through the crowd, clinging to Tenna's fingers, from which the bottle had already fallen on the floor, and fallen, oddly enough, without breaking, so that John was destined to remember more vividly even than Tenna's distorted mouth the particular look of the dark water as it flowed out over one of Ursie Mum's reddest rugs.

Of the white beard of Davy Jones, of Davy Jones himself, John could remember nothing. The old man must have hurried from the room for help at a pace that was like the subsiding of an ocean-wave when it has broken upon a ship's deck. It was from a position on his knees at Tenna's side as her hysterical convulsions subsided — for Pantamount had placed her on an old horse-hair sofa that stood at the foot of the staircase to the women's quarters — that John was able at last really to grasp the actual issue of what had happened; and it was an intense relief to him, one of the greatest reassurances of his life, when as he rose to his feet at Tenna's side and helped her, very pale and silent, but perfectly calm now, to get up from that horse-hair sofa and lean on his arm, to find, that as far as he could tell, nothing that threatened destruction to their plan of escape had so far occurred.

There was a great jostling and murmuring going on round them, broken by cries and outbursts of anger and exclamations of pity, but there was always this sort of hubbub when the inmates, dazed by cards or by exciting books, were crowding together discussing every detail of what had happened, and enjoying in lively gregariousness every sort of prediction as to what was going to happen.

John had caught a glimpse of the strait-waistcoat official among the attendants whom Davy Jones had summoned to the spot. Nor was he without his own secret and cruel wrestling with the dark angel. It seemed to him that as he emerged from the whirlpool of Tenna's convulsions on that horse-hair sofa — and he could even recall one moment when across his own wet mouth, full of a salty and yet dusty saliva that tasted as if he had been biting his lips face-down upon half a dozen such sofas, there seemed to be drawn some maddening wisp of Tenna's brown hair — he felt a throbbing guilt in some blackened gland of his memory, as if he and his love were returning together from a crazed plunge into the blue-black interstices of some gigantic poison-fruit full of fatal though delicious juice.

What John Hush began murmuring to himself, as soon as Tenna and he were on their feet again and the attention of the other inmates had been drawn elsewhere, was anything but a clear-cut confession, nor was it a tragic appeal to divine or human mercy. He didn't form in his mind words that exactly expressed his feelings as these feelings presented themselves. The words he was muttering gathered themselves from his consciousness at random, like mists rising from the surface of a mountain lake, and formed themselves into palpable and visible shapes.

But the general burden of what his heart was now muttering to his head was that it was no good trying to dodge the not very nice fact that he had known perfectly well he was letting Pantamount sacrifice himself for them all and especially for himself and Tenna. He hadn't been private secretary to an ambassador for nothing. He knew there were plenty of subtle ways in which acceptance of a man's sacrifice could be justified by those for whom it is made.

Pantamount was one single person, for example, and they were many people, and among them were several women. Pantamount had acted so quickly and decisively that he had left him no time to decide the issue in any other way than by humble and grateful acceptance of the queer man's heroic gesture. But, in spite of all this, his conscience still felt guilty.

Tenna and he were now standing, both of them absorbed in their own thoughts, on the outside of a jostling group of inmates who had gathered in the corridor between the door of the smoking-room and the door of the reading-room. From what he heard of this group's excited chatter it seemed that Mr. Cogent Cuddle had brought a couple of new patients, each of them middle-aged men of an unusual appearance, to wait in the reading-room until either Doctor Echetus himself, or Father Toby, was free to conduct them to their quarters for the night, if not to give them some kind of official reception.

By the time John had shaken off — and he felt as if he had done this for both of them — the distressing pressure on throat and lungs and nerves of that broken-springed, remorse-shiny, black-slug-slippery horse-hair sofa, he became aware not only that Father Toby was in sight but that Ursie Mum was at their side. This extraordinary lady, John had already decided, resembled Rabelais' Priestess Bac-Buc. He regarded her as the noblest creature with the breasts of a woman he had ever encountered; and to himself he always styled her Mothef of the Hunted.

She took him aside for a moment now, which was easy enough. Tenna was so sad and weak and humiliated and reduced to the vanishing point that she could be safely left in the dazed trance into which she had fallen without the danger of any new harm coming from this isolation.

And once having got him to herself, Ursie Mum hurriedly explained that it would be a great mistake for Tenna to go now at once to the loneliness of her bedroom, for the vibrations in her nerves would in all probability lead her mind round and round and round, in circle after circle of confused memories, bringing her nothing but the shapes and faces of people, outlined with horrible distinctness, and all of them giving her pain.

"Take her back to that table," she whispered to John, "that Mrs. Wohntscher so loves to polish — and she really does it wonderfully, doesn't she? — and let her get a few other ideas and feelings into her mind before you let her go upstairs. I may put on my dressing-gown and look in on her later in the night — perhaps take her a cup of chocolate — that's the thing that always makes me sleep. But Father Toby's going to give a little talk in the reading-room presently and that may have the same effect as the chocolate. I've known it myself; and listening to the other Father, too."

And she pushed him back to Tenna with a smile that gave him the feeling that in her heart of hearts she regarded her husband's ministrations as so much hot chocolate and Father Allen Wun's as so much hot cocoa.

John obeyed her to the letter, however, and took Tenna straight back to the polished table where they were warmly welcomed by the Marquis of the Fourth Dimension, alias the Zeit-Geist, alias Professor Zoom of the College of Doom.

"Well, you've sure come back at the right moment, children! What a lovely pair of ballad-babes you two are! The balloon's just going to burst. The drop at the tip of the Almighty's tongue's just going to fall! Lipperty-lopperty! It's gone! Wurra-lurra-buderpest! Laura's got it on the chest! The little birdies of fate have been beating their wings for sometime, but now they're really ready to fly! There comes a point you know, my pretties, there comes a point! Humbuggery's the word, of course, with all mankind. But things can happen, my dears. Not often, of course. But they can happen. And then there's no case for a cosmic crack and no need for the dung-cart to hurry back!

"Yes, things can happen, my pretties. Yes, after all, there do arrive moments when matters come to a head! It may be only a speck that does it. A speck of dust lodged in a wind-bag can blow a world sky-high! Explosions, you know, can be extremely unphilosophical. They can even be unscientific! Humbug, humbug, humbug — and then crack, bang — and where is the round world?"

As he beckoned them to sit beside him, John was staggered by the whiteness of the whites of Zeit-Geist's eyes. He shrank from even approaching the thought that there could be anything in common between this grotesque Eidolon of frivolity and the wild, tragic, staring eyes of Tenna, but where that unearthly gleam of God knows what sort of gold-dust had appeared on the whites of his girl's eyes under the electric light the appalling whiteness of the Zeit-Geist's eyes had horribly increased; and as John Hush watched it now it seemed as if it kept drawing to itself more and more of the man's eyeballs, till this pair of eye-centres, whose peering out from any living organism means to all of us poor creatures of earth our sole power of vision, was in danger of disappearing.

“With one illusion,” the Zeit-Geist went on, “inside another illusion, and all these double and treble illusions inside bubbles that are themselves inside other bubbles, and all of them together, bubbles and illusions, floating on a dream-river in a dream-world, what, I ask you, could be more fitting for the last scenes of the last act of the sixteenth of June than to hear Daddy Toby tell us of a new discovery about God—”

He broke off suddenly and pointed excitedly with the very finger that had so terrified John. “You see,” he cried, “what has happened? That idiot Cuddle instead of taking this pair of new inmates upstairs to their rooms has brought them in here, to hear a sermon on sanity, sobriety, and chastity from Father Toby, our great hooker of fish!”

And, sure enough, Toby Tickle’s open-air voice, full of the harsh twitterings of reed-warblers, the splashings of water-rats, the cryings of plovers, the challenges of yaffles, the screamings of jays, the quackings of wild ducks, now rose and fell in its familiar plangency.

“All aberrations of the human mind, my dear people,” declared Father Toby, while John, who knew too well how this sentence would end allowed his mind to wander, in company with his eyes, to the two new inmates, who, deserted by Mr. Cuddle and with nobody to welcome them except this impersonal open-air voice, were now standing side by side just across the threshold of the reading-room, surveying their surroundings with considerable curiosity and, as far as John could detect, with no apprehension at all.

There was, however, no question which of these two unusual events, occurring simultaneously twenty-five minutes before bedtime, namely the arrival in the reading-room of a couple of absolutely new patients and the delivery in the reading-room of a sermon by Father Toby, interested the present inmates the more. Toby, as Jesus would have put it, “they had always with them” and destiny might decide that they would find the newcomers more hopelessly devoid of amusement or entertainment for them than was usually the case even with patients who were incurably mad. But this was unlikely; and new guests at Glint were more exciting than new sermons.

As John gripped Tenna's left hand under the polished table, which at that moment seemed to gleam with a deep magic light as if its lustre were due to the anvil of Hephaestus rather than the duster of Mrs. Wohntscher, and looked anxiously about him, praying that their careful plot would not at this crucial moment, only a week from their escape, be broken up by Doctor Echetus. He couldn't help, any more than any other inmate could help, peering excitedly at the two newcomers, so unceremoniously landed here by Cogent Cuddle. This would have been a moment for Bill Squeeze, with Heraclitus in his pocket, to make it clear that the hour was unpropitious for new personalities.

But Bill must have departed for the night to Betsy and the south lodge. And then with a rush of shame and admiration he thought again of Pantamount, passive, patient, and unresisting, like an ancient camel with such a complicated experience of sand-storms and massacres and plagues and famines and the madness of strange gods that with a selflessness that was almost shocking in its natural ease he could let himself be carried off to that upper wing so that there should be no insuperable obstacle to the escape of the rest.

"And so, my friends," Father Toby was now saying, "I would like to appeal to you all, and especially to the two new patients, for I see we have two fresh faces here, whom I am delighted to welcome to our little intimate family of the good God, or, shall I say, to this 'great good place', as some old writer calls it; to appeal to you all, I repeat, to remember the one Great Essence of our Holy Faith, which is its integrity. By its integrity I mean its perfect oneness with itself.

"Our religion can be summed up in two simple one-syllable words, the word knot and the word tight. We are all tied together in the tight knot of our holy faith. And outside this compact globe, or ball, if I may use such a word, of which God is the centre and circumference, there is nothing but nothing. You are all interested, are you not, in the noble game of football? And you know well, do you not, the difference between a soccer ball and a rugger ball?

"Well, God's mysterious and eternal universe is like a soccer ball. It is rounder than a rugger ball and is more often kicked than carted. But the beautiful thing about our cosmic soccer ball is that it is the all. Outside of it there is absolutely and simply nothing.

"You have heard of Hell, dear people? Well, Hell is only our blasphemous and wholly impossible idea of something outside this tightly knotted soccer ball of a universe beyond whose circumference is nothing. You know, dear people, how the river flows round this 'great good place' as that well-known ancient famous author — at the moment his name escapes me — called our happy home?

"Well, in the same way God's love radiating by the necessity of the Divine Nature from the Eternal Being flows round all that is and protects it from being dissolved into all that is not. That river of love guards from nothingness the memory of everything that has ever existed and every thought that has ever been thought. Yes, dear people, you know how the river flows round us at Glint? Round and round and round us the river flows!

"And so and in the same manner round this cosmic ball flows the river of salvation."

At this point there came a voice from the polished table and John couldn't be sure whether it came from the boy Hither or the girl Thither. "Who catches the little fishes from the shining river?" This interruption broke the spell.

The Commander himself leaned forward over the table and gravely uttered the words: "By the pricking of my thumbs something wicked this way comes!"

He spoke so solemnly and with so grave a face that both Hither and Thither burst into high-pitched shrieks of childish merriment. But it was at that moment that Tenna herself, who all this while had been staring, with eyes that kept opening wider and wider, at one of the two new patients whom the inconsequent Cuddle had thrust into the reading-room and left stranded there like a couple of sea-lions on a sheep-browsing promontory, waved her free hand — one of her elbows was on the table and her chin was resting on that hand's inactive wrist — in the direction of the newcomer she'd been watching.

"He wants to answer him!" she burst out; and added quickly, when John turned an appealing look upon her, "Why don't you all let him speak?"

Just as if he had actually heard her, and he may have done so, though John didn't believe it, there now came, dancing forward into the space between Father Toby and the polished table, a man of about fifty in full evening dress and wearing patent-leather shoes. Had he been brought here in a car, John wondered, dressed like this? He was a striking-looking figure. His hair was grizzled and cropped close to his skull, while his high cheek-bones, sunken eyes, and hollow cheeks, gave his face a skull-like and a gargoyle-like appearance. His body was very short, but his arms and legs were long, and his hands and feet were abnormally large.

He advanced into the middle of the room in a series of skipping jerks; and it became in some queer way plain to everybody that if the caprice took him he could have used his big hands as feet and brandished his big feet like hands. But the moment he began speaking his absurdly short body and his startlingly long limbs froze into absolute immobility.

The sounds that issued from his mouth gave everybody the queerest shock, for his voice turned out to be more high-pitched than even Hither's and Thither's. It was indeed hardly human. It was as if some extremely bold insect were expressing its disapproval of the philosophical conclusions of the human race. Its protest was expressed in oddly constructed sentences, sentences so abrupt as to remind John of fifth of November squibs and crackers, yet what he said was simple enough and perfectly intelligible.

"Every word," he squeaked and gibbered, "of what has just been said is a lie! Nobody knows how many worlds there are — all totally different! Our realities, our worlds, our truths, our ideas, our impressions, are all different, and we may take it for granted that we are surrounded by millions of completely separate and completely different universes, some of them attainable from our dimension, most of them entirely beyond the scope, not only of our science, our reason, our logic, our intuition, our instinct but of our imagination, too!

"What the generations of mankind are like and what they've been like ever since they first appeared is the generations of the leaves of the forest! Leaves, leaves, leaves, leaves! Like leaves we come and like leaves we go! And if you want to know what we ought to aim at becoming with the whole of our intention I will tell you this first night I've set eyes on you! We ought to aim at becoming like a cloud of flies, a cloud of gnats, a cloud of midges! Thus and thus alone shall we escape places like this, preachers like this, and the silly solemn stupid humbug of taking for granted that a person is crazy because he doesn't accept the opinion of the hierarchy of ages, the academic poppycock of ages, the traditional abracadabra of a rabble of priests, professors, lawyers, doctors, scientists, politicians, divines, whose pontifical claptrap and up-se-daisy assumptions are simply the milk of those old moo-cows of habit, custom, tradition, and vain repetition, curdled by the holy horrors of hoodoos and taboos and put over on us, ever since man first appeared on the earth, by those who want to rule.

"How much better to do what I do and become a mob of midges, that is to say to blow up once for all this self-satisfied idea of wholeness and integrity and the beauty of a well-stuffed rounded-off person's person, and just say to all comers: I, moi qui vous parle, Johnny catch-as-catch-can, am not a pathetic tragical-comical one creature with a fatal power of choice between God and the Devil, but a host of creatures, a cloud of gnats, carried up and down on a welter of winds! Who and what can catch me, keep me, bind me, hold me, if I am true to myself? You say you can make me suffer and can force me to obey?

"Oh yes! And destiny, fate, necessity, chance, can beat me down to the ground. But what can they really do to me till they kill me en masse and finish me off en masse? They can do nothing! They can do nothing because I am not one but a multitude. And because every single thing and every single identical life is a multitude of things and lives!

"No, it's a lie that the universe is one. It's a multitude of personalities, of gods, of demons, of men, of animals, of midges and worms, of electrons and atoms! The reality of realities is not One but Many. And, of this many, nothing is eternal. Everything passes away! My thought, your thoughts, and the thoughts of every god, every demon, every insect, every worm, every minutest life that exists — all pass away, all 'leave', as the Great Magician says, 'not a rack behind'!"

Having thus expressed himself, this queer stranger balanced himself for a second on his head; and then rising on one of his enormous feet, whose size was emphasised rather than diminished by the elegance of the shoe that covered it, he uttered an audible sigh and murmured, loud enough for all to hear, but as if he were talking to himself, “The pleasure of life is expectation.”

14. MIDSUMMER DAWN

THE DAYS BEFORE Midsummer Day were without question the most agitating of John's whole life. On the contrary, by some lucky chance, a chance that to John was quite inscrutable, Tenna was calmer during those six days than she had been for a long time, and of her own accord took the initiative in avoiding Tottie and old Rumpibus.

The fatal time came round at last, and on Sunday the twenty-fourth John was awake well before three in the morning, nearly a whole hour before the sun rose. He lay dead-still on his back in the cold greyness of the prae-dawn, deliberately keeping his eyes tightly closed but listening intently to the sound beyond sound that proclaims the approach, through dedicated abysses of infinite space, of the light of a new day. This sound is not the mathematical music to which the spheres dance their mystic dance. It is not the balanced rhythm of the advances and retreats of the galaxies and the nebulae. It is not the humming of the unfathomable dimensions that surround us. It is not the overheard inbreathing and outbreathing of the revolving mystery that is the nearest neighbour to the world to which we belong. It is simply the sound of the coming of light.

What John felt most aware of as he lay there listening on that twenty-fourth of June to that cold, wordless antiphony between being and nothingness, between the is and the is not, was a feeling of wonder that he wasn't more disturbed, more agitated, more tense and strung-up on this morning of all mornings than he felt himself to be. How could he be so calm when everything of value to him in this or any other conceivable world was swaying, reeling, shivering, rocking on such an intolerable pivot of suspense?

Well! It was no good asking himself how he could be like this. The point was that he was like this; and it was a damned good thing for him that he was. "But it's up to you," he told himself, "my good John, whatever may be the cause of this unnatural calm of yours, to consider every move you’ve got to make in the next hour or so; and consider it from more angles than one and along with every possible danger that such a move may bring with it.

It really is a wonder,” he told himself, “that things have got as far as they have. But I must get up and go out and have a look at those south-lodge spikes and make sure they’re in working order. Everything depends on those damned spikes!”

Lifted up now as strongly by what he had to do as he had been by that weird fancy he had confessed to Tenna of his will being like a great pair of iron tongs with which he could pick himself up and plant himself wherever he might wish, or might decide he ought to wish, to be, he got out of bed in that queer pallid light that he kept telling himself was a sort of metaphysical light and began hurriedly dressing. While he put on his clothes he tried to arrange in his mind all he had to do if he was to have things really ready for their escape. This was no easy task, not only because, good diplomatist though he was, he was the extreme opposite of a competent conspirator, but because, owing to the special mental condition of most of the inmates, there were so many weak and ticklish spots in their conspiratorial phalanx that the most important and obvious duty of any leader fate might give them was to go up and down behind the front line, propping up the tottering knees and steadying the twitching lips of those whose shaky nerves, at a touch, at a straw, at a falling leaf on the air, at a ripple in the water, are plucked at by the madness of panic.

When he was dressed he stood hesitating for a moment, wondering whether to put on his boots or to carry them in his hand. The odd thing was that the idea of going to that stream flowing under the wall at the south lodge without his boots gave him the jitters.

“Why the holy Jesus should I feel like this from such a simple thing as carrying my boots and creeping downstairs in my stockings? Am I going dotty?” And then — but still standing in the same position with one of his boots dangling from a long leather bootlace in one hand and the other hand on the particular knob at the end of his bed that would always be associated with the wagging finger of the Zeit-Geist — he uttered that false artificial chuckle which is an essential attribute of a Nordic diplomatist in a Slavonic court.

On this occasion, however, the joke was against himself: “For what the hell,” he groaned in his heart, “am I doing, talking of ‘going dotty’ when I’ve got in my collar-drawer those three wisps of Tenna’s hair? God! How that does give this whole business away! Over girls’ curls I’m as crazy as you like, but the horrors that come over me when I think of creeping downstairs carrying my boots are — and I don’t deny it! — really and truly insane. Everything depends on the agreement of our minds about reality. That is sanity and everything is relative to that. There is no such thing as what the more simple-minded of our scientists call the ‘objective world’.

“This room and that yard” — and John waved the hand from which his left boot hung by its bootlace towards the ghostly panes of his window— “only exist because all the various minds that keep them going see more or less the same room and the same yard.

“But the great difficulty about it is that some of these minds are superhuman and some of them subhuman. So the common vision of things that these silly sods call ‘reality’ is a compromise between what souls of the elements see and feel and what the wood-ticks and the nuclear electrons see and feel. No wonder everything looks funny when we put our heads on one side and worse than funny when we stand on our heads.

“Nature isn’t a static picture on a stretched-out canvas. It’s a living face all puckered up with different feelings and with weeping and crying and putting out a galaxy of jeering tongues!”

He let the bootlace go and the boot fell with a thud on the floor. The sound of that thud and the thought of the many ears that might have heard it gave him a shock. He sat down on the edge of his bed and stared at his window. He counted six whitish-grey squares of window-glass above three rusty-black bars crossing a pallid gulf of dizziness that was scooped out of limitless space by the opposing wall of the north lodge.

“Of course, I ought to carry my boots when I creep down those stairs and unbar the hall door.” He knew there were a couple of night-watchmen down there, great lusty prizefighting fellows ready to stop any rush of inmates to escape. But he knew that in the summer dawn these guardians of the gate were always dead-asleep in the little entrance-office where they played their night-long games of chance; but, of course, the tramp of these thick-soled boots of his would almost certainly wake them — why the devil, then, had he got this queer horror of going down the stairs and crossing the hall with his boots in his hand? And why was it a still worse horror to think of following the gravel path between the tulip-tree and the flowerbeds, and along by the meadow-railings, with only his socks between his bare feet and the ground?

Damn! He had to face it. He had to admit it. It was the old supreme horror of his boyhood come back to torment him on this day of all days, this morning of all mornings!

Yes, it was that old boyish mania about femininity, that blind sick horror of everything feminine that used to extend to everything that yielded to pressure, that horror which at one time associated itself with everything that was soft, with everything that went in, with everything that resembled children's india-rubber toys when they were squeezed!

It was all very well to boast to Tenna about his will being strong as a pair of iron tongs, and about his power to hold his manias in complete control, and about his inflexible refusal to let himself put a match to those three wisps of hair in his collar-drawer! Yet here he was at this moment of all moments, when it was absolutely essential he should get out of the house without being heard — here he was, suddenly confronted by the worst horror of his boyhood, the thing he had for years taken for granted would never trouble him again!

But why should touching the floor, or the steps, or the gravel, or the grass, bring all this back? Yes, it had been in him all the time, this peculiar association of ideas; but why on earth should touching things with his bare feet, or with only socks or stockings on, bring into his mind that appalling boyish dread?

Damn it all! Where was the connection? What on earth had the feeling of gravel and grass and flagstones and bare boards under his feet to do with his boyish terror of growing, when he grew up, not into a man but into a woman? Had any watchful observer crept into John Hush's room on his bare feet just then he would have noticed how John's head had sunk so far forward as he sat on his bed that by this time his forehead was only about eight inches from the boots on the floor.

His shoulders were hunched up as he sat there, and he had laid his hands on the pair of boots beneath him and was pulling their leather tops towards each other, making them just touch, as if they were kissing each other, or whispering and conspiring with each other, and then he would pull them apart with a jerk, and then, after letting his long thin fingers hover languidly back and forth above them like sprays of seaweed over sea-anemones in a rock-pool, he would begin it all over again.

But suddenly he stopped, squared his shoulders, clasped his fingers tightly together and sat up straight. He had recalled a very curious conversation he had once had with his old nurse, the woman who resembled Mrs. Cogent Cuddle of the north lodge. This woman had been with his mother at his birth and had witnessed the performance of what was an ancient custom in that part of the country when by some chance the infant's feet appeared first.

On this occasion there had been a pause in the delivery while the doctor, a stiff-jointed old man, was still on the stairs, and to hasten the birth an ancient crone who was assisting rubbed the soles of the child's feet with a particular kind of pebble-stone, muttering as she did so some obscure ditty about boy-babes and girl-babes.

His mother, the nurse told him, had set her heart on the infant being a girl, "And if you, Master John," she had added, "be soft where women be soft, you may take it from me 'tis that pebble-stone fixed it — first in her mind, and then, half-born though ye were, in yours."

The possibility that this insane dread in his boyhood of developing certain feminine attributes and necessities which was so oddly associated with a horror of going bare-foot might be explained by this incident impressed him very little in those early days, but it came back to him now with a revealing force. It was all very well to boast to Tenna about his will being strong as a pair of iron tongs, and about his power to hold his manias in complete check, and about his adamantine refusal to let himself put a match to those three wisps of hair in his collar-drawer.

Here he was at this moment of all moments, when it was absolutely essential he should get out of the house without being heard, here he was, suddenly terrified by that peculiar feeling of an intense neurotic outrage at contact with the floor or the gound without his shoes!

And now he realised why he must avoid this particular feeling. Uh, but he knew too well what the terror was! He felt it in every whitish-grey pane of that window and in all that he could detect across that scooped-out and barricaded-up gulf of space between his iron bars, bare to the faintly stirring breath of the dawn's pallid outriders, and exposed to those windows of the north lodge that were now staring back at him and taunting him and whispering at him: "Keep your boots on — and keep your hair on — and stay where you are! And bear this in mind — you double-dyed ass — the fields of dawn aren't the place for ugly cowards to creep about in!" Yes, it was when he touched anything cold or damp or wet or scratchy or sharp or rough with his bare skin that the feeling came over him that he was turning into a woman.

Yes, it was then that he felt his breasts beginning to grow and their nipples to distent and get longer and longer and longer and longer, get so long in fact that he could wave them about in the air! Yes, he felt them now, growing as long as elephant's trunks and groping about in the same sort of way! Why, he could take hold of those window-bars with his elongated trunk-like nipples, nipples made of that warm, intimate, flexible, baby-smelling, rubber-like stuff, that seemed to have been stripped off the very secretest organs of warm nature-hidden life, and pull himself from the bed towards the midsummer dawn!

Thinking thus — if it could be called thinking — John Hush made several feeble movements with his hands towards the places in the air on both sides of his thin chest, now well-covered by woollen vest, linen shirt, and cloth waistcoat, where these imaginary members were waving about like the flappers of a dying seal.

He got up from the bed and began walking up and down the short piece of carpeted floor between it and the window. Each time he approached his boots, one of which lay on its side with one single long bootlace trailing beside it, he touched the heel of this particular one, which was turned towards the window and from which a gleam of whiteness was thrown back from the head of a smooth well-hammered shining nail, and gave it a hesitant tentative poke with the tip of his big toe. And as he walked up and down this small strip of colourless carpet he was cruelly torn between alternative decisions. Should he force himself to disregard these imaginary appendages to his thin chest, leave his boots as they were at this moment, and his slippers, side by side under the bed, as they were at this moment, and, leaving his room, creep downstairs past the little office-room, and have a good try at opening the front door and slipping out on the gravel-path beside the tulip-tree?

Or should he obey his dread of this horror-mania, put on his boots and slip downstairs as quietly as he could, letting the inevitable creaking take its chance, and chance take its own risk, while he just simply hoped and prayed that the two men inside that little room would be too absorbed in their game or too fast asleep or too drunk to take any notice as he pushed the bolts and went out? Over each of these choices there hung a special and peculiar dread.

Over the first — going down in his socks — hung this horror of elongated nipples. Over the second — going down in his boots — hung the peculiar terror, which was always such a cruel compulsion with him, of feeling a coward, feeling, in fact, that he was dodging what he feared, and, worse than all, feeling that by taking this path of funk he was starting on a funk-slope that must inevitably lead him down, down and down, till he found himself hemmed in by every kind of fear and face to face with some unknown horror from which there could be no escape.

So — for this was what he kept telling himself — the end of the funk-slope must inevitably be that he would perish of pure unmitigated terror, while the end of the other decision remained unknown. He might by forcing himself to carry his boots in his hands while he let his monstrous nipples hang down in front, or buttoned them up tight inside his coat, get safely out of the building and be able without disturbing a soul to find out whether those sham wooden spikes were still safely in position only waiting to be removed en masse with the greatest ease when the final moment arrived, by which time he might easily have entirely forgotten the nipples-horror.

Or, on the other hand, he might reach such a point of horror with regard to them that he’d be able to think of nothing else; and in place of opening any front door or visiting the spikes of any under-road stream, he’d just rush deliberately into that little office-room and beg to be taken to “the Wing” and have “these things” cut off by Doctor Echetus!

It was, in fact, a choice between an action that risked ruining everything and everybody in a welter of madness, or an action that only risked the ruin of this one particular plan of escape. Well, he must choose the one or the other; on the one hand all or nothing, on the other hand much less than all or a good deal more than nothing.

After all, his boots might not creak, or not loudly enough to spoil everything, and if he were caught, well! it might not prove the end of everything! But could he face — in his own deepest self — knowing to the end of his life that he’d been a coward and had funked carrying his boots because of — of those things?

Well, he had faced already ere now a good many memories of contemptible cowardice and had, yes he actually had, either forgotten them entirely or could treat their memory with indulgence. Yes! He would try it in his hoots!

But he never forgot to the end of his life what he felt as he put on his boots and laced up each of these objects with furious tightness over the instep of each foot, and then tied the laces in savage knots above his ankles. He remembered his concluding thought with special clarity as he rose to his feet and moved his body in odd jerks up and down as if performing some gymnastic exercise without lifting his feet from the floor.

He knew well that this conclusion was a final and very important one, as indeed it was; for it became a turning-point and a mile-stone in what might be called the wavering direction of his willed destiny.

“What am I doing?” he asked himself. “Well, I am choosing cowardice in this particular case quite deliberately so as to wrestle with life under the easiest and most unimpeded condition. By means of my cowardice I have won for myself now a completely free advance along a particular track of time, entirely irrespective of what may happen!

"I have chosen, in fact, the path by which I can enjoy, and as I might say devour, every change in myself and every change in what is happening to me, without bothering about my character or about my reputation! All I've got to do is to 'press on regardless,' as young Seth once told me he did."

All this being now settled, John went softly to the door, opened it, and closed it behind him. He congratulated himself that he'd dressed without turning on the electric light, since now he had no shock of contrast to face in the darkness of the corridor and the stairs. Creak! Creak! Creak! Of course it was quite impossible to go down these well-known stairs without this accursed sound. Well, he must just accept it as part of the carrying out of his great decision.

And what exactly was his great decision? "Oh, mother of the Muses, don't let me forget it — at least not till Tenna and I are safe! No, no, I can repeat it to a dot — though I'd be puzzled to remember how I reached it! Follow your worst cowardice and avoid the temptation to be brave, but press on regardless, doing the thing that in spite of your cowardice and all your stupidity it is your clear destiny, I mean the urge of your whole nature and the craving of your whole being, to do!" Creak! Creak! Creak! He tried to lessen this cursed noise by leaning all the weight he could possibly transfer from his feet as heavily as he could upon the wrist of the hand which was sliding down the banister.

There was no interruption, there was no sound except this devilish creaking, till he reached the bottom of the stairs; well, not precisely no sound, for from the very start, since from the moment he had closed his own door, he had been aware of a faint murmur of voices from that little room on the ground floor where those two watchers were trying to keep each other awake.

But this he had expected, this was the recognised background, like the flow of the river, to the presence of night at Glint, but it was when he let his hand slip from the polished knob at the bottom of the banister, and giving each of his thighs little blows with his clenched fists so as to diminish — there could have been no other reason for such an odd gesture — the ridiculous noise these damned boots of his made at each step, and it was when he began to walk slowly and cautiously from the staircase to the front door, that he was aware of the figure of a man crouching against the wall.

In recalling this later he was struck by the fact that he wasn't by any means overpoweringly startled by this apparition. His impassivity, however, wasn't due to anything heroic in him. It was due to the indescribable relief he was feeling that those revolting figments of his imagination, those distorted elongated female nipples that he had actually felt — for obviously if he hadn't felt the loathsome things as well as conjured them up, it wouldn't have been so bad — were no longer with him.

So great was this relief that the sight of the egregious Gewlie huddled up there waiting for him troubled him hardly at all. "That's one advantage of having a mad imagination," he told himself, "real devilries are reduced." The "reduced" devilry in this case was the look in Gewlie's eyes of hollow, desolate, unhappy, in-drawing suction. It was this look the man turned on him now and he caught it by the light from the door-crack of the little room; for the fellow had turned the lantern he carried as a gesture of humble apology upon his own feet so that all that passed between them took place by the light of that door-crack through which along with the thin glare of electric illumination came the sound of the two watchmen's voices.

In his relief at having shaken off those imaginary feminine appendages John found his whole nature exceptionally alert. He recalled in a flash the galvanic effect on Gewlie's nerves of Tenna's mention of her friend the gardener, and moving as quietly as he could he advanced towards the man, stepping gingerly on his heels till he could actually have allowed the uplifted sole of his right boot to descend upon Gewlie's exposed left ankle, as the man crouched sideways under the wall.

The ray from the lantern Gewlie carried flickered a little upon that prostrate ankle, which was covered, in spite of the season of the year, by a well-knitted woollen sock, for the unhappy creature, devil-ridden pervert though he was, had a grandmother in Canterbury, to whom his hideous physiognomy, whenever it was presented to her old eyes, was an angelic vision.

Gewlie's slippers above his Canterbury socks were not a reassuring spectacle, for there were ominous stains on them, and, indeed, he had been called to assist — for such perverts are as precious to scientists in research laboratories as they are to despots in political prisons — both in that upper wing, wherein recalcitrant inmates were taught the limits of institutional forbearance, and in the Doctor's vivisection annex, wherein, according to an hypocrisy deeper and more unpardonable than that of the worst religious humbug, human flesh was supposed to be healed by the torture of animal flesh.

Had the incorrigible Pantamount been present here, "whether", as St. Paul would say, "in the body or out of the body", he would doubtless in his Atlantean knowledge of the language of the inanimate inmates of our planetary bedlam, have been struck by that moment's vivid exchange of impressions between Hush's upraised boot-sole and Gewlie's prostrate ankle.

But John, even if he had known the way two such manifestations of matter exchange their impressions of a self-stricken planet, was now occupied in informing the wearer of the knitted socks that, early as it was, he had an appointment to meet the Glint Hall gardener at the south lodge.

Like a will-o'-the-wisp chased by a jack-o'-lantern Gewlie's light flickered now. It flickered so violently that John felt as if the man had been transformed into a swarm of fire-flies. But an event occurred at that moment that gave this strange creature an entirely unexpected command over himself. A fantastical dialogue between the two watchmen in the little room suddenly burst upon their ears. But apart from this dialogue, to which they both listened intently with their backs to the wall opposite the little room, John felt by a queer instinct that something in Gewlie, either a vein of deeper devilry or of deeper religion, had considerably diminished the gardener's power to scare him.

"Didn't you hear what I've been saying to you all this while, Gum? And if you heard what I said, didn't you understand?"

"I can't honestly say I did, Glue."

"Will ye listen, then, ye sodden gomorra, if I tells ye once again?"

"'Ere's me ear, Glue."

"It may be no more nor a bloody flea-bite to thee, Gum, old pard, but to me who've been a Third-Programmer ever since wireless were wireless, to me who've been president for ten months of the Take It or Leave It Club for Special Asylum Attendants, there's never been such news as I've just heard; news that if you had the brain of a badger, Gum, you'd jump out of your hairy skin when I uncovers it for you!"

"Has it to do with international football, Glue?"

"It has to do with international blowing to bits, Gum! But it said there's now arrived in this old British Isle a great mystery-man called Morsimmon Esty; and Parliament have sent him here, not, you understand, as an ordinary inmate, but to be given the once-over, on the q.t. by Doctor Echetus, to see whether he's a real miracle-man like Merlin or Moses, or just a lunatic like the ones we've got here. The fellow seems to have the run of the place, for 'ee only arrived after teatime last evening, and I'll be damned if he hasn't been prowling around like Sherlock Holmes all night long!

"They tell me he ain't slept for four and twenty years; seeing he's found some radio-stuff out there in Thibet or cooked it up 'isself most like, what'll keep a man 'ealthy, wealthy and wise without so much as a wink of sleep. They say he met this jibber-jabber crazy clown from Outer Cathay on his journey here; and a real tonic that bird is, and an honest-to-God inmate, too, and his proper name's Katch-as-Kan!

"Yes, Katch-as-Kan, the dancing puss-moth, and, oh! but he does sleep! In fact, after that act he put on last night his head's been on pillow in number fifteen quiet as a baby, for the door can't lock and we've all 'ad a good look at 'im. He don't take no radio-urinny to drive dull sleep away! I wouldn't wonder if he don't ask for his tray on his counterpane and his cigarette in his soap-dish when he wakes up. One thing I do know. What he wants he'll ask for. And what he asks for he'll get I "But this 'ere barmie-larmie, Gum, you old gambler, be none other than the greatest barmie-larmie that ever lived. They say he's the old boy who's back of all these flying saucers, and that he's now busy with flying coal-scuttles, and that the plane they've got at Halfway House is for him to fly to New York in.

"But the greatest thing they say about him, and you think of that, brother Gum, is that he can paralyse hundreds of thousands of people — millions if he wants to! — just simply by this funny business of teletitery or whatever its scientific name is; but it takes a brain like mine, as full of culties as a music-hall stage of tighties, to understand these things. And this is how it works, brother Gum. And put your wits to it, brother, and push hard, for it's backroom-boy stuff, Gummy old chrysalis, if ever there were! But as I explain it, knowing both It, as we might say, and you, as we might say, it grows clear as daylight; and so listen.

"I'm in Thibet, you must understand, like this here barmie-larmie was, before he started to come here. Is that clear, Gummy? And I'm talking to you now, you being here, and me being there. And this is what I'm saying. 'Don't you dare to move an inch, Gum! Lie down on your face, Gum! Kneel on the ground with your head between your knees, Gum! And stay like that, Gum, just as long as I tell you!' Don't you see, partner, how any man alive, not to mention a barmie-larmie of the top-grade who could make his voice ring and ting in your ears as if you was in a telephone booth, could stop these hoary Russians and these bleeding Chinks and march the lot of them, meek and mild as Mary's lambs into Holy Lizzie's compound."

At this point the voice of Head-watchman Glue died away, and it became clear that Under-watchman Gum had either been reduced to an awed silence or had successfully retreated into that blessed detachment from the most powerful logic and the most triumphant reason, open to mortals in the poppied oblivion of sleep.

Swift as the leap of a grasshopper, Gewlie now turned round to John, his lantern throwing a narrow, elfish ray, that, as it flickered here and there, seemed to want to dance alternately with the light that shone through the door-crack of the little room, and with the paler, wiser, less purely human light that came floating in through a small round window above the well-barred front door of the whole establishment.

“I was waiting for you,” whispered Gewlie. “I thought you’d be glad of my help in getting away without their hearing you!”

But as if the accomplished Glue and the illiterate Gum had patched up, in fear of the “telepathy” they had been discussing, a sort of pact between knowledge and ignorance, they now turned without restraint to their private affairs. Here they were on equal ground, and they laughed and jested in so jovial a manner that John, when he began the process of drawing the bolts in dead silence, found he had no need of the feverish help proffered him by Gewlie. When once he had got the huge double doors open, both he and Gewlie, though what the latter’s actual sensations at that moment were would have puzzled even such an expert in human obliquity and human redemption as Father Allen Wun to interpret, were instantaneously confronted by the naked presence of the midsummer dawn. To John’s consciousness it was as if they’d been admitted through some “magic casement” into an enchanted Cimmeria of wandering airs that were at once exquisitely cool and exquisitely warm, and were full of faint yet quite distinguishable odours, odours that kept dodging one another, pursuing one another, overtaking one another, but never losing their identity.

Sharp grass-fragrancies came and went. Delicate rose-scents came and went. While in and out among them all, as if it were a weary serpent with dusky scales, such as might have been described in some heavily repeated burden to an old border ballad, floated the smell of river mud! It was at this moment that turning round to confront Gewlie, with nothing in his mind but an obscure urge of animal instinct warning him of danger, he realized, just as if it had been a demon-headed worm in the central nerve of the man that could actually be touched, what it was that he was plotting. Was this sudden knowledge part of the new planetary telepathy by means of which this mysterious refugee from Thibet was minded to bridge the appalling gulf between the warring halves of the whole human race?

For it was a very curious experience that John went through at that moment. Herodotus himself, the master of wonders, would have hesitated at describing the millions of little clock-cells in Gewlie’s skull that were ticking and tinkling and turning their tiny wheels on their electric pivots.

And yet all this was what John did actually behold! But it was much more than this that Master Glue's "barmie-larmie" had hypnotised our friend into embracing with his mental vision. It wasn't merely "as if" he could perceive millions of little clockcells in Gewlie's skull, ticking and tinkling and turning. There was no "as if" about it. This is what the intelligent inmate called John saw at the front door of the scientific establishment called Glint in the receptacle commonly known as Gewlie's head.

But he also saw what hasn't been permitted to many people — certainly to no other inmate of Glint — to see with mortal eyes, namely the insubstantial and yet not quite immaterial soul-covering or soul-skin which is the halfway house, "if one may", as Herodotus would put it, "speak in that manner", between the visible and the invisible! What he saw was in fact a cloudy shape in the form of a man, composed of semi-transparent mist, the colour of a puddle of dirty water upon which has just fallen some dark purplish shadow.

This misty shape might be called the chemical form of Gewlie's impalpable soul; but how well John could hear the clear, teasing, sceptical tone of Tenna's voice enquiring how in all this physical clockwork he managed to read the man's thoughts.

And then it was that in answer to this imaginary question he was compelled to admit that the man's thoughts came straight into his own head distinct from any clockwork and that he didn't "read" them in the wheels of Gewlie's skull.

No, it was into his own head they came, just as Homer makes Hector's brother confess that the truce between the two great opposed divinities, Athene and Apollo was entheti thumo, "slipped into his soul". But although Gewlie's thought was, as Homer says, "slipped" into John's soul, John was given, at that weird and never-to-return moment, the privilege of seeing the actual connecting link, duskier in colour than the cloudy image to which at the nape of the man's neck it was attached, between a human soul and a human body.

This link was apparently composed of an organic chemical substance which, in fact, conveyed the impression that a large living eel was the medium between Gewlie's soul and Gewlie's body! It was emphasised for John as something distinct from both Gewlie's spirit and Gewlie's flesh by the peculiar way it quivered and shivered, and still more by the extraordinary manner in which like a thin little inlet of seawater in wind-swept sand it kept being traversed from end to end by rippling vibrations just as if it were swallowing something not much smaller than itself!

All this accentuation and extension, to put it mildly, of John's normal powers of vision lasted for no more than thirty seconds, and as soon as it had ceased and he and Gewlie had returned to a simple staring into each other's faces, each face having grown both more ghostly and more ghastly in this pallid prae-dawn light than was possible under the electric glitter from the crack of that office door or the will-o'-the-wisp jerks of Gewlie's lantern, our friend John was once more aware of that look of indescribable suction in his enemy's eyes.

But it suddenly struck him that this indrawing "suction" of Gewlie's expression suggested a much deeper cause than a simple sadistic delight in creating intense fear or supervising calculated inflictions of pain. It seemed to belong to an older order of things than ours, and to a more confused dimension of life, where the differences between good and evil were much less clearly defined. In fact, Gewlie's expression actually suggested that the wretched man regarded himself as the Supreme Deity's avenger and inquisitor, in fact as a sort of little Minotaur of eternal justice, for whom to devour his master's enemies was a sacred duty.

John realised that the moment they separated and he himself went off to that stream where all those spikes had been changed into moveable wedges of harmless wood, the wretch would scamper off to the house of Echetus and claim from him God knew what reward for God knows what discovery!

But now as he looked into the man's face, himself with his back to the tulip-tree and Gewlie with his back to the dark hall and to the thin tream of light that, along with the two watchmen's noisy laughter, came from the door of the little room, he found himself startled by something he hadn't at all expected; in short, by something that he would have described, and indeed did subsequently describe to Tenna, as the very last thing he would have looked for from Gewlie. What he saw was nothing less than an urge to utter an oracle.

The countenance of the man, no very attractive medium for any form of inspiration, least of all for a spiritual revelation, was actually convulsed and distorted under the pressure of what he was struggling to say or of what somebody or something was determined to make him say.

John was more than startled as he stared at the man's face in that unearthly morning light. He was shocked. Knowing, or at least thinking he knew, Gewlie's thoughts, and having just had, only a minute ago, not merely a super-sensual vision of the strange link between the man's soul and body but a direct intimation, by means of some new kind of telepathy of the man's intention to go at once and betray everything to Echetus, nothing could have surprised him more than that this weasel of hell should suddenly, instead of bolting off on his treacherous mission, be heaving and throbbing and contorting his horrible face in the spasm of a rending and tearing effort to utter an oracle!

And then suddenly the oracle burst forth from him in an appalling whisper. The spirit in Gewlie's soul, or the demon in Gewlie's soul, or simply the wretch's innermost self, had obviously not the faintest thought of addressing itself to John, as a sympathetic inmate of the asylum, or, supposing the pair could hear him, to the cultivated Glue or the illiterate Gum as fellow-attendants in the asylum.

No, this terrible whisper from the Coliseum of Gewlie's soul at bay was a bolt catapulted to the perimeter of his precious One-world-only in a desperate attempt to destroy for ever certain impious inmates who were trying to escape the cosmic glint of the living God. And the effect of this appalling whisper upon John was for the moment overwhelming. It struck him as the most poignant thing he had ever known. What thunderbolts of power lay in the miserablest human soul!

John felt like worshipping, not Gewlie or Gewlie's god, but the infinite divinity in the lowest human creature. He knelt on the mat in the doorway so that with his face close to Gewlie's face he could catch every syllable squeezed from that sponge of suction. And, as if the obsessed soul of the wretch did really have for its covering some kind of skin that could be torn in thin slits, there issued from its mouth, accompanying what he said, a queer sound that exactly resembled the tearing of some stiffly resistant fabric. “One God”, whispered Gewlie; and the whisper as it lost itself in the morning air was accompanied by the hissing scream of torn silk.

“One God,” repeated that wrung-out oval of porous human flesh, opposite to which John knelt; and it struck him, as he knelt there, in his thunderstruck worship of the intolerable, that not only were the eyes and mouth at work in this double process of sucking up and wringing out, but that the ears were doing their share, and the nostrils were doing theirs and that even the knuckles of the fingers clutching the lantern were doing theirs!

These fingers were in fact playing what might have been called “The March of the Cosmic Sponge”, for they were beating a sort of indrawing and out-propelling tattoo on John’s chest, in the process of which those fingers moment by moment seemed to be growing whiter and thinner and more bony, in their desperate attempt to combine the machinery of suction with the machinery of explosion.

“One God,” hissed the eyes, mouth, nostrils, ears, and clenched fingers of Gewlie, “and therefore one Mother of God; one God, and therefore one Son of God; one God and therefore one Church of God; one God and therefore one Bride of God; one God and therefore one Spirit of God; and as in the Beginning God was All, so in the End God will be All. God, God, nothing but God! The One, the One, the One, nothing but the One!”

But a man’s strength is a man’s strength, whatever his willpower, and the legs of a man are that strength’s measure and limit. Thus having flung his bolt back into the blue as a warning to the Titans to leave Pelion and Ossa alone and Olympus alone, the whole power and presence and personality of Gewlie cringed and cowered and crumpled and collapsed, as a creature drained of all life.

He made no further attempt to “kick against the pricks”, in other words against all the thorny land-hedgehogs and spiky sea-urchins of multifarious Nature with her fathomless reserves of infinite backgrounds and undreamed-of dimensions. He sank down weakly and shamelessly on the litter and dust of the unswept floor of the entrance-hall to Glint. Mrs. Wohntscher wasn't due for nearly an hour yet, and between his exhausted body and the dust of that trodden threshold there seemed a natural reciprocity.

John's pity for the man under the tension of the oracle that convulsed him, combined with the fact that John himself was on his knees, made any assistance he gave him natural and automatic. What he did for the sadistic little sod", as he called him later to Tenna, was simply to help him to collapse comfortably on his haunches, and, this done, to sink down by his side. After a little more shuffling, during which John treated his companion as if he were an exhausted infant, they were both seated on the capacious doormat, with their four heels on the doorstep.

The "sadistic little sod", however, though no longer with that painful accompaniment like the tearing of the veil of the Temple, continued his dithyrambic oracle in praise of the One. "There will be," his voice wistfully wailed in John Hugh's left ear, "no more you and no more me, no more men and no more women, no more masters and no more slaves! There will be no more black, red, yellow and white among the nations. There will be no more French and English, no more Jews and Gentiles, no more Old World and New World.

"There will be no more individuals, no more persons, no more men, or animals, or birds, or reptiles, or insects, or vegetation. There will be no more heavens, or earths, or moons, or stars, or galaxies, or nebulae. There will be no more time and no more space. There will be no more of anything we know.

"Instead of life there will be only God! Instead of death, only God! Instead of me, wanting what I want and hating you, only God! Instead of you, wanting what you want and hating me, only God! Instead of the sane eating up the mad in places like this, only God, eating us all up according to His eternal and divine pleasure."

The high-pitched intoning of this diabolus-sanctus litany ceased at last, and John Hush, plucking his attention like an in-sucked cork from this exhausted conqueror-worm, considered what was, as Homer would say, the best counsel to be followed. He had to make sure that those sham wooden spikes were O.K. so that when the moment came it would be easy to pull them out and let the stream carry them off, and easy to climb out on the bank on the other side of the great wall when once they had followed the stream under that arch.

But if he got up from the doormat and shut the door softly and cleared off wasn't there every chance that in spite of the fellow's belief in the final end of everything and his absolute conviction that he himself would vanish as utterly as a bubble of spittle from the mouth of one of the dogs in Echetus's torture-house, "the sadistic little sod" would scramble to his feet and for all the shakiness of his legs manage to shuffle off to the house of Echetus and find a hiding-place to wait there, as patiently as a cat watches at a mouse-hole, till the Doctor could see him.

And then John Hush thought of the appallingness for them all, for himself, for Tenna, for Mr. Lordy, for the mysterious Pantamount, for the heroic Commander, for poor old Miss Bolster and her besotted circus-freak, for those crazy twins, for the skipping Zeit-Geist, and even for Tenna's special human horror, that obsessed old masochist Rumpibus with his applecheeked Tottie, if their plot were discovered and the American plane went off without them!

"I'm responsible for the lot of them," he thought. "And if Tenna and I desert them, and he and that girl fly off with only Tenna and me, the fate of the inmates of Glint will be hopeless. Sometimes the worst of cowards simply has to be brave.

"Well, I rather fancy such a time has now come for me; and I've got to do something drastic." With a long fixed stare he contemplated the exhausted and wrung-out Gewlie.

Then, as we say, he gathered himself together, or, as Homer would say, he crouched to spring; and, having made up his mind, he acted with a rush.

15. “ON ALL FOURS”

IT MUST BE confessed that when once his resolution was made John plunged headforemost into a series of actions that would certainly have struck his guardian as surprisingly rapid and competent. He clapped his hand over his companion’s mouth, lifted him up in his arms, and, holding him pressed tightly to his chest, managed by squeezing him against the door-post to keep him dumb, while with his free hand, using exquisite care to shut them with scarcely a sound, he succeeded in closing the double doors of the main entrance to Glint Hall.

This accomplished, he staggered and stumbled eastward, away from the tulip-tree and the entrance-drive and the smooth lawn, following a narrow, neglected, overgrown path that led round the corner of the house where there were no windows on the ground-floor but above which, as he lurched and staggered on, he knew very well was that wide semi-Gothick window looking due east out of which on his first day in this place at the end of March he had seen the ancient fortress-ridge with its two Scotch firs, and seen it, in the rapidly darkening spring-twilight, as the background to Tenna’s face when they first exchanged words.

He had to lean against the wall every half-minute, and he kept uttering loud panting gasps that seemed to himself to resemble the hoarse croakings of a mad raven who was carrying in its claws in some desperate insurrection of the fowls of the air one of the most vicious of game-keepers, in order to quell his expostulations in the pit Echetus had dug for his dead dogs.

During these moments of resting against the wall he kept assuring himself that he mustn’t think about the threat to Tenna if Gewlie did get to Echetus and revealed their plot. “I mustn’t squeeze the little sod to death,” he thought, “or knock out his brains against this wall!”

But it wasn't only the roughness of the wall, making it an unpleasant object to rest against and a tempting smashing-block for the execution of a midget-minotaur of totalitarian omnipotence: it was the wall's endlessness that made every second of this struggle so appalling. And in addition to the rest there was this horrible half-dead, half-living, half-animate, half-inanimate jumble of things that clung to the wall for protection!

To John's peculiar sensibility and half-crazy fastidiousness this over-growth of creature-life as it brushed against his face was incredibly repugnant.

Midges, spider-webs, small blue-bottle flies, snail-slime, trailing stalks without leaves, tickling insects without wings, tangles of leaves that completely hid their stalks, and finally thick red stalks that seemed to carry upon their smooth surface nothing but thorns, all these conspired with nameless grub-dust and pollendust to cause him that particular kind of discomfort, thick with a curious excretion of loathing and disgust from which he seemed to have spent his whole life in running away; and here he was with a jungle of it round his head!

The wall, indeed, seemed to stretch on in complete indifference to everything except some implacable necessity of the higher mathematics. But it was not ordained by the great goddess Chance, Nature's daughter and darling, and so much less of a wanton than many sages have surmised, that John should perish of a burst blood-vessel at that particular stage of his unnatural undertaking.

After a few steps more of stumbling and staggering he reached the end. The building turned away from them at right angles; and there in front of them, looking due east, was a clear open space! So high did the up-sloping distance rise above their prison wall that the summit of the eastern ridge which he had seen from the window of that passage as a background to Tenna's head showed itself to him now through a wavering transparency of white mist, like a vision of magical escape, with its prehistoric camp and its two Scotch firs.

And above the ancient camp and between those two tremendous trees, red as the blood of a battle in heaven, rose the sun! It is true that neither the gasping and groaning John nor the moaning and whimpering Gewlie had the strength left to notice anything more than the most realistic aspect of what they saw or to observe that both the ridge and the trees upon the ridge had the air of having awaited this blood-red apparition, not for a mere twenty-four hours but for twenty-thousand years! but there it was: and you might have thought at that moment from the expression on each face that the question as to which was the victor and which was the vanquished made small difference compared with the desperate welcome they gave to that red rim, knowing well in their strained and contorted bones that its presence brought at least a respite to their struggle.

There were several cows in the enclosed meadow whose iron railings had now given to this grotesque contest some sort of an end; and these somnolent creatures, who had themselves only just risen to greet the sun, leaving dim islands of enchanted greyness on the grass, like patterns on a map of undersea mountains, half-turned their heads on the obscure chance that it might prove possible to find a natural cause for the sudden manifestation at the boundary of their pasture of a man with well-laced leather boots and a scratched face pressing frantically against his breast another being of the same species with tattered slippers, a white face, and something in the expression of his eyes that even at that safe distance was disturbing.

But, having decided that neither the man carrying nor the man carried was aiming just then at any mischief to them, they turned back to the east, where the bloody rim of the lord of life challenged all profane men and all impious beasts to dare to utter a blasphemous sound.

John now behaved to Gewlie as if he were a child, and deliberately helped him to prop his slippered feet on the bottom rail of the fence and to clutch tightly with his trembling fingers, from which still dangled the palely jerking lantern-flame, the thin chilly rondure of the top rail. No piercing shriek burst from Gewlie's mouth to fly like an arrow across their prison-wall till it reached that crimson orb on the horizon.

All the sound that came out of him was just as if John had been squeezing a queer-shaped bagpipe, a bagpipe which, when balanced against the railings, could only repeat with a whistling long-drawn gasp: “Mother of Mercy! but I didn’t know you were so strong!”

Strong or not, our friend couldn’t collect either his breath or his wits for a good half-minute, while with his arm round his prisoner’s shoulder he stared at that crimson platter slowly projecting itself from between a pair of familiar black trees across a gulf in space.

And he now discovered that one of the cows they had disturbed had not returned to the grass but was still staring at that blood-red rondure on the high ridge. And while this black-and-white cow stared in awe at the sun, John Hush, recovering his breath, stared in awe at the cow. “She might be Io herself,” he thought, “and that grand homed head with those liquid eyes and those quivering nostrils might be flinging its spirit across horizon after horizon, far over the Molossian plain, far beyond the oaks of Dodona, till it reaches the heaped-up mud of the Nile, where the gad-fly will cease from stinging and the great black king Epaphos will be born!”

And as he regained his breath, he asked himself what it was about the head of a homed cow confronting a sunrise that had such a peculiar effect on him? Was it, he vaguely pondered, mingling the remoteness of his thought with the aching of his muscles, that there exist within us certain life-germs inherited from primeval creatures of this planet who possessed an intimacy with the elements far closer than any known to us to-day; beings for whom what was happening now on that eastern ridge was the central ritual for all living things as they worshipped the cause of all life?

But everything was rapidly changing now about that crimson orb, and there had appeared above it what looked like an overhanging down-toppling mountain of woolly cloud edged with delicate silvery cornices and with coppery entablatures that were scooped into golden arches.

More slowly than he could have believed possible, that blood-red circle crossed the narrow chasm in space between the crest of the hill with its gigantic trees and these illuminated cloud-alps; and John had the feeling that it was crossing an irretrievable crack in our whole dimension! As he saw it now it was no circle, that orb of blood. It was the half-torso of a cosmic creature, a creature born of a self-evolved, self-differentiated multiverse, not created by any god, and not a friend, or an enemy either, to any man!

John had never properly learnt Greek at school and it was due entirely to his guardian that he had made feeble efforts to keep up with it later; but the Heifer-Maid of the Aeschylean Prometheus had always had a special attraction for him, as a creature loved by one ultimate mystery and hated by another! "We are all haunted by mysteries," he thought, "and we have no more idea why we are what we are than why anything is anything!"

Whether it was that carrying Gewlie like a colossal insect, like the very gad-fly from which the Heifer-Girl couldn't be saved till she reached the mouths of the Nile and gave birth to the black Epaphos, John had over-strained himself, or whether it was that his drastic question addressed to life and flung in the face of the rising lord of life had blinded and dazed him, but for a minute or two his whole consciousness stopped dead and everything went-dark.

He came to himself so quickly that his momentary loss of consciousness seemed to himself no more than the "blank misgivings of a creature moving about in worlds not realised", and when his mind came back it was an extremely disagreeable and totally unexpected shock to see his recent companion scuttling like a ferret escaped from a keeper's bag in the direction of that pit for vivisected dogs whence, as he knew well, there was a direct path leading to the House of Echetus.

"Oh, God!" he groaned aloud, "if I don't stop him now all is lost! He'll tell all he knows and he probably knows everything!" Had the wakeful Zeit-Geist possessed, as according to the cultivated Glue their visitor from Thibet did, "the run of the whole place", and at that silent hour been watching from the dew-soaked shadow of one of the young spruces John's desperate final rush to catch his enemy, he would doubtless have understood the subtle relief it was to our friend to utter his feelings aloud instead of keeping them to himself as his old nurse would have told him he ought to do, and understood also, no doubt, that the mere putting his feelings into words toughened them with that spiritual cement that might be called the irony of expressed self-consciousness. It may be doubted whether the wakeful Zeit-Geist could have produced from about his person by simply wriggling a finger an instrument for recording not only the substance of a thought but its precise verbal vesture, but he would have had a perfect opportunity for registering the effect of extreme emotional agitation upon the colours and forms of the visible world as these are imposed upon, and interpenetrated by, purely mental imagery, had he been watching this manhunt.

At last a perfectly simple and direct feeling broke through the blurred confusion of the chaos in John's brain, and, as he ran, this feeling tore its way out and tossed itself free of everything! In place of Gewlie it was Tenna herself he was now carrying in his desperation, and it seemed as if he were making the most frantic efforts to keep her soul as well as her body from escaping, and he felt as if it were these efforts to keep Tenna's soul in Tenna's body that kept forcing him to make certain convulsive jerks as he ran, and not only so, but to give vent to certain surprisingly animal noises, as he leapt over the small spruces and dodged the large ones.

To himself these sounds were the very talk of his heart to her heart. "Oh, my one true love!" was what these gruntings and groanings were really saying; but, in some obstinate knot of self-confusion, as if he'd been a spell-bound thick-skinned, inarticulate animal, he was troubled now by a blind doubt as to whether she understood what he was doing and feeling.

"Tenna!" he cried at last; and it seemed to him that this cry — wrenched like a gobbet of bleeding flesh from his body, and like a nugget of burning radium from his soul — had been flung forth upon the universe from within the mounting curve of the escaping sun as it burst into the mists! "Whether we die together," he cried, "or go on living side by side till my manias grow grey and your manias turn grey, I'll hold on to you while I am I; and if I lose you I'll hunt for you from one dimension after another! I'll ransack them, I tell you, these dream-worlds! I'll break through them all till I get you again!"

It would have been a curious experience for old Mrs. Wohntscher, arriving, as she sometimes did, with all her paraphernalia for scrubbing and cleaning, long before even the most conscientious of the permanent staff had left their sleeping-quarters, if, as was her custom to do before settling down to work, she had taken her usual glance through the window at the end of the long corridor, and from thence had perceived the staggerings and the recoverings, the wild rushes towards the east, and the not less furious deviations to the north and the south, as these two figures, the one pursuing and the other pursued, the one bent upon reaching Echetus so as to reveal everything, the other still more bent upon preventing, if necessary by violence, the revelation of anything.

Whether the old lady, who never quite forgot, whatever else she was doing, that mahogany table at the end of her day, would have been able, simply from the outward appearance of the man pursuing, compared with the outward appearance of the man pursued, to decide whether it was the urge that was driving the first or whether it was the urge that was driving the second that was likely to prevail in the end, is a question difficult to answer.

Mrs; Wohntscher never gave a thought to outward appearances save in relation to inward urges. She had been brought up by the Salvation Army, having been left as a child almost literally on the Army's doorstep by one of those tenderhearted women who know by instinct, quite apart from logic or mathematics or even common sense, in what queer directions the vegetable substance of the second oldest mystery in the world is apt to make its unpredictable appearance; and although both Father Tickle and Father Allen Wun had more than once given her historical, archaeological, and even metaphysical instruction as to the true nature of the wood of the Holy Cross, there was something about the accelerated rhythm of the swing of her polishing-rag, as it swept dust and dirt from every grain of planetary wood, that led the old lady, in despite of geography, history, reason, and even of good taste, to reserve that honour for mahogany.

As a matter of fact, the philosophical charwoman did see the two figures behaving in that unusual manner by the first light of dawn, but when she turned back to the long corridor and set to work on its familiar floor she told herself that men as men, whether within or without the walls of Glint, were incurably demented.

For some while as she moved about on her hands and knees, Mrs. Wohntscher mingled the feel of each dust-crack she knew so well and of each queer mark in certain particular boards where great creative nature had indulged in some perverse caprice before the tree was cut down, with the peculiar aberrations of the male animal whether inside or outside this particular home of research.

"As I always say," she murmured to herself, "it's their trousers what does it. In them old scripture days" — thus her thoughts ran on— "when learned men painted proper Bible-pictures of the prophets and saints, they didn't paint the rest of the menfolk who were, of course, as men always are, playing at some silly game or drinking in pubs or sneaking into whore-shops.

"The saintly men they painted were always keeping their sheep or feeding their cattle or fishing from their boats, or with spears and shields taking captive great heathen cities from ungodly tribes of Midianites and Jebusites and Canaanites.

"Did we ever see in these Holy Sunday-book pictures even so much as one single pair of trousers? We never did! Where did I hear that timely saying: 'When men first wore trousers in Cuckoldy Square their wives went a-whoring at Candlemas Fair'?"

But neither the philosophical cleaning-woman nor the wakeful Pantamount, who from his small window in the punishment wing had also caught a fleeting glimpse of this drama among the spruce-trees, remained long enough at their posts of observation to see what happened when John came near to overtaking Gewlie at about a couple of hundred yards from the hole of the dead dogs.

Our friend was close behind the runaway; and Gewlie, aware of this, had already turned to face him, when from behind a spruce tree that was a trifle and a thicker trifle higher than the rest there suddenly appeared between them the most overwhelming personality that either of them had ever seen.

This person, if person he were and not a supernatural apparition, had his back to John and his face to Gewlie. Gewlie's own face, however, by one of those circus tricks so dear to that supreme virtuoso in historic pantomime the corybantic acrobat Chance, was clearly visible to John under the apparition’s left armpit; for the man, if man he were, held his arms akimbo, and the expression upon Gewlie’s face, thus exhibited within a living frame, completely bewildered his recent pursuer. It showed no fear. It showed no horror. It showed no surprise.

What it showed was ecstatic happiness! It had the look of those rather ugly supernumerary bystanders in some vast El Greco mystery-picture who nevertheless are quite as much transfigured and transported by what is occurring as the protagonists in that particular cosmic drama.

Very deliberately the imposing personage who had thus intervened proceeded to do what our friend had recently been doing for a different purpose and with another result. He lifted Gewlie in his arms. But instead of clasping him to his breast, as John had done, with a hug of desperate vengeance, this new performer in the Burlesque show of redemption held him high up in both his arms well above his head while he still kept his own face turned away.

John and Gewlie were therefore once again staring at each other; but this time only a couple of hundred yards from the dog-pit and with the prehistoric camp in full sight but with the risen sun concealed behind a mountain of mist.

And to John’s amazement the ecstatic Gewlie, thus held aloft before the indrawn breath of all the creatures of the dawn, began to utter articulate speech.

“So you see, master,” announced the contorted image of this weird transfiguration, “you were wrong and I was right. Men and women are nothing. All is God; and all is death at the hands of God!”

Gewlie’s face after he had uttered these words broke in pieces. Henceforth it was not as if Morsimmon Esty were carrying a dead man. It was as if he were carrying a figure of petrified clay that was in danger of crumbling to bits. A complete exhaustion that was like a collapse of living flesh, though it was parallel to Gewlie’s almost chemical dissolution, now took possession of John Hush.

He caught sight of the stump of a large ash tree that had been left in the ground when the spruces were planted and upon this he sank down, clutching his shins with his fingers and pressing his forehead against his knees. Gewlie was done for. But John felt as if this Morsimmon Esty had found a crack in the heart of life, thrust an atom-bomb into it, and were now carrying towards it a fluttering and flapping flame that would blow up the world!

And John, with his skull pressed against his knees, knew that the flame the man was carrying towards this crack was the soul of Gewlie. The flame of that soul had curled itself up like a crouching tiger within the cauldron of the wretch's cruelty; but now it was released. It had leapt up. It had leapt out. The infernal cat was out of the holy bag. "What," thought John, "is this Morsimmon Esty going to do now? I wish I knew whether he's on our side or on the side of our enemies! Will he want to fly to America with us if we get out of this place?"

These questions adapted themselves in John's skull, as he kept t'hat brittle structure pressed hard against his knees, to the rhythm of a peculiar jogging jig, a jig made, not with his heels against the stump he was sitting on, but with his fingernails on the edges of his shin-bones, scraping and rescraping these bony projections covered by corduroy trousers as if they were a pair of outstretched strings.

Suddenly he let his hands sink down and lifted his head. What he beheld in front of him was the figure of Morsimmon Esty moving, in the manner of a priest approaching an altar, towards the dog-pit, with the rapidly disintegrating remains of the man he had caused to die of ecstasy held aloft in both hands. The remains of Gewlie were indeed dissolving fast, but as moment by moment they crumbled away they retained a simulacrum of human shape; and it was this shape that had a resemblance to a rain-soaked delapidated long-lost doll from some gargantuan Glint Hall for insane dolls into which one of the most scatter-brained of all Sons of Mischief had incontinently tossed it, either in pure caprice or out of curiosity just to see what would happen to it in such a Noah's Ark of crazy puppets, all fancying themselves creatures who could purr and growl and scrabble and wriggle and lick and bite and wag their tails, when once they were presented with a keeper who enjoyed his job!

“Inmates are we?” thought John. “But if crumbling images of corruption like this poor eidolon are to be allowed to go on driving us into worse insanity there’s need indeed for rending and tearing, and a beginning again of the whole business! But of course” — and as he watched the inexplicable dissolution of the human-inhuman envelope of the entity upon whom the name Gewlie had been tagged he began to wonder if any atom of it, for the thing now seemed to be more than decomposing, it seemed to be trickling and dripping and melting away, would reach the dog-hole at all—” but of course, “he thought, “if the whole of this weird puppet-show we call ‘life’ vanishes at the moment of death into a dream which in its turn dissolves into another dream without the sleeper waking up at all, and if neither the dream that has gone nor the dream that has taken its place touch, as we might say, bottom, in the sense of ever reaching any firm ground, what does it matter whether he gets to the dog-hole with anything of Gewlie left, or whether it’s all gone before he gets there?

“I must call to him! But he knows I’m here, for he saw me. He came between us. No, I’d better not call to him. I’d better get up and go after him! But how solemnly he’s walking now! It’s as if he’s carrying something that’s very dangerous to spill, but he’s spilling it all the time without knowing it! Yes, I must get up at once and go after him.”

The man from Thibet was indeed advancing towards the dog-hole in a singular manner. He was walking not only slowly and cautiously but with a ritualistic gravity that was beginning to strike our friend as grotesque.

John Hush made an effort to rise. He couldn’t rise. He made another effort. Again he couldn’t! Had he been paralysed by this person whose face he hadn’t yet seen? Had he a face at all? Like other victims of a disordered imagination John had often frightened himself by horrible fancies of featureless human heads. Was he destined, now, even now, when on the brink of escape, to be driven really and actually insane by what he might see if Morsimmon Esty turned round?

He tried desperately for the third time to rise from that ash-tree stump. In vain! And yet he didn’t feel paralysed. Was the Thibetan a friend of the enemy and consequently hostile to any flight to New York? Was he himself destined to sit on this ash-tree stump till, like Gewlie, he crumbled and dribbled into nothing, his only advantage over that obsessed voyeur of cruelty being the questionable one that the bulk of his decomposition would take place while he was still conscious?

It may easily be imagined that John Hush had some very contradictory feelings, and as the result of these feelings some very contradictory ideas as he contemplated the prelatical back of Watchman Glue’s “barmie-larmie” who was indeed making the utmost of what that well-informed attendant had called his “run of the place For one thing, some self-lacerating devil in John forced him to imagine the dead silence, for she was as secretive as he was himself over their feelings for each other, with which Tenna would hear that his room had been found empty that morning and that Mrs. Wohntscher had seen him chasing Gewlie across the spruce-plantation.

On the other hand, he automatically began practising what he regarded as his most important discovery during his nine weeks in an institution devoted to research, nor was he so infatuated with his own devices as to fail to give due weight to the influence of the Commander in this, the royal trick, namely, of forcing himself to go through the motions of enjoying all the craziest and most abominable situations offered by life and death, as they arise, just as if instead of feeling them to be horrible he felt them to be delectable.

“Repeat these self-compelling motions of enjoyment often enough,” he had of late explained to Tenna, who could only refute him by murmuring a preference for death, “and the most appalling things change their character and cease to be intolerable.”

It was in accordance, therefore, with this august discovery, of which, so he had been driven to confess to Tenna, neither the Commander nor himself had hitherto made any striking use, that he now set himself to enjoy the sensation of imagining that the flesh below his ribs was falling away, and that, like the body of a dead sheep he had once seen in a ditch in Slovakia, his decomposing torso was rapidly becoming a confused waterfall of living maggots.

If this was to be his fate, wasn't it only meet and right that it should come upon him when he was in a position like this, huddled, head to knees, and with his fingers clasping his shins? Wasn't this the very position in which in ancient days they buried people?

Wasn't it the position in which foetuses and embryos and abortions were wont to hug themselves before being bundled out of limbo into life and out of life into limbo? "Well," he thought, "if I can't get up I can at least find out how much of my body is paralysed!"

It was this vigorous and sensible decision of John's that resulted in his carrying out a series of muscular experiments which, even if they had struck Tenna as pathetically like the sort of experiments that a doll would have made if a doll's brain had been able to make the discovery that it possessed physical things called "muscles", a mental thing called "will", and an electric system of interior wires by which these two could be connected, would not have impressed her with that particular kind of special hero-worship that childless women who are not "in love", but who are deeply touched in their maternal hearts and at the same time mischievously tickled in their old-maidish sense of humour where their male heroes are concerned, are apt to feel.

To feel the true poignancy of our friend's situation would have taken not only the romantic sentiment of Miss Bolster but also the realistic and sweeping shrewdness of Mrs. Wohntscher, remembering the innocent timidity of Mr. Wohntscher, who perished in the Second World War leaving her still a virgin.

To have seen John so resolutely at work on his mysterious inability to get up from that ash-stump would indeed have deeply impressed both these admirers of his. What he did was simply to try out one by one every movement that it was physically possible for him to make, and every set of muscles that it was possible for him to use, and how far and exactly where these revolting members and muscles refused obedience to his will.

And to his perfect amazement he found he could move any separate portion of his body he liked! He was soon behaving in the manner of an electrified robot, nodding and wagging his head, knocking his knees together, tapping his heels against each other, shrugging his shoulders, snapping his fingers, slapping his arms across his breast, and even causing his haunches to rock to and fro, as though he were in the act of dodging or destroying a wasp's nest.

But no sooner did he suspend these activities and try to rise to his feet from his seat on the stump than once more complete immobility took possession of him and he became no better than a stone.

And all this time it was impossible for him not to gaze with infuriated desperation at the massive prelatical back of this "barmie-larmie" who could reduce one man to a pinch of dust and another to a prisoner on a tree-stump. Yes! this formidable back was still moving, with what might most literally have been called the remains of Gewlie, towards the dog-pit. "But I won't, I positively won't," he thought, "work myself into a fury over this. What difference does it make, in a I dimension or time and space like this, it a conscious entity called John should be compelled, yes, compelled to contemplate another entity, and one devoid, as far as the first can tell, of a single human feature in his terrestrial face, playing at a solemn entombment with the scraps of decomposition left from the crumbling body of an asylum-keeper called Gewlie? And, "after all," he thought, "it's all pure chance! The Aristotelian-scholastic God of Father Wun's metaphysic has no more real existence than the Evangelical-Anglican God of Father Tobie's river-bank intimations! And this unfair chance has chosen to make a hundred times luckier than the tortured dogs of Echetus's dog-hole. What's happened to me is simply that in coming near this ambassador from Thibet, who, I certainly hope, is on our side and not on our enemy's, I have been touched by some devolutionary cosmic ray that has the power of magnetising people back from human to animal, from animal to vegetable, from vegetable to mineral, and so on down the scale to bodiless gasses and even, perhaps, to atoms and mesons.

"I don't so much mind if it leaves me as a patch of moss or a clump of lichen or even as a scum of mould, but I don't want to finish as one of those weird mathematical suppositions or hypotheses belonging to some level of existence that exists only in the human mind."

And then John thought of Tenna. What would Tenna feel when she discovered he had vanished with Gewlie? Imagination of the nerves rather than of the heart was John's chief peculiarity, and at this moment the image of Tenna's particular look when she realised the fact of his disappearance hit him such a sharp blow that its first effect was to cause him to utter aloud the first syllable of her name and to repeat that syllable over and over again.

He must have uttered it four times. "Ten! Ten! Ten! Ten!" But to him it was as if he had desperately shrieked it a hundred times, and not upwards after the vapour-wrapped sun as he had done before, but downwards, "through the thick rotundity of the earth", downwards, cracking the innermost centre of "nature's moulds" till that "Ten! Ten! Ten! Ten!" broke out, erupting upwards once more, in New Zealand, and became audible as the voice of some ancient Maori ghost from the mountain-peak of Taranaki!

And then, just as he had begun to wonder whether the syllable "Ten" might have been some ancient prehistoric invocation understood at once by dehumanised presences hovering about the ridge of the two Scotch firs, he suddenly discovered that by letting his hands sink forward into the moss in front of his feet, and rolling sideways off the ash-stump, he was able, like the Titan who could only be strangled when lifted into the air, to draw renewed strength from the earth.

Aided by this contact, and exultantly grateful to find he could crawl, he began moving, as they say, "on all fours It was in this way he tentatively followed Morsimmon Esty towards the dog-pit. It wasn't long, however, as may be supposed, before he was forced to stop to rest, for to move "on all fours" was a means of progression he hadn't practised since the age of one and a half.

The Thibetan stopped at the dog-pit and bent over it. Then he began to act as if he were removing from his hands something that might have been a little fluff, a little scurf, a flicker of scum, a speck of dandruff, a few scaly scabs, a wisp of hair, or a pinch of sticky dust.

Watching the tremendous back of Master Glue's "barmie-larmie" as he thus literally washed his hands of Gewlie, two rather unusual words came into John's head which he tried in vain to connect either with what he was watching of the person and of the proceedings of Morsimmon Esty, or with himself, as he peered out from under these sweet-scented spruce-branches. The first was the word sorites, and the second was the word incunabula.

Whether it was the prerogative of the feminine earth not only to allow a male human creature to draw "virtue" from his contact with her as the woman "with the issue of blood" drew virtue from Jesus of Nazareth, but also to supply him with a new metaphysical orientation by which he could avoid the pitfalls of life, John was now made more vividly aware than he had ever been before, as with his left hand he touched the fringe of the small just-budding purple plant called self-heal, and with his right knee approached the trailing white-flowered wisps of the plant called bed-straw, of the monstrous fallacy, lying treachery, and infernal falsehood, of the idea of logical determinism and absolute fate in human affairs, of which the enemy made such compelling play.

It seemed to him, at that first moment of being "on all fours", that he became a medium for the secret wisdom of all those creatures of the earth, animal, vegetable, mineral, "up and down, down and up", who, unaffected by the attractions of logical scientific reasoning, lived by the true illusions of life; above all by the ultimate illusion of free will. "On all fours", as he was now, he was able to observe quietly and closely, and free from the fever of self-sadistic reasoning, not only all the unpredictable twists and turns of the living stalks and filigree-foliage of the fragile bed-straw, not only the globular curves and shell-like foliations of the shadowy self-heal, but all those fascinatingly casual shapes and positions of shapes, forming spears, swords, shields, gibbets, triangles, pikes, sceptres, squares, gates, hoops, spirals, jig-saws, crosses, rakes, horns, harps, trumpets, into which the indiscriminate litter and inland windrows and spindrift of the tiny microscopic wood-sticks and straws and grass-blades of dead vegetation had been led or driven. And like an animal he raised one knee and then one hand, thinking, "I will crawl there," or, "I will crawl there," and then thinking, "I will crawl a little in that direction, and then I will turn round, not urged by any motive at all, or by any 'urge at all, or by any desire at all, but simply and solely to prove to myself, for my own interest alone, and at a moment decided upon quite arbitrarily and capriciously by myself, that I possess, along with every other planetary identity, whether animal, vegetable, or mineral, together with all the atoms that compose us, the power to act or not to act, and the power to defy, unexpectedly, capriciously and wantonly, for the pure pleasure of proving to myself that I am free, every sort of cause and pressure exerted by every sort of material sequence as well as every sequence of thought or feeling or action!

"But oh, Tenna! Tenna! Tenna! The point now is, whether on our feet or 'on all fours', how many inmates we can save from Echetus!"

Slowly, cautiously, and forcing himself with a strange power in the depths of his spirit to taste a life-enjoyment beyond any he had ever known, he crawled towards the dog-pit.

Sorites? Incunabula? Did that first word mean an infinitely remote end to everything by a progression of mad logic leading to an impossibly absurd and therefore an absolutely nonexistent nothingness? And did that second word mean an infinitely remote rebeginning of everything out of the void?

Yes, out of the very vacuum of that absurdly logical nothingness? What magic there was in words! Mad it might be, but how miraculous it was that his absurd cry of "Ten! Ten! Ten! Ten!" had summoned up those two mysterious words!

He moved his right knee and then his left hand. He moved his left knee and then his right hand. He was still crawling in the direction of the man from Thibet, who was still bending over the dog-pit. But then all in a moment he swung round! It seemed to him that a broken stick his right knee had encountered and a hollow bole full of black water into which he had thrust his left hand had spoken to him in a language totally beyond such words as sorites and incunabula! Faster than he had ever crawled in his infant life he now moved "on all fours" away from the Thibetan and away from the dog-pit; nor did he rise to his feet till he was in sight of the stream flowing under their prison wall, where the iron spikes had been changed into wooden ones.

16. THE ESCAPE

WHEN HE HEARD the news brought by his two chief retainers, Doctor Echetus was indignant. He was not upset — not, that is to say, out of due measure and suitable proportion — nor was he alarmed about the future. He was simply and quite naturally indignant.

It was an exceptionally beautiful midsummer morning; and the Doctor, after leaving his breakfast-room where he had enjoyed just the kind of breakfast he liked best, had proceeded to make his leisurely way to an earth-closet near the research laboratory with a view to relieving his bowels. On his return from this innocent objective, he had stopped to pick a white carnation.

It had been with this particular flower in his buttonhole that he had delivered the presidential address which had first announced to his colleagues the new line of research by which, alone among European empiricists, he had hoped, carrying science into a sphere where no one had ever dared to carry it before, to reach the electric contact between life and consciousness, that is to say between the magnetic vibration that acts and reacts, and whatever it may be that transforms these actions and reactions into consciousness.

The act of easing his bowels had increased the doctor's sense of well-being, so that when arriving at the door of his office and remembering that there were dogs still waiting to be crucified in his laboratory, he breathed a sigh of pure satisfaction. But he was faced by a surprise. Bill Squeeze and Cogent Cuddle awaited him with the startling news that there was not one single inmate left in Glint Hall; unless — but that was unlikely — the person called Pantamount was still tied up in the punishment wing.

Did Doctor Echetus, on hearing this information, burst into a fit of rage? Did he stand staring at the two men, white and ghastly and hit through the heart? He did neither of these things. He showed nothing but quiet vexation.

"Ingratitude, that's what I call it!" was the first remark. "But of course," he went on, "they can't have got far! What were all the staff doing, Squeeze? And where are they now, Cuddle?"

"Well, sir," began the latter, taking the initiative at once, "Bill here and I decided, before we came to you, to give the staff those some identickle orders that you yourself gave the day the bomb fell between the north lodge and the cattle sheds, blowing up the three best old sows and the three prettiest litters of little pigs we've ever had in this part of the county! So that's what we told them to do, and that's what they've done. Half of them have gone to search the village — every house of it. And I told that half clear and straight: 'No beating about the bush, lads! 'I said. And then I took the liberty, sir, of repeating your own strong language, the language referred to afterwards, if you remember, sir, in all our best papers, as the firm masterly hand at once scientific and Christian that our national institutions need."

Doctor Echetus withdrew the white carnation from his buttonhole and frowned at it for less than two seconds. Then, behaving as only Candidates for International Kudos can behave, he plucked a few caryophyllic petals from its corolla, converted his thumb and index-finger into an automatic catapult, and after replacing the flower in his buttonhole shot what he had removed from it straight at the philosophical head of Heraclitus. This head was now in full process of being furtively, but with a slow concentrated absorption, lured out of Bill's pocket into the light of day.

"Well, well, well!" murmured the self-controlled vivisector turning his attention to the retardative Squeeze. "And in what direction did the other half of our people pursue these silly fugitives?"

"Oh that, sir," cried the ingratiating Cuddle before Bill could speak, "was decided for us by one of those providential happenings, which, as I've so often heard you say, sir, in the annex laboratory of the dog-room, are the true scientist's reward for his pursuit of truth without fear or favour."

"Which way? Which way? I'm asking you, which way?" demanded Doctor Echetus.

"Straight down the North Road, sir! Some on bicycles, some on tricycles, some on motor-cycles, some in lorries and tractors! 'The poor silly things,' as you, sir, so well call our runaways, were caught as they started in the middle of the night, for the whole thing must have been carefully planned; and the curious part of it is that our friend Gewlie — of all the staff, sir, as you know, the one most to be trusted — has completely disappeared, and it has crossed my mind that they may have murdered him; but, as I was saying, they were providentially seen as they were just starting by our distinguished visitor from the East — I believe you saw the gentleman last night, sir, and were seriously impressed by him? He was studying your methods, sir, by visits to the inmates at hours when they would least of all be expecting visitors, so he found out their ridiculous plot and he told us the whole thing. It was across the river they were to go and through the village — that's why we're having every house in the place searched — and then straight along the main road through Ghost-Privy and Pump-Handle to Integer Turnspit. Squeeze doesn't think — and I tend to agree with him — that there'll be any resistance to their recapture.

"The danger is — and Squeeze agrees with me in this as I agree with Squeeze that left to themselves they'll come back quietly — the danger is that when they go through the village some of the village-people will get into their silly heads that they are some sort of victims — you know, Doctor, what fancies village-people get — and try to hide them in their stick-houses and attics and pig-sties and straw-stacks and apple-lofts!

"That's why I sent the cleverer half of our staff to search the village from Stocks-Corner to Lovers Lane. And that's why I used the downright man-to-man language you used yourself, sir, on the occasion when—" But Cogent Cuddle suddenly stopped, for it had become clear that the master of Glint was no longer giving him the slightest attention.

Doctor Echetus's head was indeed turned to the south as far as it would go and he was listening with absorbed intensity to a titanic helicopter, evidently a new American invention, that clearly could fly lower than airplanes usually do. And not only was this great air-vessel flying unnaturally low, flying so low that it looked as if it might very soon prove a serious menace to those who were watching it, but it was flying extremely slowly and with curious waverings to left and right as if searching tor a suitable landing place.

It had such powerful engines that anyone would have supposed that the noise it made would have so disturbed the master of Glint that his brain would have become as confused as those of his runaway inmates. But not at all! This well-balanced guardian of public sanity retained his self-possession.

He again removed the white carnation from his coat, held it for a second to his left nostril, plucked out a few more of its musk-scented petals, and after returning its mutilated corolla and dangling stalk to his buttonhole, as if that innocuous slit had been a younger sister of the dog-hole among the spruces, "You're perfectly certain," he enquired, aiming, by aid of his firm square thumb and his sharp-pointed first finger, a new missile at the fox-hole of Heraclitus, "that this preposterous person from the East hasn't come on some special mission to make trouble in our English institutions? Foreign visitors to our research institutions have to be watched, you know; the—"

He was interrupted by the appearance on the scene of the oldest attendant, that same ancient-mariner-like individual who had been so cautious about making bad worse when Tenna Sheer suffered her seizure over Rumpibus and Tottie.

The old fellow was seriously out of breath and obviously very disturbed. "I have to tell you, Doctor—" he panted; but before he got any further he felt impelled to turn round and shout some extremely abusive words at somebody behind him who was at present invisible to the master of Glint. "Don't you dare to follow me, you fig-tree fornicator, you lousy grub-picker, you white-gilled worm-chaser! I won't be followed, I tell you, by a sneaking lemon-pip like you with a worm in his gullet and nothing but slug-slime in his stinking lubricating gizzard! Get away! Don't you hear? It's me that's seeing the Doctor about you, not you about me! Get away, you lubberly lobscouse!"

The classic physiognomy of Heraclitus, with that curiously complacent Greek-philosopher beard that must so often make an uncultured philistine long for an avenue of the busts of murderous Caesars, descended like a solemn Jack-in-the-box into the pocket of Bill Squeeze while he and Cogent Cuddle rushed forward and began waving their arms, just as in a crowded sale of cattle the auctioneer's assistants indicate by resounding thumps on the animals' backs the appropriate entrances and exits.

But as the ex-sailor drew back, his companion advanced, and it was not long before Doctor Echetus beheld the unruffled visage of Mr. Frogcastle, the gardener. With its multitudinous criss-cross wrinkles, the gardener's countenance had the peculiar quality, and it is likely enough that this was the very thing about him that Gewlie had found so disturbing, of compelling those who looked at it for more than a second or two to fall into a reverie. The face of the gardener resembled in fact all those segments and fragments of the surface of the earth — pieces of broken fence, patches of frozen mud, sections of the bark of certain growing trees, strips of cart-track in out-of-the-way lanes, shallow ponds crinkly with cat-ice, which, for no reason that can be named, lure us into a mood of abstraction just as if they were snatches from some familiar scene in a previous incarnation.

"Be quiet, you," cried the Doctor sternly, addressing his oldest attendant: "and now!" and he turned to the gardener, who was neither panting nor explaining his presence.

In fact Disraeli's great motto for practical life— "no complaining and no explaining" — seemed wholly fulfilled in the gardener of Glint.

"I thought I'd better warn everybody up here" — and the gardener gazed equably round him— "that the milking woman from the village is on the rampage. She would have been up here by now, only she met her gossip and neighbour, old Mrs. Wohntscher, the scrub-woman, at the north lodge, and went for her. I wouldn't have been the man to try and separate those two, but before I left them they had been separated; and it was done by the chaplain's wife. There's a real lady for you, Mr. Doctor! I sure do give her the prize. But how she does it God and the Devil alone know; the one because he wins by it the other because he loses by it."

Doctor Echetus looked at him gravely. "Why did the milking-woman fall upon the scrubbing-woman? Can you tell me that, Gardener?"

"Certainly I can tell you, Doctor. She attacked her because the boy Seth has taken to following the Heavenly Twins, as we call them, when they get their dancing fits, and Mr. Hush, who is always about with Miss Sheer, encourages the twins to take notice of Seth and be nice to Seth, whatever his mother says or does."

It was a calm, unruffled, and completely self-controlled master of Glint who now once again, out of his first finger and thumb, manufactured an effective catapult with which he ejected all the remaining petals of the carnation's corolla and, when this had been done, allowed its limp stalk to flutter unheeded to the ground.

But that queer habit of nature, known to ordinary folk as "it never rains but it pours" or "misfortunes never come singly," seemed unable to make an exception even of an official who could convert his very fingers into "disposal squads".

All the four men moved forward now in an amazed and indignant protest, for two struggling and panting women, one of them beside herself with furious anger, came reeling and staggering up the slope to this strip of level gravel between the entrance to the Doctor's house and the entrance to the research laboratory, which now seemed to have become the final rampart and ultimate barricade against rebellious inmates.

The women engaged in this murderous-looking tussle were none other than Mrs. Wohntscher and the plump red-cheeked mother of the idiot Seth.

"Cos you 'aven't got," the milking-woman was shouting, "any childer of your own, you needn't come barging and bustling into the affairs of them as 'as! Tell me who's got my boy Seth! Tell me who 'twas you seed 'un with! And tell me quick, ye wurkus privy-cleaner, or I'll turn your yeller phyz into a turnip-field! Baalbub swallow my soul for mustard if I don't! Tell me who's got my Seth or you'll never have as much kissing space left in your yeller face as would tempt a horse-fly! One of your andy-dandy ones he was, I've no doubt, one of your well-behaved concertina-gents from abroadl Come on! Out with it! One of your fine loonies 'ave got 'im, sure as I'm born! Out with it, you devil's bitch! Who is it? You know you know and are only trying to keep my hands off 'im cos he's yours. Come on now, honest for once. Is it that Mr. Hush-a-baby of yours who sits, so they tell me, night after night with the worst loonies in the place and at a table you polishes hour by hour till it's as sleek as a suet-grub?

"No, not one of these gentlemen — don't you fancy it! — will stop me — no! not the Doctor himself — till I've got your ugly old-maid's mug down in the dust — and not then neither, till I've 'ammered with an honest country fist your filthy city-ways out of ye, ye slum-bitch what don't know a rake from a pitch-fork or a mattock from a hoe, and would be pulling up the best of the mangle-wurzels if you was told to do a bit of weeding before dark!"

Mr. Frogcastle had by this time withdrawn from the scene, while his recent antagonist, the old ex-sailor, had joined Cuddle and Squeeze in their attempt to separate the two women, or, to be more exact, to disengage the fingers, the knees, the few remaining teeth of the milking-woman from the clothes and person of the charwoman.

When they were separated, it became clear at once that Mrs. Wohntscher, though not wholly free from battle-stains, was a good deal the less ruffled and less upset of the two. The colossal helicopter now appeared to be following with concentrated care every curve of the serpentine river; that river that had struck so many among the inmates of Glint as being in league with their prison wall to draw closer the noose of their terrible isolation.

With all three pairs of absorbed masculine eyes watching this titanic air-omnibus from the outer world, it now became clear to the virgin mind of Mrs. Wohntscher that since nobody was detaining her by force, there was no reason against her immediate retirement from that over-crowded spot. Without any sign of her intention save the gentle extrication of her wrist from the heedless fingers of Bill Squeeze, she drew away from them all and hurried down the hill.

And the odd thing was that though at this very second Seth's mother lifted up her powerful voice in a louder cry than ever, this particular howl of hers, which only caused Mr. Cuddle to redouble his grip, had nothing to do with Mrs. Wohntscher. The milking-woman had suddenly caught sight of her missing boy himself. She had seen before the rest of them what they all now, including Doctor Echetus, surveyed in astonished silence. A majestic car had driven up of a bright yellow colour and of unusual proportions and out of it had jumped not only the idiot boy Seth but, clasping the boy's hands, one on one side of him and one on the other, that excitable and restless pair of young inmates, the boy Hither and the girl Thither.

The three youngsters were immediately, though quite quietly, followed from the capacious body of this crocus-coloured conveyance by two extremely imposing and authoritative persons. One of these gentlemen was obviously, from the easy and familiar manner in which he permitted Hither and Thither to run off with Seth towards the river, the parent of these excitable twins, while his companion, the owner of this portentous vehicle, was none other than Tenna's father, Sir Warden Sheer. Each of Doctor Echetus's subordinates automatically turned towards their master to see how far this sight would disturb him. It didn't disturb him in the least.

He had now no longer any buttonhole to toy with. So, to make it quite evident, possibly to himself as well as to his retainers, that he had not forgotten how to "keep an equable mind rebus in arduis", he absent-mindedly moved his hand — for he was standing quite close to Squeeze — and scratched with a couple of fingernails the beard of Heraclitus, whose head was still just observable above the rim of Bill's pocket. The particular coat worn by Bill on that eventful day, though it is doubtful whether he had put it on for that reason, had neater and trimmer pockets than his usual one, so that the uncarved base, or "Herm" which terminated in the philosopher's shoulders — shoulders that looked as if they could, like those of Atlas, sustain the whole paradoxical world — must have rested, invisible to everybody, in a warm, tender, comfortable darkness through which could be felt, though without jolt or jar, every movement of the hip-bone of Bill the Sophosopheros or wisdom-carrier.

"I rather tend to think," announced Doctor Echetus, addressing nobody in particular, but watching with concentrated attention the butterfly antics of Master Hither and Miss Thither as the twins danced off with the enraptured Seth towards the watery archway where there were no longer any iron spikes, “I rather tend to think that Lord Tom Tiddler himself, those twins’ father, is accompanying Sir Warden Sheer.”

He paused for a moment, lifting first one foot and then the other, and stamping the turf with each leather sole, resolutely, firmly, and even defiantly, like an aged ram, perched on a rock, preparing for the approach of a couple of inquisitive dogs. “What I would like you fellows to do,” he went on, “for my impression is that the two gentlemen have seen us and are coming straight up to us, is to remain here with me so as to be available for any action that may seem—” he paused for a second again, “that may seem indicated.” The master of Glint put into the word indicated every nuance of moral weight mingled with every nuance of infernal caution of which the head of the most complicated of all conceivable Holy offices — that of pure knowledge through licensed torture — could possibly make use—” Yes, seem indicated! “he concluded with a faint fluttering of the fingers of the left hand.

“And my impression is—” he added, while one of his companions glanced from the approaching gentlemen to the panting stable-woman, whose wrist he was still clutching, and the other tried to turn the bearded visage of Heraclitus towards the escaping twins, “my impression is that Lord Tom is under the happy illusion that all is in order and that it is part of our curriculum in the cure of those children of his to entrust them with the care of a boy like that, and to encourage them to play with him at such innocent undertakings as damming up rivers and making tunnels under walls.”

Both Cuddle and Squeeze nodded sagaciously; but the latter had to allow Heraclitus to turn his Athenian beard directly towards the woman he was holding, for the mother of Seth with her great round bulbous grey eyes “bursting”, as Mrs. Wohntscher would have put it, “out of her turniptop head”, had begun to heave and struggle and sob.

“Is it indicated,” Doctor Echetus’s look now said to his henchmen, “that we’ve got to separate this creature from her offspring? And, furthermore, have we the right to hold her back? She’s a free villager. She’s not an inmate. And mightn’t she,” so his look continued to hint, “be more of a trouble to our runaways, and to these damned agitators who are encouraging them, than she is to us?" Who can say whether Bill Squeeze was aware of all the implication of what he was doing in letting Seth's mother free to pursue her progeny?

But, aware or not, this eccentric "wisdom-carrier" must have heard these terrible sobs, must have felt these frantic and desperate efforts, even before Doctor Echetus had given him the glance that said: "Let the wretched woman go." It had long been the purpose of Betsy of the south lodge to make her husband follow, like a swift gnat "among the river-shallows, borne aloft, or sinking, as the light wind lives or dies", every curve and curlecue of a woman's conflicting emotions, so that as he released Seth's mother he used his free hand under his coat in the manner of a Punch-and-Judy showman, so as to permit his bearded doll to answer the woman's scream of maternal possessiveness with the philosophical retort of a free soul.

For that appalling scream as she rushed off came from her whole physical being. From her bulging eyes it came and from her twisted lips. From her belly it came, and from her protruding breasts. From her great thighs it came and from "the demesne that there adjacent lies".

The language of that cry was a language older than any English dialect from any English countryside, a language older than Sanscrit, older than Babylonian or Egyptian. "He has moved in my womb!" wailed that terrible cry. "He is my blood, my milk, my bones, my fibres, my flesh, my soul, myself! To let him leave me is to root out myself from myself! When his heart beats my heart beats! When his blood flows my blood flows! I can't eat save when he eats! I can't drink save when he drinks!

"For him to leave me and my warm love is a crime against God! He has no right to himself. He is mine and God's! He has no right to have any life save me, by me, and with me, who fed him with my food, swaddled him in my flesh, and grew him in the dark depths of my being like a ripe, sweet, lovely, round, obedient little bulb!" How low and faint was the voice from the bearded lips of a shocked and horrified philosopher that Bill Squeeze heard from the recesses of his pocket as he allowed his Heraclitus to sink down!

“Every living soul,” sounded that faint voice from the pocket of Betsy’s husband, “has one right that none can give or take away, one right in the infinite chaos of the innumerable warring worlds among which we are born, one right and one necessity, and that right is the right to be free and alone in our thoughts!”

But the mother of Seth was off now, bursting with the urge to whack and thwack and clack, with the law of the pack at her back, heading for the bed of the stream where the spikes were gone! Neither Squeeze nor Cuddle, however, could give any attention to the sequel of this maternal boy-hunt; for a second motorcar had appeared on the scene, driven by one person and driven at a most unusual speed. Out of it, the moment it stopped, leapt a tall, thin, lanky, aggressive individual, who began without delay shouting peremptorily and harshly at the figures of Lord Tom Tiddler and Sir Warden Sheer as they made their leisurely way towards the master of Glint and his two companions.

“Hie there, you two! Ho! Hie, you two! What’s wrong with you? Can’t you hear what a fellow’s saying? Stop there! Stop! I want to talk to you! Stop, I say!”

The two magnates, thus unceremoniously addressed, did turn round at this point, and after a word together awaited the newcomer in silence. Doctor Echetus and his two companions watched this encounter with considerable interest, but what would have struck our friend John, had he been sharing this contemplative suspense instead of being one of the trouble-makers, was the way in which both Bill Squeeze and Cogent Cuddle displayed no astonishment at Echetus’s calm! They took this superlative self-control, so it would seem, completely for granted, just as a couple of boys in some great cathedral choir, absorbed in some affair of their own, would take it for granted, though the organ suddenly became silent and though one of the big lights hanging from the roof-rafters above their heads mysteriously went out, and there wavered a flicker of surprise across the Norman eyebrows of the Dean, that nothing would disturb the serenity of my Lord the Bishop — no! though every light in the place went out, and everybody lit a match, and they all danced down the aisle to the tune of Widdicombe Fair.

But where the unruffled Doctor and his two retainers, for a philosopher in a pocket can hardly be called a retainer, were in luck at that moment was in regard to the acoustics of that gentle eminence. There was scarce a sigh or a groan, far less a word, from those three men down below that was inaudible to the three men up above.

“To whom have we the—” began the father of Hither and Thither.

“Do you know to whom you’re—” commenced the father of Tenna Sheer.

“My name is Cochineal, Colonel Cochineal,” declared the newcomer, “and if you guys weren’t mental patients, as I can see you are, of this peculiar bug-house of yours, where you seem to be treated with the easy therapy of doing what you damn-well like, I should have something to say to you, for where I live — Colonel Cochineal’s my name — I should have something to say to you — no! I wouldn’t call twice where I live after fellows like you — but if I did, there’d be some answering and some being answered! — you can take that from me, messieurs the uncured patients!

“And you can remember besides that it’s Colonel Cochineal who is always at your service!”

Cuddle and Squeeze had hardly exchanged a look over this opening remark, when Sir Warden, who hadn’t in his earlier days handled bricks and mortar for nothing, went straight to the point. “We are parents of patients, not patients, sir! This gentleman is Lord Tom Tiddler, whose two charming children are evidently being cured in the most sensible of all ways — at least that is my opinion — by being entrusted with the care of a village boy. I am the father, sir, myself, of a much sadder case, the case of a girl who has a passion for violence, sir — yes, sir, for physical violence, and I have no doubt you will understand me, sir, when I say that if I find her comfortable and quiet in this well-managed place, here I shall let her stay — yes, sir, stay till she has learnt to love her own father as the Book teaches.”

The colonel from the Deep South suppressed his anger and looked at Sir Warden with real respect. It was clear that the brickmaster’s straight man-to-man talk impressed him. At

Lord Tom he cast a sharp appraising defiant look, as at a weird animal who might or might not bite.

“I may as well,” he said, “inform you two patients — I mean parents — at once what I’m here for. Any little mistakes I may make in addressing you, you can balance up against your not answering me when I called. What I’ve come here about is a little private matter of investigation, entirely private and personal. I’ve heard it said where I come from — that is to say Cochinealville, Canister County — that you English allow social contact, drinking tea together, for instance, and even playing games like croquet and bowls, between buck niggers and white women. Now what I’ve come here to explain to you English about this nigger business is that in for a penny is in for a pound.

“What your English women haven’t yet learnt, and what I’ve come here to teach them, is the excruciating temptation they are to buck niggers. A buck nigger playing croquet is a buck nigger playing with fire. I’ve got no quarrel with, a nigger because he’s black any more than I’ve got a quarrel with the rain because its wet or with a pot of honey because its sticky. I’m glad I’ve met you two men because I can speak plainly to you, seeing as you are connected with this important institution as parents and not patients. It’s all in the understanding of the Unalterable. That’s the grand key-word. That’s the whole business; the Unalterable. The more I think of the word the more I like it. It is the grand secret of life as it should be. The mere sound of it makes you feel as if you were smoking a good cigar. Unalterable! It sounds like a rustle of the skirts of the woman you love. The great thing of course is to find out where the ‘unalterable’ begins and the ‘alterable’ ends. Can you make over a buck nigger so that when he sees a white woman playing croquet it don’t make the blood rush to all parts of his black body?”

“I believe,” broke in the father of Hither and Thither, “that the individuals who are staring down at us from the front of that building are the heads of this Institution. I am sure nobody will steal our cars if we leave them where they are. I can see my son and daughter are showing that little boy how to paddle in that pretty stream. Nothing could be more soothing to the over-excitable youngsters than paddling in cool running water. Gad! but this chap must be a good one at his job. My cousin Tit-Tat — the Dowager Lady Fly-by-Night, you know — wants me to send those children to America. She says America will knock the stage-struck nonsense out of them. It's all one great theatre, she tells me, over there, with everybody on the stage in ordinary life.

"Well, I suggest, gentlemen, since our cars are, so to speak, on holy ground, ha! ha! that we go and enquire of those fellows up there where this Doctor Echetus is to be found. Will you come, Sir Warden? Will you come, Colonel Cochineal?"

How Sir Warden reacted in his heart to this airy suggestion was not revealed in the words he uttered aloud. "God I how I wish, he thought, 'I was safe back in the brickyard office with old man Bogger lighting his third pipe and young Jiggit making his best blueprint and pretty Miss Caryatid knocking at the door with a nice cup of tea! I only hope this Doctor what's-his-name will soon begin letting Antenna fish for minnows with little boys; for then, please God, she may settle down here for the rest of her days and I may be quit of her!"

But aloud he said: "Certainly, my lord; at your service, my lord; it's a pleasure to be a fellow-parent with you, my lord, not to mention visiting an institution like this in your company! I'm sure you feel as I do, Colonel?"

While the complacent peer smiled his approval of the downright yet respectful manners of the self-made magnate, he looked at the colonel, who had suddenly commenced gazing at him with positive awe.

"I'd split my bottom dollar," said Colonel Cochineal emphatically, "for my little woman down south to see me on the television talking to the owner of Tom Tiddler's ground! Yes, of course I'll come! This noble knight speaks for me. 'Colonel,' I say to myself, 'you're in luck today! Not only have you found exactly the right place to deliver your message to the ladies of Great Britain about buck niggers, but you are privileged to ascend a natural eminence in the company of a cousin of the Dowager Fly-by-Night.'"

The Colonel paused and looked up at the Doctor and his two retainers, while it became clear to Lord Tom, if not to Sir Warden, that, like so many orators, he saw a surging audience at a cross-road of life where others could only see a group of idlers smoking cigarettes by a closed museum door.

When the three newcomers, ascending the slope together, arrived at the door of the Doctor's research laboratory, Bill Squeeze and Cogent Cuddle drew back a little to enable their chief to greet his visitors.

But since the Doctor had already made it clear to his two retainers that, at this dramatic crisis in the history of Glint, it was essential that he should have their support, they did not retreat far. It was the lord of Tom Tiddler's Ground who "broke", as we say, "the ice", for after the three men had shaken hands with Echetus, both the colonel from the cotton-fields and the knight from the brick-kilns turned almost pathetically to that florid Etonian.

"I haven't failed to notice, Doctor," Lord Tom began, "how happy and normal my youngsters look playing with that little rustic — clearly an importation from the village, though I confess as we were climbing your hill just now I was disturbed to see a rather wild and frantic woman, no doubt one of your simpler and humbler patients, Doctor, who appeared to be trying to drag the boy away from my friendly progeny. I couldn't help noticing that the child was clinging in the most desperate manner to both Marmaduke and Eleanora, who were, I could see, resolutely refusing to hand him over." Lord Tom of Tiddler's Ground paused politely at that point.

"Sheer?" he murmured interrogatively, like an experienced butler encouraging a poor relation. "Cochineal?"

But Sir Warden shook his head, and the Colonel told himself that the longer he held his tongue the more pleased with him his wife would be when he recounted this scene.

"What I feel myself," continued Lord Tom, inclining his massive forehead a little forward as he turned to Echetus, and permitting his right hand to sail loosely and negligently through the air by his side as if he were touching with the tips of his fingers the shoulders of the persons and the backs of the chairs intervening between himself and the footlights, "what I feel myself is that all the moral and intellectual problems of this round world are much simpler than people realise. In fact they are" — here not only did Cuddle and Squeeze come nearer, but the hairy pate of Heraclitus emerged from the latter's pocket, though the philosopher's beard was still invisible— "in fact they are reducible to one simple — simple — simple—" It was clear that Lord Tom had for gotten the clue-word that was the whole point of this discourse.

But while the master of Tiddler's Ground hovered vaguely about the word he had forgotten, the Doctor had what really was a supreme opportunity to display that equanimity with which temperament or training or some queer vacuum in his sensibility had endowed him; for glancing through the gap between the left shoulder of Lord Tom and the right shoulder of Sir Warden he beheld what he knew must be the titanic helicopter from America, now safely and comfortably landed among the reeds close to the river, from which position, the moment it so desired, it could rise and float away into the upper sky!

Surrounding this amazing object in a tossing, surging, jostling, struggling, confused mass of men and women, was the whole heterogeneous company of the inmates! And they were not only swarming round, they were actually clambering into that monstrous apparition!

Along with this disorderly mob Echetus was aware of a large sprinkling of uniformed men, obviously the bulk of his official attendants, making feeble, helpless, hesitant, drifting, half-hearted, and evidently quite vain attempts to prevent their patients' escape. That both his quaint adherents, Cuddle and Squeeze, were watching what was happening was clear to him; but all they had dared to do was to move up close together. They were not speaking a word. They were hypnotised by the sight of what was going on.

From the monumental pose of their profiled heads as their condition forced itself upon the corner of Echetus's vision, they might have been stunned, petrified, dumbfounded, all but bereft of their wits; but Echetus was too shrewd to take any of this for granted, and in some extreme background of his consciousness the idea arose that both these men had known of all this from the start. Very slowly he slid his fingers into his right side-pocket and extracted a half-filled packet. Then he thrust a hand more rapidly into his left side-pocket, brought out a box of matches, and with his gaze on that airplane and that crowd, as if they had been figures on the stage of a theatre where he was entertaining his friends, he offered a cigarette to Lord Tom of Tiddler's Ground.

Lord Tom shook his head, and Sir Warden, imagining such a refusal just then to be the proper thing, followed suit and shook his head too. The Colonel, however, perceiving the crumpled condition of that unappealing half-package, with courteous American consideration for the Doctor's feelings, accepted with alacrity, and permitted their host to protect with his curved hand the flame of the match.

It was this well-meant gesture of the Colonel's that let the cat out of the bag, for Lord Tom, catching the excitement of Squeeze and Cuddle, followed the direction of their gaze and swung round. So did Sir Warden — and the fat was in the fire. It was, indeed, more than in the fire. It was burning and smoking. And it was leaping up the slope towards them. This it was doing in the familiar persons of Father Wun, the priest, and Father Tickle, the chaplain.

To meet these anxious men of God, our four gentlemen, followed by Cuddle and Squeeze, hurried down the declivity. Their encounter might well have been called memorable; but alas! in after days not one of these worthy men could properly remember it, so blurred with egotistical prejudices were their visions and so lacking in the faintest repercussion of the swift-darting mischievous malice of the old Attic touch that could clarify by a few wholesome explosions the nuclear core of an occasion of this kind.

"Ha, Doctor!" cried Toby Tickle, "I swore to the Father I'd spotted you, all right! And sure enough here you are, watching the battle of the kites and crows, shall we call it? or the whales and the flying-fish? A little 'Mutiny on the Bounty', eh, Doctor? Ho! Ho! The Father takes it too seriously. I told him you had only to appear on the scene and this confounded American invention would soon flap its wings and be off, hell for leather, and our little flock would return to its proper fold! You'll see it all, Father, for yourself in a minute if you come down with him and watch him handle it! You Romanists have so much truck with the beachcombing rabble of the Mediterranean that you've forgotten what a proper chieftain and a real living authority is."

Father Wun turned upon his Anglican companion a look that clearly said: “There isn’t a thought in your float-bobbing brain, my good sir, that isn’t as transparent to me as the thoughts of Cranmer or Ridley when they first smelt the smoke of their own burning. You think, you great silly ass, that this precious Doctor of yours has only to stroll down to that airplane and clap his hands and the plane will sail away to America and his patients will gather round him like the children round Our Lord, while the lion and unicorn of this Commonwealth of Commonsense, touched by the intimations of a tempered immortality, will pull the Ark of the Covenant of decent behaviour into the well-stocked home-farm of Glint Hall!”

Oddly enough, it wasn’t the Reverend Toby, nor Lord Tom of Tiddler’s Ground, nor Sir Warden Sheer, who returned this look of infinite contempt cast by Father Wun at the smiling weather-beaten face of the chaplain. It was the world-weary, life-tired, ungullible stare of one who had seen too many “beginnings” and too many “ends” to give way to human peevishness or human jocularity in these difficult matters.

It was, in fact, the grave detached stare of none other than Heraclitus himself, as Bill Squeeze edged that bearded head over the rim of his pocket.

What appeared to amuse Doctor Echetus, who evinced not the faintest tendency to move from where he stood even though the heavens fell, was the appeal flung forth upon the general air by Lord Tom of Tiddler’s, who now beheld Marmaduke and Eleanora assisting the little Seth to clamber into the giant plane.

“Will anybody here,” he called out, addressing the whole countryside: “Will everybody here who has the right to wear a public-school tie come with me to stop this nonsense?”

At this point Lord Tom paused for a moment. Then in a still shriller tone he began again —” I’m only asking for a few real gentlemen: that’s not much to ask for, is it? A few real gentlemen? That’s what our public schools are for, aren’t they — at least the top half a dozen of them? Factories, aren’t they, for turning successful men’s sons into gentlemen! You agree, Sir Warden? You’re with me, Sir Warden?

“Well! Come on then! Let’s see what you and I can do to stop this nonsense! Come along, Colonel! Never mind about your niggers till we’ve got our palefaces under control! Come along! Come along! Come along!”

The voice of Lord Tom Tiddler died away as he approached the south-lodge gates. But through these gates he didn’t go at once; still less through the low archway where the stream ran under the wall. At those great gates, though Betsy had already passed through them, leaving them unfastened, Lord Tom waited for Sir Warden. This hesitation of Lord Tom’s failed not to interest quite a good deal the psychological eye of Doctor Echetus.

“It shows,” the master of Glint told himself, “how the vibrations of biological change affect human character. The aristocratic lord of Tiddler’s Ground daren’t take his own twins out of an American plane till a brickyard magnate supports him!”

Echetus found less to interest him in the movements of his chaplain and Father Wun, who were quite clearly not at all anxious to get involved in the confusion that was going on outside the wall of the institution and within one of the snakelike curves of the river. Whether by mutual consent or by the compulsion and pressure of theological argument, they paused under an isolated group of spruce-firs, whence they could observe both the imperturbable Doctor above and the wild confusion below.

It was at this moment that a concatenation of small occurrences, at once fortuitous and unavoidable, at once ordained by destiny and grotesquely accidental, prepared the way for an event which was as startling as it was tragic.

Bill Squeeze became so anxious to enable his bearded pockettotem to see what could happen in England when philosophical inmates revolt against unphilosophical scientists, that he left the Doctor alone with Cuddle and rushed off down the slope, following the same path as that which John Hush had traversed “on all fours” when he made his way to the now spikeless water-channel that ran under the great wall and out the other side.

It was in full view of his own house that this now unimpeded tunnel went under the wall; and it was no doubt his dread of his wife’s wounding tongue, and some vague notion that if he crept through that orifice instead of through the great gates she was less likely to catch him, that set him at such a pace.

"Well! Well!" ejaculated Doctor Echetus, watching the half-hearted and spiritless attendants making their feeble efforts to prevent the reckless and desperate inmates from crowding into the giant helicopter. "Well! Well! And what's going to be the issue of all this?"

He had put back into his pocket those cigarettes and matches that had enabled the colonel from the South to show what man-to-man courtesy, save where buck niggers were concerned, a gentleman from Cochinealville could display; and now with a deliberate tranquillity that rivalled the natural calm of that particular spot upon the earth's surface with a latitude and a longitude so mathematically verifiable, Doctor Echetus calmly lit a cigarette for himself.

No animal second-sight, such as might have warned a less purely rational intelligence, rushed into the Doctor's consciousness to tell him if he didn't swing round, quick as hell, this would be the last puff of smoke that would ever pass his lips.

Any onlooker except Mesopotamia Cuddle would have been surprised to see Cogent Cuddle, that orderly and obedient fanatic, extract from his pocket, not tobacco nor any still wiser consolation in the form of a philosopher, but simply and solely a very large army pistol. A small puff of smoke from the front of the Doctor's skull now floated off towards the river in a perfect ring, while a large puff of smoke, accompanied by a distinct but not overpowering detonation obscured the back of that same skull.

Ever since he had been delegated to bring the Doctor's activities to an end the moment they ceased to be of use to the movement, Cuddle had repeated as soon as he was awake, like the most devoted of priests his office, every syllable of the unequivocal instructions he had received from headquarters.

What he hadn't been instructed in, however, were certain disturbing details of the transaction, when he came to carry the thing through. He had accepted too roundly perhaps the Shakespearean murderer's easy assurance that "when the brains were out the man would die. His instructions had been reticent as to how the victim after receiving his death-wound was liable to behave.

There was no allusion in this Spartan document to wounded bodies leaping into the air or diving into wet mud or offering to the murderer's unprepared eyes shattered bones, bloody hairs and oozing brains, in conjunction, as happened at this moment, with a horrible stare from a pair of eyes different from all other eyes in the world.

Still less did these laconic instructions give the faintest hint as to how an inexperienced killer was to calm his own nerves when his victim really was dead. On this particular occasion Cuddle had hardly replaced his pistol in his pocket before he caught sight of the well-known figures of Father Toby and Father Wun retracing their steps.

Apparently the professional concern for mortality natural to all priests had been as much excited by the sound of that shot from the hill above as their instinctive dislike of anarchy had been exasperated by the shouts of the crowd below. Cuddle's first instinct when he saw the two priests returning was the natural one of blind concealment. He couldn't see the reverend gentlemen when he lay flat, nor they him. So from this position he pushed Echetus's body away from him till he got it completely hidden amid the stalks, leaves and flowers of a bed of rhododendrons. Thus by the time he was on his feet again, with the pistol in his pocket and the body out of sight, he was ready to put on some sort of defensive mask.

"We heard a shot from up here, Cuddle," cried Father Toby, when they reached him. "The Doctor hasn't lost his head, I hope? We've nearly lost ours; haven't we, Father Wun?"

"Perhaps you could tell us, my friend—" began the priest.

But the chaplain had now heard a familiar voice behind them and he hurriedly swung round. Father Wun did the same. So, to the indescribable relief of the agitated assassin, he beheld their backs instead of their faces. But he, too, had heard the unmistakable voice of Ursie Mum, the only one of all the authorities of Glint who had no enemy among the inmates, for Mrs. Wohntscher, who resembled Ursie Mum in being a married virgin, was too confined, as you might say, to the floor, for the mahogany table only rounded off the events of the day, to be able to exercise her personal power.

“I’m surprised at you, Father Wun,” Ursie Mum was now gasping indignantly, “encouraging Toby to leave his post like this! What have you got on your mind? And you too, Mr. Cogent Cuddle! I can’t understand how you men can — Goodness-gracious! but what’s this?”

Had she been the mother of all Britain, Ursie Mum couldn’t have uttered that “Goodness-gracious!” with more astonishment. It was not natural to her to feel, still less to express, dismay, but she came as near to that emotion at that moment as she had ever done in the whole of her maternal and yet old-maidish life.

Well might Ursie Mum, whose married virginity gave her a protective instinct that was far less savage and far more subtle than the ordinary maternal one, an instinct that might have won for her as a saint, if she’d wanted to be a saint, some such nickname as “the aunt of God”, well, indeed, might Ursie Mum come near to dismay, for between her and the two ecclesiastics there had suddenly manifested itself the figure of Morsimmon Esty, the refugee from Thibet. Without uttering a word, of giving any sign of warning, this mysterious stranger gripped the two Fathers with a double clutch of demonic power, Father Wun with his right hand and Father Tickle with his left hand, holding them in each case by the nape of their necks and with the devil’s own clutch of such supernatural force that to retain any dignity at all they were forced to submit as if he had been their executioner.

The crouching and quaking Cuddle shuffled backward as best he could, feeling with his heels for the body of Echetus so as to thrust it further out of sight among the rhododendrons. There soon, however, arrived a point when this iron-handed executioner from Thibet, with his murderous hold upon those two men of God, compelled the agitated Cuddle to scramble backwards over the corpse of his master; and once there, far too exhausted by his antics to attempt further evasion, compelled him, drugged with the sharp taste of rhododendron-stalks, to await, crouching on his heels, the next bounce of the ball of fate, as Destiny and Chance played their game over his head.

Cuddle never forgot the extraordinary spectacle that these casual performers offered to his vision. Ursie Mum, that good and great "Aunt of God", was by no means petrified by fear. She moved forward a step, and seeing Father Toby's hand dangling in pathetic helplessness she clasped it in her own. Thus, if we had the curiosity to contrast the thoughts of these living centres of consciousnesses as they occupied together the same transitory bubble on the river of time, both Father Wun and Cuddle felt they were not alone but were portions of a larger entity upon which at this uncomfortable crisis they could lie back, whereas both Toby Tickle and Ursie Mum felt that they were, though a man and a woman holding hands, totally alone in infinite space and infinite time, although there was no doubt, floating vaguely around them somewhere, a sweet savour usually called "God" and a horrid stink usually called "the Devil".

It was at this point that Morsimmon Esty sank down on his own knees in front of the body of Echetus, where he faced across it the crouching figure of Cuddle. Then, having got his captives upon their knees, he intensified his iron clutch upon each separate skull and forced their faces downward till their eyes and noses and mouths and cheeks were buried in the Harris-tweed-smelling coat and laboratory-acid-smelling trousers of the dead scientist. Five separate times did the person from Thibet press down their faces in this manner into that dead body. And most vividly aware were both the ecclesiastics that, at each descent of their faces into the body beneath them, there was less of the dead man into which to sink.

Finally, when their skulls rose for the fifth time it was from earth mould and weeds and the stalks of rhododendrons that they rose. There was no longer any remnant left of Echetus, the manner of dogs, nor was there any sign or shadow or semblance of the man from Thibet.

The two ecclesiastics were so physically exhausted by the weird experience they had been through that when at last released, and released in the attitude so natural to men of their profession, they were for a while unable to rise from their knees; and Cuddle, as he faced them with a piercingly sharp smell of stalk-sap in his nostrils, felt drawn to examine, with the desperate intensity of a hunted animal, the two faces that were now peering at him, towered over no longer by any supernatural stranger from Asia, but by the bent head, massive frame, and outstretched arm of Ursie Mum, that potential “aunt of God”, who, however, was of less interest to Cuddle than a rhododendron-stalk.

“Only two of them now,” he told himself, with an immense sigh of relief. Being a man of insight, in spiritual as well as other matters, it stuck him that his unquestioning use of the pistol, according to orders from above, need, as things had worked out, have no uncomfortable results for himself. The death of the master of Glint had in fact been lifted out of the sphere of the criminal and tragic into the sphere of the fantastic and miraculous. His personal apprehensions being so surprisingly eased he was now able to examine with something of his natural acuteness the faces of the two clerics kneeling before him and only divided from him by an oblong space about a foot and a half broad, where certain insignificant weeds, such as common veronica and groundsel, were now feebly rising from the prostrate position to which they had been reduced by the superincumbent weight of what was now thin air and a pinch of dust.

What struck Cuddle most about the face of Toby Tickle was its ruddiness and the thickness of the flesh that composed the nostrils and formed the bulbous knob of his healthy animal nose and the manner in which all the innumerable wrinkles from the corners of his eyes and the corners of his mouth seemed to be singing a little cheerful song of their own, a song that made Cuddle think of his wife when her special sort of female impulsiveness infuriated his logical mind.

And now, as he stared into the face of Toby Tickle, all the chaplain’s good-natured little wrinkles seemed chirping like grasshoppers. And to the embittered integrity of Cuddle’s fanaticism they really did compose themselves into a psychic ditty, though no doubt all Toby Tickle was feeling just then was that Ursie Mum had come to extricate him from the clutches of devils.

There’s never a hook
In a fish that you cook.
What hell in the steeple

Can bother a people
Whose God's in the sky
Where the great clouds sail by?
The wind and the sun
Wipe out all that's done.
Let the sad wail dong-ding
And the mud howl ding-dong.
Forget every things
Whether right, whether wrong!
'Twas to help us forget
That the seas were made wet.
'Twas to help us slip past
That the rocks were made fast.
If in one woman's looks
Are a million books
For one snow-flake of snow
You can let them all go.
When the sun goes down red
The last word has been said.

But when he turned from reading these rhythms in Toby Tickle's face and gaped at the polished inscrutable countenance of Father Wun, he suddenly became convinced that this latter had actually winked at him.

And though this impression coincided with the uprising of both priests from their knees, and coincided, too, with an exchange of words between Toby and his wife that struck him as if the woman had been reassuring a little boy of ten who without quite knowing what had happened had received a stab in his self-respect by having been danced up and down with no power of retaliating by a person who had now completely disappeared, Cuddle made no bones about catching Father Wun by one of the buttons of his waistcoat and asking him bluntly and plainly whether he would be willing to take him on as a general servant at a low salary.

After his discerning scrutiny of the priest’s impassive face, and after noting how the man was completely impervious to being turned upside down and bobbed five times against a corpse, he wasn’t really very surprised at the reception his offer received.

“You are, of course,” replied the Father quickly, “a lapsed member of the Greek Church?”

Cogent Cuddle admitted that such was the case; and in his heart he knew that the priest had accepted him. “Mesopotamia will have to go to mass!” he thought with vindictive and unholy joy. But Life has a partner in her game of bagatelle with Destiny, and this partner is called Chance. According to what happens we call her pure Chance, blind Chance, wretched Chance, or sometimes lucky Chance. And on this occasion Chance had arranged it with this same Mesopotamia’s natural impulse to escape that she should, by the hurried intercession of Mr. John Hush, find herself hugging herself with a healthy happiness she hadn’t known for twenty years, in a comfortable hiding-place in the very heart of this huge newly-invented helicopter.

And though so quietly hidden herself in the heart of the confusion, it was permitted to Mesopotamia, as if she’d been a veritable pet of Chance, to behold episodes in this strange vessel’s departure that not only would have absorbed the attention of her husband, that obstinate adherent of Oneness, but would have attracted a glance, though not, we may suspect, a turn of the head, from her husband’s new master, the equally obstinate adherent of the Oneness of the faith revealed to St. Paul on his way to Damascus.

She saw, for example, though neither of them could possibly see her, the outburst of wifely fury, mounting up and up till it burst into a suicidal scream of hate, which Betsy Squeeze of the south lodge flung at Bill Squeeze; she standing amid the reeds of the river and he caught by her as he leaned over the central rail of the airplane in an obvious effort to give the bearded doll in his pocket a parting view of the hemisphere they were leaving.

Mesopotamia heard this appalling feline howl with a response altogether different from that with which Bill Squeeze himself received it, while the actual emotion experienced by Betsy and expressed in this manner was totally different from the emotion either of them attributed to her. Mesopotamia, the woman’s gossip, and Bill, the woman’s husband, did however agree that one of Betsy’s dominant cravings was the craving to rise above the class into which she’d been born. For food and drink, for social jollification, for sexual ecstasy, for lively encounters, for pleasant parties, Betsy cared little or nothing. What she dreamed of, day in and day out, was for her neighbours to stare at each other in awed amazement and to murmur in their stunned and bewildered envy: “Think of our Betsy being a real lady born and nobody known it!”

But men are men, and women are women, and their association together through many years has the power of heaping up, day by day, and from thousands upon thousands of microscopic details, such smouldering stock-piles of explosive and even annihilating resentment that once released it seems to tap some Satanic crater that can draw upon the central lava of world-destruction!

What, however, brought Betsy’s outburst of love-hate to an end was neither her own death by a broken blood-vessel nor the death of her husband by a stab of conscience: it was the actual death, by a ghastly fall from the helicopter, of the desperate and indignant mother of the idiot-boy Seth. She had followed the pair of reckless twins on to the very deck of this monstrous vessel and had tried to snatch the boy from them by sheer force; but others on the airplane had intervened, some taking her side, and some the side of the twins, with the result that in the confusion of the struggle the unlucky woman fell backwards from the deck of the plane, struck a twisted, sharp-edged six-foot iron stanchion fixed among the reeds close to where Betsy stood to deliver her imprecations, and broke her back.

The hurt to the cattle-woman’s spine would alone have been fatal, even if her skull had not also been hit, and hit with the sort of crushing blow that kills at a stroke.

The disturbance that now arose, both on the deck of the vessel and on the ground beneath it, as a crowd composed of a motley mixture of inmates and attendants and villagers and onlookers surged round the idiot’s mother confused every issue. Betsy Squeeze, although on her knees by the dead woman, hadn’t by any means been shocked into silence, but, on the contrary, had found in this new tragedy a fresh cause for raving against “that cowardly idiot I only married out of pity for the brute, and he thinking of nothing but that bearded Beelzebub the crazy swine keeps in his filthy pocket!”

But it was rapidly becoming clear to John Hush, as he stood clutching Tenna’s hand and staring at his guardian with that girl, that an indescribable jealousy was twisting like a snake round every nerve and every nerve-twitching fibre under the skin of his whole body! His guardian had seen him, and had seen Tenna with him, and so had that girl. What they were trying to do now was to talk to him above the uproar and through the same megaphone they had been using to give orders to their American crew.

It was queer how John managed to keep a small, cold, clear, uncynical, unsardonic observation-post in one corner of his consciousness that observed everything that was happening at that moment, together with its precise impact upon himself. “This is,” he told himself, “the most hateful and horrible moment in my whole life! I’ve got to give him up whatever happens! Does he think he can hand himself over to that girl and keep me too? Not on your life, heart of my hell! Not on your life!”

What made things worse for John Hush at that devilish moment was the vicious and cruel struggle he was having, quite apart from his guardian and that girl, in what he called to himself his “Glint Hall conscience What, in plain fact, he felt he ought to be doing now, before this air-dragon rose from its riverbed, was to rush into the main building of Glint Hall, climb the stairs to the punishment wing, and rescue Pantamount, that log-like waif from the Atlantic, who had sacrificed himself for Tenna and for him. Wasn’t it his plain duty now to pay back this debt and return that sacrifice?

He couldn’t help being troubled by the most horrible imaginations as to what might have been done to Pantamount. The most horrible rumours were always running through Glint Hall as to what punishment wing, or “Special Department of Corrective Treatment”, as it was called, and as if his destiny wasn’t being cruel enough to him at that moment by dangling him on a sort of gallows-bridge between his guardian and Tenna, it needs must now make him imagine the luckless Pantamount pinioned and trussed up in that bloodless crucifixion practised on the friend of the suitors in the Odyssey; one of the things, like the hanging of the suitor's girl-friends, that had always seemed to him an absolute proof of the Odyssey's infinite inferiority to the Iliad!

In addition to these private thumb-screws of the mind, John was now growing increasingly aware that the crowd about them had become dangerously hostile to this American air-vessel, to its foreign passengers, its foreign crew, and to its obvious intention of kidnapping as many crazy inmates as it could and carrying them across the Atlantic! All this excited shouting through the megaphone amounted, as far as he could follow it, to some sort of angry ultimatum. Either he and Tenna must climb on board at once, without further parley, or they would simply have to be left behind.

John felt as if there was an excruciatingly thin, sharp, high-pitched ice-edge in the centre of his heart, along which two distinct selves, each of them giving vent to a piercing soprano-shriek, were skating side by side and each endeavouring to thrust the other over the ice-edge!

It was at that moment that an extremely handsome, rather languid, exquisitely graceful individual of the male sex, with large brown eyes and an aquiline nose and an obscurely atmospheric but at the same time an unquestionable persuasive Jewish look in his air of approach, came lightly and gracefully up to them.

"Do you happen to know anybody," enquired he, addressing John, "who has any knowledge of the signs of the zodiac?"

From the remote position within the hinterland of his mind that contained an observation-post John couldn't help noticing how half-way across his frozen eel-bridge-edge of exquisite indecision, from the pain of which, if he'd been a woman, that woman would have had to fling herself with a rending shriek, he couldn't help noticing that mixed with his suffering there was a weird and diabolic spasm of enjoyment as he looked in his questioner's face and replied quickly: "Certainly I do, my friend, if I know anything of myself, for drawing up horoscopes has for some years been a habit of mine, and I can usually tell at the first glance under what sign of the zodiac a person is born."

The super-subtle and gravely ironical newcomer then turned to Tenna, whose attention had clearly been arrested by the beauty of his disillusioned eyes and Cardinal-Newman-like profile. "Do you, lady," he enquired, "happen to know anybody who knows anything of palmistry?"

John Hush couldn't help smiling, even from his ice-edge tragic indecision, as he caught Tenna's quick amused look.

"Certainly, mister, certainly," she murmured excitedly.

"I'd like nothing better than to tell fortunes in a tent at a fair!"

Apparently very well satisfied with both these answers, their unknown interviewer went off, but John had a queer sense of something new in the wind when he saw the fellow hurry away to join none other than his old acquaintance, who had been the first inmate he had met when he arrived, namely that giant-dwarf from the circus who had been so attracted to Miss Bolster.

And then he was back again on the shrieking cutting ice-edge of his cruel indecision. As Homer is always saying: "his mind was" literally "divided into two".

Things were indeed growing more desperate every minute. His guardian's lady, the American to whom this gigantic invention belonged, kept whispering in his guardian's ear, and he could see clearly from her gestures that she was urging him to give the signal, whoever might be on board and whoever might be left behind, to rise from that river-side and be off at once!

The worst of the whole thing was that Tenna herself was beginning to get agitated with that old fatal agitation. He had known there was that danger. Too well for some time he had known it. Once or twice already he had caught sight of Tottie and old Rumpibus teasing each other in their accustomed manner as they leaned over the shining rail of the vessel's deck. And then as he was watching the preparations of a couple of the crew to haul up one of the few remaining gangways into the interior of the plane, he suddenly became aware of a much worse agitation in the frail form by his side and he noticed that she had twisted her head round and was straining her neck.

Yes! it had come — their worst danger! He knew it from the glimpse he got of her profile. He knew it from the frantic struggle she now began to get free of his hold; yes! to shake him off and rush wildly in the direction of the man she hated! Rumpibus and Tottie were nothing to this. This could only be one thing. This must mean the presence of her father.

He had never seen the man before, but that it was her father was proved by the effect on her. Sir Warden was accompanied by some upper-class person who might have been any gentlemanly barbarian in the kingdom who didn't "give a damn" how he behaved; and it was evident as they approached the plane together that their appearance wasn't only throwing Tenna into one of her insane fits but was causing terrible consternation to Hither and Thither.

He had already noticed how the Heavenly Twins had been struggling to keep the fact of his mother's death away from the boy Seth. Would they be able now to defy their parent and refuse to leave the plane? God! But things were growing crucial. If the great flying creature didn't rise now — now at once — these two confounded men of rank and authority — and anyone could see they were that sort of thing — would send for the police — indeed he fancied he could see the helmet of a policeman already — and the police would search the plane — and the end of it would be that the Americans and their crew would have to set off alone!

It was at a curious little pattern of torn-off pieces of feathery reed-stalks, lying criss-cross together on the wet mud along with blackened wisps of moss, that John was now staring as he lifted the struggling Tenna from her feet and heard the gasping choking passion of the rending sobs that he seemed to himself to be squeezing from the core of her heart; and as he stared at that pattern in the mud, he plunged the very horn — for it felt like the horn of a crazed unicorn — of his whole soul into the very centre of this hieroglyphic writing in the mud!

He didn't pray. He didn't laugh. He didn't cry. Down, down, down, he seemed to be plunging the horn of his spirit; plunging it down into a secret of life that could only be known by a man who was squeezing sobs like black ambergris and golden myrrh out of the heart of his true-love!

His trance, or obsession, or whatever it was, was broken by the one voice that in all his days in Glint had never been associated with anything that wasn't comforting and healing — the voice of Mr. Lordy! And simultaneously with Mr. Lordy's voice he heard above him the resonant voice of his guardian giving the signal to start. The ground shook beneath John's feet with what seemed to him to be the same convulsive movements as Tenna was making in his arms; and the steel body of the air-monster above him shivered from head to tail, and then from flank to flank, and then with one grand heave and four great up-gathering wave-like cresting curves, the huge creature swayed upwards.

It was to John an astonishing sight, and in some ways a horrible as well as beautiful sight, to see it rise, for the people round it, as well as the people upon it, were so jammed together that it was like the human head and shoulders of a Centaur tearing themselves free from the four legs and flanks and tail of the same body!

John felt as if where he now stood the air ought to be wet with blood. But he noticed that from the thing's tail a long rope-ladder was still swinging in the air, a ladder that looked as if the hemp that composed it was made of some stuff much whiter than could be woven from any ordinary flax. Though the vessel which was carrying Mr. Lordy away was already heaving and swaying, and Mr. Lordy's voice was always rather faint, they were his words and nobody else's that remained in John's ears, and simple enough they were:

"Look behind you, mister!"

Yes, Mr. Lordy had now departed, and all that John could do was to obey him. So he swung round. And there at his back, as unmoved by the giant helicopter's leap aloft as he might have been unmoved by all the seas and oceans of the world, stood Pantamount.

"You thought of going to the punishment wing to look for me, didn't you?" he said quietly.

John gazed at him in complete bewilderment. The long rope-ladder gleaming so oddly white in the sun was swinging now between them.

"Catch it and go, for God's sake!" he gasped.

"I will, I will, I will!" cried the other. "See! I obey you I and I'll think of you all the way across!"

It certainly offered no difficulty to this last of the Atlanteans to ascend this rope-ladder, though under his weight it serpentined over their heads like the tail of the chimæra. It was strange that it should have been just at this moment — though not out of keeping with a recurrent aspect of what happens to us in time and space where the negligible, the meaningless, the insignificant, the senseless, seems to take an impish delight in presenting itself to our attention — that the voice he heard upon the air was not the voice of any of his friends but a voice he hadn't heard since that day in March when he had had his first meal in the Glint dining-hall; the resounding voice, in fact, of the luckless young man who had been on that occasion removed by the attendants for making too much noise.

"My father," such were the last words that reached John's ears as his guardian left him for ever, "was the Flying Dutchman!" It was with the word "father" pounding and grinding and turning into powder within him something that seemed like the very marrow of his bones that John, with Tenna in his arms, stumbled blindly into the thick of the crowd. Though she had seen Sir Warden, he didn't think Sir Warden had seen her; and the chances were, he told himself, that the man took it for granted she was on board the plane.

Blindly he stumbled on, crying: "She's my wife, my wife, my wife!" when anyone tried to stop him. Then all in a moment everything had changed. They were out of the crowd. They were in a lane. They were just below that ancient camp with the two Scotch firs, where the river couldn't follow them. And now they were being helped into an old battered dilapidated car by the circus-freak who had been so obsessed by Miss Bolster and the man whose profile resembled Cardinal Newman's.

It was explained to them now, and Tenna listened with relief as she sank into the ferret-smelling back-seat by John's side, that if they wanted to escape from the world and from their relatives in the world, the best of all disappearances was to be lost in a travelling circus. Miss Bolster's giant-dwarf, John noticed, spoke almost affectionately to the handsome gentleman who was now driving them and who had asked them a few minutes ago those pointed questions. And certainly after being rattled and jerked in that ferret-smelling car through a greater number of narrow lanes than John had imagined existed in that part of the country, they arrived at the biggest circus encampment either of them had ever seen.

The handsome gentleman, whom the giant-dwarf simply addressed as "Boss", but who, before they reached their destination, introduced himself in the most courtly manner as Mr. Livius, kept turning round to explain to Tenna, for he evidently considered John to be a convert already, that behind the disguise, in darkened tents, of fortune-tellers and zodiacal-diviners, no one could possibly discover them.

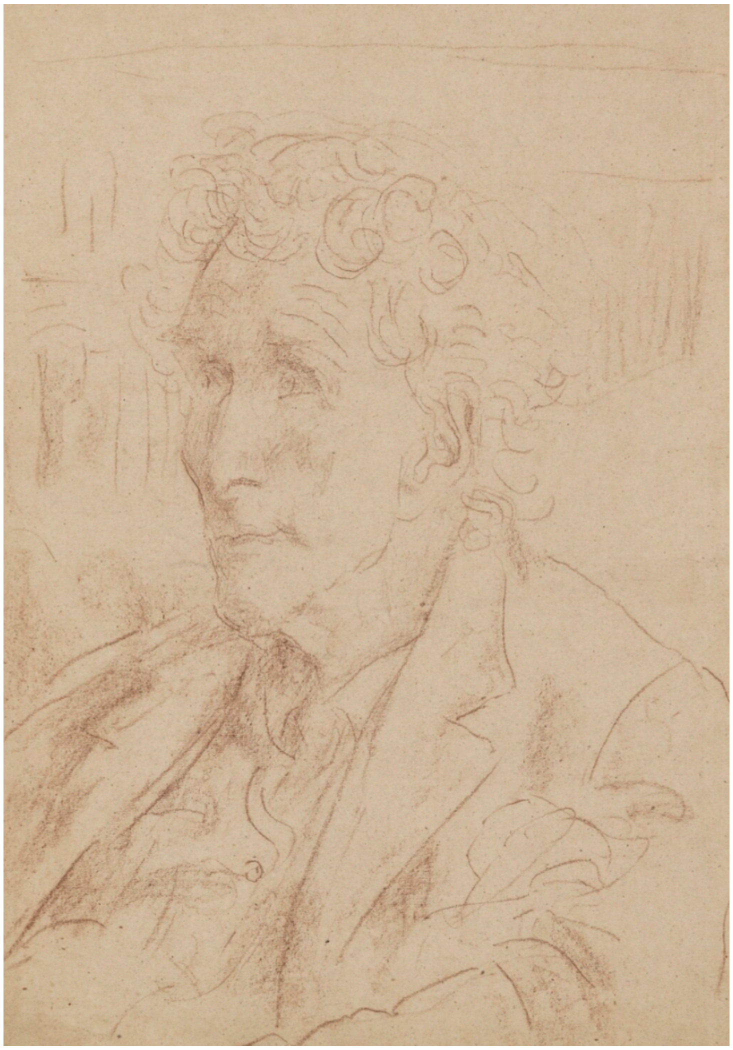
And there, indeed, a new life began for them. None knew them. None dreamed of their identity, none guessed their past. They had no past. They needed no future. Past and future, as they often told each other, were so perforated by the faces, voices, movements, gestures and all the wild and whirling words they had heard at Glint that their present was sometimes in the one and sometimes in the other, and sometimes had swallowed both!

Their saviour, the giant-dwarf, was so pleased with the favour they won in the eyes of his Jewish friend, the boss of the whole show, that it was only in the November of that year, and he had intended to wait till a year had gone by and the anniversary of their arrival had come round, that he presented them with a very special gift. This was nothing less than a black spaniel he had stolen from the Glint research laboratory before Echetus, the manner of dogs, had got to work on it; and it was Tenna herself who chose its name. She decided to call it "Mr. Lordy".

Atlantis (1954)

This novel was first published by Macdonald & Co in London in 1954. The novel was dedicated to Powys' long-time companion, Phyllis Playter, who was not only his romantic partner, but a vital source of intellectual and creative support to him throughout their forty years together. The couple met in 1921 during one of Powys' lecture tours and quickly developed a strong and enduring connection. The major obstacle to their romance was that Powys had been married for twenty-five years to Margaret Lyon, with whom he had a son. He was unable to divorce her due to her Catholic faith. Nevertheless, Powys and Margaret eventually came to an agreement about their marriage and the author lived with Phyllis, while he continued to support his wife financially until her death in 1947.

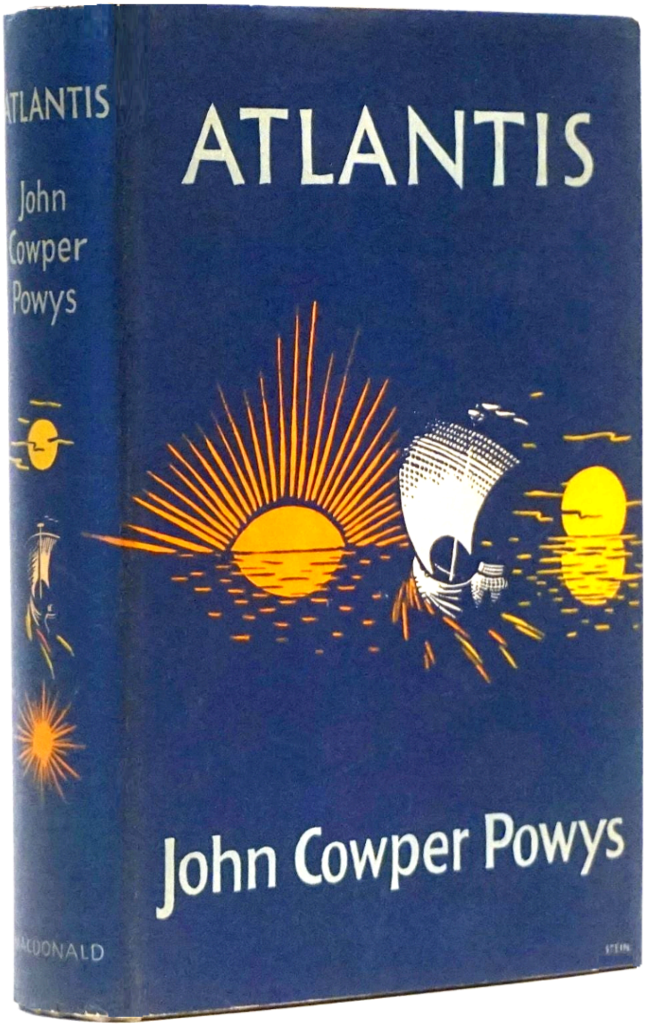
Atlantis is a fantasy novel inspired by stories and characters from Greek mythology. The author described the book 'a long romance about Odysseus in his extreme old age, hoisting sail once more from Ithaca'. The protagonist sets out on another voyage after being abandoned by his former mentor, the goddess Athena, during an uprising of the Titans against their Olympian rulers. Odysseus' journey leads him to the underwater island of Atlantis, submerged beneath the sea, before he eventually arrives in the 'New World' of America. The novel is heavily populated with vivid and peculiar characters and Powys animates the inanimate giving stone pillars and wooden clubs the ability to move and speak.



Chalk portrait of Powys by Augustus John, completed close to the time of publication

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I
CHAPTER II
CHAPTER III
CHAPTER IV
CHAPTER V
CHAPTER VI
CHAPTER VII
CHAPTER VIII
CHAPTER IX
CHAPTER X
CHAPTER XI
CHAPTER XII



ATLANTIS
John Cowper Powys
ATLANTIS
John Cowper Powys
MACDONALD

The first edition

Dedicated to

PHYLLIS PLAYTER

CHAPTER I

THERE HAD BEEN an unusual tension all that Spring night in the air of the arched corridor that led into the royal dwelling. It was a weird, hushed, premonitory tension, the sort of tension that implies a secret foreknowledge shared among a number of so-called inanimate things. It was the sort of tension that strikes human beings as ominous, and from which all sub-human creatures instinctively shrink.

Even when the phantom-light that comes before dawn and is known in the island of Ithaca as “Lykophos” or “wolf-light,” touched with its ghostly greyness that silent portico the tension did not relax. Some chroniclers would no doubt declare that if this palace of the aged Odysseus had been on the mainland, or if Ithaca had been a larger island, the elemental vibration that was bringing this tension would have been less active. This is extremely doubtful. Such chroniclers would be laying too much stress upon the purely physical capacity of the inanimate to convey the shock of far-away outbreaks, and too little stress upon whatever it may be in the composition of any form of matter that partakes, however faintly, of the nature of emotional consciousness.

The corridor which was thus affected that Spring night was a narrow one but it was about eighty feet in length and its arched roof was reached by — it would be incorrect to say “was supported upon” — six huge pillars. These pillars were not of great height, for the arched roof was low; but they were of colossal girth and were by no means identical in appearance.

In fact the first impression any stranger who visited the House of Odysseus received from them was that they had been dragged to this royal entrance by long-forgotten generations of slaves and had belonged to more than one pre-historic temple in the primal age of the Island of Ithaca, an age so fabulously remote that these terrific pillars had probably beheld creatures that were neither gods nor men nor centaurs nor satyrs moving about beneath them.

The entrance to the corridor was from a garden of very ancient olive-trees, at one side of which was the slaves' burying-ground. The stones that supported the entrance-arch were so enormous that they made the porch itself look just what in all probability it was, the mouth of a subterranean river that aeons ago had dried up.

A stranger entering it could make out at once the half-open brazen doors at the end and at most hours could feel the fragrant smoke emerging from beside the throne and floating out down the row of pillars.

The tension at any rate that welcomed that particular dawn had been created, so it was gradually made evident, by some world-upheaval that was nearer human consciousness than the most insidious constituents of these last eddies of wood-smoke that were at that moment being wafted out between those brazen doors from the whitening ashes of the fire by the empty throne, nearer human consciousness than even the sepulchral mist that at this hour was slowly drifting in over the stunted olive-trees from the slaves' burying-ground.

Whatever was the nature of the revolutionary event that was happening or was just going to happen, and however important it may have been or was going to be for human consciousness, one thing can be counted upon as certain: it meant absolutely nothing to the dust of the dead slaves out there in that unhistoric enclosure. What did it mean to those Six Pillars? Now this was a significant question. To dispose of those centuries-old layers of slave-dust not a great deal of nourishing soil had had to be disturbed; but with these Six Pillars it was a different matter.

Odysseus himself, who had known them from childhood, and whose homesick imagination had turned to them again and again under the walls of Troy and in the Nymph-tended gardens of Circe and Calypso, found it impossible even now, as he went out or came in between the polished rondures of their preoccupied surfaces, to imagine them as anything but still erect in their majestic immunity, whatever convulsion at the heart of the island might make the rest of his home a heap of ruins.

But if the aged lord of that place could himself only too easily imagine its final desolation and see in those Six Pillars its only lasting memorial, by what tremors of vibration or currents of magnetism was the appalling tension caused that now filled that corridor?

One of the most startling things in human experience, whether the person be old or young, occurs whenever such a person is left alone for a while with another of its species who is sunk in sleep. It is then that the wakeful one suddenly becomes aware of the chasm that exists, a chasm resembling a crevasse in scoriac rock, between its consciousness and a consciousness like its own that is functioning in a completely different dimension.

There are some who find themselves questioning when they are fully awake, but of course they may have been influenced during their sleep, whether it is true that of all the things in the world the most precious is human consciousness. The champions of human consciousness defend its preciousness on the ground that it is consciousness alone that makes it possible for one living creature to respond to the feelings of another living creature.

Among ourselves however there are so many varieties of consciousness that it would seem as if it ought to be possible for us to relax the thought-pattern of human beings, or perhaps stretch it a little, till we could pass into the consciousness of a fish or a reptile or an insect or even of a plant or a tree.

Indeed if we have known the weird discomfort and strange uneasiness of the isolation of a brain awake lying close to a brain asleep, we have also known the annoying frustration of our complete failure to feel what the inanimate entities around us feel.

In the pre-dawn of the February day that brought this odd tension into the corridor of the palace of Odysseus the human sensibility that was really needed before any adequate solution of the mysterious shock lately received by this portion of the earth's surface could be obtained was the peculiar and special sensibility of a virgin who had never known a man, in other words of an old maid, a sensibility that the mere experience of copulation, whether resulting in pregnancy or not, wholly destroys, a sensibility that is as impossible for a mother as it is for a father.

The only human beings in the corridor at this hour were neither paternal nor maternal, nor were they on the watch. They were both male and they were both asleep. Thus it was left for the last of the six enormous Pillars to give the first articulation to the curious suspense that pulsed from one end to the other of that corridor.

One aspect of this magnetic vibration was naturally outside the Sixth Pillar's field of awareness. We refer to the possibility that being so rocky an isle Ithaca may simply have been the highest peak in an under-sea range of precipitous mountains and that thus, whatever it was that had happened whether of a psychical or of a physical nature, whether an insurrection of Titans or a revolt of Women, the news of it had travelled by way of Ithaca from the extreme East to the extreme West and from the extreme North to the extreme South.

The Sixth Pillar was the one nearest the olive-trees and the slaves' burial-ground outside the porch; and it was the furthest from the throne-room inside the porch. Its difference from the rest lay in the fact that it had been hammered and chipped and scooped and carved by none other than a son of the great craftsman Hephaistos, who was himself the son of Zeus and had been endowed with a peculiar sensitivity much nearer human awareness than anything possessed by the other five. So sensitive indeed was the Sixth Pillar that this particular Spring-night had seemed to it as long as three ordinary nights.

In this mood of nervous apprehension it had been distressingly aware of all the other entities in that corridor. One of these was an extraordinary-looking club from the Nemean forest on the mainland. Another was a still-living olive-stump, not more than a foot high, growing between two flagstones in the centre of the corridor.

A third had a quite different sort of identity and was a small brown moth with a way of flying that sometimes was faint, weak, fluttering, drooping and drifting, and at other times was jerky, violent, desperate, almost suicidal; while the fourth among them was just an ordinary house-fly.

All these had been struggling frantically for five hours of suspense to convey to one another, each with its own private interpretation, their particular version of the terrific shock that was now turning that dawn in the palace of the King of Ithaca into such a shattering experience.

"How extraordinary it is," the Sixth Pillar pondered, as it felt a breath of cooler wind, "that these two human bipeds, this simple Tis and this sly little rogue Nisos, can go on sleeping quietly among us here like a pair of acorn-surfeited swine, when someone or something who has a friend outside is telling us in here what the dawn-goddess has just confirmed, namely that things have begun to happen in our universe that may prove to be the beginning of its end.”

Having uttered these words in a tone that was barely distinguishable from a sad soft air that had just crossed the slaves’ graves, the Sixth Pillar decided that until new revelations should reach it, it would revert to the hieroglyphical if egotistical problem that was dearest of all to its un-roofed heart, namely the mysterious “U” and “H” carved upon its pediment which had been interpreted for generations as meaning “the Son of Hephaistos”.

Further and further into the corridor, implacably moving from pillar to pillar, and throwing a phantom-like chilly greyness over the dark flagstones as she moved, came the dawn-goddess. The one solitary ancient olive-stump that grew inside the corridor near its entrance and thrust forward one crooked bough like a raised hand with fleshless fingers lifted by a long-dead corpse from between the flagstones, could not hinder the dawn’s ashen-pale luminosity from enveloping it but it hardly seemed to be welcoming this pallid illumination.

On the contrary it seemed to be imploring the dawn to approach more slowly so that the awkward nakedness of its reluctant resurrection should not put either of them to shame. Between this corpse-like protuberance from beneath the floor and an enormous fire-blackened club that was propped against the inner side of the low entrance-arch there was now flitting through the grey light a small but alert house-fly.

This small creature seemed as conscious of the unnatural tension as was the over-vigilant Sixth Pillar itself. For though the little fly appeared to be using the resurrected bough solely for the purpose of cleaning its front legs, the visits it paid to the formidable club resting beside the entrance-arch were clearly actuated by a quite different motive.

Obviously what was urging the fly in this case was the necessity it felt of talking to somebody about this tension who had a philosophic mind. But the awakened house-fly was not the only insect in the place who feared, like the Sixth Pillar, that there was some planetary catastrophe imminent, either happening now, or just going to happen.

There was also a very disturbed light-brown moth. This moth seemed for some definite reason of its own to avoid alighting upon the olive-stump; but it also, like the fly, kept paying repeated visits to that Heraklean weapon by the entrance.

It must have been clear to the Sixth Pillar by this time that the dawn-goddess was not going to reveal to them anything beyond what they had all instinctively known, namely that something momentous, something that probably affected them all, had really occurred; otherwise the Pillar would hardly have relapsed into her ancient ponderings about those letters that had been engraved ages ago upon her marmoreal flesh. They must have been engraved there before she had had time to become a conscious, separate, inanimate entity. In fact they must have been engraved when all she felt was what her mother, the earth, felt.

Meanwhile the two human sleepers, lying discreetly apart on their goat-skin mats, one the middle-aged cow-herd, Tis, and the other the princely boy-helper of the household, Nisos, were both vaguely aware, even in their dreams, that psychic disturbing tremors of some sort were troubling that rocky palace and probably that whole rocky island.

What this especially simple cow-herd and what this especially alert princely house-boy would actually do, if, their dreams shaken off, they found themselves conscious, whether they understood its nature or not, of a catastrophic, all-affecting event, remained to be seen. None of their sub-human neighbours, animate or inanimate, not the club, not the olive-stump, not the moth, not the fly, had any doubt about the existence – for they had all learnt it from pleasant and unpleasant personal experience – of a very considerable gulf or gap or lacuna between the feelings, impressions, intimations, instincts, and, above all, reasonings, of all human beings, and their consequent action.

"It all depends, my pretty one," whispered the olive-stump to the house-fly as the latter in its agitation tried to clean its left back leg by brushing it against its gauzy transparent right wing, as it laid its square black head sideways against the smoothest portion of the upspringing shoot, "whether Nisos had a visit from Hierax his pet hawk while both you and I were still fast asleep."

"Why doesn't Pyraust come to ask you things like I do?" whispered the fly to the olive-shoot.

The older creature hesitated a moment. Then he said: "Because, Myos darling, she knows that I know who sends her here."

The fly, who had balanced itself very carefully on its front-legs and had begun to clean both its back-legs with its gauzy wings pressed its huge black head still closer against the skin of the olive-shoot and allowed its unemotional staring black eye to drink up the conversation that was now proceeding between the brown moth and the club of Herakles.

"I suppose you don't want to tell me who sends her?" whispered the house-fly. "I don't mind telling you at all," replied the other, "or anyone else either. It is Enorches, the High-Priest of the Orphic Mysteries who sleeps in the big ante-chamber of Athene's Temple where Telemachos ought to sleep. Instead of which Telemachos sleeps in that hut you pass on the left as you go in."

"Why does the Priest of Orpheus take that big ante-room for himself?" asked the house-fly, standing perfectly still now and staring at the brown moth whose wings were fanning the queer slit that went down the upper portion of the club of Herakles.

“That’s for Athene to answer, little fly,” replied olive-shoot with a curious hissing sound, as if its sap was seething.

“My Lord Telemachos has let himself be wheedled and worked upon by that Orpheus Priest ever since our Lady Penelope died. She would have scarce endured to see it.”

“You’re getting angry,” said the fly to itself. “By Zeus I believe if that Priest Enorches came in now you’d split into two and spurt poison over him.” The olive-shoot was getting angry and it wished it had wings like the fly so that it could accompany the fly to where the club was leaning.

“The Club is surely,” thought the olive-stump, “watching us now while it listens to the chatter of that silly little moth-girl Pyraust.” And the fly said to itself: “How tiresome it is that so many learned and scholarly philosophers have no eye into which you can look and read their thoughts! I’ve seen my own eyes reflected in a hundred different things and I may say without boasting that they are fierce and implacable. But even I can’t read any living creature’s thoughts with them. Now why is that? I can’t even read the thoughts of that silly little moth. Now why is it that I am no good at expressing the stem and majestic authority through my eyes which I feel so powerfully in the pit of my stomach? Isn’t it a funny thing that a person should feel inside him feelings that he can’t express in any possible way to other creatures? As for this poor amphibium of a half-in, half-out olive-shoot, it seems totally devoid of all real insight, it can only see through the inflamed pores of its touchy skin!

“And over there, within a dozen buzzing flaps of my wings, rests that great Club of Herakles as it has done for seventeen years! Yes! as it has done ever since Penelope died. Eurycleia must have seen it for seventeen years balanced between those out-jutting pieces of quartz!

"All those years — think of it! — it has been keeping its position, upright and invincible, leaning first to the right but still upright, still straight and unbending; and then, just a tiny bit, to the left, but still straight and unbending! Aye! How I admire thee, O great Club!"

And the fly went on to think how it would love to throw some charm or spell over the Club that would force it to make known to Odysseus how this cunning Orphic Priest was ousting Telemachos from the great hall of the Temple! It longed to ask the Club how it could refrain from calling upon its former master Herakles, now that it was clear that the old Odysseus was beginning to lose his grip upon the sequence of events.

Thus as strongly moved in its heart as it was in its mind, the fly stared at the archway beside which the Club was resting. Meanwhile the great Club was being slowly aroused from a dim obscure and puzzled sleep by the approach of the dawn-goddess, that tiptoe-footed daughter of Helios Hyperion, whose rosy fingers were still pressed against the palms of her hands.

"So I am still myself," was the first clear thought of the great weapon. "Yes, I am still myself." And it began deliberately recalling that far-off day when Herakles snatched it up from a fire-burnt portion of that Nemean forest on the mainland when he was struggling with the monstrous lion.

The club had been seriously blackened by that fire; but long before the fire had touched it it had been deeply indented by the trailing and twisting around it of a honeysuckle intruder who eventually would have possessed itself of it entirely and have transformed it from a noble pine sapling, half-strangled by a deadly honeysuckle, into a flourishing honeysuckle beautifying a wretched dead pine-trunk already blackened in some forest-fire.

"Still myself," continued the great weapon in its slow confused awakening under the gradual approach of dawn, "still old Dokeesis — who was embraced in that far-off forest by God knows what treacherous neighbour-plant, but who is still able to fit himself as easily into the hand of an older hero as into the hand of a younger hero; Yea! by the gods, and into the hand of a mortal hero as into the hand of an immortal one!"

Pondering thus, the fire-blackened, well-polished club, deeply furrowed into rounded grooves and convoluted curves by the parasitic plant which had so assisted or impeded — who can say which? — its natural growth as to endow it with what resembled a female bosom, found himself recalling his feelings, when, years and years ago, he was washed up by the waves on the coast of Ithaca.

Broken pieces of sea-bitten wreckage from far older vessels than the one upon which the sea-god's wrath had most recently been wreaked were strewn about him on the strip of shore beneath the rocky promontory where he lay. Sand-crusted fragments of sea-shells together with wind-tossed wisps of foam and salt-smelling ribands of slippery seaweed had drifted by pure chance and were piled up by pure chance against the rounded wooden curves of his female-looking bosom.

Just because he was the latest object to be cast up out of the deep upon that shelving shore the club of Herakles had felt in some dark and deep sense humiliated as well as ill-used.

It was curious, he thought, that this ancient feeling of humiliation should return to his consciousness at this particular moment of this February dawn; but as he tried to analyse what he felt, for the club had grown almost morbidly introspective during these long years of peaceful relaxation with his head resting sometimes against a piece of quartz to the East and sometimes against a piece of quartz to the West, he could only repeat over and over with a proud, furtive, sly, secret detachment, “I am myself”, and as he did so he felt detached not only from the service of Odysseus, but also, and this struck him as something quite new in his experience, from the service of his old master, the demi-god Herakles. He had therefore two introspective riddles about himself to ponder on as this cold pale light of this early dawn moved from pillar to pillar. Why should there be any sense of humiliation in his memory of surviving, in the way he had, the wrath of Poseidon?

And why should he be feeling this savagely cunning, ferociously sly sense of detachment from the service of any master, while at the same time he had such a self-confident sensation of power; of power to serve a mortal hero like Odysseus, quite equally with power to serve an immortal one like Herakles?

“Perhaps,” he said to himself, “I have spent so many days and months and years with my head drooping and slipping and sliding and sinking, first to the east and then to the west between these glittering blocks of quartz that when I try to form any clear-cut explanation of my real inner feelings I just swing from the extreme of shame to the extreme of self-confidence.

“But that seems a silly explanation when I think of the pride I felt in throwing my life into every blow I struck for Herakles, and when I think of the shame that shivered through me as I lay, like a swollen and bloated baby’s rattle, half-covered by seaweed, between two rock-pools, and felt the swishing of sea-gulls’ wings brush against my bare cheeks and my bare stump-end.”

But it was at that moment that the awakened consciousness in the club of Herakles decided that common decency as well as common courtesy, not to speak of prudence, demanded that he give some flicker of attention to the small brown moth that for the last half-an-hour, indeed long before any light entered that corridor, had been struggling to tell him things that concerned them all.

"What's that? You imp of Erebos? What's that you're telling me now? Isn't it enough that for more years than I can count I've been listening to you, and listening to your mother's and your grandmother's and your great-grandmother's chatter about this infernal Priest of Orpheus who has ousted every other prophet and seer and soothsayer and omen-reader from the Temple of Athene, that I must now treat you seriously; and begin solemnly answering a whole series of ridiculous questions about the end of the world?

"What's that, you silliest of insects? No, of course I've felt nothing of the kind! Have I felt, do you say, that the world was coming to an end as soon as the sun was up? Of course I've felt nothing of the kind! Don't I feel it now, you ask, this terrible news? No! I certainly don't feel it! I feel the confounded tickling of your tisty-wisty wings against my old life-crack; that crack from outer to inner, I mean, from what's going on to my consciousness of what's going on, that began when He — and if you don't know who He is you'd better get back into your baby chrysalis as soon as you can! — hit that great roaring Beast over the head in that Nemean wood.

"It's ever since then that my hearing's been so good. Curious, isn't it? Shows how wisely old Father Zeus governs the affairs of the world, eh? And so this blasted fool of an Enorches thinks the world's coming to an end does he? He'll soon learn the opposite if that great Son of Zeus whose business it is to purge the world of those who try to bring it to an end comes this way again!"

"Please, please, please, great Club," pleaded the little Pyraust in her most tender tone: "Please believe me when I warn you that there is serious danger ahead for all who fear the gods."

The voice of the club of Herakles shook with wrath. "I tell you, silliest of girl-moths, that this world of ours is founded forever on the will of Zeus the Father of All, he who wields the thunder and lightning, he who kills and makes alive, he who can cast those who refuse to serve him into the lowest depths of Tartaros; and Tartaros, you must remember, O most misled and most infatuated of small moths, is as far below the earth as the earth is below the starry heaven! Think, little whimperer, think, what it must have meant to an enemy of Zeus and of the Olympians when he felt himself falling, falling, falling, falling, even as the monster Typhon must have felt himself falling when, with Etna on the top of him to keep him perpendicular, down, down, down, down he went, down to a place — and don't you forget it, little flutterer with a wren's eye! — that is as far below the kingdom of the dead as that is below the earth!

"Yes, you flipperty-flap of an insect, what you've got to realize is that the Kingdom of the Dead is the Kingdom of Aidoneus; and that Aidoneus is the brother of Zeus and as much under his will as you and I are under his will.

"It is by the will of Zeus, as well as by the help of Queen Persephone, that Aidoneus keeps the ghastly myriads of the dead in control and compels them to submit to their fate. And do you know, you flicker-fan, what their fate is? What yours will be, yours will be, yours will be, if you flap at my crack of quietness, or disturb my groove of wisdom any more!

"But if you ask me, you silly flitter-fluff, what their fate is now, and what yours will soon be, I cannot answer. 'Shadows they are and shadows cover them,' as I heard Herakles muttering once when we brushed the dead leaves from his lion’s skin. Have you forgotten, O grain of sand on a pair of wings, the story of how our old Odysseus called up the Theban Prophet Teiresias from among these shadows?

“And how the Prophet had to drink blood before he could speak? So much for the most intellectual of mortal men when it comes to real knowledge! Drink blood is what they have to do, little brown one, drink blood! Is your precious Priest of Orpheus prepared to do that?”

The wings of the moth-girl emitted a faint susurrating shiver. Then they relaxed and closed above her sunken head. But she was still perched on one of the bosom-curves of the monster-killing Club where she must have looked to any smaller creature, to a thirsty louse for instance, searching for half a drop of sweat from a human hand, like an exhausted sea-mew resting on the crest of a sea-wave.

And her voice filtered down like a distillation of mist into that long and narrow crevasse where dwelt the club’s consciousness.

“Is it true, O immortal one,” she asked — and behold! it was brought about by her very fear of the gods that the voice of Pyraust, the moth-girl, gathered up as she spoke some of the rhythmical lost notes from the wailing of the earth over the rape of Persephone; and thus, while not too faint to be audible to the smallest louse, had in them that which caused even the pine-wood sap in the club of Herakles to stir and rise— “please, please tell me if it is true what I heard the Priest of Orpheus tell the Priestess of Pallas Athene: namely that on the confines of the country of the blameless Ethiopians there have now come back from the Kingdom of the Dead the First Man and the First Woman; and that the First Woman, whose name is Niobe, no longer weeps like a ceaseless torrent from an eternal rock; and that by her side once again is the first man, whose name is Phoroneus and who was the son of a Melian Nymph who came from ah Ash-Grove, even as thou thyself, O immortal one, came from a Pine-Forest."

Now indeed had the moth-girl said the wrong thing! She had been taught from childhood about the Melian Nymphs and about their association with Ash-trees and there had been a family tradition among her own brown-moth ancestors that it had been by the special intercession of one particular Melian Nymph that the original pair of brown-moths had extricated themselves from the hidden parts of the Great Mother.

But what she had never been taught, or, if she had, what she could never keep in her head, was that the effect of every act and every word and every gesture of every living creature depends, not on the nature of what's done, spoken, or indicated, but on the manner of these performances.

And where this impulsive flutterer made her mistake was in speaking so carelessly about Ash-Trees and Pine-Trees that the natural implication was left upon the atmosphere that the only difference between them was that one was the haunt of Nymphs and the other of Lions.

But the savage beast with whose brains the Club of Herakles had sprinkled the pine-needles of the Nemean Wood had never made a more violent sign of fury than the heavy thud with which the Club struck the paving stones of that palace-porch or the harsh groan with which it bade the terrified little flutterer "get back to your Priest of Blasphemy and your Father of Lies!"

Out into the dawn flew in deadly silence Pyraust, the brown moth, while Myos, the black house-fly, spread his gauzy wings and with the tense buzzing sound that always, for all its low pitch, suggested the impetus of a classic messenger, flew in pursuit of her to the Temple of Athene.

It was at this moment that the cow-herd Tis stretched himself with a comfortable groan and rising to his feet lifted up first his bare right leg and then his bare left leg, supporting them against the base of the third pillar, while he fumbled for his sandals. He had been sleeping in his single garment, his shirt-tunic or “chiton”, and he now surveyed his companion, the boy Nisos, who, asleep in a similar garment, though fashioned a little differently as befitted not only his fewer years but his nobler birth, had been so suddenly submerged in sleep that though the cords that bound his sandals to his ankles had been loosened and now trailed over the flag-stones, the sandals themselves remained on his feet.

Tis regarded the sleeping boy with friendly amusement for a moment. Then he shook him gently by the shoulder. “That girl will be down here in a moment,” he said. “In fact I keep thinking I hear her step. Of course neither she nor Leipephile would worry about me if I were like you a son of Naubolos who claims to have more right to be King of Ithaca than Odysseus himself.

“But if I were your elder brother or your uncle that girl Arsinöe would still throw her witch-look on me just the same as she does on you. She hates us all, and not altogether without — God! master Silly-Boy! wake up for Hermes’ sake! Tie your sandal-strings tight!” As he spoke the Cow-herd disentangled the boy’s sandal from the cords of the mattress on which the lad had been sleeping and helped him to get his foot into it.

“Has Babba been making a noise?” enquired Nisos somewhat irritably. “The old lady ought to be ashamed of herself,” he went on, “if she has been raising hell again just because her damned udders are too full. Didn’t I hold on to my bladder when it was nigh to bursting yesterday when mother sent me to the Temple to see Stratonika and I had to wait till her morning chant was finished and she’d put off her garlands and black ribbons in the porch?

“How ridiculously different from one another women are, Tis! Who would ever have imagined that Stratonika was Leipephile’s Sister? It seems just simply crazy to me whenever I think about it. I can't help rather liking Leipephile myself. It's the way she smiles at you when you tease her; as much as to say: "of course, kid, I know perfectly well you're much cleverer than I am; and I'm a bit of an idiot; and I know that the great House of Naubolides is much grander than we Pheresides can ever claim to be; but yet," so her looks seems to say, "you and I, Nisos Naubolides, are born to understand each other. That's what the gods have willed that you and I should understand each other!"

The boy was now engaged in smoothing down his blue-black hair with a small ivory comb which he drew from an interior pocket of his "chiton" and the odd fancy crossed the patient mind of Tis that his own left eye upon which Nisos seemed to have concentrated his gaze had suddenly become a mirror, but a mirror that didn't interfere with his keeping both his own eyes firmly fixed on the boy's face. "It'll be your brother Agelaos she'll soon have to understand, if what Eurycleia told me the other day is true," muttered Tis carelessly.

"O I know all that," cried Nisos; "and Agelaos is as simple as Leipephile! It's Mummy and me who are the clever ones. You should hear us confabulating in the kitchen when she's stewing pears and how I say something about Leipephile and she says something about Agelaos and how we both laugh. Dad has no more idea than Agelaos how mother and me talk about them and what we say and how we laugh; but naturally" — here the boy gave the cow-herd a very searching and very quick look— "naturally it's different between us, Tis. You're the oldest friend I've got; and I'll never have another like you. However! We are what we are, Tis, old partner — you the perfect cow-herd and me Eurycleia's clever little House-help — and if dreams mean anything some very queer happenings are on the wind. Do you know what I was dreaming when you woke me up? No, no! I'll tell you later! There's Babba making that noise again! Don't let's wait here, Tis. I'll come out with you. I've got to see mother anyway before I help Leipephile with the old man's breakfast. So I'll come down the road with you to the Milking-Shed and then I'll go on to Aulion. I'd better run in at Druinos as I pass its gate. My mother and Leipephile's mother tell each other everything! Dad and my brother can't understand how everything they say to each other is known all over the island.

"But what can you expect from two elderly well-to-do mothers with trained servants and children as grown-up as Stratonika and Leipephile on the one hand and my brother Angelaos on the other, and with nothing to do but comment on what other people are doing and saying?

"I call it perfectly natural and right. Why shouldn't our mothers have their little pleasures when they are too old to make love? I don't like these Temple-chanters who blame Nosodea and my mother for exchanging tales about their husbands and children. I know well how stupid Dad and Agelaos are; and we all know what a funny old customer Damnos Pheresides is! who in the name of Aidoneus can say what goes on in that queer-shaped head?

"If I were Leipephile's mother I should certainly want to talk to somebody about my husband." The shrill boyish voice of Nisos Naubolides drifted away between the olive-trees till it was lost among the slaves' graves. Very soon both that youthful voice and the cow-herd's hoarse responses to it were lost in Babba's call to be milked.

Even the Sixth Pillar, whose unusual consciousness had been at once fortified and dulled by its bewildered ponderings upon those two deeply-engraved letters, that "U" and that "H", which had in the early times appeared on its base, could no longer hear a sound.

Little big-eyed Myos the house-fly, was gone; indeed he was at this moment waylaying in the porch of Athene's Temple in defiance of the Priest of Orpheus his pathetically frail acquaintance Pyraust, the brown moth. Thus the most intelligent consciousness left just then in the Porch of the Palace — for the five younger Pillars were even more lacking in response to anything outside their own substance than their venerable comrade the Sixth Pillar who at least had kept up an interest in the letters "U" and "H" for a few thousand years — was the half-burnt pine-wood Club of Herakles, whose heavy head and almost feminine bosom as they rested between those fragments of quartz while the movements of the man and boy were still causing vibrations through the substance of the flagstone, lost no opportunity of swaying consequentially, and pontifically, first to one side and then to the other of their narrow enclosure.

It was indeed with almost a sacerdotal alternation between east and west or left and right, and with a quaint blend of judicial finality and suspended fatalism, that the Club of Herakles acted the part of Guardian of the Gate that early Spring morning.

Thus it was with a shrewdly expectant acceptance of the worst rather than a mischievous enjoyment of what was happening at the moment that the Club listened to a light step descending the unseen stairs to the door behind the throne and watched the stealthy opening of this same door and the emergence therefrom of a plaintively wistful middle-aged woman who looked as if she would have more willingly reconciled herself to welcoming the last dawn that would ever reach this earth than the particular one which was now removing the kindly veil of darkness from the repetitive horror of life.

The Pillars in the corridor were by no means evenly placed. They were indeed so divergently and so erratically arranged that they resembled the sort of massive supports that might have been found in the crypt of some sea-king's palace beneath the floor of the ocean, the building of which had been disturbed by the movement of sea-monsters.

The expression in the woman's face as she made her way from the inner door to the entrance was only too familiar to all the dwellers in that house. It was indeed the expression of such an enduring quarrel with existence that there was not one among them who would not — whatever words he or she might utter with their lips — breathe a sigh of gratitude to the gods on her behalf if they heard of her death. “The poor thing has gone whither she longed to go!” would have been the instinctive feeling of them all.

As the woman now threaded her way to the entrance she glanced apprehensively at every pillar she encountered; and in the case of the second one and the fourth one she slipped cautiously round them, as if to make sure that nobody was watching her. She wore the sort of robe or “peplos” that by means of the way a certain fold was draped over the curve of one of her breasts left room for a secret pocket at that particular place where a pair of scissors, or a knife, or a dagger, could be quite comfortably and easily concealed.

What this forlorn creature carried hidden in the fold of her foreign-looking garment on this eventful morning was as a matter of fact known to none, not even to the Club of Herakles. It was a carefully sharpened carving-tool of the sort used by wood-carvers. But what increased the self-conscious caution of this secretive woman's movements was the awkward bundle she carried in her bare arms wrapped in a linen cloth.

Whatever this object may have been it agitated the forest nerves of the once root-inspired club; for the club was naturally, since its flesh was made of wood, hostile to every metallic object and it recognized at once that whatever the girl was carrying it was something made of bronze. Bronze or not bronze the woman kept pressing it tightly to the pit of her stomach, while every now and then she gave a sharp jerk with her bare shoulder when that carving-tool in the fold of her robe scraped against her soft skin through its covering.

Safely past the great club, whose judicial watchfulness changed to angry perturbation as it felt her passing, Arsinöe, the Trojan, whose father was Hector, and her mother a sister of that Dolon who had been slaughtered so unmercifully by Diomed so that his weapons and all he wore might be offered up by Odysseus as a pious offering to Athene, found herself among the graves of the slaves and among the olive-trees that bordered on the graves.

Safely past both graves and olives, and clearly keeping a definite purpose in her tense brain the Trojan captive directed her steps to an uncultivated tract of wild country, about a mile square, which was avoided by all the people of Ithaca.

This particular expanse of ground was unploughed and unsown; nor was it planted with fruit-bearing trees or with nut-bearing trees or with any grain or any flowers. A few very ancient oaks and ash-trees and poplars had grown there for ages and there were several reedy swamps where the mud had a brackish smell though the sea was more than a mile away and where there were strangely-stalked mosses that looked as if they had grown there along with antediluvian marsh-lichens which had been the food of creatures so monstrous that the mind shrinks from picturing them.

At any rate the natives of Ithaca had for unchronicled generations avoided this particular square mile. It had come to be known as Rima or Arima, though these musical syllables had no known connection with the mysterious tribe of a similar-sounding name to which reference is made in certain ancient poems; and it was avoided for a very definite and particular reason. It had, as a matter of fact, become the “Temenos”, or consecrated shrine, of two fearful Beings who must have been worshipped as Deities in Ithaca long before the Golden Age of Kronos, and long before any dweller in the island had so much as heard of Zeus and his thunderbolts.

Not only was this weird expanse of haunted ground the “Temenos” or dedicated shrine of these two strange Beings, but it was the immemorial stage of an unending argument between them, a sort of phantom-ritual, not between two worshippers but between two objects of worship. They were both female Deities and what must have been in pre-historic days their unqualified hideousness had been blurred and clouded, and, if such a word can be used, be-ghosted, by the passing of time, as the most horribly shaped rocks can be overgrown by congenial funguses.

One was Eurybia, whose name means “far-flung force”; and the other was Echidna whose name simply means “the Serpent”. Eurybia was the grandmother of Hecate; while Echidna was the mother of the Chimera and of the Hydra and of Cerberus, and also of the Lion of Nemea, not so very long since destroyed in its savage old age by the introspective Club of Herakles, whose repose between his two quartz pillows had been disturbed only an hour ago by this tragic captive concerned with nothing but her carving-tool and the mysterious bronze object wrapped so carefully in its linen cloth.

The shrine of the Grandmother of Hecate was on the lower level of this mile of unfertile land. Indeed it overlooked the most frightening portion of the haunted swamp where any imaginative intruder might well fancy that he caught shadows and reflections in the black water and among the swaying reeds of hovering ghosts that had drifted down the ages from an epoch in which mortal men by day as well as by night had to struggle with creatures whose limbs were not only deathly cold but had a saurian effluvium from centuries of reptilian life in salt-marshes, where terraqueous abortions of both sexes embraced and devoured one another. The shrine of the Mother of the Chimera was in a different position, although there was only a quarter of a mile between them.

This portion of that "holy ground" stood under a tall black rock of some primeval adamantine stone, at once much smoother and much darker than all the other geological strata in Ithaca. In substance as well as in appearance the "eidolon" of Echidna was completely different from the image of Eurybia. Neither of them possessed a realistic human shape, but each was a misty phantom, associated with a material and movable object. At close quarters Eurybia was nothing but a thick wooden stump; while Echidna "the Serpent" was a short but very massive pillar of clearly articulated white stones, each one of which contained, embedded in the texture of its substance, a noticeable array of fossils, many of which, though by no means all of them, had originally been shell-fish.

Above and around each of these two Images or Idols there swayed and wavered and hovered and moved and shook, sometimes growing thicker and sometimes lighter, a tremulous body of palpable vapour unmistakably resembling a female human shape. Both shapes not only grew darker and lighter, thicker and thinner according to the occasion but they also contracted and expanded in actual size.

There was, however, one very curious thing about them. The mist that composed them was entirely impervious to the wildest winds. The wind might flow from North, South, East or West, and blow so softly that it would scarcely stir a feather, or so violently that it would rock the pinnacles of a mountain or upheave the roots of a deep-grown forest: in neither case was its presence so much as visible, however closely you watched, by any effect it had upon these two superhuman phantoms of mist. They exchanged human speech in the language common to both Achaeans and Trojans; speech that could be heard and understood by any native of that island who entered this unconsecrated, this unholy, this unwalled, unguarded, undefended, unassailable tract of demonic ground.

Yes, any reckless child, any rebellious prowler, any philosophical tramp, any desperate bandit, any life-weary beggar, any obsessed youth in pursuit of his ideal vision, could cross at will the boundary of this weird spot. Especially could any daring novice in religion, anxious to obtain supernatural support for his own particular interpretation of the Mysteries of Orpheus or of the Mysteries of Eleusis come stealthily and humbly to a smooth lawn equidistant between these two Beings, or between the wavering pillars of vapour that represented them, and, as he listened to the wind-impervious, storm-immune, rain-indifferent, unbridled and unholy dialogue between them, either be upheld in his special vein of mystical revelation about the secrets of the cosmos or be driven in a wild reaction against every spiritual cult in the civilised world to the desperate madness of parricide or matricide or to some astounding incest or bestiality or perhaps even some unheard-of attempt to side-track or undermine the very fountain-spring of human sexual life and to pervert the unmistakable intentions of nature.

But the absorbed intensity of the daughter of Hector, whose uncle Dolon was the son of Eumedes of Troy, was as unaffected by this undying dialogue of the dead as was the carving-tool she carried in that special fold of her garment which was the mark of the highest-born maidens of Ilium. She went straight into the centre of a grove of Ash-Trees, or Meliai, just as if she herself had been one of those Melian Nymphs born of the Great Mother at the first separation of Heaven from Earth, a grove of trees that grew on the eastern margin of the smooth lawn of delicate grass that lay midway between those two demonic pillars of cloud. Had Tis the cow-herd and Nisos the princely young house-help been following her at this moment they would certainly have stopped in horrified amazement at what they saw.

Both of them knew well as indeed did all the retainers of the royal House of Odysseus that the long-cherished divinely sacred arms of Achilles had been kept in the treasure-crypt beneath the palace ever since by the influence of the goddess Athene over merchant-sailors, they had reached Odysseus’ island home.

Whether voyaging eastward or voyaging westward, they had been brought safe to Ithaca five years after his own miraculous return. But who would have believed that Arsinöe, the youngest niece of Dolon the Trojan spy, could have carried the divine art of carving to such a pitch that she could carve an Ash-Tree, devoid of branches though it was and standing erect in its death, into the actual shape and form, as he was when he lived, of Hector, son of Priam, husband of Andromache, defender of Ilium?

And where and how could the girl have learnt such a god-given gift? Had she strayed as a child, while following the chorus of the maidens of Troy in their Orphic worship and received secret lessons from some outlawed offspring of Hephaistos, the son of Zeus? But learn the great art to some purpose she had, and this grand figure of Hector himself, standing tall and stately in the heart of this Melian Grove, was the result.

And now upon this noble image, carved though it was in perishable wood rather than in immemorial marble, this sad, lost, helpless Trojan maid had hung all those Hephaestian fragments of divine workmanship upon which the rising sun was already beginning to pour its pure blood-sprinkled gold. Holding it high with both her hands, as if it were a goblet of the very nectar of the Olympians, Arsinöe now disentangled the horse-hair-nodding helmet from its covering of white linen and placed it on the Trojan hero’s majestically moulded head.

Then at last carefully removing her carving-tool from that proud fold in her garment that marked her as having been a privileged attendant at Priam’s Court, the Trojan girl set to work to suggest by a series of delicate scoopings and indentations the precise appearance of Hector’s forehead — so un-Hellenic in its curious curves but so pitiably well-known to every dweller in Ilium — as its outlines, partly concealed and partly emphasized by the horse-hair helmet, emerged as if newly created to greet the glory of the sun’s first rays which now pierced with a long stream of golden light that little group of ancient ash-trees.

The moment she had completed her final touches to the dead, whose figure was now entirely accoutred in the divine armour of Achilles, which, piece by golden piece, save only the world-renowned shield which had never reached Ithaca, she had brought from the palace to that ash-grove, at first doing this month by month, and later week by week, as her purpose in its prosperous secrecy gathered momentum, she wrapped the linen cloth about her carving-tool and without giving her finished work any final glance turned to retrace her steps.

Her face as she turned to go re-assumed that look of Cimmerian hopelessness which had never left it since the day when her companions who had been pointed out so implacably, one by one, by Eurycleia, as the girls who had given their maiden-heads to the Suitors, had met their death by hanging— “no clean death for such” Telemachus had declared with all a young man’s righteous ferocity — and no graving-tool were it as powerful as the talons of the Erinyes themselves could have done for a human face what that event once for all had done, long ago as it was now, to the face of the youngest niece of Dolon.

But no sooner had she commenced her retreat over that square mile of mystery called “Arima”, the boundary of which, as all the natives of Ithaca knew, Odysseus in his old age never cared to cross, than she was aware of a new sound, a sound entirely distinct from the wild and hoarse dialogue between those two pillars of cloud, to which she paid no more attention, perhaps less, than did the frogs in that haunted swamp.

But the sound she heard now was completely unusual and very startling in that ghostly place. It was the unmistakable cry of a wounded bird. She heard it long before the bird itself fell miserably to the ground at her feet and lay there helplessly fluttering. Quickly she bent down, seized it, and pressed it to her breast. This she did with no change of expression and with the same unmoved, unsmiling, unhappy, inscrutably fixed look.

But she knew what had happened, and she knew what bird this was; none other in fact than Heirax the Hawk, the messenger-friend of Nisos, the princely House-Helper. Heirax had been wounded in the air, either by an attack from some other bird, or by an arrow from a human bow, just as he was reaching the cliffs of Ithaca, and for the last few minutes he had been desperately flying forward in hectic jerks and feverish swoops, with the frantic hope of reaching the palace and of delivering to her friend Nisos the tremendous news he carried before loss of blood brought him down.

But his fatal day, or, as any native of the island would have put it, his predestined “Keer” had come. He felt himself falling, and impelled by the natural instinct of all dying creatures to seek a hiding-place, he deliberately swerved so as to fall in “Arima”. It was only when quite close to the ground that he realized that he was destined to fall at the feet of the one single person belonging to the palace who was no friend of his friend Nisos. Leipephile was his best girl-friend and in his thoughts Heirax always pronounced that simple creature’s name as if it had been Leip-filly; thus totally avoiding the proper stress with Its accent on the “peph” that flippant second syllable.

Heirax’s pronunciation made the name more dignified as well as more appealing, though the sound of the word thus uttered would have made Agelaos, the girl’s betrothed, want to treat him as alas! the hawk was going to be treated now.

Not for nothing had the Trojan girl always stayed awake while the rest of them, including the king’s old nurse, nodded in weariness under the eternal divagations of their “much-enduring” lord. “Tell me, Heirax,” whispered Arsinöe now: “what your news is and I will swear by any oath you choose that I will tell it to Nisos. If you tell me, I will carry you back to the palace where they have drugs that will strengthen your spirit, and ointments that will stop the blood, and potions that will heal the pain. But if you will not tell me …” And she pressed her knuckles against the bird’s throat.

And Heirax the hawk said to himself: “It matters nothing whether I tell or refuse to tell. The news is bound to spread anyway. The only loss will be to Nisos and me. I shall lose the pleasure of telling him and he will lose the pleasure of being told by me.” He shifted his position slightly against her left breast and opening his beak made the sounds that Nisos had taught him.

Nisos had been a good teacher for a Hawk, especially for one born on a small island and accustomed to rocks and shores and sands and caves and curving waves and tossing wisps of foam. So his words were clear as to their meaning; though they were ungrammatical and disconnected in their utterance.

“Zeus,” he whistled — and at each sound drops of blood oozed from the wound in his side— “thunder lost …

peak of Gargaros …

… alone … Hera on Olympos …

… alone …
Trojans rebuilding Troy in Italy …
… Rome … Seven Hills … Tartaros
broken loose …
Niobe weeps no more …
… Chaos comes back …
Persephone
… leaves Aidoneus …
Prometheus escapes …
… Cheiron free …
Helios conquers
Apollo …
… Atlas no longer
… the sky …
the Mysteries … blown far and wide …
… Typhon free …”

Here there was a long pause; and in the interval the Trojan girl could hear the hoarse voices of those two Pillars of Cloud raised in an absorbed argument with each other. Eurybia was maintaining that what had happened was the overthrow of the Olympians by the Titans while Echidna was arguing that what was convulsing time and rocking space, and upheaving the Abyss till it was tilted as high as the Zodiacal Signs, was nothing more or less than the victory of the Eternal Feminine whether divine or human or diabolic or angelic or bestial or saurian or reptilian or earthly or aquatic or ethereal or fiery, over the male.

Then Heirax whistled: “Take me to Nisos or leave me to die in Arima!” Ever since she had heard the Hawk’s astounding news an absolute change had approached Arsinöe’s tragic face. It had not taken possession of it. It had only come near it. But it had come so near it that from now on to the end of her days at uneven intervals and for uncertain reasons there began to burst forth or rend forth or tear forth, or jet forth, or explode forth, a flame of exultation so formidable that anyone might have imagined that some fiery particle of the lost lightning of Zeus had by some mad chance got entangled in her hair giving to this already dangerous emotion of hers a supernatural power.

“And now I beseech you,” Heirax implored her, opening and shutting his beak with a queer, shrill, scraping sound, “take me to …” But it was out of a dead throat that the name “Nisos” dissolved in the air; for without a word the girl had wrung the bird’s neck.

But Heirax did have, for all his sudden end, a sort of tributary memorial set up in the scoriac floor of the Trojan girl’s memory; for whenever afterwards she recalled her exultation at the image of Zeus robbed of his aerial weapons and compelled to look down from one of those peaks in Ida, so officially familiar to him as the divine Umpire, and to hear news therefrom, without the power to interfere, of the rising of a new Troy on those Seven Italian Hills, she always felt herself lightly toying, as in her heart she derided the Fathers of Gods and Men, with the swaying neck and dangling head of that small enemy of Ilium, so limp in her hands.

But she didn’t toss that lump of blood-wet feathers either into Eurybia’s swamp or Echidna’s slaughter-cave. She carried it back to the feet of her tree-carved image of Hector and there as she curled it up, claws against beak and wings against belly, she murmured to it aloud: “I don’t fancy the worms of Arima will bother with you: but you’ll be eaten for all that! In this little matter, the friends of great Hector and the enemies of great Hector are the same. Eaten of worms are we all when we come to it: but at least we give birth to our own worms and are devoured by what we ourselves have engendered.” It may have been that some dim little-girl memory of the funeral-rites of the man whose horse-hair-crest above the armour of Achilles seemed just then to stir in reciprocity, came into her mind at that moment; for as she stared at the bird on the ground and thought of the Son of Kronos on his Thunderless peak her triumphant mood relaxed a little. At any rate it relaxed enough to enable her to hear a thin little reedy voice like an infant’s pipe played in a subterranean gallery.

“Aren’t you ashamed,” piped that thin voice, “to talk so loud that a person can’t hear Echidna’s answer to Eurybia? Is it nothing to you what has caused this terrible Pandemonium that is shaking the bowels of the universe, cracking the kernel of the cosmos, splitting the fundament of the crustaceous globe and disturbing every civilized and scholarly and sophisticated and weaponless worm who dwells below the vulgar and brutal surface of this blood-stained and desecrated earth?”

As Trojan maids, whether young or old, were addicted to become when crossed in any personal quest, Arsinöe became rude. “And who may you be?” she enquired.

“I happen to be,” replied the unruffled worm, “what below the surface of the earth we call a philosopher. I pursue the purpose of all true philosophy which is to live happily without helmet or breast-plate or greaves or shield or sword or spear or claws or teeth or sting or poison. But the human race refuses to let us stay quietly underground. It digs us up. It impales us on fish-hooks.

“And this invasion of our right as individual souls to pursue truth in our own fashion began early in the history of this planet and is not confined to the cruel race of men. As serpents practise it upon toads, so do toads upon us. Contemptible little birds swallow us whole and we perish in their loathsome little stomachs.

“Primeval saurians from the aboriginal swamps delight in swallowing us and love to feel us wriggling to death in the fearful stench of their foul entrails. Are you not ashamed to bring your blood-shedding absurdities, your ridiculous feuds, your childish armour, and your murderous weapons into Arima, so that a person cannot even hear the drift of the metaphysical argument between Eurybia and Echidna and hearing it judge calmly for himself whether what is happening is the long-expected revolt, so welcome to us worms, of women against men, or is a revival of the ancient struggle between Kronos of the Golden Age and his ‘Peace to all Beings’ and the reign of these accursed Olympians with their infantile motto: ‘The Devil take the Hindmost?’ Are you not ashamed of yourself, you carver of dead trees?’ Arsinöe touched carelessly with the tip of her right sandal Heirax’s squeezed-up corpse that had the appearance, after the way she had handled it, of a feathered tortoise.

“Is it permitted,” she enquired sarcastically, “to a humble carver of images who has not yet learnt that the earth belongs to those beneath it, to ask the name of the person who is addressing me?”

“I am the Worm of—” But the mysterious syllables “Arima” never reached her ears from the uplifted point of soft-wrinkled redness emerging from its crumpled collars of pink skin that diminished in tapering elasticity till they reached that prehensile projection: for she was off at a pace that was almost a run. “I must just go and see,” she told herself, “what that little devil Nisos is up to now.”

As she hurried away she took care to adjust the “Palace-of-Priam” fold neatly against her breast with the carving-tool wrapped tightly in the linen cloth she had used for the helmet. Not for one second had it occurred to her that, exquisitely as she had caught the curves of her hero’s skull, the way she had armed him would certainly have made Hector’s brother, the wanton

Paris, smile; for that Trojan helmet by no means went well with the armour of Achilles while the absence of the famous Hephaistian shield hindered the separate pieces of the golden armour from producing their proper cumulative effect.

“Have you got a mug or a cup of any kind with you, Tis?” she asked boldly as she passed the open door of the shed where Babba’s large, warm-blooded black-and-white body was being milked. “Come in, lady! Come in lady! Certainly I’ve got the best possible cup here for a beautiful maid like thy precious self!”

Thus speaking, and squeezing the final drop of milk from Babba’s depleted udder, Tis gave the cow a friendly slap, followed by a vigorous propulsion towards the hay at the head of her stall, and without further delay proceeded to dip into the brimming pail between his knees a great battered silver ladle, which, as his only valuable possession in the world, he kept hidden in a secret place in that ramshackle shed.

“Here ye be, lady,” he chuckled, “‘Tain’t every day old Tis has a fair lass to entertain in’s own banquet-hall! ’Tisn’t wine, as dost know of thyself, being as ye too, like Babba, must suckle offspring when the man and the hour be come; and it aint spiced with nard or thicked out with Pramnian cheese. But right good milk it be, warm from Babba’s teats and properer for a maid like thee than any of the rosy!”

The Herdsman went on with his quaint compliments long after the Trojan captive had possessed herself of the ladle’s gleaming handle and taken a satisfying sip of its warm contents. When she had restored to its owner the one and only heir-loom in his family except their name, for Tis’s Father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, who all worked on their own farm at the other end of the island, were never known as anything but Daddy Tis, Grand-Pa Tis, and Old Tis, she begged this middle-aged youngest and simplest of the Tisses to tell her if he knew whether Nisos Naubolides had gone back to the palace.

Without the faintest hesitation — for what did this middle-aged youngest of the Tisses know about cosmogonic upheavals and Trojan second-births? — the herdsman informed her that the young princeling of the great House of Naubolides hadn't yet returned from visiting Aulion his ancestral home. "He said something," continued the innocent herdsman, "about running in to Druinos on his way back. My lady Pandea," he said, "loves a gossip with my lady Nosodea."

"But Master Tis," protested the Trojan girl, aware that there was an obscure shadow wavering across the path she was now travelling though keeping well out of her immediate reach and as unable to shake her new secret triumph as it would have been to touch the adamantine unhappiness of her former mood, "how do you explain this business of the Priest of Orpheus being able—"

But the girl stopped short. What was the use of trying to make a man like this see what she could or couldn't understand among the confused doings of these infernal Achaians? "One thing's clear," her thoughts ran on: "Telemachos was, is, and ever will be my most dangerous enemy here. He is a priest in Athene's temple; and suppose he heard rumours that I'd been seen at work in that grove of Ash-Trees within the confines of Arima, he might come himself and get hold of me, independently altogether of Odysseus, and treat me exactly in the same cruel way he treated those others at the killing of the Suitors."

The lonely Trojan woman stood like a statue between Tis, who was now wiping his silver ladle with fresh-plucked moss and Babba who was switching her tail in growing impatience to be out, in the sunshine, cropping grass. The girl's eyes were fixed upon empty space, while before a secret judgment-seat in her hidden soul each of the island-leaders connected with the Palace or the Temple appeared one by one.

She thought of the great statue of Themis, daughter of heaven and earth, and sister of Okeanos, which stood at the foot of the grassy slope leading up to the porch of the Temple. This goddess of humane Law and Order, and of the righteous customs and traditions of mankind, had been worshipped in Ilium as devoutly as she was worshipped here; and Arsinöe's chief links between her youthful happiness and her mature servitude were the many gods of Hellas that were worshipped by both races.

Once or twice when the moon was full she had even slipped out of the palace-porch, and stealing down to the Temple barefooted, so that no grass-stain on her sandals, or gossamer-seed caught in the knots of the threads that fastened them, would betray her daring to the sharp eyes of old Eurycleia, had gone so far as to pay a visit to the stone image of this Goddess of divided mankind and to kiss the earth at its base.

Of the parents of the two brothers Agelaos and Nisos whose names were Pandea and Krateros, she had always preferred Krateros; not only because as the head of the Naubolos family he was the ancestral rival of Odysseus and Telemachos but because his appearance always struck her as un-Hellenic and even a little Phoenician. Nosodea, the mother of the Priestess Stratonika and of Eurycleia's Maid, Leipephile, who was the betrothed of Agelaos, she disliked most of all, more even than the King's old nurse, Eurycleia herself, whose caprices she had to obey.

Exactly why she so hated Nosodea she felt now, as she mentally caused the woman to be dragged before her judgment-seat, that she could not quite make clear even to herself. "She's such a regular woman!" she found herself repeating; but she knew she was packing into the word "regular" several qualities that were by no means exclusively feminine.

Nosodea’s husband, the father of the two girls, was a good deal older than his wife and was something of an enigma to the whole island. The adjective “geraios” meaning “old” was invariably added to his name by the whole neighbourhood; which in itself suggested, Arsinöe could not help thinking, that everybody felt the man to be different in some curious way from all his contemporaries.

And the odd thing was, the Trojan girl now told herself, while Babba fidgetted more and more irritably and Tis watched her with the expression with which when slaughtering an animal he waited for it to fall stunned after giving it a blow between the eyes, the odd thing was that for some inscrutable reason which completely baffled her she felt there was something in common between herself and Damnos Geraios and that if she could only get hold of the man when Nosodea was well out of the way she could form an alliance with him not only against his wife and two daughters but against the whole world!

“Well!” she sighed, almost as if she would have liked to spend the whole day thinking of all these people from the new background of her feelings, “I must be off, Master Tis! Thank you a thousand times for the milk!”

But it was at that moment that the Trojan woman received a startling shock. The herdsman suddenly lifted his muscular body from the tree-root that had been serving him as a milking-stool. He did not raise it to its full height, which at its best was nothing beyond a man’s medium stature, but he raised it sufficiently to make it resemble a quadruped swaying about on its hind legs. He still held the silver ladle; and as if to assist himself in an agitating process of confused and difficult thought he grasped it tightly at both ends and drew it angrily up and down across his forehead like a glittering rod across a sullen and silent musical instrument.

While absorbed in this process he kept repeating in a series of harsh cries the words: “Lady! lady, lady! The dream! The dream! The dream!”

Arsinöe experienced a spasm of such nervous irritation at this impediment to her already over-delayed departure that it was with an effort she suppressed the impulse to leave the man to his fit, or whatever it was, that was now doubling him up, and just hurry off. But impulsive selfishness was as foreign to Arsinöe’s introspective nature as was impulsive geniality.

“What dream are you talking about Master Tis? You really oughtn’t to give people such shocks. You quite scared me, jumping up so suddenly like that. Can’t you tell a person quietly, Master Tis, what’s come over you?”

But Tis continued to totter like a quadruped on its hind-legs; while, though holding it with only one hand now, he scraped his forehead with the ladle.

But it was at this moment that Babba, drawn into the situation by an obscure feeling that her friend and protector was being unfairly scolded, and also, by a less obscure desire to be led where she could find juicier and more sap-filled nourishment than the dry hay which at present bristled with so many sharp stalks over the edge of her wooden bin, shuffled back to Tis’s side and pressed her cold nose against the log from which he had just risen.

This instinctive bovine movement combined with the tone of rebuke in Arsinöe’s voice brought Tis to himself and he began hurriedly to explain. “You see, lady,” he almost blubbered, “great-grand-dad’s, bit of land at the blasted end of this here rock of beggars and bastards was called, in them blessed days of old, after, if ye understand me, the home-stead of Aulion of the Naubolides and also after the home-stead of Druinos of the Pheresides; and we was taught by grand-dad, whose old dad taught he, that on the day when Aulion and Druinos, our poor old bit of rock-dust and grass-root being called, thee must understand, by the name of Auliodruinos came under one hand, that one hand would bring down forever, break-up and bust-up, for good and all, you understand the House of Odysseus! And it just then came into me head that last night I dreamed that Grand-Dad was once again talking to us same as ‘un used to talk about this final confirmation and arbitration of They Above.”

At this point Tis stopped, and a look of abysmal satisfaction overspread his countenance. It was already familiar to the captive from Ilium that the use of long-drawn-out proclamatory expressions such as “confirmation” and “arbitration” was in itself comforting to the agora-loving inhabitants of Hellas; so now that she saw that look on the herdsman’s face she lost entirely her humanely feminine scruples about leaving this incredible simpleton alone with Babba. It was clear they understood each other. It was indeed not inconceivable that Babba herself derived vague images of rich green grass from words that sounded so rhetorically satisfying as “confirmation” and “arbitration”.

With her pride in the news that the unburied Heirax had brought quite unimpaired, therefore, by any twinges of a humanely feminine conscience, the Trojan girl, with one of the rare smiles that few in Ithaca had ever seen on her face, indicated to times during that disturbed February night, whileTis that it was time for him to think less about his grandfather and more about his job. She was not greatly worried at being so late; for she felt pretty sure, such were her own secret good spirits, that the king’s aged nurse would be too conscious of calamity on the wind to take her delay as more than a ripple of annoyance following a rolling wave of menacing premonition.

CHAPTER II

FOUR TIMES DURING that disturbed February night, while the atmosphere in the palace-corridor grew tenser and tenser, and the Herculean club between its quartz-props grew more and more surly, and the fly Myos and the moth Pyraust were working themselves up to a fever of agitation, did the lonely old monarch rise from his bed and look out of his two windows. One of these faced due West, that is to say towards the opposite quarter of the sky from the one upon which the corridor of the six pillars opened. The other window of the king's bedroom faced due North.

It was the middle of night when he got out of bed for the fourth time; and this time he heard a certain thin, frail, feminine voice uttering a quavering, rasping, high-pitched appeal from the ancient oak opposite his window. This was a hollow oak-tree not only familiar to his own boyhood, but equally familiar to the boyhood of Laertes his father; and it was the abode or what almost might be called the second self of a Dryad.

His encounters with this ancient Oak-Sister had been rarer since his marriage. They had been interrupted of course by the Trojan war and his capture by Circe and Calypso, and had been only intermittently resumed since his wife had followed his parents into the shades and his son Telemachos had turned into a reserved, self-centred, philosophy-absorbed priest, serving Athene indeed, but serving her in a very different manner from the way he served her himself.

The voice he heard now as he leaned out of the window which looked due North was consequently not only a little querulous but a little injured. He was wearing his usual night-blanket or "claina" which save on the hottest nights he kept buckled round him by his broad body-belt or “zosteer”; so it wasn’t from chilliness that the Dryad’s voice struck him as having in its tone something so disturbing that it went beyond querulousness or hurt feelings. Laertes, his father, who had often talked to her out of this same window, used to call her by her name; a name she had received from a patroness of hers, one of the less well-known Graces, a Spartan Grace named Kleta, or “the one called for in time of need”.

The Dryad Kleta was indeed a touchy, highly-strung, super-sensitive Nymph, whose chief pleasure was in what she persisted in calling her “garden”: and if you wanted to bring down her anger upon you you had only to meddle with this obsession of hers. Kleta’s garden in reality was simply and solely a wild strip of uncultivated woodland, not as rocky or swampy as the haunted “Arima”, but, like it, belonging to no individual owner, and extending as far as the crest of an up-land ridge from which the wooded peak of the mountain known as Neriton was visible as well as the high rock above that Naiad’s cave where on his return to slay the suitors Odysseus had been helped by Athene herself to hide his Phaiakian treasure.

The oak-tree from which this disturbing appeal reached him through the thick darkness was not only large enough and hollow enough to hide three or four old Dryads as emaciated as Kleta; but it was disfigured and deformed under its lowest branch, as well as above its largest branch, by two deeply-cut indentations, now almost filled up with mosses and small ferns, one of which, the lower one, having been made by the childish axe of Laertes and the other upper one by a similar childish tool wielded by himself.

As he leaned now out of that wooden aperture and murmured his response to that quavering voice he couldn’t help thinking of the days when his mother had stopped him from interfering with Kleta’s so-called “garden”. What the old Nymph liked to do was to arrange every tree, every shrub, every flower, every clump of grass, every dead or living root, every wild fern, every spray of ivy, so as to make exquisite patterns and delicate arrangements, and even to design suggestions of god-like terraces, and the mystic purlieus or enchanted courts and secret vistas leading into divine sanctuaries where the smallest insects and the weakest worms could be safe at last from all those abominable injustices and cruel outrages, and all those stupid brutalities and careless mutilations that lack even the excuse of lust.

But it was not only of things like these that the aged Dryad Kleta constructed what she called her garden. What she really set herself to be was a protector and fulfiller of the intentions of her universal mother Gaia, the Earth. Kleta was in fact a sort of voluntary gardener of wild nature, planting and re-planting and trimming and cutting and watering and grafting and designing, as if she were a spirit-like impersonation of all the various maturing elements and an embodied shield-bearer against all the destructive ones.

Not an inch of Kleta’s garden in the slow long passing of the years was neglected. That spartan grace who visiting Ithaca once every five-hundred years had noticed this young oak-tree with its entwining “hetaira”, or devoted “companion”, and had given the Dryad her own name, was well-satisfied with her protégée. If that portion of the island called Arima was dedicated to mystery and prophecy, the portion of it tended by Kleta was dedicated to the unruffled preservation of what is usually obliterated.

Kleta would arrange with absorbed contemplation and deeply pondered purpose all those little separate twigs and straws and tiny pieces of wood and fungus and fir-cone that lend themselves to some subtle extension of the power of Themis even over such chaotic realms of pure chance as are offered by the man-trodden and creature-trodden trails and tracks and paths in a wild island like Ithaca.

Anyone, whether human or more than human, who turns nature into a garden is liable to find an unbelievable number of very small things that have once been parts of other things but are now entities on their own such as bits of wood, bits of stalk, bits of fungus, bits of small snail-shells, bits of empty birds' eggs, bits of animals' hair, bits of birds' feathers, bits of broken sheaths of long-perished buds and shattered insect-shards, strewn remnants of withered lichen-clusters, and scattered fragments of acorns and berries and oak-apples that have survived in these lonely trails and tracks to be scurf upon the skin of one world and the chaos-stuff for the creation of another world.

It was especially the curious hieroglyphs and mysterious patterns which are the written messages from all the unnoticed things that die to make the dust out of which other things are born that fascinated the aged Dryad as she moved day by day about her wild garden.

It was because of her sensitiveness and touchiness with regard to her interpretations of Nature's intentions, and the odd uses to which Nature's smallest leavings and litterings can be put, that Kleta had often burst into fits of furious anger with the childish heroes of three generations of the Lords of Ithaca.

The first time he left his bed that February night he completely soothed the old Dryad. But by the fourth time he leaned on that great plank rather like a ship's rail, that crossed the opening into his bedroom at the top of a short ladder of thick pine-wood boards, he felt as if it were he himself, quite as much as the Dryad, who needed soothing.

This time he held a torch in his hand and had sandals on his feet, while Kleta, who was watching that illuminated window with trembling limbs and a troubled mouth could only stare in amazement at the figure that confronted her across that black gulf. Odysseus was anything but uncomely, anything but deformed or badly built, but it must be confessed that in the flickering blaze of his torch he presented a somewhat eccentric appearance at that moment.

He was not a tall man; and this fact which the famous Helen hadn't failed to notice made the massive breadth of his shoulders and the enormous span of his chest something that bordered on the fantastic and grotesque. Nobody's vision of him, arrested at first by these peculiarities, would be able all the same to dwell on them for long.

The startling proportions and unique grandeur of his head would inevitably dominate any enduring impression. He was very nearly totally bald; so there were no attractive curls to distract an onlooker's or even an interlocutor's attention from the peculiar majesty of his skull and of the way his eyes were set in it. His forehead itself was neither particularly high nor particularly low. Its breadth was its chief characteristic and next to its breadth the unusual distance between his eye-sockets.

This distance made it impossible for him to stare at any person with that kind of concentrated intensity which suggested that the object of the gaze had the power of giving him something that it was essential he should have, or of taking something from him that it was essential he should not lose.

In fact this breadth between his eye-sockets produced an effect that was at once sub-human and super-human. It gave him that look which certain large animals have of being completely oblivious to everything save their own immediate purpose. But it also gave him the look of a Titan or a Giant or even of a God from whom other mortals, whether male or female, had no claim for more individual notice or respect than swarms of gnats or midges.

His nose was neither curved like an eagle's beak nor protuberant as a boar's snout. It carried forward the straight line of his forehead and its character lay in its massive and bony breadth; for its nostrils were not especially wide nor did they twitch or contract and open with the abnormal sensitivity of horses or deer. Curiously enough it was not his majestic skull nor this weird breadth between his eyes that gave to the countenance of Odysseus its most familiar attribute.

Every person, whether male or female, in any group of people who encounter one another day by day, possesses some particular physical characteristic more realistically charged with that person's predominant effect upon others than any other attribute. In the case of the aged Odysseus this was his beard. If the wily old warrior had any special personal vanity or anything about his appearance upon which he himself especially concentrated it was his beard.

To get the effect that pleased him over this beard of his it had become necessary for him not only to trim it with the utmost care but to shave off or cut away all the hair on the portions of his face other than those that served him as a stage for this dramatic emphasis upon his beard.

As he now leaned out into that hollow sap-scented darkness holding his blazing torch, his beard was emphasized precisely in the way that satisfied this one queer streak of personal vanity in him. It was no wonder then that the old Dryad's appeal to him to come down those wooden steps, for they were much more than a ladder, and listen closely to what she wanted him to hear became an appeal that he felt to be irresistible, for in certain deep and narrow mole-runs in their nature the personal vanity of god-like men surpasses by a hundred-fold the natural vanity of women. But there was more in this than that. There was a queer psychic obsession in it; for once when, in middle manhood, and under the influence of this rather eccentric vanity of his, and of the method he had deliberately adopted for trimming it, his beard showed signs of taking the shape he desired for it, his mother Antikleia cried out to him when she caught sight of him emerging clean and fresh from a bath: "By the gods, boy, your beard is as pointed as the prow of a ship!" and, as it chanced, in flinging out this casual remark she proved she had read, as mothers sometimes, though not often, can read, what had hardly been known to himself, the hidden urge behind what he was doing to his face.

"O why is it," he groaned to himself, this wily old sacker of cities, and enslaver of their defenders' wives, "that we mortals have the power of re-creating our actual appearance with which we confront the sun and the moon? Animals and birds can't do it though they can rejoice in the change or lament over the change when it's done for them!"

If it had been some special competition of opposite odours during that February night, as they hovered round his home, some of them unspeakably exquisite, some of them revoltingly excremental, a few actually sepulchral, that swept his memory back at that moment to his mother's words about the way he trimmed his beard, he was still descending that wooden flight of stairs, when a gust of wind from the sea whirled away from above both himself and Kleta's oak a thick veil of mist, leaving in sight not only several zodiacal constellations, but among them, and yet not among them, such a shy, timid, lonely, brittle, shell-like crescent, that the idea of the Moon as she was before Artemis meddled with her, or Apollo meddled with the sun, whirled into his heavy skull.

This same gust of wind, not satisfied with making him aware that his disturbed sleep was connected with the fact that they were now in "noumenia" or the beginning of the month, brought from far-away, across rocks and deserts and forests and seas, in fact from the entrance to Hades itself a vision so strange that he paused in his descent, and holding his torch at arm's length, so that its flame shouldn't touch the protruding point of this same bowsprit-beard, shut both his deep-socketed, widely-separated eyes, and drew in his breath in such a gasping sigh that it was as if he were swallowing his own soul.

What that wind brought to him, as it revealed under those far-off stars that tiny crescent was nothing less than the glimpse he had in Hades of the ghost of Herakles himself, glaring round him like black night with his fingers on the string of his bow, while round about him whirled flocks upon flocks upon flocks of birds in feathered panic, their beaks and wings and claws indistinguishable as they circled.

But his vision of the former owner of the great club that nowadays was always so patiently waiting in the porch till its hour came round again, was gone with the gust that brought it. The old man leapt to the earth from the final rung of that wooden flight of steps and tightening his belt about his middle and holding his torch so that neither its flame nor its smoke should impede his movements he hurried across the uneven ground to the hollow oak.

It was certainly a pitiful old face that looked out at him from that mouldering recess; but he had known it now for all the years since Penelope died; and though in its lines and wrinkles, and in its scooped out hollows where soft feminine flesh should be, and in its bony protuberances where beguiling girlish dimples should be, it was a ghastly enough mask of the ravaging power of time, it had the same strangely preoccupied look it always had.

It was a beautiful face — no! not "beautiful" exactly — say rather haunting with its own special kind of poignant wistfulness — and it wore a permanent expression that betrayed the Dryad's incurable inability to lose herself in any love or worship or devotion or absorbing affection that implied the sacrifice of the smallest fraction of that larger half of her conscious life that was given up to her struggle to be a tender nurse, not only to all the wild vegetation within her reach, but to the innumerable offscourings of animal, vegetable and even mineral life about her, that seemed to her queer mind to be in need of a friend.

Arrived at the hollow oak the old king thrust the torch he carried into the ground, where its quiet flame, now that the gust of wind had subsided, burned as steadily as a large candle. “There’s so much, Odysseus, to tell you,” the Dryad began, “that I don’t know where to start. Kleta-Charis, my name-mother, has been here: that’s the chief thing I wanted to tell you. She was resting for the night in that cave of yours belonging to the Naiads where Athene helped you to hide your treasure when you returned to slay the suitors.”

“And where, now, old lady,” the king interrupted. “I am building my ship for my last voyage! But what did Kleta-Charis say? Don’t ‘ee be afraid to tell me, old friend. I know of myself from what I’ve been feeling all night that there’s something new and strange on the wind; though whether from East or West the storm is coming, and whether Zeus or Poseidon is behind it I’ve not yet learnt.

“What I cannot understand is why my friend Athene hasn’t come to tell me what has been happening tonight. In all my life until now she has always come to me at a great crisis. Is it so serious, do you suppose, Kleta-Dryad, that she has been summoned by the gods of Olympos to a grand council? Or has she gone to the East, whither the great gods were always accustomed to go at this time of year, to receive worship and reward worshippers among the blameless Ethiopians?”

“Sit down on this, my child,” and the lady of the oak leaned forward from her hiding-place and using both of her long emaciated arms spread out on the dark mosses and small ferns between them the skin of a recently dead wolf.

“Kleta-Charis,” murmured the old Dryad in a low hoarse voice, and it was clear to her hearer that she spoke with an effort and with a grim determination to let him hear the worst at once, “Kleta-Charis told me that the great gods were at this hour in such extreme danger themselves that they had no time to think of the fate of their votaries and champions. She said that the whole of Tartaros has broken loose, and that in their first attempt to resist this upheaval, Zeus and Poseidon, blind with anger, raised up such a world-swallowing sea-wave that it swallowed the whole continent of Atlantis; and that the cities of Atlantis with all their populations had now sunk into Hades, where, if Aidoneus reigns still — but does he, Odysseus, does he reign in Hades still? — he ought to be marshalling them in their due order and bringing their leaders and chieftains, and especially those among them who were unjust and cruel, before the judgment-seats of Rhadamanthus and Minos.”

The old Dryad, having poured out all this in one breath save for a gasp at the word “Atlantis” and another at the word “Aidoneus”, sank down on her knees in the inside of the hollow tree-trunk and rested her chin and her hands against the rough, powdery, thousand-year-old jaggedness of disintegration which for nearly a century had constituted the window-sill of the slowly dying oak which was in a sense her house, and in a sense herself.

She breathed heavily, but freely enough now, as she watched the effect of her words upon the massive, upturned, almost bald head beneath her, as he squatted cross-legged upon the wolf-skin, while his torch from its muddy socket in the wet moss threw a wavering beam of light upon his outstretched bowsprit-beard which at noon-day was like the solid silver of a graven image in a temple.

But the most silvery beard in that darkness, in spite of the crescent-moon and the stars and the torch, would have been reduced to a colour-levelling monotone by the encompassing gloom. He remained silent for a long moment. Then he said slowly: “My friend Athene is bound to appear soon. She will touch me with her immortal hand. She will counsel me with her divine wisdom.”

After hearing this the dweller in the dying oak fell silent in her turn while far-away they both could catch the voice of some fortunate sea-bird that after losing itself inland fell to uttering repeated cries of relief when it caught once more the sound of waves breaking on the rocks.

“Athene will probably appear to me,” began Odysseus again, “in the form of a young fisherman or goatherd when I go tomorrow, today I mean, to the cave of the Naiads where I’m building my ship. It was clever of me — eh, Kleta, old friend? — to go to a place like that which all the island regards as so sacred to the sea-powers that they daren’t approach it? My difficulty, as I knew from the start, when I began working on the keel and the body of my ship, will be to collect enough sail-cloth to make a big enough main-sail.

“You, of course, old friend, always busy as you are with tending your wild garden, have no idea of the things we men have to consider, especially in matters of war and of ships. I’ve made up my mind to hoist sail again before I die. I’m not going to rot here alive till I’m eaten by worms. You tell me Zeus and Poseidon and Aidoneus have between them drowned the whole of Atlantis. That doesn’t look to me as if the power of the gods were declining!

"Zeus, the Father of Athene, has often been influenced by her far-sighted wisdom; and when she visits me she will tell me how to propitiate the Father of men and gods. Even if Atlantis is at the bottom of the ocean, why should I be worried? Answer me that, name-child of the loveliest of the Graces! Couldn't I steer my ship, when once I've got her mainsail, over the graves of a hundred Atlantises?

"I tell you' old friend, I can't see what there is in this news to make me miserable. I just can't see! I feel at this moment as if I — —"

But he suddenly stopped; confounded by what he saw in the old face staring at him out of that hollow tree.

"What's the matter, Kleta-Dryad, old friend? For the sake of all the Olympians tell your child what's the matter?"

The Dryad uttered a choking sound in her throat that was like the sob of a sea-wave caught and imprisoned behind cruel rocks when it longs to leap and curve and curl and toss and crest and fume and foam and race over the ocean's surface. Then she said, speaking in a queer voice that seemed to come from the middle of her old bent spine and to force itself between her ribs and her withered breasts: "I can't hide it from you, my child; I can't hide it from you! But what Kleta-Charis really came to tell me was that Keto herself, the most terrible of all sea-monsters, has been seen in your cave!

"Oh child of my soul think of it! Yes, Keto herself, sister of that awful Eurybia who along with Echidna haunts Arima over there, where only those of us who have lost their wits ever go; yes! Keto the sea-monster who plays the beast with old man Phorkys of all the old gods of the sea has been seen in your cave; and since she has been there not a Naiad dares to go near it; and Kleta-Charis told me that nothing would ever induce her or any of her sisters to visit the place again! O my child, my child! It’s terrible to think of! What it will really be is a second Arima.

“Yes, Odysseus, a second ‘Arima’ whose threshold none of us will dare to cross. What are you doing? Where are you going, Odysseus? You’re not forgetting there are two hours still before Dawn, are you? Where are you going, Odysseus? You frighten me when you pull your blanket round you like that!”

Her voice rose to a hoarse shriek. “Stop, Odysseus! Stop! I tell you there are two hours more of night before the dawn comes. You can’t go now, my child! You can’t go like that!”

The only reply he made to her frantic appeal, as he rose to his feet and wrapped his blanket more tightly round him, was to turn his face towards the East and stand absolutely still with his mouth open, his nostrils wide and quivering, and his breath drawn deeply inwards in long spasms of excited suction.

But when the troubled old creature went so far in her agitation as to clamber grotesquely if not indecently out of the hollow oak and seize him by the wrist, he did speak, and when he spoke he did so with a natural and easy calm entirely free from all intensity of locked-in emotion.

“I am only going to my room,” he said, “to get some sleep, and I’ve not the least intention of going anywhere, Kleta, old friend, till I have had a good meal. Athene will no doubt either send me a message or come herself. I only hope she won’t send Telemachos. Why is it, Kleta dear, that I find it so hard to feel at ease with Telemachos since his mother died? He’s become so rigid and austere and pontifical; more of a priest than a son. The great goddess herself is free enough and natural enough with me. I can even fool her a bit now and again and make sport of the way she has treated me and challenge her to treat my son in the same way.

"And all this without her getting angry with me or my getting angry with her. Though she's an immortal Olympian, and I am very much of a too-human mortal man, the goddess and I understand each other perfectly. Nothing anyone said to make trouble between us about her telling Telemachos things she doesn't tell me would make me angry with her. She's the goddess who all my life has helped me; and I am the one from among the rulers of men she has chosen to aid and defend — and that's all there is between us.

"This business of priesthood and worship, and sanctity and calling upon the dead, and swallowing the smoke from mystic tripods, and eating the flesh of dead or of living gods, and drinking their blood, and bringing the dead to life by boiling their bones in magic cauldrons is something beyond me altogether and alien to me, and I cannot understand what has come over Telemachos since his mother died. He's become so silent and secretive and so wrapt up in all this priestly ritual, that I can't get a word out of him. He says he has no wish to be king of Ithaca and lord of the islands when I'm dead!

"Sometimes I think it's all due to this curst Priest of Orpheus. But that is hard to believe; for Telemachos from his infancy has seen the Maenads and Bacchantes of Dionysos without wanting to join them! He has seen the Mysteries of Demeter and Persephone without wanting to follow them into the Kingdom of Aidoneus. I tell you, Kleta, all the priests and prophets of the gods that I've known, and I've known many, are such as teach us rulers how to overcome our enemies and how to break down the gates of their cities and take their women captive.

"No, I can't understand it, Kleta old friend. Do you remember how the other day you asked me why I didn't go to the Agora over there and make a public oration calling upon the people to collect all the sail-cloth they could get hold of and bring it to me? There are thousands and thousands of pieces of it woven into the huts and hovels of slaves in our city and hanging idly in the chambers of our merchants, when they ought to be filled with all the winds of heaven and carrying good well-benched ships over all the waves of the ocean."

He picked up his torch and looked about him. The torch had begun to burn badly and its smoke had an unnatural smell because of the moisture rising from the wet ground into which it had been thrust; but as he brandished it in the air to quicken its flame this badly-smelling cloud of smoke drifted away towards the Temple of Athene.

The old king followed its departure with his eyes while his head remained turned to the West. Slowly that small cloud of evil-smelling vapour floated away over the Temple towards the Agora. With his imagination conjuring up his speech to the assembled people of Ithaca he followed that small cloud to the low walls of their compact little city and to the amphitheatre outside those walls, with its stone seats and wide stone platform, where the citizens of the whole island, if once gathered together in a popular "ekklesia", could be conveniently harangued.

Then turning once more to the troubled old Dryad who had taken to heart so bitterly this invasion of the Naiads' cave by the monster-wife of the oldest of the "Old Men of the Sea" he saw that she was weeping silently with her forehead pressed against her knuckles and her hands clinging tightly to that uneven edge of rottenness, so frayed and so fragile and so soft and crumbling that it looked as if it had ceased to be a substance and had become a momentarily objectified taste or smell, such as, together with the aged transparency sobbing in its midst, might vanish like a ghost at cock-crow.

As the king turned his back upon her and moved off towards the stairway to his chamber he had the feeling that the bowed old creature were nibbling her own flesh as if it were a bread of phantom-sorrow made of the crumbling wood of an ancestral oak.

Back in his room, however, Odysseus behaved exactly as he had declared to his old friend he would behave. He loosened his belt, wrapt his blanket more evenly round him, and lay down on his bed, shutting his eyes so as to replace any sort of steady staring into darkness by an absolute blindness to the whole phenomena of the visible world.

Thus he remained, and no one but himself could possibly have told whether he were awake or asleep, till dawn was more than well advanced. In fact the sun was high above the horizon, and all the paths and vineyards and gardens and woods and desert-places were illuminated by full daylight when he rose from his bed and shouted for his ancient nurse.

It was indeed in magnificently pleasant sunshine that Odysseus found his circular bath of polished stone awaiting his appearance. Eurycleia had already seen to it that no fewer than eight great water-jugs of carefully varied temperature were arranged in order round that hollow circumference of polished stone.

From the surface of some of these jars the steam rose in clouds into the air, while, in other cases, ripples from newly dissolved circles of vanishing bubbles, all tinged with rainbow colours, proved from what clear fresh springs they had come. Here Eurycleia awaited him herself, and as, with the help of Leipephile and Arsinöe, the old nurse poured in alternation the cold and lukewarm and hot streams over him as he crouched and bent and straightened himself and moved this way and that, under the varying temperatures of those jars of water, his thoughts took shape and formulated themselves into a resolution to quicken to a much more rapid speed his preparations for hoisting sail once more and setting out to explore the world again.

"Yes," he thought, "I've given this pleasant routine of the beautiful seasons repeating themselves, and the beautiful days following the beautiful nights in beautiful succession as Themis the great Goddess of order under the will of Zeus decrees, its full opportunity to soothe this itching, fretting, chafing, gnawing, fermenting, biting, seething ache in my wicked old midriff!

"But this happy easy lazy time has not done it! The marrow in my bones howls and growls for the random odds of the old great Circus! I must, I must taste again the salty taste of real plotting and real planning and real deceiving and real achieving!"

In his massive, caustic, long-sighted, super-human and yet subhuman way Odysseus had acquired the power of what might be called a "postponement of thought" while a series of instinctive impulses directed his actions. This power which would certainly appear an odd one to most clever people, had not so much been forced upon him by the particular nature of his experiences as by the prevailing mood of his reactions to these experiences.

This power was not essentially a philosophical one, nor was it even a predominantly intellectual one. What it really might be called was the controlled release of that deep intimate rush of life which at special moments takes possession of us all with what feels as if it were a wild prophetic force under the direction of a calm calculating will.

While he gave himself up, therefore, to all the small physical movements which the process of being bathed by a commanding and rather cantankerous old woman, a beautiful, secretive, middle-aged woman, and a lovely but incredibly simple young woman, his whole nature was gathering itself together, not so much to follow a thought-out plan of action as to have his nervous, electric, magnetic soul kept, in intensely conscious reserve, just under his physical skin and ready for any event, a soul that was not necessarily composed of a single compact consciousness but retained the power of dividing itself at will.

It was indeed a very curious power that his soul possessed, of splitting itself up, if need were, into an array of square-headed conscious souls that still were Odysseus “pro tem”, though they were Odysseus in multiplicity rather than Odysseus in unity!

By the time the old hero was seated on his simple throne in the great open dining-hall of the palace, to which hidden steps descended from the upper chambers, and had begun to break his fast with bowls of red wine thickened by various powdered nuts and sweetened by a particular kind of honey, while he accompanied this rich beverage, after pouring out a libation to Zeus, by devouring greedily — for this first meal of the day was a good deal later than usual — the particular portion of the backbone of a fatted hog which best pleased him, he was fairly at rest in his mind.

He knew more or less what he was going to do, and he left the details of the thing to chance and occasion. Never in the history, not only of Ithaca, but of all Hellas, had there been such a born opportunist as Odysseus was. He had always been a difficult one for women to mould to their will.

It was because her powerful personality took the line of indomitable independence that Penelope had suited him so well; and it was probably because she had brought up their only child to live his own life independently of each of them that as a mature man Telemachos was so reserved and self-centred.

On this particular day therefore the old king had already thrust clean out of his contemplated groove of action any visit to or visit from his ritual-absorbed offspring. What he had to do was to visit the Naiads' Cave and find out if Keto the Sea-Monster had meddled in any way with the building of his ship of escape. "How queer," he told himself as he swallowed his final bowl of enriched and thickened wine, "that I should think of my ship as a way of escape! Escape from what? Have I acquired a hatred for an honoured, peaceful, well-regulated life? Is it now again just as it was on the Isles of Circe and Calypso where women's love was my accursed chain?

"No, no! That's absurd. My wife is dead and has left none to take her place. What's wrong with me then? To reach home from those immortal bitches was to escape slavery. But now that I'm at home and at peace, in rich, untroubled luxury, with my son a devoted priest of my divine protector, now that I am free from all ills of mind and body and have no enemy that I couldn't destroy with a look, a step, a thrust, a blow, now that I'm within a bow-shot of the 'herm' of Themis, the Mistress of Order and Decency and Custom, and only a couple of bow-shots from the Temple of the Daughter of Zeus, what's the matter with me that I can't rest by day or night till I've built my ship and hoisted my sail and am steering for an unknown horizon?

"Well, let's see," he was addressing the three women now, "what's been happening in my Cave of the Naiads. No! I'm not going to rush off, Nurse darling, in any mad hurry nor with unmoved bowels nor unrelieved bladder, and I hope to find you, and Leipephile and Arsinöe too, ready to give me as good a bath as this when I come back tonight; and I can tell you, my dears, I fully expect I may need it! But we shall see. Good luck to us all!"

All was dim in that long, low corridor, for the Sun was steadily mounting towards high noon and not until dawn tomorrow would there be any striking sign of the lord of light again, whether written in fire or written in blood. The Sixth Pillar was aware of a queer throbbing sensation under each of those grimly-scrawled letters upon its pediment as the king approached it and passed it, making straight for the Club of Herakles near the low arch leading into the olive-garden.

“O my! O my! O my! O my!” sighed the up-lifted arm of the solitary olive-shoot that had reared up between the flagstones of that ancient threshold; but when Odysseus stopped in front of the swollen-bosom’d club and taking it up with his left hand and transferring it to his right took a firm hold of it in its narrowest place, which was about three-quarters of its whole length if you measured from head to heel, he proceeded to carry it at right angles to his hip as a hunter carries a boar-spear when making his way through a thick forest.

By no unusual chance or casual accident, for they had been hovering over the rough ground of the slaves’ graves, awaiting him for several hours, did Myos the house-fly and Pyraust the girl-moth settle upon the great weapon, as the old hero held it at this horizontal angle to his person, and secrete themselves, as best they could, in the deep life-crack of the club’s conscious identity, where existed all the organic pulses of its mortal being.

They were both still huddled close together in this dynamic concealment and were still keeping up the metaphysical debate into which they delighted to throw the whole life-energy of their restless natures when Odysseus, after a rapid walk of four and a half miles, reached the sea-coast.

For a few moments the effect upon him of facing the sea was overwhelming. The purpose of his coming to where the waves broke was completely swept away by the waves themselves. In their breaking they took this purpose of his and tore it to tatters of lacy wisps and wind-tossed feathers and flying flurries of fleeting foam.

He had come to the same exact spot only a day or two ago when the waves were no wilder than they were today and the sun was no more dazzling; and yet the sight of this far-flung spray, of these gleaming sun-dazzlements hadn't swallowed up then in such a gasping whirlpool of sensation every plan and scheme he had been carefully formulating.

What was there about the sea today that made its effect upon him so much more overpowering than it had been that other time? In the intensity of this question, which his whole spirit seemed to be putting to some faraway heart of the cosmos, he grasped more tightly the club which he carried in his right hand.

Ah! how well the club knew that tightening of the fingers! "Not quite as strongly grasped," it thought, "as when Herakles heard the growl of that monstrous beast! But I know very well what my new wielder is worrying about now — what's in these roaring waves that wasn't in them before?

"That's what's sticking in his gullet, not the salt wings of the strangling wind nor the whirling spray. And I know what it is that's in them. I know what it is that's made them different. I know what it is that lurks behind these curving and cresting and breaking waves. It's nothing less than Keto the unspeakable, Keto from the abysmal chasm in the floor of the Atlantic, Keto by whom Phorkys the Old Man of the Sea begot Echidna the Ghost-Serpent of Arima, who, by her own son Orthos the brother of Cerberos, gave birth to the feline abortion that called itself a Lion whose brains I converted into good rich dung for the ferns and honeysuckle of the Nemean Forest!"

Thus murmured the club of Herakles in the hand of its new master, while Myos the fly and Pyraust the moth hugged each other in the crack of his body where his soul was most active, and while Odysseus with an impatient effort turned his back on those gleaming waves and entered the cave.

Then it was that the club endeavoured, by barging against every sea-weed-covered wall and colliding with every gigantic shell-fish that extended its wrinkled curves and scaly convolutions and encrusted horns from every obtruding buttress and arch, to catch his new master's attention by creating a dying-away echo that could just out-reverberate the hoarse long-drawn roar of the retreating tide by repeating the syllables "Keto-Keto-Keto-Keto" over and over again.

At last they arrived–Odysseus and his vociferous weapon–to the palatial interior of the cave, where the roof was high and the walls smooth, and the pavement, by being lifted up well above shore-level was not only dry but free from all rocky or stony obstructions.

The central hall, so to speak, of this cavernous palace by the sea resembled a gigantic workshop under immortal jurisdiction –not the jurisdiction of Hephaistos the god of fire but of some antipodal God of the extreme opposite element, that of water, but nevertheless a great and divine artificer.

In the centre of this elevated floor, which was surrounded by several subsidiary caverns that Odysseus had converted into storehouses for the materials of ship-building, lay the unfinished hull of a well-formed sea-going ocean-ship.

When the old hero, with his still murmuring but now much less tightly held companion, reached this half-built ship, which had a most curious look in this ocean-temple, he swung round and faced the wide up-sloping approach by which he had come.

This incline, which, as he now gazed down its full length, had become an astonishingly steep ascent, grew narrower and narrower the nearer it got to the flying surf and wildly tossed spray of the breaking waves.

"What has become of all the Naiads?" the king asked himself, "who were wont to frequent this cave? Have they been frightened away by that Monster of the Deep, Keto, the mate of Phorkys, the Old Man of the Sea?"

The king looked calmly round, evidently deciding, as not only his Heraklean club was deciding, but as the fly and the moth in their hiding-place in the bosom of the club were still more anxiously deciding, that some appeal to the absent Naiads to whom the cave belonged was called for at this juncture. Had the club, however, and, still more had the insects in the bosom of the club, made the appeal that followed, it would no doubt have been a more tactful one, but at any rate the king's voice echoed mightily through the whole place.

"O divine Naiads, I know your lives are determined, even as the lives of your cousins the Dryads, by the lives of the Forests and the Fountains and the Groves and the Caverns which you deify by your dear presences but which you cannot survive, whereas the fifty daughters of Nereus remain undying and imperishable even as Keto herself, the monstrous wife of Phorkys, for the sea cannot cease to exist, any more than can the earth herself, mother of us all.

"But it was the great goddess Athene who met me here when I was brought home by the ship of the Phaiakians and she told me to pray to you and to worship you and to cry aloud to you whenever I came here to build my ship for myself. And thus I obey her; and through my weak old voice it is the great goddess herself who calls upon you, O heavenly Naiads, who calls upon you to tell why you have deserted this beautiful cave and whether the cave itself is soon to be destroyed under the wrath of Poseidon the Shaker of the Earth as he avenges himself on the monstrous — —"

He was interrupted by a clear young girlish voice which was certainly not that of any Nymph, whether an immortal Nereid or a more vulnerable Naiad, but was obviously the voice, as Odysseus and his Heraklean club and those other living consciousnesses within the club, felt at once, not only of a maid of human origin but of a maid who spoke with the native island accent.

"Go away, you horrid thing! Go away! Or I'll call the King!" The little girl had evidently been watching the approach of the wily old warrior and his war-experienced weapon; for she now sprang up from the deepest portion of the ship's stern, where this one man's dry-dock work had advanced furthest, and with outstretched arms and streaming hair began shaking her fists and staring with wide-open eyes at something at the waves' edge.

Odysseus swung round on his heel; but between what this island-maid beheld and the line of his vision there was some obstacle, the corner of a rock, or an enormous fossil jutting out from the wall, or perhaps only an extra-thick tuft of salt weed on the floor of the descent into the sea, that completely hindered his vision as he struggled to focus the object that was giving her this shock.

It was an intensely awkward moment; for it was clear that the advancing monster, if such it were, must have assumed that Odysseus could see it as clearly as did the maiden but was scared either by his own old age or out of respect for the power of the immortal sea-god from interfering.

"She thinks," said the club of Herakles to himself "that the king is so old he'll just remain quiet and still while she tears the girl to pieces and swallows her!"

This idea was so appalling to the great weapon that, inspired, as we all can be by sheer desperation, he made one surpassing effort and slipping out of the hero's hand fell with a crash upon the rocky floor.

And then, in stooping to pick him up, Odysseus saw Keto. Never had the shrewd old hero shown more self-control or more subtle and convoluted cunning than he showed now. With the club in his hand and held by the middle as hunters hold a short boar-spear he ran down the slope straight towards the creature who was already half-out of the water. Keto's face was that of a beautiful woman, though it had at that moment an expression of horrible lust, mingled with insatiable greed: but it was not her face but her hair that was the strangest thing about her.

Her hair was of an extremely weird tint and was so long that as it spread out over the wave that was carrying her forward it changed the colour of the wave to its own hue. It was doubtless due in part to the fact that the season being an exceptionally early spring, there was so much fresh green to be observed in every direction, together with such startling contrasts as the blue of the sky and the purple of the mountains, that this weird apparition of Keto's hair struck these three consciousnesses as it came nearer and nearer, with that appallingly beautiful face at the head of its advance, as something so absolutely ghastly in its reversion to a colour that could only be described as a manifestation of Death and Nothingness in the midst of Life and Joy, that each one of them felt the approach of something like a frozen paralysis.

Not one of the three, not the wise old king with his staggering burden of memories unequalled by any man who has ever lived upon earth, not the terrific club of the greatest killer of anti-human Pests who has come to the rescue of humanity, not the young girl in her fresh youth from the oldest and simplest of the island's farming homesteads, had ever in their life before been thus paralysed by all that was suggested in a mere colour, and that colour without horns or claws or teeth or sting — just simply the colour of hair!

But all three of them felt simultaneously that their fearful impressions from Keto's hair were connected with one single simple thing, with nothing more or less in fact than the dead leaves of one particular kind of tree — O so well known to them all! — that grew somehow round every one of their homes in this island.

Over and over again had all three of them felt some strange shudder over this particular colour; the Heraklean club rather less than the old man or the young girl, since his native home was really in the forest of Nemea, situated on the "epeiros", as the islanders called the mainland.

Like a flash that combined the deadly bolt of forked lightning with the more widely spread illumination of sheet-lightning, some peculiar horror for normal mortal senses seemed to lurk in the mysterious colour of this sea-monster's hair. Yes! the only parallel to it was the colour of the dead leaves of that one particular tree in autumn, especially when autumn came earlier in the year than usual, causing these dead leaves to be isolated from their fellows.

It wasn't a negative colour or the absence of anything. It was a positive colour, and it possessed its own absolutely special metallic gleam. The colour grey, contrasted with what this colour was, would have appeared a friendly and natural if rather a melancholy apparition. But this colour flung forth a metaphysical shock. It possessed a look as if Nothingness itself, the primordial and perhaps the ultimate Non Est had chosen to incarnate itself in visible appearance.

"You will see me again!" it seemed to say to the old king, to the young farm-girl, to the club that slew the Nemean Lion. And the club was fully aware of the fact that there was a special reason for its sharing the horror that now menaced the other two, the fact namely that the Nemean Lion whose brains it dashed out on the "epeiros" was actually, though belonging to the earth, an offspring of this monster of the deep.

Little did either the old man or the young girl guess that the forward rush with which they both followed the Heraklean weapon, as, straining itself forward till it almost flew out of the king's grasp, it rushed with blind defiance down that slippery slope straight towards the beautiful face in its terrible hair, had anything to do with the fact that the weapon the king carried knew so much more than they did of the creature they were encountering.

So terrific, however, was the shock of sheer panic that struck them all three when they came within reach of that swirling whirlpool of hair — the colour of the absolute void before there was any world at all — that fortunately for the two human ones it broke through, just as if it had really been a flash of metaphysical illumination, the natural barrier between the consciousness of the club of Herakles and the consciousness of the man and the girl, so that when, within a couple of yards of the wave's edge, they finally stopped, Odysseus was able to threaten that beautiful face in the midst of that abysmal hair with the knowledge possessed by the weapon of the son of Zeus and his mortal bride Alkmene.

"Beware, you evil mother of good daughters, you mother of the Graiai, born with white hair, of the Graiai, who still live in Kisthene, the cavern of rock-roses, where there is neither sun nor moon, and where no stars shine, and who have only one eye to see with, and only one tooth to eat with! Beware, I tell you, you demon-mother of the white-haired Graiai! If ever your face is seen again near this Cave of the Naiads I shall rob your daughters of both their one eye and their one tooth; for none knoweth the road to Kisthene of the Rock-Roses better than I, wanderer as I've been through both the world of the living and the world of the dead!"

Had Keto, the eldest daughter of the Sea, possessed, at the back of her swirling hair, now the very colour of that Nothingness into which everything shall return, possessed a foam-drop of the feeling resembling ours, she would have been softened in some infinitesimal measure by the poignant sight of those two pathetic human beings, the little farm-girl with slender outstretched arms and the broad-shouldered shepherd of the people, brandishing his old cracked root of a twisted pine disfigured by honeysuckle and brooding on the spilt brains of lions; but that drifting face remained as impassive as the exquisite convolutions of a cockle-shell; impassive and implacable, and still slowly advancing.

But it was at that moment that behind this intolerable sea-horror with its appalling beauty and its deadly hair there suddenly rose up a three-fold prong held aloft in a vast overshadowing muscular arm. “Stop, all of you! stop, I say!” boomed the god’s terrific voice, as the outstretched trident was directed towards them.

With the sluicing and shelving roar of a hoarse, out-drawing, tidal retreat the whole volume of water, swallowing up Keto entirely as it went, rolled back about the tall and menacing torso of Poseidon. Recognizing his worst personal enemy in this insatiable avenger of the Kyklops Polyphemos and this passionate ally of the Trojans, Odysseus contented himself with shrugging his massive shoulders, with extending an imperative yet kindly hand to the young girl, with swinging the club in an almost humorous gesture of submitting to fate, and with walking, without another glance at the ship he was building, slowly forth from the Naiad’s Cave by the nearest inland path; a retreat from action that was an unspeakable relief to both the fly and the moth.

“Were you on your way somewhere, child?” he asked the young girl in a friendly voice, still retaining her hand. “I’m herdsman Tis’s youngest sister,” the girl replied in a docile voice. “Grandfather sent me with a message to him. Grandfather told me to stop at the Naiad’s Gave and see if it was true that you were building a ship. They say, down our way, that if you, my lord, sail from Ithaca, one of the Naubolides boys will be king in your place: but I tell them that's all silly nonsense."

The girl's obvious sincerity made Odysseus look more closely at her and he was struck by the oddity of her appearance. She had one of the plainest faces he had ever seen, and her stomach and torso were shapeless and graceless, but her legs were as beautifully formed as those of some incomparable dancer. "I'll take you to the house," he said. "Tis sleeps there and the women will find a place for you."

CHAPTER III

NEVER HAD NISOS Naubolides felt surer of himself or of his destiny than when, on this same morning of the old king's visit to the cave of the Naiads, he set out for the Temple of Athene. He had come straight from the presence of his mother Pandea whom he had found as he had expected, not in the Naubolides homestead of Aulion, but in the house called Druinos, where lived Nosodea, the mother of the two girls Leipephile and Stratonika, who was Pandea's best gossip, best scandal-monger, and best-loved friend.

The old Odysseus must have been still lying on his bed with his eyes closed after his nocturnal conversation with the Dryad Kleta when Nisos set out so full of confidence in himself and his future. As to Myos the fly and Pyraust the moth, they must already have discovered for the benefit of the Club of Herakles and of the inquisitive Olive-shoot which had sprung up near the club, some important news about the ambiguous activities of the Priest of Orpheus who had occupied the ante-chamber to the Temple, for they were now flying back in their return from the Temple.

At the foot of a long slope of carefully tended green grass that led away from the Temple in an Eastern direction there was an old roughly hewn ungainly statue — scarcely a statue at all for it was more like a low stone pillar or "herm", with the crude outlines of a clumsily carved feminine face just indicated at the top of it — not of Athene but of the Goddess Themis, the special guardian throughout all Hellas of law and order and justice and decent behaviour.

Nisos stopped in amazement in front of this image. He knew every curve and every hollow and every tinge of colour upon this ungainly block of stone. But behold! there was this morning a horrible great crack clear across it. It was a crack that reached from what might have been the figure’s left shoulder to what might have been its right buttock. Nisos now examined the injured image with the utmost nicety from top to toe.

As he was doing this he suddenly paused with an excited gasping little cry, the sort of cry a young soldier might have uttered who had just discovered on the battlefield the severed head of his general.

It was not quite as startled a cry as that; but it was in the same category of shocked astonishment. What he had seen were unmistakable blood-marks at different places all over the stone’s surface.

“Whose blood?” was the question that shot through the boy’s mind. Down on his knees he sank and began scrabbling with both hands in the grass. Here his startled curiosity was more than rewarded. Again and again his fingers encountered certain curious horny objects, which, as he lifted them up into the sunlight that was now blazing down upon him from a cloudless sky, revealed themselves without doubt or question to be nothing less than broken finger-nails, enormously sharp and super-humanly long finger-nails, some of them thicker than others, but almost all, he soon noticed, bloody as well as broken. “Whose blood?” the boy desperately asked himself again.

His whole feeling towards these abnormally large finger-nails was an extremely queer one. It was indeed such a confused and complicated one that, clever as he was, the lad was completely non-plussed. What agitated him was not so much these large and bloody finger-nails in themselves as what they represented and the world of associations they brought with them.

“This must be,” the boy told himself in one of his characteristic introspective mole-runs, as he automatically gathered those horrible fragments into a heap, “this must be what you feel when you go mad.

Didn't Herakles go mad? Didn't Ajax go mad? I mean when they'd annoyed Zeus in some way? Perhaps I've annoyed Zeus in some way without meaning to, and what I feel now is the beginning of my punishment."

For the last year and a half Nisos had deliberately cultivated his tendency to elaborate his fancies and enlarge upon his feelings. He had done this ever since the day when, neither of them knowing that he was within hearing, he had overheard his mother say to his father, "Nisos will be a famous philosopher one day! Don't you see how introspective he is?" "Introspective is what I am!" he had henceforth always told himself.

And when other boys beat him at racing or jumping or throwing the discus, "I'll be a prophet," he told himself, "when you are all common soldiers!"

His face just then, while the blazing sunshine caught the five beads of perspiration on his forehead and behaved towards them with the same passionate intensity as it was at that moment displaying towards the whole Aegean Sea, had a very curious expression. At that heap of supernaturally large and inhumanly pointed finger-nails, all torn and bloody he felt he was in a dream, whence, though he knew it was a dream, he was unable to force himself to wake. "Heavens and Earth!" he thought. "Of course I know whose finger-nails those are! They're the 'Harpies, the Snatchers'! They must have some quarrel with Themis." He shut his eyes and with the back of his hand wiped those five miniature seas of sweat out of existence.

And then he remembered what he'd been taught about the Strophades or Isles of the Turning-Point, and how it was there that Themis compelled the fierce sons of the North Wind, brandishing their sharp swords to turn from their pursuit of these fatal females who had no weapon but their own snatching nails! And so this foul crack in the image of the goddess of Order was the gratitude of these infernal Harpies!

Well, well, well. He decided that it might be wiser not to tell his mother about this crack in the image of Themis, nor to ask her what he had better do about this little heap of finger-nails. “Cover them up with Babba’s dung! Tis would say”, he thought; and then he thought: “No! I won’t be the one to tell mother. Those bloody nails give me the shivers!”

He did his best, as he left that desecrated image and made his way up the grassy slope towards the temple, to recover his self-esteem by remembering his mother’s words about his being “so introspective”. “Neither Daddy nor Agelaos,” he told himself, “would have the cleverness to feel things like this as I feel them.”

He was still nearly half a mile from the top of the slope where the first buildings began when he saw the two insects, so well known to him in the palace-porch, flying slowly towards him engaged in some absorbing argument between themselves. Yes, he was sure he knew them both. One was that pitifully nervous and weak-looking brown moth with fluttering wings. The other was that extremely self-centred house-fly with a calm collected manner, a black head and staring eyes.

And now if it were possible for him to enter into conversation with them, or at least into some sort of intelligent communication with them, he would gather all sorts of hints as to what this Orphic Priest, who called himself Enorches, was doing, and have something important to take back to his mother quite apart from those horrible finger-nails, concerning which he had decided to remain silent.

Yes, he was pretty sure he knew both these insects; but of course it was possible that the house-fly, with those transparent prismatic wings upon which it was always cleaning its rapidly moving feet, had two or three, or even four or five, brothers and sisters. It was also possible, though less likely, that the brown-winged, anxiously obsessed, sacrificially dedicated moth had a twin-sister who resembled her so closely in the eyes of gods and men that only a caterpillar could distinguish the one from the other.

Indeed if it were not for some multiple-footed, velvet-muffled relative, to whose cocoon-piercing, chrysalis-searching eyes no pair of winged creatures were exactly alike, how easily might the brown moth have been a nameless unidentified nomad, flitting over the earth's surface until she fell by her own propensity for self-sacrifice into some worse fate than becoming the obedient servant of the Priest of Orpheus.

Such a born Ambassador was Nisos that he had hardly caught sight of the two insects fluttering through the air towards him, so submerged in their metaphysical argument that they had no attention left for what they were doing or where they were going, than he stretched out his hands palms downward towards them and addressed them with his fondest and politest social salutation, a salutation that was only a little less respectful than the one he used, in his imagination, for kings and queens, and also, it must be admitted, for members however young of the ancient houses of the Naubolides of Aulion.

Having thus saluted them the youthful diplomatist uttered a deep sigh and ejaculated the gnomic syllables, "What a shame!" The subtle implication of this sympathetic groan was indeed, though few would have had the sensitivity to catch it, that the ignorant, vulgar, illiterate, brutal retainers of the Priest of Orpheus had clearly refused to allow the sophisticated homage of such noble insects to enter the inmost shrine, in spite of the fact that all the world owes honey to honey-bees, silk to silk-worms, pearls to oysters, and Tyrian dye to the lovely sea-shell, Porphura.

Seeing that he had succeeded in interrupting their dispute and that they were hesitating and flying in circles and hovering round his outstretched hands, the boy withdrew one arm, moved the other with a mute solicitation, and drawing in his breath with an instinctive movement of his whole frame that was in itself a crafty-imitation of a sub-human gesture, he made a peculiar humming sound between his palate and the back of his tongue.

All these things were done, all these signs were made, purely on the inspiration of the moment; but seeing them still hesitate and feeling in his open mouth and widened nostrils the morbid smell of the incense-heavy sacristy-dust they carried on their wings, he suddenly lifted the back of his hand to his mouth, licked it with his tongue, and stretched it forth again.

Ah! He was indeed a clever plenipotentiary. He had done it! Both the insects settled on the back of his hand which the moth desperately caressed with her wings and the house-fly began hurriedly to use as an ash-can for the dirt he scraped, first by the aid of one gauzy wing and then of another, from his exploring feet. Here indeed was the Ambassador’s opportunity! He must convince himself that he had come from the kitchen of his mother Pandea, the wife of Krateros Naubolides, straight to this sacred half-mile of well-watered grass.

He must let that ominous crack in the image of Themis be blotted from his mind and that bloody heap of super-human claws vanish like an obscure dream. Here upon the back of his hand were two living creatures, each of them endowed with wings, who had come straight from this temple, borne forth upon a dusty wafture of incense-bearing smoke.

But how, in the name of Tartaros, was he to obtain from them the information he required? How on earth could he cross the gulf between his human consciousness and their insect-consciousness? How was he to enter into conversation with this brown moth and this house-fly now that he had persuaded them to settle upon the back of his hand? Nisos Naubolides never forgot to the end of his mortal days this crucial moment. He drew his arm a little inwards towards his ribs and hung his head, staring helplessly at the back of his hand where from the knuckle of his longest finger, which she evidently felt to be a wisely chosen observation-post, the brown moth was explaining to the black fly, who was cleaning his shoes on the knuckle of Nisos' finger, just how it was that with such unusual words and gestures the Priest of Orpheus had bidden her show her friend off the premises and see to it that he never returned.

What, in the name of their universal mother the earth, was he to do to break down this cruel wall of difference between his human senses and those of these two creatures?

And then suddenly, to the born diplomatist, the inspiration came! Of course there was only one thing to do, and that was the thing indicated by every vibratory law of tellurian politeness. He must pray to Pallas Athene!

No sooner had he decided upon this line of action which was obviously the most proper, the most natural, the most pious line for a diplomatic ambassador to a great goddess's temple to adopt, than he lifted up in his heart an intensely concentrated prayer to Athene, imploring her to reveal to him how to exchange thoughts and experiences with this moth and this fly.

It was soon clear to him that the goddess had heard him and had taken measures without delay to give him an answer to his prayer. Well must she know the limits of her power and not only its limits. She also must know the evil effect, so often precisely contrary to the desired effect, of manifesting her power in her own person. So to enlighten him as to the way moths and flies received and remembered their impressions she evidently brought it about that her most understanding worshipper in the vicinity should at this critical moment be descending that grassy slope.

This was an elderly virgin called Petraia who belonged to an island family into which in each generation for hundreds of years an old maid with Sibylline inspiration had been born. Petraia was not the prophetess for this particular generation but she was twin-sister to the woman who was. And the goddess knew well that there existed, as happens sometimes with twins, a mysterious thought-transference between Petraia and her sister, who had fled from the world to the sacred Arician Forest of the Italian King Latinus, where she had become a follower of the immortal Nymph Egeria who lived like an oracle in a hidden cave.

It was through her sister's association with this Italian Nymph that Petraia was able to keep the virgin-goddess whom she served in close contact with all that preceded the founding of the New Troy, destined, so the word went forth, to rule the world from its Seven Hills.

Nisos was thoroughly at home with Petraia who in his infancy had been his nurse as well as his mother's midwife, so that he at once accepted her appearance at this juncture as an authentic answer to his prayer. Without a moment's delay in one wild rush of excited words the boy poured out the whole of his story and explained his difficulty about the insects.

The slender and stately old lady surveyed him with whimsical scrutiny. "So you want to get the news from those two small prisoners of yours, do you? And you need an interpreter?"

"O Nurse, I'm thankful it's you!" gasped Nisos. "Mother wanted me to find out what's going on and I don't feel like telling her about what I've just seen down there"; and he gave his head a jerk in the down-hill direction. "Does the goddess, do you think, know all about that? Does she know they've left a lot of their disgusting nails or claws, or whatever they are, behind, and all bloody too? Why does she let such things happen, Nurse, and so near her Temple? Themis is cracked clean through — does she know that? — clean through, from shoulder to hip! Mother will have a fit when she hears. I’m not going to be the one to tell her, nurse. You bet your life I’m not! You know what she is when she hears things like that. She’ll go rampaging off to Druinos to pour out everything to Nosodea; and there in his corner like a hunched-up toad you may depend old Damnos Geraios will be gloating over every word and thinking what new silliness he can invent for dear sweet simple Leipephile and what new imaginary wickedness for that idealistic fool Stratonika, so that she’ll have to lacerate herself to the bone to purge it away! But tell me, nurse most sacred, nurse most precious, nurse most holy, does our great goddess, who sent you here in answer to my prayer, know about Themis?”

He looked searchingly at the virginal midwife as he asked this question. He knew well that his faith in the omnipotence of their goddess wasn’t what it had been when he was five years old. He was nearly seventeen now, and in these last years he had had a great many very private and rather peculiar thoughts; but it would still have shocked an indestructible vein of piety in him to think that such things could happen as this horrible attack on the obelisk of Themis so near Athene’s very judgment-seat, without her knowing anything about it!

Petraia smiled that reassuring familiar smile that had so often comforted him in his paroxysing panic lest the feathered bosom of aboriginal Night should swallow him up alive.

“Let’s think of your insects first,” Petraia said now, and she added: “Moths and Flies before Law and Order!” She added these words with that particular kind of domestic persiflage that is more annoying to a boy nearly seventeen than a slap in the face.

However, he obediently lifted the back of his hand closer to his eyes and stared at the moth and the fly so intently that he could see the delicate lacy fringes on the margins of the moth's brown wings and the metallic circles like polished adamant round the bulging eyes of the house-fly.

As Nisos stared at the insects it seemed to him that he could feel like a palpable wafture of nard-scented air the divine power of feminine virginity, a power that male youth always recognizes without knowing precisely what it is, pass from Petraia's hand to the nerves of his shoulder. It did, yes! it actually did, transform the quivering of those brown wings and the friction of those jet-black legs upon those gauzy wings into the expression of thoughts that a human being could follow. "So that's it!" he said to himself sharply and shrewdly.

And he was so afraid that just as a crib of some classic paragraph might be snatched from a school-boy before he had got the hang of it, that this preternatural translation of the sign-language of insects into the sound-language of men might be withdrawn before he got its full import that he began announcing to Petraia in a louder voice than he generally used and in a hurried and curiously jerky manner that what the insects had revealed to him was that there was a quarrel beginning, that might soon become a deep rift, between Zeus and Hera, the former being alone on the peak of Gargaros deprived, one rumour declares, of all his weapons, while the latter was almost equally alone on the summit of Olympos.

He further announced to Petraia that the effect of this quarrel upon the great goddess Athene was to force her to withdraw herself from taking any part in any public movement until the issue between Zeus and Hera became clearer or definitely resolved itself in one way or another.

"But at this point," so he explained to the old midwife, "while the moth understands that our goddess has left Ithaca altogether, the fly is sure she is still in the island, and probably still in the temple; but is unwilling to commit herself, or take any side, or make any definite move, till things are clearer than they are at present.

“Another thing the fly tells me, Nurse dear, which astonishes me a good deal, and to confess the truth gives me a funny feeling, indeed, if I were absolutely honest, as you used to teach me every Naubolides with our claim to the kingship ought to be, makes me shiver and shake is that Tartaros has broken loose, and that Typhon, the most terrible of all the Titans, has burst his bonds from beneath Etna and is again breathing fire and smoke against the gods.

“But you see, Nurse dear, what makes it so hard for me to tell you all they say is that they keep contradicting each other as if they were speaking as ambassadors from opposite camps. For instance what the fly says is that the real reason why our great goddess Athene has withdrawn ‘pro-tem’ into herself is that she is waiting to hear what Zeus will do if certain rumours that have reached her from Italy are correct, namely that at a special place in Italy where there are seven sacred hills the descendants of Aeneas the pious ally of Priam have already begun to build a new Troy.

“The moth, on the other hand, swears that Athene has gone to visit the blameless Ethiopians to find out for herself whether it is true that Persephone has quarrelled with Aidoneus and helped Teiresias to bring back from Hades the weeping Niobe, the First Woman, together with her husband Phoroneus, the First Man.”

Long before the insects had ceased revealing their discoveries to the undulations of the knuckles of his now weakly and wearily extended hand, the inspiration proceeding from the virginity of the old maid who had nursed him ceased to give him the clue to the small creatures’ sign-language.

He gazed helplessly at her, while a wave of tiredness and the feeling of being a hopeless fool engulfed him. “What do you make of it all, Nurse?” he murmured feebly.

“It is clear enough, Nisos,” commented Petraia, “that a female moth and a male fly are bound to be on opposite sides in the great ‘old battle’.”

“What old battle, nurse darling?” enquired the boy, contemplating the insects on his knuckles with re-awakened interest.

“Between males and females, silly!” There fell a dead silence between them with the weight of a heavy stone: a silence that was broken at last by the old maid herself. Her voice rang out with something of the prophetic resonance that had belonged to that twin-sister of hers who was a neophyte of Egeria, the Nymph in the Cave in the Italian forest.

“Didn’t I always tell you, forgetful child, how Apollo and Artemis persecuted Niobe, the First Woman, whose husband Phoroneus was the son of a Melian Nymph? Didn’t I tell you how that pair of murderous deities — holy Athene guard me from them! — between whom and our great Goddess there has always been war since, like that dangerous Cyprian Aphrodite, they took the side of the Trojans and may the golden Sun, Helios, and the silver Moon, Selene, shake off such intruders! — didn’t I tell you how that murderous pair killed the children of Niobe the first woman? And how they wouldn’t even let their neighbours bury those beautiful maidens and heroic youths? Haven’t I told you all that?

“And now this liar of a house-fly is trying to make out that our great goddess has lost herself in some kind of trance when the pillars of the world are shaking. O you male creatures, what infants you are! Children of women and nurselings of women, it is your mothers, your mothers, always your mothers, who are to blame! It is only from us, the unmarried ones, the childless ones, who have never known a man, that you ever hear the truth!

That is what my sister always used to say. That is why she went to that forest of Aricia, which in Italy must be like the Nemean Forest in our mainland, and a little like our Arima too, only much bigger. Lucky, yea a thousand times lucky, are we in Ithaca to serve a Virgin Goddess!

"The mothers of men are the worst traitors to the cause of women. I tell you, boy, from the beginning of all things women have been betrayed, exploited, enslaved, insulted, perverted, depraved, debased, by men!"

Petraia drew breath at this point, while Nisos, feeling a little uneasy, since he still assumed it was in direct answer to his prayer that his old nurse had appeared on the scene, stared at the black fly on his knuckle with the vague idea of finding an excuse if not a justification for the wickedness of men in that big black head supported on those gauzy wings.

But the indignant old maid went on in mounting emotion, until her indictment soon became so detailed in its survey of the wrongs of women and so crushing in its denunciation of their corrupters, that all he could do was to rub his knee with his free hand while one method of defence followed another in mute succession through his bewildered brain.

"Petraia," he thought, "must have gone down to Hades like our King Odysseus for she can't have seen all these things happening round here." And then as his attention wandered a little from what he was hearing he became aware of an extremely unexpected and very curious experience. He found himself in fact whispering to the fly and being whispered to by the fly in a language of which he was absolutely ignorant. It was like a dream, though he was fully awake. The fly was a boy among flies as he himself was among people. And with this other boy he was now making fun of everything.

"But it's our great goddess — it must be — —" he told himself, "who in answer to my prayer has arranged this meeting with Petraia and has helped me and the fly to make friends! She is a Divine Being, therefore she must herself understand the language and the thoughts of all the animals, birds, reptiles, insects and even plants, that walk and fly and creep and grow around her temple."

He had begun to call the fly "Kasi". "Kasi-kid," he said, "isn't this whole business just like a game of Blindman's Buff? Don't you think so, Kasi?"

The old midwife at his side went on with her arraignment of all males; but he kept his attention fixed on the fly, for it had become a deep joy to him to feel that they'd really made friends. "Kasi" was an abbreviation of the Hellenic word for brother and it was the old class-mate expression that all the younger boys of Ithaca had made use of between themselves in the Island's preparatory-school.

As for the fly, it was natural enough that since it had got older considerably faster than his new friend it was as gratified at being called "Kasi" as Nisos would have been if he had been treated like a young comrade by one of the heroes in the Trojan war.

"Blindman's Buff?" cried the Fly. "It's as if we were all buzzing round a new-dropt cow-turd of Tis' s old Babba, all warm and steaming! But this lady-moth here keeps giving me a flap with her left wing to remind me that I promised to escort her home; so I'm afraid I must say 'cheire!' for we must do what the ladies tell us, is it not so?"

"It is indeed the sad truth, Kasi," admitted Nisos. "Ta-Ta! till the next time!" shrilled the Fly. But when the insects had commenced their flickering and wavering departure in such close colloquy that the all-seeing sun, whether ruled by an Olympian or a Titan or by nobody but his flaming self, couldn't decide whether to turn them into one darting jewel or into two darting jewels, Nisos found that Petraia had fallen silent and was regarding him with a look that was a palimpsest of different expressions. It had reproach in it. It had a grievance in it. It had mischievous amusement in it. It had a puzzled pity in it.

But in place of any sad, weary, resigned, disillusioned acceptance of fate it had a gravity that was faintly whimsical. “Those finger-nails that disgusted and disquieted you so, my dear,” she remarked at last, “show me who cracked that image of Themis. And now listen to me, child; and lay to heart what I tell you; for I am not speaking only on my own authority. I am speaking to you, Nisos, you Babe that I took from your mother, as an unwedded mortal on behalf of an unwedded immortal, for I tell you, boy, that at this very moment I can feel her presence inspiring me and teaching me exactly what to say and exactly what not to say to you, Nisos, child,” and Petraia’s voice quivered with emotion, “the greatest event, and by far the best event, that has ever happened in the history of our terrible world is now happening.

“From the lowest depths of Tartaros to the highest peaks of Olympos a great revolt is in progress which if successful will change the world. But it is a revolt against Fate Itself, as well as against the Will of the All-Father, a will that always bows to Fate and then pretends to be what the All-Father Himself would instinctively will, which of course really and truly it isn’t, only All-Father Zeus can’t and daren’t do what he’d like to do!

“Those who attacked that Figure of Themis were entirely justified in so doing. The Harpies, or ‘Snatchers’, as our enemies call them, are women like us, like me! They are women, and they are maids, and they are not only old maids, they are immortal maids! And they have joined the great revolt that began before dawn this night, this night that has now become day, the first day of the greatest event in the history of all days!

“Need your old nurse tell her babe what that event is? It is the Revolt of Women! Yes, of the Women-Slaves of the entire universe! Yes, Nisos, nothing less than that, the revolt of all Females in the cosmos against the tyranny of all Males in the cosmos! Themis, the goddess of Custom and Habit and Tradition, has always been unfair to us women, always trying to force us back into slavery to men whenever we've tried to escape. And, as with Themis, so with the Fates. They too are against us. They too want to hold us down to the laws, ways, manners, morals, usages, privileges, conventions, institutions, organizations, founded upon male stupidity and bigotry!

"But our maiden goddess will be on our side; yes! she will lead us! She — —" And then suddenly, after a terrifying pause, the boy heard Petraia utter a ghastly groan, followed by a horrible shriek. "She's gone, gone, gone, gone! She's left me! She's deserted me! Athene! Athene! Athene! Where art thou, Athene?"

Nisos looked in positive fear at the woman. Her whole countenance was convulsed, distorted, twisted awry; while her eyes, enlarged and deepened into the most beautiful and most terrible eyes Nisos had ever seen in his short life, gave him the feeling, as they turned on him, as if his whole nature were being summed up and weighed and analysed and judged by the central nerve of the entire universe!

"What's the matter, nurse?" he gasped in a low voice. At his question her gaze of terrible insight changed into one of contemptuous irritation.

"Oh, nothing, nothing, nothing, nothing! Nothing's 'the matter'! What could be 'the matter'? A person may be allowed, I take it, to change colour for a second when the goddess she has been serving for forty years begins inspiring her with the deepest secrets of life in one blob, one blur, one blot, one gobbet of prophetic truth; and then, just as a person's in the act of expressing it glides off, glides away, glides into thin air, glides back to her grove or her grotto or her shrine leaving the person, leaving me, to be nothing but the silly, speechless idiot I always have been!"

Petraia stopped speaking and covered her contorted face with her two hands, while the boy noticed how big the tears were that forced themselves between those thin fingers and ran down between those wrinkled knuckles as the tall figure swayed and shook with her dreadful sobs.

Nisos was staggered. All he felt was awe and wonder; awe in the presence of such human emotion, and wonder that so wise a goddess could treat a faithful servant so unkindly and ungratefully. If only Petraia had been less upset she would have remained in touch with her twin-sister who in Aricia was at that very moment struggling desperately to convey to her by vibrations of pure thought that in this cosmic revolt on behalf of women, though the Fates and the All-Father and Themis might be against them, they had on their side the terrible Avengers of Blood, the Erinyes, who, according to Egeria, the Nymph in the Cave, could bring with them to the battle the Graiai, the Gorgons, the Sirens, and even the Nymphs of the Hesperides!

Had the woman only possessed the power to visualize the scene at that moment in the cave of Egeria, where the twin-sister on her knees with her long bare arms outstretched and her face transformed by an ecstasy of worship was invoking all the Chthonian deities on behalf of Petraia herself, that crazed creature might have been checked in her bitter wrath. As it was, she left Nisos without a word more; and the boy heard her as she went off talking blasphemously to herself about her service of the great goddess and how on this day of days the goddess had deserted her.

"So my life is to repeat itself, is it?" the boy heard her mutter, as she went up the slope with the particular aberrations of her way of moving when she was excited, which might be described as a limp and a jerk followed by a hop, exaggerated to a ridiculous degree, "always to repeat itself, is it? And there's never, never, never, never to be anything the matter! What's the matter? O I'll go and see if anything's the matter! The matter with my knees perhaps as I pray to you! With my voice perhaps as I sing hymns to you! With the floor of your shrine perhaps, with the echo of your arches perhaps, with the smoke of your incense perhaps? Or could it possibly be, that what the matter is, that you aren't in your temple at all? Just somewhere else!"

Muttering and babbling in this blasphemous way Patraia stumbled up the slope towards the temple and vanished from his view among the many marble buildings that surrounded the central shrine. Left alone without the fly, or the moth, or the old midwife, or, for all he felt of her presence, the Goddess either, Nisos himself began slowly ascending the slope. Strange thoughts flitted through his head as placing one foot carefully and pensively in front of the other, and then the other in front of it, and then repeating the process, he mounted that grassy hill.

Since it was not the time for any particular celebration, or for the performance of any particular ritual, this ascent to the Temple and to its agglomeration of marble buildings, interspersed by the wooden houses of the priests and the still rougher and cruder hovels, mostly constructed of tattered sail-cloth and twisted withy-twigs of the slaves of the priests, was at that moment almost entirely deserted.

Surrounded therefore by an atmosphere of consecrated silence our young friend had one of those opportunities that come to us all at rare moments of really "collecting", as we have come to call it, his wandering thoughts; and, as often happened when he was alone, his mind journeyed into a cloudy realm composed of an entirely imaginary circle of things and people.

This circle, person by person, and background by background, was his future, that far-off future, into which by the help of what he felt so strongly within him, what to himself he always called his "cleverness", he was certain he would one day come.

Where many island children watching their companions being scolded for behaving badly would say to themselves: "I am good, I am!" Nisos would say to himself: "I am clever, I am!" and he had an absolute faith that, if he didn't die by a violent death, he would one day be the memorable figure of his epoch. He never defined, or tried to analyse precisely, of what the power within him which he called his "cleverness" consisted.

His mother always told her neighbour, the lady of Druinos, that it consisted of a gift for subtle flattery and of a genius for propitiating older and wiser people. But of his real secret ambition he never spoke to his mother. The only person who had the faintest inkling of what it was, for nothing would have induced him to talk to Petraia about it, was his friend Tis, the herdsman.

But what in his hidden heart he actually imagined himself becoming was an inspired prophet. If Petraia could be so upset by the idea of their goddess deserting her and not speaking through her as Apollo did through the oracular woman at Delphi and as the Nymph Egeria did through Petraia's twin-sister in Aricia, why shouldn't he become the voice of some Divine Being, and win respect and esteem for himself for all time by expounding that Being's philosophy?

He began to wonder what kind of divinity he would be most fitted to represent, and most happy in representing. And as he pondered on this important point he found himself staring at one particular blade of grass the top of which, the point as it were, of this brightly green dagger, had turned into a pale brown colour. The point had not shrivelled or crumpled in this transformation. It was still as smooth as the rest of that leaf of grass; but it was discoloured.

Something had bitten it or the excretion of some poisonous creature had sucked the life-blood from it; or, for all Nisos knew, this single grass-leaf with all the consciousness it possessed had uttered a curse against Zeus himself, the lord of high heaven, and had thus drawn upon itself an individual flash, especially adapted to a small object, of celestial lightning.

At first Nisos couldn't help associating this discoloured point with Petraia's unseemly outburst; but as he went on staring at it his secret dream about his own future on this island stirred within him.

"Yes, by Aidoneus," he thought, "I know what special kind of prophet I'll be, a kind that has never existed in the world before! I'll not be a prophet to the clever who are weak and timid and nervous like me. I'll be a prophet to the strong who have been hurt in some way. Yes, I'll be a prophet to the healthy and strong who are like this leaf of grass with a brown tip."

"Listen to me," I'll cry, "all you who are strong but yet are stupid; you who are hurt and hit without knowing why! Listen to me!" He stood still, imagining himself a man with a long flowing beard, taller than he was now, much more distinguished than he was now, and possessed of philosophical secrets known to no other sage in Hellas. He glanced casually up the slope in front of him. All those glittering marble buildings he knew so well were hidden by the grassy ridge at the top of the ascent and he noticed that Petraia had entirely vanished.

"She must be visiting Stratonika," he said to himself. "Yes," he thought, "I'll be a Prophet to the strong who've been hurt, and the healthy who've fallen sick! The half-dead ones, the tortured ones, the mad ones, the diseased ones have all got prophets; but strong, stupid, silly things, like this blade of grass with a brown tip, who just stares back at a person, think they don’t want a prophet; but they do! O yes! you do, stupid grass, whatever you think! You wait till I’m older and cleverer and have a beard; and you’ll soon see! It’s the stupid things that need the clever prophets!”

Having decided on his future in general, Nisos now felt a need for beginning to practise the art of prophecy in a more special and particular manner; so he began plodding steadily on, with drops of sweat falling from his forehead and his eyes upon his sandals which were discoloured by pollen-dust and rabbit-dung.

Suddenly he turned his attention, drawn by an impulse for which he couldn’t account, away from the ridge in front of him to a clump of trees on his extreme left; and he even began walking hurriedly towards it. The trees were only a portion of the group of natural objects that was now his objective. In the blazing sun and against all this greenery the many-coloured mound he was aiming for had almost a purple look.

Nisos knew the place well. It was of natural rather than artificial origin, formed by the intermingling of three separate things, a rather oddly scrawled rock, the stump of an oak, and the twisted root of an ash. Over this dusky excrescence there grew a mass of waving ferns and thick clumps of a specially dark moss; and as Nisos now advanced towards it its queer purpureal tint appeared to be spotted by blood-red patches which glowered like raw wounds in that burning sun.

Everyone who knew Ithaca knew this spot and it was locally called Lykophos or “Wolf’s Light,” a name which implied that faint grey light before dawn that was more suitable to eyes of wolves than of men. The Lykophos-Mound seemed especially prominent at this moment. Its queerly scrawled rock, its oak-stump, its ash-root, together with the sap-filled living energy of its ferns and moss and honeysuckle, and its minutely delicate early Spring flowers and their clambering foliage, accentuated just then something about it, some powerful atmospheric emanation, that always made it an object towards which certain living people and certain living creatures gravitated with magnetic or hypnotic attraction but from which others shrank away with instinctive dread.

Nisos himself was one of the former sort; but his friend Tis, the herdsman, though he used simpler words, had given the boy the impression that to him there were always shocking blood-drops oozing out of that rock; while, for all its ferns and mosses and small spring-flowers and spreading foliage, there were always raw skinless hollows between its hieroglyphic surfaces and its leaf-mould ledges that suggested festering wounds and pus-exuding sores.

Among our other friends from the porch of the palace the black house-fly was repelled much in the same way as Tis. What the fly felt every time it flew near the Lykophos-Mound was an aching void in the pit of its stomach; as if some poisonous-looking meat-cover of brassy gauze had suddenly been precipitated out of the air to surround every half-crumb of edible farinaceousness and every half-drop of absorbable stickiness in the entire world.

It was however quite calmly and thoughtfully, and yet rather doggedly, for he was anxious to pick up for his extremely human Mummy a few fragments of more ordinary, more domestic, more everyday news than had recently been bewildering him from so many thaumaturgical if not supernatural directions, that our young friend was approaching the Lykophos-Mound, when he heard in the air above his head the strangest combination of startling, terrifying, and unbelievable sounds that he'd ever heard in his life.

And as, trembling with pure terror, he looked up, he saw a sight that froze his blood. What he saw gave him the impression that he was in the midst of a nightmare and that if he burst into a wild cry himself, these other cries, together with the incredible shapes that were descending from out of the air, would cease and dissolve and sink away, shaken into nothingness by his mother's approach as she answered his frantic screams.

But not for nothing had he been brought up by a mother like Pandea and a nurse like Petraia. Not for nothing had he listened as intently as that wicked old toad of a grandfather, Damnos Geraios himself, to the tales exchanged between his mother and her grand gossip, the mother of Leipephile and Stratonika. Above all it hadn't been for nothing that he had done housework for the aged lady who had been the nurse of three generations of royalty. As, half-petrified with terror, he gazed upward at what he saw, these two wide-winged female Horrors, uttering these appalling screeches as they flapped down towards the Lykophos-Mound in the half-circle of a raven-like swoop upon their prey, he knew at once who they were. One was an Erinys, one of the Avengers of Blood or Furies, and the other was a Gorgon.

Talking about it later with the old palace-nurse he came to the conclusion that the particular Erinys who made this attack must have been Allekto, whose name means "the never-ending" and that the Gorgon who tried to help her in this attack was Euryale whose name means "the wide sea".

But at the actual moment he had this appalling experience he only knew that without question one of them was most certainly an "Erinys" or "Fury" and the other was most certainly a Gorgon. The pair were clearly much too absorbed in catching their victim off-guard to notice Nisos at all. In fact they behaved as if he were a short, branchless tree, devoid of all sensibility save of a passive vegetative kind.

He was not, however, so paralysed with terror that he couldn't stagger to the trunk of the nearest spruce-fir; from which vantage-point, and clinging to this friendly tree with both his arms, he recovered a sufficient amount of "cleverness" to begin to take careful and detailed note of this whole amazing event. Amazing it certainly was: so much so that even the tree he was so desperately clutching, with some childish idea of taking refuge from the enemies of the gods with the daughters of the earth, displayed an unmistakable sign of being troubled in its quietude; for it exuded such a large drop of sticky tar that it tickled a nerve in the boy's smooth cheek. But in spite of his trembling legs and the tickling in his cheek he didn't fail to notice that the whole being of this pursuing Fury, whom he later discovered to be Allekto, "the never-ending", was so lost, diffused, absorbed, mania-mazed and blood-crazed, in its mad punishment-lust that though at this moment she was flying, the wings she flew with were feathered with the smoke of burning carrion, while from her mouth there issued, along with a stream of poisonous saliva, such a horrible alternation of bellowing and barking and such an appalling mixture of the stench of decomposition with the stench of excremental filth that the boy, though his stomach was empty, was unable to resist the motion of vomiting; and no! never for one moment did he fail to notice that everything about her had simply become one single rushing wind of all-devouring, all-consuming vengeance.

The creature whom Allekto was half-carrying through the air with her was also a female Being, and although it was not till later that Nisos learnt that she must have been Euryale or a daughter of "the wide sea", and in fact that she was a progeny of the sea monster Keto himself, he already knew, from her tusks like those of a wild pig, and her claws of brass, and the serpents that were a living portion of her flesh and blood, and above all from that unspeakable and utterly indescribable look in her eyes that made it impossible for any other living child of the earth or of the heavens to face her glance without at least the risk of being frozen into stone with sheer terror, that she was one of the Gorgons, an immortal sister of the mortal Medusa.

While absorbed in his contemplation of these two monsters, who were now hovering round and round the Lykophos-Mound, Nisos had not yet noticed the most important person of all in this cosmic-comic burlesque show, namely the Being whom these two monsters were preparing to attack. She, he found out later, was none other than Atropos, the smallest, but at the same time the wisest and the oldest, of the three Fates, or the "Moirai", those who can, when so they wish, decide the Destiny of every man and every woman born into the world.

Young Nisos Naubolides must have had something in him of the spirit of Odysseus, though, in place of being related to the king, his father Krateros and his brother Agelaos were the only living rivals of the old hero as claimants for the kingship. But the boy certainly displayed something beyond his boasted "cleverness" when, in order to find out what really was the object of this mad attack by the Erinys and the Gorgon, he made a run to another small fir-tree-trunk and clung tightly to it.

Yes! There she was, Atropos herself, the unturning, unbending, unwavering, unrelenting, implacable Decider of mortal destinies! As Nisos saw her, she saw him, and for an incredible moment this "clever" boy who had just made up his mind to be the prophet to the strong, looked into the eyes of Fate, into the eyes of her who could decide the Destiny of any man and any woman born into this world. Yes, they looked each other full in the face.

Atropos was under a spruce-fir just as Nisos was; but she was seated beneath hers, while he was clinging to his. As he looked at her now Nisos realized that the flesh and blood of which she was made was neither the normal flesh and blood of mortals nor what he had always been taught to believe was the immortal flesh of the gods with its veins full of ichor, that divine liquid more like the sap of imperishable vegetation than the raw red stomach-turning juice that mortals call blood.

No, the boy realized as he gazed at her that the mystery of her being was far deeper than anything he had been taught to attribute to her or to her sisters. In fact the aura that hovered round her and the spirit that emanated from her were so transporting to him that the frightful noise kept up above his head by the barking and bellowing of the Fury and the still more terrifying sound, resembling a series of viscous and glutinous thunder-claps following one another like a procession of sea-blown bubbles and finally bursting as they broke into the air, made by the Gorgon, became no more than hens cackling in a yard.

Yes, the material out of which Atropos was made was clearly as different from the ichor-nourished substance of the Olympians as it was from the horn-like material of the bodies of the Erinys and Gorgon. Nor was it made of that vaporous stuff, only a little thicker than mist or spray such as composed those phantom-like forms who eternally harangued each other in Arima. No; the truth is that the longer Nisos Naubolides looked into the eyes of Fate and the longer Fate looked into the eyes of Nisos Naubolides the more clearly did the latter realize that the imperishable frame of Atropos, this “one who could not be turned”, was made of a substance drawn from a level of existence outside both time and space, though cunningly adapted to play its part in each of them.

But the boy proved how “clever” he was by imbibing like an inexhaustible draught of timeless experience much more at that moment than the mere physical nature of the oldest of the Fates; for there came over him in a trance that was more than a trance the surprising knowledge — and this, though again and again he blundered hopelessly in trying to describe it in words, was really with him to the day of his death — that Atropos helps us in the creation of our individual fate by an infinitely long series of what some would call nothing but blind, stupid, dull, dreamy, moon-struck "brown studies", many of which take place inside the walls of houses, and others when we are moving about on our ordinary errands outside.

In these interruptions of our ordinary consciousness we fall into a brainless, idea-less moment of dull abstraction in which we cease to think of anything in particular but just stare blindly and dully at some particular physical object, no matter what, that happens to be there at the moment. This object, in itself of no particular interest, and never selected for its real purpose is merely an object to stare at, lean upon, rest against and use as a trance-background, or brown-study foreground, or, if you like, like a shoal beneath a stranded consciousness, or a reef of brainless abstraction, wherein we simply escape for a moment from the trouble of being a conscious creature at all.

Nisos showed how born he was to be an interpreter if not a prophet by his complete acceptance — as from the trunk of his spruce-fir he faced the Mistress of Fate as she leaned against the trunk of her spruce-fir — of the revelation that our individual destiny is made up of an accumulation of brainless, uninspired, brown-study moments of abstraction wherein we cease to be organic living creatures and almost become inanimates, almost become things of wood and stone and clay and dust and earth, almost become what we were before we were intelligent or instinctive creatures: almost — but not quite!

For, as our young friend looked Atropos in the face, there was permitted to him what is permitted to few among us mortals during our lifetime, namely the realization of what actually happens to us when we fall, as we all do, into these day-dreams. At that moment, as Nisos Naubolides now knew well, all over the surface of the earth there were living creatures, many of them men, women, and children, many of them horses, cattle, lions, wolves, foxes, wild asses and tame pigs, sheep and goats, rats and mice, who were standing or crouching, lying or sitting in one of these brooding trances when dazed and dreaming, we are asleep and yet not asleep.

For Nisos at this moment almost all the inhabitants of the earth, at least such as were not included in his school-geography-books, were “blameless Ethiopians”; and what he conjured up at that instant over the entire face of the earth’s surface were millions of men no different from those he knew so well, no different from the king and the king’s son, no different from his own father, Krateros Naubolides, or from the old man, Damnos Geraios, or from his own familiar bosom-crony, Tis, the herdsman from the other end of Ithaca, all of whom, as they went about their affairs, fell now and again into these day dreams of fate where, asleep and yet not asleep, they created without knowing it their future destiny.

And as he looked into the eyes of Atropos he seemed to become the blood-brother, the “Kasi”, or school-camerado, of all these day-dreamers, till their dream was his dream, and without any “pomposizing,” or processioning in the manner of Hermes, he became aware that with this whole great multitude, including not only his fellow-men but all creatures upon the earth, he was, without knowing it, living a double life, in fact two quite separate lives, one in this world and one in some other world.

“Why it’s just as if,” he said to himself, “I was in one of those dreams when I know I’m dreaming, and could, if I wanted to, wake up, quite naturally, easily, and without any particular effort, rather than go on dreaming.”

He was beginning to feel almost reassured, when suddenly he received an extremely unpleasant and thoroughly disconcerting shock. He beheld those two hovering Horrors make a downward swoop towards the Spruce-Fir against which Atropos was leaning. It was a shock that gave him a very disagreeable sensation, a sensation as if his heart-beats, his pulses, his quick-drawn breaths had been pounded into one single blood-dripping welter, and that this welter of automatic physical functionings might at any moment absorb the attention of his whole conscious being.

"What on earth can be going on in her head," he thought, "to give me such a feeling?" And then without warning, and still under the power of her eyes his entire mind became concentrated upon the old Odysseus. "I'm not going to endure," he thought, "no! not one day longer, this wretched plot that father and Agelaos and the rest of them are working up against the old man. Arsinöe's with them of course. That's only natural since she's a Trojan. But none of the rest of us are Trojans! What's come into us, what's come over us, that we're so against the old man?"

The unpleasant sensation he had just been through of feeling as if the beating of his heart, the flicker of his eyelids, the throb of his pulses, the breath of his lungs, had got mixed together in one raw palpitating bubble of blood-streaked eruption, now began, as Nisos disentangled himself from this reeking blood-sweating mass, to take its due proportion in his mind as he connected it with the drowsy passivity of his body, and not only of his body, but of all the bodies of all the human and sub-human creatures as they pause in their work or in their play, in their hunting or in their fighting, to forget themselves in day-dreams and trances.

And it was then that Nisos realized that not only heroes and kings and prophets and soothsayers but all living things are subject to an unseen, unfelt, unrecognized fate, and that it is this fate whose current flows, above or below, it matters not which, the heart-beats and pulse-beats of the lives of us all.

And the boy finally realized that there are points in our lives that we ourselves think of as turning points, but which, under the eyes of Atropos, the one with whom is no turning, are in reality only the fulfilment of our inherent destiny.

The boy had hardly reached this conclusion when the threatened attack began. The Erinys and the Gorgon descended with a sickening stench from their foul throats, with a horrible hissing from their bosom serpents, with an excremental vapour from their festering flesh and putrid scales, and with a screaming and a barking that silenced every bird and every wind.

It had nothing to do with the eyes of Atropos, for they had left him perforce — the instinctive impulse with which the boy now flung himself into the midst of that terrible struggle. The final issue may not have been in doubt; but Nisos was too young, and, just then too wild with desperate courage and too dazed by supernatural shocks to think of anything but his physical contact with that pair of Horrors and with their serpents and their stench and the sounds they made and with their appalling strength.

One comfort he had as he fought on, gasping and sweating, to free that oldest of all the beneficent powers in the world from those two demons, and that was nothing less than her own faint though very clear voice, encouraging him.

Another comfort he had was the uninterrupted humming of small insects round the Lykophos-Mound. These little creatures seemed quite oblivious of what was going on. Up and down across the surface of the rock they flew, dodging one another with quivering antennae and hovering wings; while first one, and then another, snatched a sip of Nectar from between petals of flowers so delicate that from their disturbed rims rose no sounds audible to human ears; though to lesser insects no doubt they sounded with the rain-drop clarity of tiny bells.

But what gave the boy a strength beyond his years was not only the fact that the oldest of all the goddesses was calling upon him to aid her, but that, although her voice was as faint as the remote sound of the sea-wind in a sea-shell, it was a voice with the most far-reaching echo he had ever heard.

For the echo of the voice of Atropos was no ordinary echo. It was a special and peculiar one, and it responded to every syllable that the old creature uttered; for through the substances of all the material elements of which the Island of Ithaca was composed this small faint echo of the oldest of the Fates could pass. Through substances that seemed bent on resisting its passing this echo easily and naturally passed. The old Fate’s voice went forth first; and then the echo followed it like a faithful disciple doing the will of its master. Passing through everything that resisted them they went on; till they reached the yawning void where all echoes cease.

And the echo of the voice of Atropos had the peculiarity of entering into all the substances that carried it forward, as well as using them to help it on its way towards the ultimate void. The echo entered now into the fluttering insects who were sucking the Nectar from those tiny flowers. It entered into the burning sun above those three immortals and above this one mortal just as it entered into the heart of the Lykophos-Mound.

The curious thing was that the boy accompanied his final terrific effort with his human hands and feet against the two monsters by a low-murmured, very rapidly enunciated, rational argument, defending his own and his mother’s friendly attitude towards the old king of Ithaca compared with the hostile one of his father Krateros and his brother Agelaos.

It was indeed only when he reached the culmination of this rapidly murmured, rational, and almost legal argument, with which he was punctuating, so to speak, his violent physical struggles, that he suddenly discovered that the battle had been won and that the Fury and the Gorgon had vanished. In his relief at this consummation, just when the throes of the struggle had become more than he could bear, the boy lost consciousness.

When he recovered he found that Atropos also was gone and that it required so much effort to leave the Lykophos-Mound and to drag himself up the rest of the hill that all that had passed grew steadily more blurred and more indistinct. One thing alone limned itself clearly on his mind, like a reflected image in water amid a crowd of globular bubbles, and that was some reference made, either by himself or by the oldest of the Fates, to a certain woven stuff.

This stuff he kept visualizing; but the shock to his nerves of what he had been through had made him completely forget its name. He remembered that the whole matter of this stuff had to do with some difficulty in procuring it and some difficulty with regard to its fabrication. He could see its colour. He could sense the feel of its substance, but its name and its use, though both of these had been familiar to him from his infancy, he had completely forgotten.

The shock he had received from the sight of those two monstrous creatures had left a queer blackness, a gaping, yawning, bleeding chasm in the compact body of his natural and orderly memories.

“I am myself,” he kept repeating as he climbed the hill. “Nisos is Nisos; and Nisos is clever; and Nisos is going to be the prophet of those who are strong and healthy but who have been hit in some way — hit as I am now! — and who need a prophet rather different from former prophets.”

And then in a flash it all came back to him and the gap in his memory was filled. “Othonia” was the word; and sail-cloth was the stuff. Atropos had told him — so he had had it from the Mouth of Necessity Itself — that

Zeus, alone on the summit of Mount Gargaros, deprived of his thunder-bolts and separated from Hera his Queen, had decided to unite all the will-power and wisdom he possessed with the will-power and wisdom possessed by Themis, the goddess of what was orderly and seemly, and with whatever Atropos herself, the oldest of the Fates, she who was Fate Itself, decided might be for the best.

And what was "for the best", here and now in Ithaca, was that Odysseus their lord and king should hoist sail again and depart for the Isles of the Blessed whither Menelaos, the brother of Agamemnon, had already sailed.

So that was it! And the little black spot in his rattled brain was no more than "othonia", a rag of sail-cloth, a woven wisp of crumpled weed, which had been completely obliterated, swept forth, cast away, blotted out from his terrestrial brain by the stench of those loathsome immortals! Othonia! Othonia! Othonia! Sails! Sails! Sails! Sails for whatever ship Odysseus can build, Sails for whatever crew Odysseus can find, to carry him on his last voyage across the sea!

It was in this first blush of his relief at the recovery of his memory that Nisos Naubolides suddenly felt himself seized by the wrist. He had been so absorbed in his thoughts that he had not noticed the man approaching him; but there at his side was the mysterious Priest of Orpheus. "COME!" was all the man said.

Nisos, who felt that if he could only avoid looking at the fellow's face he could cope with him perfectly, tried to pull his arm away. But this he found he couldn't do. And how queer it was that he couldn't look at him! Only an hour ago he had looked into the face of Euryale, the Gorgon, without being turned to stone. In the eyes of Fate Itself he had been finding comfort; but not with a secretive, intrusive wretch who wasn't even a priest of Dionysus, or of Demeter, or of Persephone or of the authentic Mysteries of Eleusis, but only of these newfangled, sanctimonious, priest-invented, fabulous Mysteries, of an Orpheus who himself was more of a fantastic poet than a hero or demigod, he felt entirely paralysed.

So here was he, Nisos Naubolides, the favoured one of the oldest of the Fates, one who was fated to use his cleverness, when he became a man, to grand prophetic effect, here was he, for some mad, mystical, demoniac reason, unable even to glance at the face of this crafty intruder! “Well,” the boy said to himself, “I know I heard old Damnos Geraios, Leipephile’s grand-dad, tell mother once that there were certain papyri which absorb certain pigments and others that cannot absorb them. So I suppose my particular kind of ‘cleverness’, though it may have Fate Itself on its side, would be entirely wasted on this man.”

By this time the man in question had conducted him to a sinister-looking square building, “Go in there and learn reverence!” was all he said as he pushed him in and barred the door behind him.

Nisos was so relieved at being liberated from the man’s touch, and from the nearness of a face he felt he couldn’t bring himself even to glance at, that the first thing he did was to clap his hands. “Well!” he said to himself, “as long as I don’t have that filthy sod hanging around, I don’t care what happens!”

What had happened was indeed a curious experience for a young prince of the House of Naubolides. He found himself enclosed in an extremely small and absolutely square cell that was nakedly bare from the centre of its ceiling to the centre of its floor. Ceiling, walls, floor, were all of the same stone and this stone was of a most unusual colour. He tried in vain to think of any object he knew that was of this peculiar colour. The nearest he could get to it was a thunder-cloud he had once seen when he was very little reflected in a muddle of rain-water near the cow-sheds of his home.

He stood on one leg for a second which was a custom of his when dumbfounded. But he soon brought his foot down again and remained with his heels together and his eyes fixed on things far beyond the queer-coloured walls that surrounded him.

The point he was considering now was simply this. Why should his natural awe and pious dread in the presence of the oldest of the Fates have produced in him no shrinking at all but on the contrary an indignant protectiveness and an unbounded respect, while the mere touch of this Priest of Orpheus, not to speak of the appalling disgust roused by the thought of seeing his face, made him shiver all over? Without having to separate either of his heels again, remove either of his feet from that weirdly coloured stone floor, Nisos decided that what really made the difference was that Atropos, like the Goddess Athene, had been well known to him from babyhood. His cradle so to speak had been rocked to the rhythm of the Three Fates and to the Rhythm of Athene's name. He didn't put it to himself in those exact words; but that was the substance of what he now thought.

But there was more in it than that. There was something else that was much harder to put into words, whether only to clear it up for himself, or to explain it, if he had to explain it later, to his mother. The oldest of the Fates was in reality much more like himself than this terrible priest of none knew what. She fought for her friends as he did. She felt pity for that poor old Zeus left lonely on the peak of Gargaros without his thunder-bolts, just as, if he ever thought of the All-Father at all, he would have felt pity himself.

And the same with Pallas Athene. She was one for telling huge palpable lies. And he had to do that himself. That was necessary in life's ups and downs. He had to do it every day! When he became the Prophet of the strong and healthy who have been hurt and hit in some way, he would show them the importance of being clever! But when this Priest talked of reverence it was clear he meant something quite different from proper piety.

Did these "Orphic Mysteries" which this weird new kind of Priest celebrated mean some blasphemous and horrible change in the proper manner of worship? Once again Nisos lifted up his right foot and stood on one leg thinking hard, like a young sand-piper pretending to be a heron.

"This must be," he said to himself, "one of those moments in the life of a clever prophet when he has to think about thinking. What the teachers at School say is always: 'Think, Nisos! Think, Kasi! Think, Agelaos!' But if you're going to be a prophet — you've got to do more than think. Any fool can think. You've got to think about thinking."

Finding however that the position in which a person thinks about thinking has an appreciable effect on his thought Nisos returned his right foot to that queerly-coloured floor with some violence. "We can't think properly about thinking," he thought, "without bringing in ourselves. Atropos has to be Fate unswerving or she cannot think. Athene has to be the natural daughter of Zeus' brain or she cannot think. Was this new kind of priest not thinking of himself at all but, busy in the establishment of some Secret Society, or Holy Cause, or Community Conspiracy, compared with whose dark and inhuman and impersonal purpose, he himself, the man Enorches, was as nothing?

"When I think," the embryo prophet now told himself, "I think like Athene and like Atropos and like the old Odysseus, from myself outwards. But I have a revolting suspicion that, when this horrible Orpheus-man thinks, he thinks towards himself inwards."

It may have been partly due to the queerly-coloured stone-work of this square cell, but our young friend's mind at this point turned, as if automatically, to an interior vision of those two letters carved upon the oldest Pillar in the Porch of the Palace. He felt, as he thought of those letters, as if they were engraved upon the substance of his own soul.

"From now on," he told himself, "I shall dodge, avoid, and undermine in every way I possibly can, these infernal 'Mysteries of Orpheus'." Having decided this point the youthful challenger looked round him more carefully than he had done before. Yes, this chamber into which that man had thrust him was certainly a naked one! It was as if he were imprisoned inside a hard, square, semi-precious stone: a stone that, with him inside, might have been worn by some tremendous titanic giant, a giant as big as Atlas who was reported to hold up the sky.

The boy had been thinking too hard, thinking with a cleverness that had become a strain. His nerves now began to behave as if they might in a little while make the sound of popping, after the manner of certain seed-pods. In pure nervousness he began to do funny things. He went up to the wall directly under a little square hole, that let in all the light the place had, and began to scrabble at it with his nails; at nothing in particular, just at the wall.

But this silliness was brought to an end by his wondering if it were possible that there might be — but this was probably only a little less silly — any scratches on these walls that resembled that "U" and that "H" on the base of the Pillar in the Palace-Porch. "Apparently," he thought, as he looked carefully about him, "to escape in soul from a Priest of Orpheus is easier than to escape in body!"

But he set himself the task of examining his prison in the manner in which he fancied his old friend, Myos the fly, would have examined it if he had been the one to show scant reverence to Orpheus. In his nervous excitement Nisos almost laughed aloud when he imagined Pyraust, the moth-girl, asking Myos to tell her who Orpheus was, and the fly describing him to the moth as the first original spider.

But he now meticulously examined every one of these four walls dutifully thanking as he did so the sky-god Ouranos, Zeus' grandfather, for the light that came from a small half-a-foot-square window near the top of one of them. He was growing nervous again now. With his birthday in sight, for he would be seventeen in a few days, he felt he must hurry up with his mental development if he were to be recognized by the whole Island as the Prophet to the strong by the time his brother, duly married to Leipephile Pheresides, had inherited their father's claim to be king in succession to Odysseus or even — here he looked round in real apprehension now; for where, in the name of Zeus, was the door through which he'd been thrust into this place? — even instead of Odysseus!

"Oh popoi!" he groaned. "Was there ever such a fool as I am? Of course it's to stop Odysseus from hoisting sail like a real king and to keep him petering out in his palace till he dies of idleness, or what Mummy calls 'malakia' or some such word, that Dad and Agelaos have been hiding up for years all the 'othonia' or sail-cloth they can get hold of!

"If ever," Nisos thought, "there has been a fool in Ithaca I am that fool!" But he had no sooner "given himself to the crows", as the island saying had it, as the greatest fool among all the "kasis" or class-mates of his age from coast to coast, than he suddenly become certain he had caught sight of the Pillar's "U" and "H".

Madly he rushed towards those scratches and pressed against them with both his bare hands. By Zeus, the Pillar had saved him! A great stone in the wall moved outwards, fell silently on a bed of moss outside, and lay there motionless. In the sun that stone took to itself a completely different colour from the one that had characterized it within those walls.

It struck the boy, as he jumped upon it, and jumped away from it, and ran off free, that that heavy stone looked as if it were drinking in, in that one second, enough air and sun to give it a new colour for a thousand years!

CHAPTER IV

A FEW DAYS after the momentous encounter between the oldest but far the most powerful of the Three Fates and the boy Nisos who had now reached the age of seventeen, the hero Odysseus awoke in the grey “wolf-light” of the pre-dawn, and, with nothing on but his blanket, his sandals, and his broad ox-hide belt, scrambled down the ladder and shuffled across the intervening space to the Dryad’s hollow tree.

It must be confessed that on this occasion the old king was the awakener of the old Dryad, and not the other way round. It gave Odysseus indeed something of a shock when, in that pallid “wolf-light”, with one hand on the soft-crumbling edge of the phantom-grey orifice, he peeped down upon the crumpled heap of faded substances, patches of linen, pieces of cloth, bits of bone, fragments of withered flesh, tangled twists of lichen-coloured female hair, in fact all the accessories and visible appendages of what might well have been an aged human female’s bed, including the old lady herself reposing within it.

The patches of linen and cloth were so pitiably the kind of objects that a wandering female beggar would have picked up in her capricious travels that Odysseus drew back with that sort of instinctive reluctance to disconcert a sleeping female that any male householder might feel who finds such an one slumbering in one of his out-houses.

But, along with this feeling, another and a very different one came over him as once more he thrust his bowsprit beard and his massive almost bald skull over the edge of that crumbling orifice.

This was a much more intimate and personal feeling, though sex and sex-shyness entered into it. It was indeed the sort of self-restrained courtesy on the relations between the sexes such as Odysseus had learnt as a child from his mother, Anticleia, the sophisticated daughter of the crafty and mischievously magnanimous Autolycus. In an island-palace such as theirs, crowded with alien visitors from half the coasts of Hellas, some kind of calculated refinement in ordinary personal contact was essential; and it was the dignified reserve of such well-brought-up behaviour that the old man felt he had outraged by peering down upon this sleeping old woman, as she lay half-naked amid her long-accumulated bits of human finery like some moribund forest-fungus that had just managed to survive the winter.

"I must wake the old creature somehow," he thought, "for if I'm to carry through this touchy business of appealing to the people in open 'agora' I must find out more about these strangers from Thebes who've got the daughter of Teiresias in their keeping, and the Dryad is the only one who can help me."

He turned his pointed beard to the West without getting any inspiration. Then he turned it to the East and despatched across all the forests and mountains and seas and swamps and deserts that separated him from the land of the blameless Ethopians what he felt to be the swiftest kind of prayer. "What actually is it that I have done," he asked himself, "to vex her as much as this?" And he drew a sigh that really came without any pretence from the very bottom of his being, "I've prayed to her as if my prayer were a wave, a wave that must bring her back. Yes, I've sent a wave to the Eastern edge of the world! It's a wave of the sea I've sent; only it's not merely making a furrow of sea-water; it's making a furrow of earth-mould, a furrow of broken branches, a furrow through all the forests of the Mainland till the Mainland itself reaches the edge of the earth!"

The old man’s pointed beard seemed to follow his thought as if it possessed the power of transforming itself into the wave its owner was imagining. “But what sort of thing is the edge of the earth,” Odysseus wondered; “and do the blameless Ethiopians peep over that edge as I peeped just now at the sleep of the Dryad?”

As he pondered on this, he saw in his mind a terrific chasm of absolute darkness along the fringe of which hung suspended gigantic smoke-blackened shapeless rocks, beneath which there was nothing but a hollow bottomless abyss. And then it seemed to the king, as he imagined himself lying on his stomach on one of these blackened rocks and staring down into the abyss, that he saw the sun coming up out of that unspeakable gulf.

“Do the blameless Ethiopians,” he wondered, “ever fall over that frightful edge?” He imagined the great goddess who was his friend, standing there in all her divine beauty, with the terrible Aegis-shield on her arm, its magic tassels dark with the darkness of the gulf of Erebos, while from her breastplate glared forth upon all who dared approach her the dreadful head of Medusa, the dead Gorgon, with the still living hair of its twining serpents feeding on the obscure mystery of its human fate.

Standing motionless the old man gazed for a long moment over that imaginary world’s edge. “She would be with me if she could,” he murmured aloud; and then shrugged his shoulders. “The gods with me or the gods against me,” he thought, “I shall do what I shall do; and what will come of it will be what will come of it!”

He then swung round but instead of leaning against the uneven edge of crumbling and rotten wood and peering down at the sleeping old creature as he had done at first, he now proceeded to call upon her by name; thus giving her an opportunity to arrange her appearance a little before presenting herself. There was enough light to catch her expression fully and clearly when, after a couple of minutes delay, she appeared at the entrance to her hollow tree.

"What — is — it?" she groaned hoarsely. "Has Krateros Naubolides attacked the Palace?"

The old king smiled under cover of his beard. "Not yet, my friend, not quite yet. But no doubt if the Palace doesn't take precautions and take them quickly too he will attack us before we know where we are. And that, my dear old friend, is precisely why I have come to disturb you so early. I feel ashamed of myself for breaking up your dream but there's something I'm very anxious to know, and you are the only mortal or immortal, the only Nymph of land or sea, who can help me to attain this knowledge."

Never in all his days had the crafty old wanderer seen such a look of unmitigated beatitude as rushed into the haggard face of Dryad! "O my dear child!" she cried, "I never thought the Olympians would give me a chance to" — Here the ancient creature had to struggle grimly with a rush of up-surging sobs— "to help the son of Laertes at a real crisis in his life. And I never would have presumed to push myself forward, whatever knowledge I might happen to have, without some sign, some invitation, some request, at least some permission, some opportunity, some door ajar. But now that you yourself have spoken, my dear lord, and have as the Persians say, stretched out your sceptre towards me, I can tell you all I know."

"Tell me, old friend, tell me quick; so that I can act at once. It has become fatally clear to me at last, though it took many days to make me believe it, that my wise goddess and ever-faithful protectress must have hurried away in anger and contempt from our wretched and ignoble quarrels and from this 'complicated world-crisis' as our more pompous contemporaries will love to call it, though of course, as you and I know well, if every battle between Gods and Titans is a 'world-crisis' our poor old world has never been free from one. Yes, it is natural enough that she should do what our great Olympians have always done at a crisis, gone off; gone off to recover her faith in the natural piety of humanity by enjoying for a while the innocent worship of these guileless races. And so, my dear friend, I'll put to you without further delay, the question I should have implored our great Goddess to answer. It is this.

"I have been assured by Eurycleia that the maiden Eione who has lately come to serve in our household, and who is, she herself declared, when I found her in the Cave of the Naiads, a sister of our excellent herdsman Tis, has revealed in recent conversations the discovery of an extremely important secret.

"It was to reveal this discovery to her faithful brother Tis that Eione came here from the opposite end of Ithaca. Eurycleia indeed assures me that Moros, who is Eione's grandfather and also the grandfather of our faithful Tis, has discovered that there is a formidable pair of foreigners, calling themselves Zenios and Okyrhöe, who have occupied for several years — nobody seems to know exactly for how long — a lonely and desolate farmhouse on the extreme sea-verge of a rocky headland that has been deserted for generations and left to fall into ruin. There are springs of fresh water in that lonely place, there are remains of several walls and even the remnants of a few wooden fences but the ground that was once protected by these things has been so blighted by sea-winds that it is doubtful if any grain would grow there now; and, if it did, it is certain its chance of its surviving the depredations of beasts and birds would be small.

"But grand-dad Moros swore to Eione — you're listening to me, aren't you, old friend? — that this queer foreign couple came here from Thebes after the death of Cadmus and that they brought with them enough treasure to keep them for a hundred years. And grand-dad Moros declares further that he has spoken with both Zenios and Okyrhöe and has learnt from them that they have under their protection in their half-ruined dwelling a young maiden who is the living daughter of the great prophet Teiresias.

"Eione's grand-dad swears he has been told by this couple, who have several times welcomed him to a lavish meal in their lonely refuge, whose local name is Ornax, that this young daughter of Teiresias, who has inherited from her father a startling amount of his prophetic inspiration, declares that if Odysseus does not sail from Ithaca this Spring on his last voyage he will die miserably in his bed, yes! in his bed in his ancient palace, of an ignoble disease flung upon him out of the deep sea by his deadly enemy Poseidon. Unlike other youthful prophets this young girl has never once contradicted, never once altered by a single breath, this terrible prediction. Her protectors Zenios and Okyrhöe swore to old Moros again and again, so Eione tells Eurycleia, that if ever Teiresias' daughter whose name, it seems is Pontopereia, came here, with this prophecy of hers, she would inevitably convince us all of its truth."

The aged Dryad gave two or three jerky hops forward till she stood on a heap of last year's dead oak-leaves. Here she became more erect than Odysseus had ever seen her; and raising her withered arms above her head she began clasping and unclasping her gnarled fingers tightly round the back of her neck.

"O my child, my child," she murmured. "Say the words, only say the words, and I will help you to the limit of my power and — and — —" Here the old lady broke off, under the strength of her emotion. " —— and beyond the limit!" she added in a gasping whisper.

"You mean, my dear friend," said Odysseus quietly, "that by the laws of decency and order that the world owes to Themis and to which Zeus himself bows, it would be improper for you, a mortal Nymph, to help me, a mortal man, before I had prayed and implored you to do so?"

The Dryad nodded furiously. "And we are further," he went on, "since both of us are doomed to die, we are further obligated by the ineluctable courtesies of the cosmos to accept whatever comes of such an appeal for help made by a mortal man to a mortal Nymph? Isn't that so, old friend?"

And once more the Dryad nodded; but this time resignedly rather than passionately.

"Well then, old sweetheart," the crafty hero concluded, "I do most earnestly beg your help in this difficult situation, but unluckily" — and it would have been clear enough to Penelope, had it been she who was just then listening to the old king, that this heroic courtesy in face of the unregulated chaos of life was extremely unpalatable to the old creature to whom it was offered— "it looks to me as if, since I am a man who cannot escape death, by reason of my association with the body of my mother, and since you are not one of these immortal nymphs of fountain and grove and cave and river but like myself are doomed to old age, it seems that even working together we shall find it no easy task to get out of this appalling dilemma: but easy or hard, I will lay it before you, old friend, exactly as it is."

He made a sign with his hand towards a large mossy stone a few paces to the North of her decayed and crumbling tree-trunk; and here they both sat down. "I understand from Eurycleia," he went on, "and she of course gets all her knowledge of the tricks of our enemies from" — but catching a look on his companion's face that he knew only too well, Odysseus interrupted his appeal for help and his tale of difficulties by reminding the Dryad that the aged Eurycleia was being assisted in the palace by the boy Nisos who was the younger son of Krateros Naubolides, the chief enemy of their House, as well as by the simple-minded maiden Leipephile who was betrothed to Krateros' elder son.

"You see, old friend, we over-praised warriors of the last war before the last, are reduced, when our hoards of golden loot are exhausted, to living upon our native acres with very scanty attendants and upon pretty meagre fare, and if among these attendants there are some like the girl Arsinöe, who are captives of our bow and our spear, most of them are no different from the ordinary retainers of any well-do-do landowner."

What he had seen in his old friend's face that led him into reminding her of all this was a dark-scaled shadow of coiling jealousy that at the mention of Eurycleia's name rose like the crest of a venomous tree-toad into the Dryad's eyes.

But he hurried on now, speaking much faster, and clearly hoping by the mere rush of his words to drive back this moribund demon into its hiding-place amid the rotting roots of ancient hate.

"What I've decided to do now, my friend, is what I've been planning in the marrow of my bones for many and many a day; yes! you can guess what I mean. I've decided to call such an assembly of the men of Ithaca as there has not been for twenty years! To this assembly held in the agora, just as was the one about which they've so often told me when Telemachos made his great speech — and it's ironical to think how absolutely impossible it is even to imagine his making a speech like that today — I've decided to appeal in person on behalf of my desire to hoist sail for the last time. I've decided to implore the people to help me finish the ship I've begun in the Cave of the Naiads. I've decided to implore them to furnish me with all the sail-cloth I need.

"And with this sail-cloth I shall hoist upon a mighty mast such a sail as has never been seen before upon any sea."

They were seated so close to each other on that mossy stone that each of them was conscious of the smell of the other’s skin. The skin of Odysseus smelt in the nostrils of the old Dryad like a particular kind of sea-weed she was always especially anxious to keep from encroaching upon one of her favourite rock-pools where an uncultivated tract of land to the north of her dying oak-tree bordered on the sea.

The skin of the Dryad on the contrary smelt in the nostrils of the old king like an especially rare and fragrant fungus that grew out of the bark of the most ancient stumps of long dead trees.

Neither of the two old friends suffered the least distress from this vivid consciousness of the smell of the other’s skin. In fact a very curious phenomenon was the result of this mutual awareness, a sensuous result and a psychic result, and a result which gave each of them a peculiar pleasure. The fact is that from now on they would both enjoy summoning back at will, from, below their most sacred and secret shrines of intimately erotic “pot-pourri”, the separate smells of their separate skins fused together in one delicately united smell which was neither that of sea-weed nor of fungus but rather of those divine rock-roses of the land of the Graiai, the land that is called Kisthene, and that lies beyond Okeanos.

It was the Dryad and not the King who was the first to break the enchantment that had begun to wrap these two old friends round and about in its fatal folds as if with the invisible mantle of Urania, the heavenly Muse. “And now tell me, child of Laertes, what it is that in my crumbling corruption and my deciduous decomposition, I can do to help you fulfil your daring plan? Tell me, tell me, only tell me; and you’ll soon see what an old Nymph, even if she is destined unlike the Naiads and the Nereids, to perish utterly, can do to help you!”

"Well, it is like this, old friend," and the cunning Wanderer gave her one swift sidelong glance out of his deep-sunken, glaucous-green, totally unreliable, wholly unconquerable eyes, and then, as he went on speaking, fixed his gaze on a small group of trees that was, as he well knew by this time, directly between the rock where they now sat and the little walled capitol-city of the island, "though it has been, of course, for years and even centuries, the custom with us for none but warriors, or at least none but grown-up males, to address the people's assembly in the 'agora', this custom has of late grown less strict.

"Indeed in our life-time, as you, old friend, will remember, these assemblies of our traditional city-life have not only been open to all our people, but have been subjected to all manner of natural and even domestic interruptions. Now do you catch, my dear, what I am driving at? What I want to do is to get hold of this daughter of Teiresias and have her brought here under the good influence of young Eione and my faithful Tis, not to speak of young Nisos, who naturally enough, as happens in most Hellenic families, takes the opposite side to that of his elder brother in our civil strife; I mean of course, in this case, in the struggle between our House of Laertes and their House of Naubolides. Once have her safely here on the scene and I am confident she will exert such an influence on our side that my opponents will be completely vanquished. I'm perfectly well aware of the almost imbecile stupidity of Krateros' eldest son, our young Nisos' brother and of the equally helpless imbecility of the daughter of Nosodea who is betrothed to him. Our danger does not lie with them; though the House of Naubolides as represented by these simple old-fashioned Princes has actually, as all our islanders know, older and better claims to sovereignty than has our House of Laertes.

“No! No! the danger lies in an entirely different direction. It lies in the machinations and infernal cunning of this Priest of Orpheus who, by reason of our instinctive Hellenic weakness for mysticism and the occult, can lead us astray in any devilish direction he likes. It was only by the purest accident and by the boy’s sudden remembrance of that signature of the son of Hephaistos on the Pillar in our corridor that young Nisos was saved the other day from Hades alone knows what fate at the hands of this bloody-minded priest.

“And so, my dear,” Odysseus concluded, “the great problem for me now is how I’m to get hold of this thrice-precious little prophetic maid, Pontopereia, and transport her here. I know this Ornax place, this lonely promontory by the sea. But what about this Zenios and Okyrhöe? Heaven knows who they may be! Probably they are Thebans who claim descent from Kadmos himself, and possess magic powers beyond anything we’ve ever heard of!

“Well, old friend, there is my appeal to you — clear and definite enough but most damnably difficult. However! I know what tree is the king of all trees, and I know what Nymph is the empress of all wildernesses, and since she rules by turning the wilderness into a garden — well, there we are!”

He turned his head away from the group of trees that led to the North and let his gaze rest on the Dryad at his side. Few old women in any forest have answered an old man’s questioning gaze with a more radiant look.

“I surely can give you advice in this matter, thou brave son of a brave father, and I’ll do so without delay! It is not of course by any wisdom of my own, that chance has given me my opportunity of jumping into your boat and of snatching thus boldly at the rudder. It is due entirely, as you can guess, to my goddess-friend Kleta, loveliest of the Graces.

"But listen, precious child of Laertes; listen and store away my words in the depths of your great bald skull! You know the place where our city-walls descend most steeply from the 'agora' to the harbour? And you know where there's a second pair of walls at that steepest place that lead down between the rocks in a wider bend, though they too finally arrive at the harbour, only by a more circuitous route?"

Odysseus, who was listening intently, gravely nodded. "People don't often nowadays go to the harbour by that roundabout way; for, though the shorter street is terribly steep, it's only in bad weather that it's really dangerous to man or beast. In fact so few people ever do go down to the harbour by the circular route of which I'm now speaking that there are places in it where those sweet-scented, bitter-tasting plants grow — your mother probably taught you their ancient name; but I only remember what Penelope used to call them when you first brought her here as your bride. Not a pretty name at all she used to call them!"

Again the king gravely nodded.

"Well, my child," went on the aged Dryad, "just at the point where this roundabout way leaves the straight one there is an unwalled road, narrower than a street, but more frequented than an ordinary mountain-track, which leads to the summit of that ridge of rocks which your mother always maintained the farmers up there called "Cuckoo-Throne" or "Kokkys-Thronax", but for which your father Laertes had a grander name that I've forgotten. But never mind the name! What I have to tell you now, my dear, is more important than the name of any ridge of rocks. The folk who dwell up here, when you get to the top, are almost all small farmers. Their houses, however, are large and look very comfortable from the outside.

"But you know that rocky ridge I'm talking about better than I do; so it's silly to go on describing it to you. Anyhow, among the farm-houses up there — and part of this ridge must be nearly as high as Neritos — there's a farm-house called Agdos where lives in complete loneliness a middle-aged farm-labourer of the name of Zeuks. This Zeuks has, as you can imagine, been so laughed at and so teased because of the resemblance of his name to that of Zeus, the supreme Ruler of gods and men, that he has become extremely eccentric and will only plough and sow and dig ditches and plant roots and prune trees for those among the farmers up there who use his name respectfully and never laugh at him because of it.

"In all these matters of words and letters, Odysseus my dear, I am as ignorant as this poor Zeuks, but I have the intelligence to know that if a farmer wants to get work from a hired man who isn't a slave he's got to treat him with respect."

The winner of the arms of Achilles once more nodded in grave acquiescence; but in his heart he thought: "When I hoist sail again I shall need no tying to the mast to keep me from the Isle of the Sirens!"

"It was," continued the old Dryad, "because of his hatred of being laughed at, that Zeuks began to leave the island on short fishing excursions on board a small schooner called 'the Starling', and it was on these excursions, upon which he was entirely alone, that he enlarged, so to speak, the nature of his booty or loot and took to indulging in a little cautious piracy.

"For several years it was the prevailing idea among the farmers of Kokkys-Thronax that their whimsical neighbour Zeuks had discovered not only a particularly profitable sand-bank for fishing, but a particularly profitable market for his fish. The barns of Zeuks' solitary homestead seemed to grow, autumn by autumn, fuller of the well-salted meats most necessary for the nourishment of strong men, and, spring by spring, of the honeyed sweet-meats most savoured at the festivals by women and children.

“But now, listen carefully to me, thou son of my lord Laertes. On the high ridge up there for three successive nights a great mist came out of the sea. This was long before your marriage with Penelope and she knew no more about the thing than you do yourself. It was your mother who knew all; and it was your mother who told me all. When those three nights were over — and you must understand, Odysseus, that it was then the identical time of year that we have reached today — very strange stories began to spread far and wide over our island. It was rumoured that during the three days when the unusual sea-mist covered that high ridge this unaccountable farm-labourer Zeuks had actually succeeded in bringing across the sea from Crete or Naxos, — Naxos I think it was, but I’m completely ignorant of everything outside what I call my ‘garden’ and how it could have been that a crazy one like this farm-labourer who wouldn’t labour if you didn’t treat him like the son of a prince, could do what no hero has ever done I cannot explain — succeeded I say in bringing across the sea and to that very ridge above our harbour, a living pair of immortal, super-magical, demogorgonic horses, Pegasos, born of the blood of Medusa and born with wings, and Arion, born of Demeter by the semen of Poseidon, and born white as the whitest dawn but with a mane black as the blackest midnight.

“But why do you turn your head away, Odysseus? And why do you sigh with that weary, cynical, bitter sigh? Is the whole subject full of infinite weariness to your mind? Is it so riddled and perforated with what a realistic shepherd of the people like yourself probably regards as romantic rubbish?

“But I will stop, Odysseus dear, if you feel that anyone who takes seriously such crazy local rumours cannot possibly be a real practical help to you in bringing Pontopereia the daughter of Teiresias here to influence the decisions of our Assembly."

The hurt feelings in the old lady's face were so vivid, and evidently must have risen from such a deep level of her whole being, that Odysseus looked at her in amazement. Since Penelope's death his amorous propensities had been only aroused by his memories, and as these were almost entirely concerned with immortals, who by reason of having no blood in them except the liquid known as "ichor", which has such a distinct cousinship with chlorophyll, the eternal greenness in vegetation, the physical effects of emotion upon flesh and blood had rarely attracted his attention; and when he noticed them at all, for he was as self-centred as a diamond, it was with so little disturbance of his own emotions that they were less to him than rain-drops on his bowsprit beard.

"What on earth's the matter, old friend?" he enquired. "Of course I want your help, want it very much indeed, want it especially at this juncture when I've got to get hold of Teiresias' daughter but can't think of any way of doing it, except by crossing the island on my own feet and carrying the girl off, like a warm bundle over my shoulder!

"But you are a wise lady, a friend of my parents, and, I daresay, of my grand-parents too, and you know all that is rumoured from skin to skin, to say nothing of mouth to mouth, from this damned Ornax promontory to the top of this confounded 'Cuckoo-Throne' where the Agdos-place of your precious old Zeuks must be hiding those heavenly horses in his pig-sties till he can find somebody to buy them! Who but a wise girl like you, my dearest friend, could possibly have told me that there was a shy old farm-labourer, with a homestead named Agdos perched on the top of Kokkys-Thronax, or whatever it was mother called it, who had got the winged Pegasos and the black-maned Arion hidden in some creaky shed or ruined stick-house up there until he hears of a travelling merchant rich enough, and by the gods daring enough, to make him an offer? Aye! But isn't it more likely that Pegasos and Arion will hoof this poor old Zeuks into the sea, and carry their purchaser to the Moon to sell him, than that an imaginary Phoenician trader will offer to buy the winged offspring of the Gorgon and the black-maned by-blow of Poseidon's rape of the mother of us all?

"But listen, my dear," he went on; for with all his adamantine, mortised-and-tenoned, indurated, inveterate, homogeneous, impregnable, bowsprit-bearded egoism, the son of Laertes was born crudely kind and had acquired an almost supernatural discretion; and he could see that any off-hand sailorish jocularity which diminished the gravity of the startling facts the Dryad had disclosed was ill-suited to the tempo of the occasion. "It is clear that as in what you call your 'garden' you have worked at fulfilling the inscrutable intentions of our mother the earth, under whatever name she likes best to be invoked, so you have been permitted a most rare communion with every living creature, mortal or immortal, finned, furred, feathered, scaled, naked as a serpent, disembodied as a mist, such as ever has been, ever is, or ever could be associated with the surface of this rocky island.

"And when, as at this hour, in the presence of the most dangerous, crucial, important, and fatal conjunction of the Zodiacal Signs of my destiny upon earth, you my parents' oldest friend, you the world-famous Dryad of the oldest oak in Hellas, take upon yourself the piloting of my boat through the earth-waves of mould and sand and gravel and clay, the only offering I have wherewith to thank you, Kleta-Dryad, is the cry of gratitude in my heart: 'vox et praeterea nihil!' as Petraia the Midwife always says, in the language of their New Troy, about her twin-sister's Nymph in that Italian cave."

He was silent, his eyes fixed steadily upon her face, his ten fingers, with the intention no doubt, in true Odyssean style, of simulating calm, resisting the natural human tendency to clasp and unclasp themselves under the pressure of agitating and anxious thought, tugging at the fastenings of his broad belt, while he even went so far as to indulge in the motion of a long shiver.

Then he straightened himself. “Well!” he muttered: “I must have a good bath and a mighty meal and a lordly action of the bowels; and I must get hold of Nisos, and, if I can do it without scaring any of them, discuss with him and with Tis and Eione at what hour we’d better make our visit to Ornax; and whether, we’d better assume, and I fancy Eione will be our best advisor on that point, that these mysterious strangers, Zenios and Okyrhöe, have come to Ithaca from Thebes and belong to the House of Kadmos, and that they have been within their legal right according to our Hellenic tradition in possessing themselves of the person of Pontopereia, the daughter of Teiresias.

“But you are the only one, I swear to you, Kleta darling, who have given me the true clue to my fate at this supreme crisis in my turbulent life; add thus while the Sun, once more Helios Hyperion, freed forever from the yoke of Apollo, looks down upon me, and the Moon, once more the virgin Selene, freed forever from the yoke of Artemis, looks down upon me, as, in this stick-house of a stable for immortal horses, I carry on my haggling with Zeuks — not with Zeus on the top of Gargaros in Ida, but with Zeuks on the top of Kokkys-Thronax in Ithaca — what I shall have in my heart will be neither the tricks of Zenios of Ornax, nor the wiles of Zeuks of Agdos, but the wisdom of the Dryad whose garden was the cradle of Odysseus.”

With these words the crafty hero did what even his father had never done — if Laertes was his father rather than that “Father of Lies”, the great

Hermes himself — he flung his arms about the old creature's neck and kissed her with such dexterity that the protruding point of his bowsprit beard rested tenderly upon the curve of her left shoulder.

He never knew, nor did any of his household ever know, far less any of the city-dwellers between the walls, or any vineyard-owners outside the walls, what the old Dryad did when in silence he had released her, in silence had turned his back upon her, in silence had re-mounted the steps to his bedroom; but the scattered offscourings of dismembered vegetation, the sheddings from dead leaves, the tiny bits of dead sticks, the half-stripped feathers, the empty husks of grass-seed, the pale straw-heads of withered stalks, not to mention the almost invisible insects for whom these minute objects were as stately avenues of cyclopean ruins, in fact all the unconsidered and unrecorded things that in their infinite multitude made up her "garden", accepted the opinion of a small black slug who assured its neighbour, a still smaller beetle, that the gods had turned their Dryad, as they had once turned Niobe, the ancestress of the human race, into a fountain of tears.

But the sun mounted up, steadily and ever more steadily, into the heavens, until he reached a point when the phantom moon that floated opposite to his rising, seemed to be drifting so aimlessly in a sky which was incapable of doing justice to more than one great luminary at the same time, that she looked as if nothing could hold her back from sliding down in an utter dive of helplessness into whatever element of complete extinction awaited such as sank and sank and sank, till they reached the nadir of the universe.

None of the three women, however, who poured first cold, then tepid, then pleasantly warm water, over the king in his bath, had the faintest resemblance in her mood just then to the moon in her vanishing. They were all indeed, although each in her different manner, far too intensely interested in the problem with which Odysseus had just confronted them to think of anything else. This was the question as to what special treasure or treasures he and Nisos had better take with them to Kokkys-Thronax if they were to be in any sort of secure position in bargaining with this madman, Zeuks.

Bargain with the fellow it was clear they had to; and from what the Dryad had said it was also clear that he was likely to prove an extremely shrewd bargainer. It did cross the cunning old hero's mind that it might be possible to take a band of men up there, surround this homestead called Agdos, and carry off that immortal pair of horses by force; but the more he thought of such a violent and arbitrary way of going to work the less he liked it.

His one fixed idea, the one final purpose of all this planning and scheming was to hoist sail once more. What in every bone of his body, what in every pulse of his blood, what in every centre of his complicated nerves, he longed for was simply to sail again into the unknown. He couldn't explain this urge, even to himself. It was deeper than any ordinary desire or intention.

His old friend the Dryad could have explained it to him. It was an obsession, like the migratory passion in birds and fish and insects and even in the spawn of eels!

In his old age it had become the final impulse of his energy, of his sex, of his fight for life, of his deepest secretive struggle, of his struggle, not so much to obey a destiny imposed upon by fate, as to create his own destiny. All he wanted now was to hoist sail once more; and, when he had hoisted sail, to sail! It was not that he cared greatly whither he sailed, or to what end; but since he knew more about the coasts of the "blameless Ethiopians", — for such was the name he had been brought up to use for the dwellers on both extremities of the earth — to the East than to the West, it must be to the "blameless Ethiopians" of the West that he would sail.

Yes, he would sail West. And if to touch the limits of the earth in that direction and to reach the "blameless Ethiopians" who dwelt at those limits, that is to say where the Sun, who could travel a thousand times faster than any other living thing, was wont to rise, after traversing, swifter than the wind, the lower regions beneath the earth, was his destiny he would fulfil it.

Odysseus was impelled all the more strongly to make the supreme voyage of his life a voyage towards the West, because, if these late wild rumours told the truth, the whole of the continent of Atlantis had been sunk to the bottom of the sea. From his childhood he had been hearing tales of this mysterious continent, and now to learn that it had been forever submerged, in fact that it existed no longer, made the sort of impression on his peculiar mind, a mind at once obstinately and implacably adventurous, and yet craftily empirical and practical, such as a high-spirited boy would receive who suddenly learnt that what he had been taught were stars floating in space were really tiny holes in the arch of a colossal dome; an impression of which the practical effect was to strengthen his decision that at all cost this ultimate voyage of his must be to the West.

"I shall sail," he told himself, "over the waves under which lies Atlantis!"

And it was extraordinarily exciting to the peculiar temperament of this insatiable adventurer to think of reaching some unknown archipelago of islands, on the Western side, that is to say the further side, of a sunk continent.

Such were the old wanderer's thoughts as the three women gave him his bath in the upper chamber. While he was eating his breakfast, however, not only the three women to whom he was accustomed were called for consultation, but the little new-comer Eione was also brought in. It became indeed, before it ended, this breakfast of Odysseus on the morning of his encounter with Zeuks, what might be called a Council of State, for our young friend Nisos, now past his seventeenth birthday, stood proudly and demurely at the foot of the table from whose silver plates and flagons and salvers the well-browned, savoury-smelling hogsflesh and the barley-bread and the creamy milk and the fragrant red wine were soon, it was clear to all, putting the old hero into an especially good mood.

Among the women it was Leipephile who, for all her simplicity, watched the king of Ithaca with the most anxious expression. She could not quite understand her own feelings in the matter, but she had learnt enough from the teasing replies of Nisos and from certain rough and casual words dropped here and there by Tis to make her feel that the expedition which was now being planned had something at the back of it that was inimical to Agelaos her betrothed, something that not only her own mother Nosodea but Agelaos' mother Pandea would most certainly regard with serious concern and alarm.

As for the Trojan girl, or rather the Trojan woman, her bewildered resentment bred from years of captivity and always seething in her veins was now assuming, as it had never done before, a definite personal apprehension. They were discussing what particular treasure had better be brought up from the subterranean vaults beneath the palace and it naturally entered the Trojan prisoner's head that some golden object from the world-famous arms of Achilles that by the secret aid of Athene had been awarded to Odysseus instead of to the more daring, more fool-hardy, and far more powerful Ajax, might occur to the crafty old king as a more tempting exchange for the winged Gorgonian steed and the black-maned abortion of the great Mother than any vase or goblet or jug or cup among the rare gifts brought by Odysseus from the palace of Alcinous, the father of that young Nausikaa who had fixed upon the wanderer the first-love of a romantic maiden.

This armour of Achilles, as the Trojan captive well knew, had been brought to Ithaca in one of the ships of Menelaos long before the winner of it had himself got home: and what if it now occurred to Eurycleia his aged nurse, if not to the old king himself, to descend to that secretest chamber of all in the caves beneath the palace only to find it empty? Arsinöe had never been greatly worried at the thought of anybody finding her graven image of Hector, now so glittering in the armour of his slayer, within the haunted purlieus of Arima, since she knew that where abode those two terrible Phantasms, Eurybia the sister of the monstrous Keto, and Echidna, Keto's daughter, and where Odysseus himself never dared to go, it was unlikely that anyone, even if they risked it, would reveal to a soul where they had been or what they had seen there.

But to descend to that lowest of all the treasure-caves beneath the palace with the idea of finding something wherewith to bargain with this crazy Zeuks, that was quite a possible move. But even if the old man or this handsome boy-pet of Eurycleia's did find that chamber empty, was it likely that anyone would accuse her? Who would guess she had learnt the art of carving? Who would suppose she had ever lived closely enough to Hector to recall his features so well as to be able to carve them?

The aged Eurycleia was the only one during that quaintly palatial and yet so wholly domestic council of war to guess the meaning of the gloomy prognostication lowering in the frowning brow of Agelaos' simple betrothed, or to puzzle over the furtive glances now at the king, now at Nisos, now at Tis, by which were revealed the nervous apprehensions of Arsinöe. The final issue of the discussion had probably been foreseen all along by the shrewd old nurse, who was, though she would have vigorously denied it, quite as “polumetis”, or full of the wisdom that wrestles with life’s realities, as was Odysseus himself.

It was in fact decided that Nisos should carry over his shoulder in a capacious sack, as he followed closely behind Odysseus, three precious objects, a golden Tripod, a golden Mixing-Bowl, and a golden Flagon. The two first of these came from the Phaeacian palace; while the third had been brought to Ithaca by Anticleia, the mother of Odysseus; and it was a marriage-gift to her from her own father Autolycos who all his days had been a great collector of such treasures. Wherever he went he found them; and whenever he found them he saw to it that they were not left behind when he moved on.

And now that these royal domestic female advisers had concluded their deliberations, while their chief was still devouring his meat and drinking his wine, it can easily be imagined in what high spirits our young friend Nisos was when he set off, brimfull of every kind of ambition to follow his aged hero and king on the first really official adventure, as you might put it, of his life.

Odysseus explained at the start to his excited follower that he had decided to avoid both the Temple and the City in approaching the homestead of Zeuks; so that their progress was less rapid than it would have been had they followed the various main thoroughfares.

Odysseus carried no weapon except our old acquaintance the club of Herakles, while Nisos, walking with a rhythmic swing of his whole body, balanced on his shoulders an enormous sack, to which, first on the right hand and then on the left, he kept lifting a hand, or, sometimes it might be, only a few fingers, to steady the thing’s weight under the shocks of the way.

The first thing they both realized when they crossed the border of Zeuks' farm was the fact that for all the precautions they had taken to reach the place un-heralded there was already quite a gathering of Zeuks' neighbours, small farmers with their wives and children, clearly collected there to get the thrill of an immensely grotesque and wildly comic, if not a shockingly startling, encounter.

Odysseus quickly understood that the half had not been told him of the fantastic personality he was now to meet for the first time. Into his mind, and indeed into the mind of his youthful attendant too, as they now both looked round at the faces about them, there entered the suspicion that this little crowd of men, women, and children, gathered on this level expanse of rough grass with lichen-covered rocks and a sprinkling of spring flowers, was anticipating an extremely dramatic scene, but was prepared to feel no particular sympathy for either side.

Evidently something beyond all ordinary events was going to happen, for the children kept whispering to one another, while the younger among them lifted puzzled and rather frightened eyes to the faces of their mothers; and indeed it was plain that what everybody expected was that their old, weak, deserted, and poverty-stricken king was now going to be completely outmatched, out-witted, and rendered helpless if not ridiculous, by this famous country-side clown whom none of their richest farmers could tame. “They are all thinking,” Nisos told himself, “that the old man must be in his dotage if he fancies he can cope with such a crazy rebel against all established authority as this weird creature Zeuks.

“And everybody here must feel,” the boy's thoughts ran on, “that the moment the king really sinks into the helpless silliness of old age, the House of Naubolides will assert its claim to rule; and to rule not only Ithaca but all the neighbouring islands as well.”

For a moment, as he rested his heavy sack upon a rock and automatically jerked his body so that the knife in the leather belt which his mother had given him on the day he was seventeen might fall into the precise place most convenient for clutching it at any sudden necessity, he felt a shiver of family-pride rushing through him, and of thankfulness to the Fates, the oldest of whom he had so recently defended, that he was different from the farmers' boys of his own age in this crowd whose eyes he could see were fixed on him, he hoped with envy, though in one case he fancied he caught a couple of them laughing at him.

But if the king's armour-bearer, or more strictly his currency-bearer, for it was purely in preparation for a shrewd piece of trading that the boy carried that heavy sack, had his own private thoughts created by the general atmosphere around him, the old hero was not without his own sharp-edged reactions to this highly-charged occasion. What he, from old experience of the moods of flexible-susceptible human beings, suddenly felt now was a complete surprise to himself. He felt that his own encounter with this queer personage who had the audacity, as well as the subtle cunning, to steal, by the aid of heaven knows what irresistible spell, the actual winged horse sprung from the blood of Medusa was not the sole cause of the crowd's excitement.

He couldn't help noticing that in place of staring eagerly and excitedly in the direction of the outbuildings and barns of the homestead called Agdos, the eyes of most of the people assembled here kept turning to the circuitous upland track by which he and Nisos had reached this flat expanse of level grass and evenly strewn gravel, just as if they expected a considerable rear-guard of well-armed soldiers to be following him!

"Surely they cannot," he thought, "really imagine that I've got a body-guard of Ithacan warriors ready, like those who arose from the sowing of the dragon’s teeth, to fight to the death wherever I lead them!”

But he quickly gave this mental question a physical rebuff with his broad shoulders, sharp-projecting chin and massive skull; and was prepared as he used to be, day following day, twenty years ago, for whatever ambush of his enemies was to burst out from round the next corner.

Odysseus had full need to be thus prepared, for in another second an enmity greater than any searching tentacle of Scylla or any whirling suction of Charybdis revealed itself to them all.

From the very same path by which the old king and the boy Nisos had just reached this spot came a hurrying figure of whose identity neither of them had any doubt. It was Enorches, the priest of Orpheus!

A curious shudder of supernatural awe ran through that whole crowd. The younger children clung to their mothers’ hands and garments whilst the men bit their lips, tightened their belts, and looked anxiously at one another. Nobody turned to the well-roofed sheds of Agdos, whence the mocking clown who called himself Zeuks was awaiting his turn on that typically Hellenic stage, which seemed, as was always happening in the midst of those eternally contesting islands and cities and races and cults and political parties, to have been called into existence, for some malicious purpose of its own, at that particular moment, by some invisible master of ceremonies.

At first glance Nisos simply could not resist the childish impulse of pure panic which caused him to heave up his sack once more on his shoulders and retreat before that advancing figure till he was a few paces to the rear of Odysseus, though he kept his head sufficiently to restrain himself from crouching, precious bundle and all, actually behind those broad shoulders.

As he watched Enorches advance straight towards them, evidently prepared to speak face to face with Ithaca’s king, it was only by an intense effort that he forced himself to do what even his encounter with the oldest and most powerful of the Fates had not enabled him to do, namely look the man in the face.

But the boy did manage to do this; and no action in all the years of his life was destined to be more momentous, and this purely in its effect upon himself, than his action in this case. And Nisos not only looked straight into Enorches' face. He quite deliberately forced his mind into its fullest, clearest consciousness as he did so; though the effort he had to make to do it was an extreme one, almost as if he had to embrace a boy or a girl with whom he was in love but whose body was hung with glittering sharp-edged and even pointed ornaments that hurt him as he pressed them with his arms and hands and naked skin.

But what, beneath that dazzling sky and burning sun did he make out of the face of the Priest of Orpheus? Well! The dominant features of it were its eyes and mouth. Nisos felt as if the visage into which he was now looking lacked forehead, ears, cheeks, and nose, lacked everything in fact but eyes and mouth; eyes to seek out its prey, and mouth to swallow it when found.

In that blazing noon and because of something demoniacal about the whirlpool-like suction of that mouth, Nisos felt as if this appalling Being had no forehead or nose, or ears, or chin, or even neck! Enorches was, he felt, literally all eyes and mouth, like certain fish, certain serpents, certain birds, and certain insects.

As he gazed in fascinated horror at this Priest of the Mysteries the creature moved — the boy could hardly think of the man as a human person — a few steps nearer to the old king. In making this move Enorches naturally came nearer to Nisos also, who felt such a shiver of terror, that, lugging his great sack along the ground, for having once faced that visage he couldn't take his eyes off it, even to lift up his bundle, he found himself in a position whence his magnetized stare of terror inevitably included Odysseus also.

And then to his astonishment the old king, taking no more notice of Enorches than if he'd been an over-officious retainer in a crowded court, turned to him himself. "Don't you think, Nisos Naubolides," the old man said, "that it might be a good idea when we come back with the daughter of Teiresias to make use of this level expanse in place of the traditional "agora"? Do you get what I mean, my lad?

"It strikes me somehow as a freer and less formal place, and being further from the city and further away from the city-walls it seems to me to be less under the influence of conventional rules, and more likely to be friendly to new and daring schemes, such as my wish to sail Westward, beyond the Pillars of Herakles and the Atlas Mountains, over the unknown waves that now, as we hear, hide the sunken continent of Atlantis. What are you staring at, boy? What's come over you? This is only the Orpheus fellow, you know, come to beg me no doubt not to begin giving away my treasures until he has had his share for the Mysteries.

"How did he find out, the rogue, about this madman Zeuks having ensorcerized Pegasos and Arion? Well — we needn't ask that. These Priests find out everything. The winds and waves themselves whisper to them, and the babies in arms babble to them, of the intentions of destiny.

"But isn't this an agreeable spot for a grand assembly? Isn't this just the very sort of place where orators are moved to speak freely and where true shepherds of the people can naturally draw inspiration out of the air? I was a fool, Nisos Naubolides, not to think of this place. I warrant it was the old associations of our "agora" up there stopped me from thinking sooner of a real grand appeal to our people. This will be the exactly right place for Teiresias' daughter to invoke the Olympians and propitiate the Fates.

"I feel like speaking to them now, only there aren't enough of them at the moment; and these, as you see, dear lad, are just the farmers' families round here. But what a place to inspire anyone! Look at these men and women, so lusty and well-fed! And what handsome-coloured cloth they're wearing! Do they weave these garments themselves nowadays do you suppose? How interested Penelope would be could she see how richly purplish in this noon-sun and under this cloudless sky gleams that excellent mingling of sepia and violet!

"And do you see how that noble Fir-tree up there stretches a horizontal branch from its very heart towards that other tree — I can't quite make out what tree it is — down there against the blue water of the bay? O yes! And when I come to address the assembly here — I tell you, my boy, it'll be like that very first assembly ever held in Ithaca, about which I used to hear from my mother before I was your age.

"Heavens! I'll make them sit up. Hermes! But I'll make them acclaim you, my dear lad, above your stupid brother, to rule in my place when I have hoisted sail. By Olympos yes! you shall look down past all these farmers in their richly-dyed cloth at that divine tree yearning to exchange its sap with that great pine; and as you see the sails of those fishing-boats on those blue waves you'll think of your old king looking down through the water of an unknown sea at the sunken palaces of Atlantis!

"Yes! By the 'aegis' of the Son of Kronos which is now the 'aegis' of Pallas Athene! when once, with the help of Pegasos and Arion, we've got Teiresias' daughter here, we will drag enough sail-cloth out of them to carry me to the shores of the unknown West! By the Olympians, yes! Why should this rustic father of yours, why should this stupid brother of yours, not be forced to give up their place to you, my dear boy? It worked before in this island, that sort of change; and it can be brought about again. O! if I could only get all the men of Ithaca assembled here I would know how to persuade them! Haven't I seen — —"

He was interrupted by a wild rush of all the crowd round them towards the sheds and barns of the homestead "whose name", as they had heard so often that day, "was Agdos". Enorches himself followed the crowd, passing both Odysseus and Nisos without a word: and there, before them all, walking, each of them on his four legs, quietly, obediently, tamely, patiently, came the winged dark-skinned horse, Pegasos, and the much smaller whitish-grey horse, with a sweeping black mane, known far less widely through Argos and all the mainland, but known well in the islands nearest to Ithaca, under the name of Arion.

Yes, quietly, gently, obediently, those two imperishable and immortal creatures walked forth from their stable towards Odysseus; while Nisos, who soon had his great sack of treasures, heavy as a king's ransom as they were, hoisted on his shoulders, opened his mouth and breathed in gasps while he awaited what would happen. And there, sometimes behind his immortal captives, and sometimes beside them, and sometimes even before them, was Zeuks himself!

Zeuks was a man of middle height according to ordinary human measurement; but among his other peculiarities he possessed an astonishingly natural power of appearing to be taller or shorter according to the convenience, as you might put it, of the particular occasion. It was as if the occasion itself became a sorcerer who called up, out of the abyss of the uncreated, exactly the right puppet-homunculus that the trick required.

Evidently what was required at this moment by the inevitable situation was to get these unusual creatures safely, quietly, and in docile subjection, into the immediate presence of the king of Ithaca. Meanwhile within that unclosable, unhealable, impenetrable, almost invisible crack, that extended down the whole length of the Club of Herakles, an intense argument was going on between Myos the fly and Pyraust the moth.

They had not been caught asleep, these two members of the royal household of Ithaca. In fact they had both been awakened by the stir in every inhabited portion of the palace, even before Odysseus had to end his emotional talk with the old Dryad which was the chief cause of his being where he was now.

Tis had been the first to disturb them. He had gone earlier than usual to milk Babba, for he wanted to get the pail of fresh milk safely into the palace before he drove the cow to a fresh strip of pasture, well the other side of the haunted Arima, upon whose devilish soil nothing would have induced him to tread. Then Arsinöe had flicked and flapped with one of the last scraps of a particular Pelasgian veil that she had surreptitiously extracted from Eurycleia's private treasure-box but took care to use before the old lady got up.

It was only after this event that she used a piece of the common stuff which the old nurse was wont to dole out for dealing with the dust which in both corridor and hall gathered with special heaviness owing to the nature of the rocky substances out of which Ithaca's royal cave had been originally and primevally dug.

It was indeed of dust that the two insects were arguing in their accustomed hiding-place within that warm perambulating retreat. Dust played as large a part in their life as wind and rain played in the life of the king of Ithaca; and so, while Enorches was striving to cast whatever devilish spell he fancied would be most effective against the creations of the blood of Medusa and the horse-play of Poseidon, the fly Myos was explaining to the moth Pyraust that every grain of dust was an actual world and that it was foolish to philosophize about the universe until you stopped talking about Etna being flung upon Typhon and talked about Arsinöe disturbing worlds with her duster.

Meanwhile Nisos also, like his newly-made student-pal or Kasi-kid, was philosophizing after his fashion. What struck him, as this dancing Zeuks led his magnetized captives towards them, was the smooth-sliding manner in which each separate event or incident or occurrence, whether it was of cosmogonic importance, or was of the faintest and most attenuated significance, a mere ripple, you might say, crossing the surface of the oceanic time-mirror of life, was accepted by Odysseus with the same unalterable equanimity.

Here was the winged horse Pegasos, born of the blood of the Gorgon, and here was the black-maned Arion, born of Demeter herself when she took the form of a mare to escape Poseidon; and dancing round these Divine Abortions was the queer individual who had the power of hypnotizing any equivocal creation who crossed his path and yet was no Bellerephon or Perseus or cast at all in the heroic mould; and here, beside them, surveying these lusty apparitions with the eye of an executioner was the Priest of the immemorial Mysteries who looked as if there were nothing in sight he would not gladly offer up to his chthonian divinities.

And yet what was this amazing old king pointing out to him now — to him whom he had recently been considering as his successor in the kingship over the heads of a father and elder brother — but some casually noted aesthetic point about the contrasting beauty of a certain massive tower of greyish-yellow stone, to the North-East of where they stood and rising from a corner of the city wall, and a glittering roof of white marble to their North-West belonging to the Temple of Athene, pictorial elements that justified still further, the old man explained, the idea of this particular spot as a new assembly place.

“Don’t let me ever forget,” the boy prayed in his heart, though to no particular deity, “the calm he shows at a moment like this!” And it really was, this time, without any thought of it being “clever” of him to notice such things that Nisos followed up his secret prayer by telling himself that though those weirdly startling wings rising from the shoulders of that submissive great horse, and that black mane sweeping the ground belonging to the other animal, were striking phenomena of creative nature’s power, it was really a more striking thing that a king who lived alone in his palace with his old nurse and a couple of maids should be so completely equal to occasions like this.

Was it, Nisos asked himself, that that great massive skull possessed an imperviousness to shocks denied to other human craniums? Well, anyway that bowsprit-like and carefully trimmed beard accentuated the quality of the man’s self-possession. And Nisos decided that when once his beard began to grow he would treat it with exquisite care. “A prophet,” he told, himself, “can clearly hide a great many natural feelings behind a well-managed beard, and if he can hide them, cannot he rule them, cannot he force them to obey him, as this horse with wings and this other with a trailing black mane have been forced to obey this madman Zeuks?”

CHAPTER V

IT WAS WITH the utmost interest that Nisos watched Zeuks and tried his best to weigh him up and get to the bottom of him. The impression he first got of this eccentric farm-labourer was that he was of middle height, of middle age, and of middle social estimation. He noted how essentially Achaean he was in every detail, in dress, in manner and in general appearance; not Pelasgian, or Dorian, or Ionian but an evenly balanced middle-of-the-road Achaean, moderate in all the imponderables, in tribal habits as well as personal reactions, and conveying, wherever he went, beneath the whole paraphernalia of his comic humours an impression of dispassionate calm; a calm that was not merely temperamental, like the coolness of Odysseus, but was the deliberately arrived-at attitude of a definite metaphysical philosophy.

Watching Zeuks carefully Nisos decided that it was this unobtrusive mediocrity that enhanced to such a startling degree the peculiar features of his countenance, features for which it would be difficult to find a more accurate epithet than bulbous. Bulbous they were, and bulbous they remained, under all the contortions and distortions of his remarkable physiognomy.

Every single one of the man's features was so to say swollen by the inordinate pressure within it of the particular purpose for which the creativeness of nature had designed it. The forehead of Zeuks seemed bursting with its overpowering plethora of thought. His nose seemed bursting with its abounding zest for smelling. His mouth with its full lips, its strong white teeth, its grandly sensuous curves, seemed to have been created by the insatiable palate and indefatigable tongue within it, a couple that were united in conjugal understanding, the palate as the female to the tongue as the male, for the tasting and enjoying of almost everything that could possibly, conceivably, indeterminably be tasted and enjoyed.

But his eyes,— "What is it in this man's eyes," thought Nisos, "that makes me feel so nice and warm?" — his eyes were surrounded by a thousand wrinkles and creases and rufflings of the ruddy skin round them, creases that seemed so infinitely tickled by what you had just said, or were just going to say, or simply by the way you were the self that could say such things, that merely to watch their response to you and your remarks gave you a delicious sense of having found your place in the world, a place which, the more you said, or the more entirely you put yourself behind what you said, would grow hourly, daily, monthly, yearly more agreeable to yourself, if not to all concerned!

But it was the eyes themselves, apart from those friendly and rampageously benevolent wrinkles, that were made to encourage everybody they approached to enjoy the world and to enjoy being the person who was thus enjoying it.

Zeuks' eyes were in fact so deeply set in his bulbous head that Nisos got the feeling that they receded into a mass of substance which they themselves, in their immense zest for life, were everlastingly creating afresh behind that mediocre skull with its pair of eternally recessive holes.

Nisos couldn't then — he put it down at first to the glare of the noonday sun, but he changed his mind later on — catch the exact colour of Zeuks' eyes; but for that very reason he decided they were probably hazel. It was indeed, all considered, an extremely complicated moment in our clever young friend's life. He might be seventeen and he might be the one destined by fate to become the prophet to the strong rather than to the weak, but it began to invade his mind, as he stood there, leaning on his heavy sack, which in its turn rested on a lichen-covered rock, that because a hero had won in his time almost miraculous victories and had used incredible physical strength and still more incredible mental cunning to win the victories, it did not mean that to the end of his days such an one would inevitably be the centre of every dramatic human situation that could possibly arise.

It was exactly noon on this desirable level expanse, with the homestead of Zeuks overlooking it to the East, and that high corner of the City-Wall and that gleam of the Temple’s marble roof out-topping it to the West, exactly noon on the very spot selected by the old king as the perfect site for an assembly of the people that would be swayed by his eloquence.

Well! here was Zeuks, coming dancing out of his ramshackle shed and leading, yes, actually leading, the immortal creatures they had come to buy!

The well-dressed crowd of prosperous farmer-families seemed puzzled as to where to turn to get some hint of the manner in which they ought to receive the thousand-years wonder of this smuggling into their home of these Divine Beasts. Were they to get it from Zeuks or from their king?

Alas! from neither! The Personage who was destined to direct their feelings was none other than Enorches, the Priest of Orpheus! Yes, to the absolute amazement of the seventeen-year-old “prophet to the strong”, there was not a family there, not a man or a woman there, not even a child, who did not excitedly turn to greet Enorches.

It is true there was one little toddler of about two-and-a-half who stretched out a plump arm towards the Club of Herakles, no doubt being attracted by the roundly twisted curves of that formidable bosom, in the cracked interior of which Myos the Fly was still expounding to Pyraust the Moth the metaphysical philosophy of dust and how every grain of it was a world.

But apart from the child who admired the Club and the two insects who were inside the Club, the whole of that excited assembly of well-to-do farmers with their wives and children instinctively divided itself into two parties, the largest of which gathered closely round Enorches and displayed evident hostility to Zeuks, while the other advanced with irresistible curiosity towards Zeuks and his Divine Beasts, constantly looking back, however, as they did so, the women glancing apprehensively over their shoulders, and the children alternately stumbling as they turned to stare at Enorches, or clinging to their mothers' belts and pressing their faces against their garments.

Not a soul among that whole company made any move towards or away from their old king, though Nisos did notice two of the men whispering together with furtive glances at himself and his great sack.

"They're saying to each other," he thought with a faint shiver; "We'll take that off him before they get away from here!"

Meanwhile Odysseus, having gravely turned his pointed beard to the North, the West, the South and the East, and having instructed Nisos to remain close to his side— "No! no! my boy, much nearer than that! In fact you'd better put a finger into my belt, if you can balance that thing on your shoulder with one hand" — advanced slowly straight towards the swaying and dancing Zeuks.

Neither the word "swaying" nor the word "dancing" accurately describes the sinuous movements with which this queer creature hypnotized those two animals. As in every other aspect of this singular person's character, if you had never seen him before it was necessary for the understanding of his peculiar nature to catch not only the general expression of his face but at least a few of its special expressions; and among these it was especially important to note what his expression was when he experienced an access of respect and reverence for anyone or anything he suddenly encountered.

Nisos had the wit to realize quickly enough, when Odysseus had greeted Zeuks and was conversing with him, that what those little, searching, deep-set eyes, peering out from the receding depths of what seemed an eternally replenished background, expressed just then was a mixture of deeply affectionate respect and humorous amusement.

And it was further evident to Nisos that this singular person's profound respect for the king was increased, not diminished, by the fact that he found the old hero so infinitely entertaining. It was also evident that Odysseus felt absolutely at ease with Zeuks and entirely natural in dealing with him. Indeed he continued to be so direct, so objective, so practical in his handling of him that it was difficult for Nisos to see what there was about such shrewd and downright and matter-of-fact business relations that could excite not only ribald laughter but hugely humorous enjoyment.

But it was quite evident to Nisos that either the old king enjoyed being laughed at, or, and this is what seemed to the boy the more probable, that he had been so toughened by all his experiences of the ways of the world, that his self-created thick skin and his long-practised straight-to-the-point opportunism had made him as impervious to humour as he was impervious to love!

Nisos inserted a second finger into the king's belt, the longest finger he had. In some queer fashion the old man's imperviousness to everything but the one single desire to sail away, to sail over the sunken towers of Atlantis into the Unknown West, touched the boy to the heart. It was a purpose he could understand. It had something about it that resembled his own fixed intention to become, when once he had grown a pointed beard, a Prophet to the Strong.

Let the rollicking humour of Zeuks bubble and bubble from what springs it would! Let it burble up against the old hero's face pebbles as hard as balls of brimstone! There'd be one friend for the old adventurer who'd be as tough and impervious as himself! Yes, imperviousness was what the future "prophet to the strong" felt he must struggle to win.

But fate had other moves to make; and there were several farmers there who, although with homesteads on the same ridge as farm-labourer Zeuks, and although they had come out to see the farm up there at high noon, were in part self-pitying puppets moved by fingers other than their own, and yet were in part also living creators of the future of Ithaca.

Enorches had already begun to scream angrily at Zeuks before Nisos, with his right hand supporting the treasure-sack balanced to a nicety at the back of his head and with two fingers thrust deep into the belt of Odysseus, had even realized that he himself, and the deserted old king, and the winged Horse, and the black-maned Horse, and Zeuks and the Priest of Orpheus were in a random knot together, with the flabbergasted but still fascinated crowd hemming them in on all sides and surging round them,

"It's no good your grinning and chuckling at me, thief, robber, pirate, serf!" cried Enorches. "It's no good your fancying that a wretch like you, the lowest of the low, the basest of the base, born to be the slave of those who rightly and properly by the laws of Themis and Zeus and Eros and Dionysos and the Inspired Singer Orpheus rule the entire world, can make a covenant with a king to put in his keeping this mad Spawn of the Gorgon and this By-Blow of Poseidon and Demeter!

"Did you think, Dung of the Earth, did you suppose, Turd of the World, that the Stars in their Courses would fight for a blob, a shred, a foul pellet, a filthy crumb, a drop of cuckoo-spit, a clipping of toe-nail, like you? There are many who rule us. There are many who strive to rule us. There are many who once ruled us. Erebos and Tartaros are full of such as once lorded it over us! And where are they now?

“Don’t you understand sod of sods, don’t you comprehend, dreg of dregs, that what you’ve been given hands and feet for by the beautiful ones, the creative ones, the powerful ones, the one’s eternally to be worshipped, is the privilege, dung of dungs, blob of blobs, squit of squit, curd of curd, scurf of scurf, flake of flake, chip of chips, drop of drop, sweat of sweat, the privilege to serve your betters, and yet here you are actually daring to decamp with demigods!

“Yes! to steal, to kidnap, to imprison in your wretched pigsty these two sacred creatures, the feathers of whose wings and the hairs of whose manes you are unworthy to kiss! Release them, I command you! Hand them over to me, the god-appointed guardian of the holiest of holy mysteries!

Though Athene may have fled to her shrine among the Ethiopians, I have not fled; and where I am there will always be a sanctuary for any offspring of the ever-living gods, however far blasphemy and sacrilege and atheism may spread their savagery! Give up these holy creatures I say! Yield them over to me now and I will see that you escape the punishment you deserve! But refuse and it will fall upon you! Harken unto me all ye that are here, devoted worshippers of the most high Gods! Have you not heard — has it not been revealed to you — —”

It was at this point that Enorches, whose very name had been given him at his birth because of the enormity of his testicles, and who had been called ere now by fellow-priests “the well-hung brother” proved his manhood by leaping forward with a spring and scrambling up upon one of the rocks with which Odysseus's newfound "agora" was sprinkled and by bursting into a ringing oration.

"Our whole Hellenic way of life," he cried, "is in danger my friends, and we're not alive enough to what's going on to do anything to save it! We haven't even cleared our minds of all the childish poetry our mothers and nurses put into our heads to stop us piddling on the floor, or upsetting the pot on the fire, or cutting off the tail of the dog, or giving the hen's best chicks to the cat! We have been too shallow and stupid, my friends, in our whole attitude to religion!

"We have accepted like babies all our mothers told us about the Twelve Olympians, about Zeus, Hera, Poseidon, Demeter, Apollon, Artemis, Hermes, Aphrodite, Hephaistos, Ares, Themis, and our own Athene.

"But, my friends, all this is sheer childishness, and what it leads to is exactly what has happened in the case of this worthless pirate, this low-born thief, this dung-heap rapscallion, this offscouring of the city's brothels who calls himself Zeuks so that he may blaspheme the more, so that he may make a mock at our Father in Heaven, and, worse still, put to scorn our Father's Sister and Mate, the great Queen of Heaven, Hera herself!

"What none of you are grown up enough to understand, though I've been explaining this very thing for the last ten years, is that by certain new, certain occult, certain mystical, certain sanctified, certain divinely inspired revelations, drawn at length and explained at last from the most sacred and precious oracle that we of pure Hellenic birth can boast, an oracle do I say? an inheritance, a birth-right, a talisman, an enchantment, a divine and celestial Word, by means of which our enemies are inevitably defeated and our intentions are inevitably fulfilled, we know that we've arrived at a point in our development where Eros and Dionysos appear in their true light. Does anyone here on this fair platform, looking down on the rich harbour of our island-home, realize the full significance, the concerted value, the abysmally-charged import of the birthright of which I speak?

“Has anyone here been so freed of late from our mothers’ lullabies and war-tales as to know what I mean when I say that our way of life in Hellas has been saved only just in time from its final extinction by recent interpretations of the prophecies of our unique poet and singer, Orpheus?”

At this point in the midst of the resounding oration of Enorches there suddenly occurred the sort of movement of relaxation in that well-to-do careless crowd which suggests an articulate admission that the subject of a speech is totally beyond the intelligence of its listeners but that the personality of the speaker, and the fervour of his arguments, not to mention the dramatic situation in which he is taking so dominant a part, are all conducive to the said listeners’ settling down to listen in self-satisfied pleasure as if they’d been suddenly transported to an agreeable theatre.

What pleased our young friend Nisos in all this, especially when he noticed that both the two portions of this unconventional hill-top assembly, the part of it that had been so fascinated by Zeuks and his unusual horses as to feel definitely hostile to Enorches, and the part of it that remained under his spell, had both relaxed, was the fact that Zeuks himself had suddenly taken the initiative with Odysseus, and had advanced close up to him, trailing the long thin leather straps by which he drew the two horses after him, and that the two were now engaged, under the very nose of the excited orator in what looked like a very harmonious and mutually satisfactory bargain.

Meanwhile the speaker was approaching the culminating points of his speech, which were entirely concerned with the Mysteries.

“What is revealed to us in the Orphic Mysteries,” he was saying, “is the inner truth, the ultimate quintessence, of our whole Hellenic life. This essence, this quintessence, my dear friends, floats like an exhalation through every moment of our existence. Whither and Whence does it float? That is no simple question; for it is fed by a thousand ineffable imponderables!

"Mystery it is, and mystery it pursues. From mystery it ascends and in mystery it is engulfed. As the heat of this thrice-sacred noon dissolves in those blue waves down there, so there is a sweetly-dissolving high noon in the life of all of us Achaians towards which we are moving even as I speak; and I swear to you, brothers and sisters of this Isle of Ithaca, that it is only in the celebration of the Orphic Mysteries that you, men and women of Hellas, can rise to your full spiritual stature and rejoice in your full divine inheritance!"

Enorches was clairvoyant enough to grow aware at this point that his large audience were enjoying his speech delivered from that jagged little rock in precisely the spirit he cared least of all for it to be enjoyed, that is to say, as a theatrical performance, and he allowed his arms to sink to his side and his voice to die away.

But he didn't come down immediately from his little rock. He looked round him with a quite special expression, the expression of a creature with the beak of a bird of prey and the body of a serpent, a creature who has bitten its prey in half, and swallowed half of it, but still feels unsatisfied.

And it happened to be just at that very moment that Pyraust, the girl-moth, implored her boy-friend, Myos the House-Fly, to remove his powerful front legs from the particular one of her languidly trailing wings which it was always easiest for her to straighten out first when she had decided to spread both her wings in flight.

"I know he's calling for me to go to him," she explained, "and when he's calling so strongly it hurts me, yes it hurts me very much, not to be able to go to him! So lift up your front legs, my beautiful one, I beseech you! They are so strong and so gloriously black; and O! how weak my poor trembling brown wings seem in comparison with them! But lift them up now, I beg you!"

But the fly remained obstinate. "In a second; all in good time, all in due course!" he buzzed. "But while we are together I do so want to settle once for all this one single point. Surely you do admit, my sweet one, you can't help it, that in the smallest atom of dust, just as in the smallest grain of sand, there is a whole world of reality. Never mind all this noisy speaking and shouting! It's about shams and shows; not about reality at all!"

Thus speaking Myos pressed his two front legs, so black, so shining, and so extremely strong, more firmly than ever upon the quivering wing of the girl-moth. "But look who's here!" he added presently; and, again, after another pause: "Aren't you glad, my Crumb of Crumbs, that I didn't let you go when he first began bawling out his blathering bluster? Why! you'd have bumped into her! And I can tell you, my leaf of longing, my flying feather of dainty fancy, if you had bumped into her it would have been the end of you!"

The brown moth ceased struggling. The fly removed his leg from her wing. They both settled themselves down as comfortably as they were able in those narrow quarters where they were only about six inches below the powerful fingers of the king of Ithaca as he went on bargaining with Zeuks. Neither Zeuks nor he paid the faintest attention to the torrent of rhetoric from the lichen-covered rock, a torrent which, as soon as the speaker realized what newcomer it was who had now appeared among them, recommenced with redoubled vigour. For the personage who had burst in upon that extemporized "ecclesia" was in fact no other than Petraia, the old-maid midwife; and it was a Petraia worked up to a considerable degree of professional indignation, not to speak of virginal vituperation.

She advanced at a pace which could only be described by the vulgar expression “at a run”. She forced her way straight through the crowd till she reached a family group whose members were pushing against each other to get as close as they could to Pegasos and Arion.

Here she singled out a woman, obviously about as far advanced in pregnancy as it is possible to be and, clutching her by the only portion of her person which was not already pre-empted by three other children in addition to the small creature as yet undelivered, she dragged her away protesting loudly, a protest shared by so many of her brood that her carrying off by Petraia caused quite a little convulsion and a sort of counter-eddy in the stream of people who surrounded those two supernatural beasts.

As she dragged the woman towards the farm-house which was nearest to Zeuks’ domain they passed so close to the club of Herakles that Myos and Pyraust could clearly catch what Patraia was saying, and she was saying a great deal.

“A self-respecting woman like you,” she was complaining, “ought to be wiser than to be so interested in these playthings of men! All that these silly boy-men want are more and more playthings! What they don’t realize is the true meaning of this great news that is now spreading through the entire world. They don’t realize, these silly boys, that during a few recent weeks there has been a revolution in Nature herself! Nature herself has decided to assert herself at last. And this means, can mean, does mean, and will mean only one thing! And that one thing is this: Women from now on are no longer subject to men.

“And it means more than that. It means that women are not only from now on freed from the yoke of men, but that men are from now on subject to women, and must learn, if they don’t want to witness the death and perishing of the entire human race, to subject themselves to their mothers and wives and daughters.

“From now on men must learn that their highest worship is their worship of women and that this worship is called Uranian because it resembles the inspiration of the Heavenly Muse!”

All this while Petraia never ceased dragging her pregnant captive towards the Bed of Delivery, the Bed which everyone present at that stupendous scene was forced by her ringing declaration to behold as the only holy and thrice-blessed Bed to be desired by all! The unfortunate or divinely fortunate woman in whom the shock of this outrageous publicity had already started the suspended pains of labour was imploring the three children who were clinging to her to let her go, as well as imploring Petraia not to drag her so fast; and so shrill was the desperate falsetto clamour of their combined voices that the man of the family following uncomfortably behind was unable to succeed in his attempt to appear to be absorbed with interest in a particular white sail on the horizon of the bay.

Just before passing out of sight Petraia called the man to the woman’s side, and, as the two of them with their children vanished from sight, she herself swung round once more and uttered, in a tone more piercing than any she had yet used, her final defiance.

“News has just reached me,” she cried, “from my sister, who serves the Nymph Egeria, in the land of the King of the Latins where the Trojans have founded a new Troy, that Persephone herself has escaped from the Kingdom of Death and has begun to hasten across the face of the earth to find her mother Demeter! When these two meet, so has the Nymph Egeria told my sister, the world’s new age of the real rule of women will begin!

"And then it will be that men will sink back once more into what was their position when the world began, that is to say into complete inferiority to women; so that from that moment onwards their proper use and value and status in the world will be as it was in the Golden Age under the Rule of Kronos; that is to say as merely the breeding animals that we women use at our free will and pleasure, so that we can bear a sufficient number of girl-children who will in their turn become the rulers of the earth!"

With this final cry of defiance Petraia was gone; but Nisos, whose diplomatic caution, not to speak of his vivid personal fear of the fellow, had made him keep his eyes on Enorches who had remained silent on his rock during Petraia's outburst, now found himself unable to resist a shiver of panic when he saw the Orphic priest solemnly, pontifically, and with awe-inspiring intensity, lift up his right arm and point with extended fingers, as if uttering a devastating malediction, towards a particular point upon the horizon of the noonday blueness of the sea.

"Listen to me, O people of Ithaca!" he cried, "and be not deceived by an excited creature who knows no more of what has really begun to happen in the world than a feeble-winged moth!"

At this point it was no more concealed from Nisos than it was concealed from the Moth herself or indeed from her friend the Fly, that a thought-wave of some sort had been passing, consciously or unconsciously, in its gloating religiosity and its bitter belligerency between the Orphic priest and the two insects within the split bosom of the club of Herakles, one of them the priest's natural sacrificial victim and the other his natural biter, stinger, teaser, poisoner, tormentor, scavenger, devourer, and final exterminator.

"That little grey spot on our horizon," he cried, "is only one of thousands of islands in Greek waters! To it and from it, through all our bays and estuaries and harbours and river-mouths, the word is now being carried from promontory to promontory that the true Rulers of the world have at last come into their own and henceforth will prove themselves supreme. You all, O beloved sheep without a shepherd, know well in your hearts of whom I speak! I speak of that immortal pair of Deities destined by fate before the foundation of the world to be its ultimate masters. Need I say, my precious and dedicated people, some of whom are destined to be transformed and transported by the one, and some of whom are destined to be transfigured and redeemed by the other, that I speak of Love and Drink, of Eros and Dionysos! Between these immortal ones is a miraculous communion, a holy understanding, in the divine mystery of which each leads to, each mingles with, each is swallowed up by the other: Love in Intoxication, and Intoxication in Love!

"It has been revealed to us at last that all this childish domination of the inhabitants of the earth by the twelve Olympians has been infantile play-acting; and that the time has come for the real rulers of the universe to be recognized by us all for what they are and what we their subjects are.

"This was, O people of Ithaca, this was, O people of Hellas, whether you are Achaeans or Pelasgians, this was the meaning of the Songs of Orpheus! Orpheus and his Priests have, from the beginning of History, alone known that the true divinities behind Zeus and Poseidon and Aidoneus, the true divinities behind Hera and Demeter and Athene and Aphrodite have always been the same, that is to say Eros and Dionysos!

"The Mysteries of Eleusis have always in their unutterable essence, of which we may not even yet reveal the true nature, been identical with the Mysteries of Orpheus. Come then, O people of Ithaca and of all the sacred Isles, come then, and acknowledge the truth that only in the sacred ecstasy of Eros and Dionysos, that is to say of Love and Drink, is the Secret behind life revealed and the Secret behind death shown to be identical with it!

“This is the reason, let me now announce to you, my friends, why Aphrodite has been imprisoned by Hephaistos in the Island of Cyprus, and why Prometheus has been imprisoned by Dionysos where Atlas holds up the sky. What is happening now to our world, what is shaking the pillars of the earth, what is rocking the walls of Erebos, what is ransacking the recesses of Tartaros, is that Eros is shaking off the childish notion that Aphrodite is his mother, and is now showing that, as he once caused the aboriginal night to be impregnated by the whirling elements of Chaos, so today he is making Okeanos enlarge his boundaries both to the West and to the East and making the sun and the moon throw off the rule of the children of Leto! Come then, O people of Ithaca! Follow the Sun and the Moon! Shake off these bow-and-arrow tyrants, Apollo and Artemis! Throw down the altars and idols of the gods of Olympus, and worship none but the two Supreme Mysteries of the Universe, Eros the Mystery of Love and Dionysos the Mystery of Ecstasy!

“Worship these alone; and Eros will give you the only clue to the inexhaustible joy of life, and Dionysos will give you the only redemption from the inexhaustible misery of life!”

It was at that moment, as the voice of Enorches died down, that Nisos recalled a curious little event that had occurred just before he set out that morning with Odysseus. Carrying the heavy load with which he had started, his head held high and his right hand raised to keep the balance of the great sack which was swaying on his shoulder, he had been too excited to give much thought to those he was leaving.

In her natural feeling for her betrothed, the elder son of Krateros Naubolides, Leipephile had turned aside while the king’s old Nurse was waving them goodbye.

Naturally enough also the Trojan maid Arsinöe had turned aside from watching them depart. But Eione, the little sister of Tis, had followed them. Yes, she had followed them as far as the last Olive-Tree in the palace garden.

Here, as she waved her farewell, the wind from the bay, which they were facing as they went off, blew a loose fold of her garment so shamelessly clear from her perfectly formed thighs that unwilling to give an impression of immodesty and at the same time reluctant to stop waving to them till they were out of sight she went on waving with one hand while with bent head and floating hair she re-folded her garment about her limbs with the other hand; and it was the simple and direct childishness with which she accomplished this double task of waving with one hand and controlling her rebellious clothes with the other that so particularly touched Nisos and became for him a kind of visual symbol or dramatic emblem of the charm of the eternal feminine.

He had been rather slow to recognize the peculiar quality of Eione's charm, owing to the fact that there was nothing in her plain and simple face to correspond with the unusual loveliness and grace of her figure, but now that he was setting off on this historic expedition the whole quality of her personality invaded him.

He wasn't a conceited fool. He wasn't so fanatically hostile to this sinister Priest of the Mysteries as not to admit to himself that what filled his mind at that moment with this plain-faced, exquisitely moulded young girl was what the fellow was saying about Eros. He had never heard till now of the primordial cosmology, so to speak, of the Mysteries, and there was something about the thought of shaking off the familiar personalities of the Olympians and concentrating upon the idea that the primeval origin of all things was Eros, that appealed to him extremely.

He had always tried to think of himself as born to grow into a mysterious prophet, and the notion of such a prophet having a love-affair with some dedicated female was peculiarly appealing to him. Nor at this moment as the echoes of Enorches' voice died away among the rocks and caves of his native island, did it seem a negligible stroke of fate on his behalf — perhaps showing the hand of Atropos herself, to whom he had been of some service — that the female to be associated with his career should be the youthful sister of his faithful old friend, Tis.

In any case the Spinners of our human destiny did not give Nisos at this moment any further time for romantic thoughts about the youthful Eione with her homely face and her exquisite limbs, for he was called to the king's side by an imperative summons.

He obeyed with alacrity; and he found at once as he placed his treasure-bearing sack at the feet of the two protagonists that the transaction had been, with satisfaction to them both, brought to a successful conclusion.

Odysseus was obviously in the particular mood into which he never rose or sank except when things fell out almost exactly as he had hoped, and yet without any exhausting effort on his part. His great square head seemed more like a fleshless skull now that he'd got what he wanted than when he was still fighting for it. His chin was so relaxed and at ease that his beard had the look of the bowsprit of a vessel that has reached a halcyon sea of undisturbed calm, with the Sirens in the form of friendly birds clinging contentedly to the rigging.

As for Zeuks, he turned his head slowly towards Odysseus, then slowly towards the Priest of Orpheus who had now rushed between them, shooting himself down from the lichen-covered rostrum of his eloquence like a fleshly arrow from an hieratic bow.

“Eros!” cried Zeuks with the inconceivable gusto of a guest at a delicious private banquet who has just tasted what to him is the renewal of a long series of forgotten delights, enjoyed long ago and far away. “Eros! Why it’s wonderful to realize at last that we can freely embrace our divine boy as a grown-up independent Deity, acting on his own without any woman’s help!” And as if to prove his delight Zeuks started singing:

“Ha! Ha! Ha!
Hee! Hee! Hee!
Smell, taste, listen!
Touch and see!
Touch, see, listen!
Taste every juice!
Embrace Aidoneus!
And you won’t fear Zeus!”

Nisos felt such a burning atmospheric fire-ball of protection whirling round his head from Zeuks’ deep-set humorous eyeholes that he actually dared to make a faint flicker of an ugly face of impudent defiance at the Priest of Orpheus: and when he turned to see how Odysseus was responding to the encounter between these two formidable ones he experienced an agreeable shock; for Odysseus was, as a matter of fact, making much the same sort of grimace as he was making himself, only it was made in accordance with the hero’s age, dignity, and heroic past. The old king indeed scrupled not to nod several times with his great massive head in the direction of Zeuks, as much as to say: “I am entirely of your opinion, O most excellent dealer in immortal horse-flesh! And as for this noisy rhetorician, he hides, as his type usually do, his only spadeful of good turf under bushels of mystical bad hay.”

Obviously aware that their presence, combined with the special quality of their unusual nature, had much to do with this unseemly contention, both the winged Pegasos and the black-maned ivory-coloured Arion now began to use all their animal powers, four legs, their muscular shoulders, their nervous haunches, their arching necks, even the flashing wings of the one and the sweeping mane of the other, to thrust their way into the very centre of the contest.

This put the torch to the pyre. The fury of the Priest of Orpheus broke all bounds. "What?" he shouted, projecting his carrion-crow physiognomy so close to the king's impassive skull that it really did cross Nisos' mind to wonder what would happen if the man's vulturine beak were actually to snatch a gobbet of bleeding flesh from the throat beneath that proud ship's bow.

"Have you been dreaming," was what the Priest had the gall to mutter to the King, "in the decrepit vanity of your degenerate flesh to which in the solitude of its ancestral cave an outworn Olympian, herself a refugee in Ethiopia, has granted a retreat wherein your moribund body can decompose at leisure; have you, I say, been dreaming that the present-day inhabitants of Ithaca, only a few among whom can even remember the lies and tricks and multiple disguises and devices, for which in days before their parents were born, you won for a year or two some kind of a melodramatic notoriety, will stand by quiescent while you terminate Tyrian transactions with dung-heap pirates, and hand over treasures which properly belong to the people of this island to do with as they wish? Give me these two horses, this moment, you Zeuks, if that is the ridiculous appellation put on you by some former clown in mischievous blasphemy or cringing sycophancy towards the tottering Thunderer we call Zeus whose very thunderbolts have fallen once more into the hands of that one-eyed race of Cyclopean Giants from whom he originally stole them; yes! yes! give me these horses this moment!

"They shall remain in the sacred stables and in the consecrated meadows of the celebrants and hierophants of the Mysteries! They shall be made joyful by Eros, the Lord of Divine Lust, and shall be redeemed from the service of men by Dionysos the Lord of oblivious ecstasy!"

Thus speaking Enorches snatched at the bridle of Pegasos with one hand and at the bridle of Arion with the other, evidently hoping that the power of his personality, and the authority of his manner, and the occult magnetism of his touch would produce the required vibration of super-human force in sufficient accumulation to enable him to carry them off to those usurped purlieus of Athene's shrine which he had now appropriated as his own. But the event turned out otherwise.

Never had Nisos felt prouder of the old hero than he did at that moment: never had he felt more utterly resolved that no insurrection against him by the House of Naubolides, even with his own dad, Krateros, and his own brother, the betrothed of Leipephile, as its leaders, should ever meddle with the old warrior's authority!

In a flash, in the flickering of an eyelash, in the curve of a single ripple on the halcyon sea outside the bay, Odysseus had made use of the Club of Herakles as if it were a battering-ram and had administered to the Priest such a blow in his belly that the man went over in a perfect summersault, legs and arms in the air, and lost all his breath for a moment when he struck the ground. Next, with a series of rapid gestures and commands, so calmly and quietly made that he might have been seated in his hall at the end of the pillared corridor, Odysseus got Nisos and the treasure, still in its great sack, on the broad shoulders of Pegasos, and Zeuks himself, shaken by terrific amusement, lodged on the immortal creature's rump, and finally, just as his enemy, having regained breath was scrambling to his feet, he got himself, the club in his hand, and within it the Moth and the Fly clinging desperately together, balanced somehow upon the black-maned Arion.

All would have been well and they would have escaped in royal style, leaving the Priest of the Mysteries confounded, if it had not been that at this moment of all moments the old everlasting competitive instinct was aroused in the black-maned horse, progeny of the semen of Poseidon when Demeter played the mare, an instinct to show that a horse born of the coupling of Land and Sea could be faster, though it never left the earth, than one with wings so wide that their shadows stretched further than any bow could shoot and whose parentage was the spilling of Gorgonian blood!

With this natural but luckless urge propelling him the horse Arion started off with a bound before the old king, being a poor horseman since the isle was too rocky and mountainous to breed horses, had properly settled himself on its back; with the result that the old man, feeling himself to be slipping, tugged violently at the bridle, causing the creature to rear up on its hind legs.

Here was Enorches' chance, and "the well-hung one", as his fellow mystagogues called him, who was now beside himself with blind fury, seized Pegasos by his nearest wing, and Arion by the nearest portion of his flowing mane, and with a mighty wrench and a superhuman tearing and rending, of which the maddest follower of Dionysos would have been proud, pulled out a whole quarter of that flowing mane by the roots and the whole of the left wing of the Flying Horse by its roots, screaming, as he did so, in a voice that seemed to whirl like a sea-vulture round their heads in strident circles: "By all that's beyond our knowledge, and beyond our powers of knowledge, I curse you both!"

But they were no ordinary mortal horses these two; and after a quick exchange of equine-heart to equine-heart commentary on the situation with their heads touching, disregarding the Priest of Orpheus as completely as if he were an inanimate reproduction of the male organ that had simultaneously come to life and become inebriated, but whose antics were of no interest to creatures of their immortal breed, they leapt forward on their dedicated journey.

Thus it was that in spite of the abundant mixture of ichor and blood which dripped from the two horses' injured sides, and in spite of the insecure seat and bad horsemanship of the aged king, and in spite of the weight of the sack of treasure and its uneasy balancing by so young a rider as Nisos, and in spite of the fooling and jesting of Zeuks, who astraddle on Pegasos' rump, began murmuring a bawdy Bœotian ditty at the expense of the defeated priest, it was long before the sun showed any sign of sinking that this unusual group of living souls reached the rocky harbour-town of Reithron Paipalöenton. The laziest loiterers round the water-front of this town must have realized as they saw them, if they had not done so before, that something had happened, in the heaven, or in the earth, or in Erebos beneath the earth, that had materially altered the normal adjustment of the celestial and terrestial order, causing the most weird concatenations of persons and things.

Here they saw, for instance, these Reithron spectators of their harbour's routine, two mysteriously unusual horses, both dripping with blood, one of them with a single useless wing of many cubits length and a bleeding hole where its fellow had been and the other with a ghastly raw place where half of its sweeping black mane had been plucked out from its neck, so that its skin, though naturally of a greyish tinge, showed like white ivory blotched with blood, while riding upon one of these creatures was the most famous of all the heroes of the Trojan War save the swift-footed Achilles, and riding on the other, with a handsome boy in front of him, was a figure of comedy so extravagant that he might have been the tipsy Silenos himself, fresh from following Dionysos across the world!

And if the philosophic observers of Reithron Paipalöenton were struck by the outward appearance of our travellers, what about the Moth and Fly within the life-crack of the Heraklean Club?

“Are we still ourselves, Pyraust, my sweet friend?” enquired Myos, the house-fly, of his bewildered companion, while the west wind rushed wildly past them and the waves broke under the hooves of their two steeds, as they followed the jagged coast-line of that long and narrow island from one extremity to the other; but there was a tense moment of speechlessness within the bosom of the club of Herakles until after several convulsive and deep-drawn shivers the brown moth collected strength enough to reply.

“You are yourself, O imperturbable invertebrate! But, alas for me! I haven’t got the courage, nor the personality, to follow my own purposes and go my own way — O how wild this wind is! It would blow me into the forest if I were out in it; or if it were from the East I’d be drowned in the sea! — no! I haven’t got the strength of will to live my own life for myself in my own way; and even now my conscience is all worried because I didn’t go to help the Priest when he was surrounded by enemies! How brave he was to stand up for himself against them all and not even be afraid of tearing the feathers out of one of them and the hairs out of the other!

“O the poor, lonely, holy, heavenly man! O the wildly-loving, desperate man! O the great, erotic champion of blind, beautiful, abandoned drunken passion! O divine intoxicator! O the blessed inspirer of eternal hatred carried to a point beyond all understanding! How could I have borne to see a Priest of the Love of very Love and the Hate of very Hate frustrated in the ecstatic piety of his revenge, just when his beautiful anger had become a devouring Worm that could not be destroyed and a consuming Flame that could not be put out?

“I was a wretched disciple not to fly over to him, a miserable hand-maid not to whisper to him with my fluttering wings how much I admired him, how deeply I venerated his mighty, his majestic, his mysterious anger!”

The house-fly, who had listened to this outburst with troubled concentration, was now turning the subject over and over in his great heavy black head. At last he hummed: “I am afraid, my dear Pyraust, that I can’t quite follow your reasoning — but, heavens! how right you are about this terrible wind! I almost feel as if our living protector, this immortal club of Herakles, must soon be blown out of the king’s hand! ——

“That priest of yours certainly was beside himself with anger; that much I cannot deny: and when men are like that, whatever it may be that has roused their fury, they are all alike. They fall into a fit of abandoned rage and every kind of reason vanishes.

“But have you noticed, Pyraust, my pretty one, how this great weapon in which we’re travelling so fast, yes! this club of Herakles itself and nothing less, has been for some time, as we have been whirling along this infernal coast, conversing with the rocky ground itself, yes! actually with the very ground against which the eight hooves of our bearers have been striking, and very often striking fiery sparks?

“Have you noticed this queer fact, O soft-hearted one?”

Both the insects were quiet for a minute listening intently. Then Pyraust murmured in rapt admiration: “Yes, Myos most clever, Myos most discerning, Myos most sage, you are perfectly right! Our thrice-blest travelling shrine is talking to somebody or something. How marvellous of you to have found that out! I suppose we could scarcely dare — eh, my wise one? — to speak to our sacred Sanctuary and ask point-blank — no! I fear that would be too rude and impertinent! What do you feel?

"Could we dare?" — and the brown moth turned to the black fly the yearning of her whole quivering being. Again they were silent, listening to the wind whirling past them as they huddled together in the deepest shadow they could find in that narrow refuge.

"Why can't we listen to them without asking leave?" whispered the moth a moment later.

The fly made no answer. But his dark and corrugated countenance contorted itself into creases that could have been naturally interpreted as the tension of a profoundly scientific brain interrogating and interpreting Nature according to an elaborately technical process of his own invention.

"He's talking to our Sixth Pillar," he whispered at last— "O! O! how nice and out of the glare it is now! Do you know how that comes about, Pyraust?"

The moth shook her head; while her eyes opened wider still in dumb amazement that there should exist in the world anyone as wise as her friend the fly.

"The cause of this particular obscuration of dazzlement," announced that philosopher with the shrill certainty of a successful scientist, "is simply a human hand. Yes, whenever the old king who is holding the weapon that is our travelling equipage changes the position of his fingers, owing probably, but we can't be perfectly certain on that point, to some faint feeling of cramp, there occurs an over-powering alteration in the nature of our environment."

The moth bowed her small head and folded her silky wings in a paroxysm of passionate humility before such insight. But the sound of a very curious humming and drumming now presented itself to the startled attention of both of them.

“Do you hear that, my beautiful one?” enquired the fly.

“I most certainly do,” replied the moth. “Can you explain this also? Has this any connection with the way our ancient king holds his club of Hercules?”

Very gravely did the fly consider this simple question; and then he said, speaking very slowly: “My own feeling is that this curious sound has no connection at all with our heroic old king, or with the way he is holding the weapon which at this moment is our hiding-place.

No, precious one; my feeling is that this sound has to do with a conversation that is actually going on now, between the weapon which is our most blessed vehicle and the ground itself, including all the rocks and pebbles and even the very grains of sand, over which these astonishing horses are carrying us all on their backs.”

The brown moth uncurled her silky wings a little and stretched out her tiny legs with an even less noticeable movement. Then with one of her antennae she touched the precise centre of her friend’s heavy forehead and after having done so she licked the spot she had touched; and then instead of withdrawing her tongue and curling it up she made vague motions with it in the air as if inscribing upon that most elusive of all elements her unspeakable reverence for the wisdom of the fly.

Since it was the black-maned son of Poseidon, by the Earth-Mother in her disguise as a Mare, who was leading this singular cortège, and since Odysseus, who was holding Arion’s bridle-reins, along with the club of Herakles, at outstretched arm’s length, was, of all the warriors of that age, owing to the rockiness of Ithaca, the least acquainted with horses, it was natural that, quite apart from the dazzlement of the burning afternoon sun and the aridity of the rocks and sands and shelving stretches of bituminous gravel and shingly marl over which those eight unusual hooves clattered, there should be several abrupt arrests in their advance, and not a few perilous debouchings from the simpler direction indicated by commonsense.

But something or other, either the imperturbable spirit of the old king or the resolution of both the horses, kept them going. The bloody wound in Arion's shoulder made by the rape of half his mane did not seem to unsettle his mind; nor did the stream of bantering railleries addressed to the badly injured Pegasos by the incorrigible Zeuks diminish that godlike creature's speed.

And the pace they were going seemed to accelerate the scientific conclusions of the alert Fly. "No, by Aidoneus!" he suddenly cried; "No! my precious Pyraust! I was right in calling that weird sound we hear all the time a conversation or colloquy; but I made a mistake as to the identity of one of the interlocutors to whose dramatic secrets we have been listening.

"I took it for a simple dialogue between our Heraklean Club and the curving sea-banks of our sacred isle. But do you know who it is with whom our House of "Rest in Motion" is conversing?"

The brown Moth fluttered the feathery points of both her wings and allowed the proboscean sucker at the tip of her tongue to make a receptive gesture. "Yes?" she whispered, "yes? O I can't wait to hear!"

"It's none other," announced the triumphant Fly, "than our old Sixth Pillar in the Corridor at home! So I really am a Discoverer! Eh? What?"

The astounded Moth could only feel herself grow an infinitesimal portion of an inch smaller.

"What," she murmured, "does our Protector say to the Pillar? Isn't there a danger that the startling news of our being carried to the other end of the island by Pegasos and Arion may give the Pillar such a shock that its marble frame will split open, as that image of Themis did when the Harpies attacked it with their nails?”

But the Fly, after licking the sensitized tip of each of its front legs and after drying these delicate members on its transparent wings, made use of them with exquisite care and chivalrous nicety as dainty brushes to remove any feathery film that might be obstructing the hearing of the brown Moth, and ordered her to give herself up to listening and not to forget all that the Pillar itself had taught them about the universal language of matter in use even by its minutest particles.

“Don’t ‘ee forget, dear Pyraust,” he added, “how when we began our study of the alphabet of matter we learnt how much more important the sensations that certain words convey to us are than the precise nature of the words used or the number of syllables they contain.

“Above all, my dear girl, don’t forget what the Olive-Shoot always tells us, how in the science of language it is a combination of assonance and alliteration that conveys the idea; and thus it is only in poetry that the real secret of what is happening is revealed.”

They were both silent, listening intently; and it is clear that the club of Herakles, now held tight in the old hero’s hand, must have been putting some very crucial questions to the Sixth Pillar; and it struck both our listening insects, not to speak of the club itself, that it was really a masterpiece of technical triumph this invention of the “Son of Hephaistos”, whoever he was, who divulged the open secret of the long-hidden language, whereby the four elements, earth and air and fire and water, could hold converse together.

At this moment Pyraust and Myos had not to wait a second before they could hear it, the clear unmistakable voice, so familiar to them in that old corridor of their royal cave, of the Sixth Pillar.

"No," came the voice. "There is not a word, not a sign from Pallas Athene. It is universally accepted that she is in one of her shrines among the blameless Ethiopians; but how long she will remain there or what particular thing it was that roused her wrath against us all in Hellas, nobody has the faintest idea.

"As to the other gods, news has come that the rumour was true which declared that Typhon, the most powerful and monstrous and terrifying of all the titanic brood of the Great Mother, Typhon whom Zeus only just managed to overcome by means of the thunder and lightning given him by that weird Cyclopean race of one-eyed half-gods, to which Polyphemus belonged, Typhon who was buried under Etna, had truly and indeed broken loose from his dungeon.

"It is said he is now confronted by Herakles himself, Herakles the son of Zeus, and has been stopped by Herakles from advancing more than a few miles from the fiery crater out of which he has burst.

"There is no need for you, O great Club of Herakles, who have lived with us so long, and whom we of the palace-corridor have come to regard as one of ourselves, to feel hurt that it is not yourself who are now in the strong hand of Herakles as he holds back this monstrous Demigod from destroying the whole population of Italy and Greece and from advancing upon Asia and Africa.

"They say that the Three Fates have long ago decided that it is only by the metal iron that Typhon can be defeated and they further tell me that Hephaistos has now forged for Herakles out of iron a weapon as deadly if not as shapely and supple as you are yourself! If you ask me what has happened to great Hermes, the cunning messenger of Zeus, and the subtle intermediary between men and gods and between the living and the dead, I can only tell you what my messengers tell me; and as you know my messengers are the fiery, aqueous, aerial, terrestrial, magnetic quiverings through the elements that are swifter than the feet of Hermes or the wings of Iris, the murmur, that is to say, of element to element, and, where the earth is concerned, the whisper of rock to rock, and of grain of sand to grain of sand!

"And from these I have learnt the startling news that Father Zeus is no longer served by Hermes the Messenger; but on the contrary that Hermes has gone back to his birth-place in Mount Kyllene, whither his mother, Maia, the loveliest of the Pleiades, is still drawn down from the sky by the poets who worship her; so that she, along with her son's music, shall enable countless generations of unborn men and women to embrace the dark spaces of life's dubious experience with pleasure instead of pain!

"You, old corridor-companion, keep on telling me about this devilish priest of Orpheus with his mad incantations and his mania for Eros. Well, my friend, let me now tell you what I hear about this young Eros of the Mysteries. I hear he has recently mutilated himself so that he can make love to both sexes and be loved by both.

"My messengers are obscure as to the precise harm — if harm it is that he has done to himself; but that he has done something very serious to himself they do most strongly affirm, assuring me that the old Eros that gods and men have known until this hour is no more; and that a new and different Eros has taken his place. The elements also tell me that the goddess Aphrodite after being unfaithful to him with both mortals and immortals for so long has now fallen in love again with her crippled lord, Hephaistos, and is struggling to keep him to herself with every art she knows and all this in the Island of Lemnos!

"As to the Father of the Olympians, the great son of Kronos himself, the elements tell me that he is still on Mount Gargaros, but without his thunder and lightning which have been taken back by that same Cyclopean race from whom he originally received them. What makes it worse for this poor Thunderer, deprived of thunder, is that not only has his own son Hermes deserted him, but his other messenger and emissary, Iris, the Rainbow, has been entirely pre-empted, appropriated, and taken possession of, by Hera, the Queen of Heaven, who is now left alone on the summit of Olympos, with only a handful of frightened attendants, and surrounded by the empty palaces and the deserted pleasure-halls of the once-crowded City of the Gods.

"Under these conditions, as you may easily imagine, O great lion-slaying Nemean Club, to still possess a messenger like Iris is an indescribable relief, and you may be sure that Queen Hera makes the most of it, and despatches the luckless Iris on the most difficult quests. For example I happen to know that at this very moment this youthful immortal is wandering through the uttermost lands of the blameless Ethiopians searching for Pallas Athene.

"You ask me what I learn from the elements about Hermes since he no longer serves the Father of Gods and Men? Well, old companion of so many years, you who along with me have seen so many strange faces in our corridor to the palace of the king, what I have gathered from over-hearing these communications between the elements, which of course simply means the contact of air with water, water with fire, fire with earth, is so startling that I myself have difficulty in believing it. But what I've learnt I'll tell you at once, old friend, if my voice still reaches you, as your un-winged Pegasos and your un-maned Arion whirl you to the end of the isle; and it is this.

“All the spirits of all the mortals who ever lived on earth have defied Aidoneus; and, following the ghost of Teiresias, have broken loose from Hades and are wandering at large over the whole earth. It is now Persephone who is searching for her mother, searching frantically, searching desperately for her, through all their familiar abodes, through all their ancient haunts, by every public way, along every well-known river.

“Hast thou seen my mother?” is her cry. “Hast thou seen a stately woman with a mantle over her head and a staff in her hand?”

“But the most astonishing part of the news the elements have brought me is this. By the advice of Hermes, who it appears has been down to Hades to find the mysterious and awful Aidoneus who carried off Persephone and made her swallow those honey-sweet seeds of the fatal pomegranate, this dark ruler of a deserted Hades has summoned his brother Poseidon to meet him at the utmost limit of the West where the Titan Atlas, as a punishment for opposing Zeus, holds up the sky.

“Here Aidoneus and Poseidon together may be able to persuade the Son of Kronos to join them in leaving Olympos to Hera and in restoring and building up again the shattered order of the world; in forcing the ghosts of the dead back to Hades, the Titans back to their punishment in Tartaros, and with the help of Atropos, the oldest of the Fates, getting both Eros and Dionysos under such complete control that the entire — —”

It was at this crucial moment that the two insects within the bosom of the club of Herakles had to clutch each other in sheer panic. The whole cortège had stopped with a terrific jerk. There was a ghastly sound of eight equine hooves scraping against some flinty floor of rock.

In the stress of this shock the two wounded animals, Pegasos still bleeding where his lost wing had been torn out, and Arion still switching and bleeding where he had lost half his mane, drew up side by side.

Odysseus as he slid down to the ground, not without a certain grim satisfaction, shifted his grasp from the reins to the bridle of Arion, while Nisos, leaving to Zeuks all real responsibility for the wounded Pegasos, pushed the treasure-sack as well as he could to the part of the creature's back that was still unhurt.

As for Zeuks, he set himself to make a timely use of the healing properties of human saliva. He spat exhaustively upon the raw place in the creature's side from which the wing had been plucked, and when he had finished doing this he proceeded to blow upon the glittering bubbles of his own spittle until the whole surface of the creature's side was as iridescent as if the luckless Iris herself, exhausted by her pursuit of Athene among the blameless Ethiopians, had dissolved in fatigue upon his back.

Nisos glanced quickly round to see if the old King were using his spittle as balm for Arion's shoulder from which Enorches had torn at least half of that flowing mane; but in place of anything of that sort Odysseus was leaning his own elbow upon Arion's back together with the Nemean Club while he investigated the cause of this abrupt halt of their divine steeds.

Nisos had only to follow the tilt forward of the old king's beard to share his discovery, and they both faced the interrupter of their ride with cautious wonder. It was at a wild, shaggy, goat-legged, goat-horned, and yet human-shaped figure lying fast asleep in the shadow of a great rock that the old man and the boy now gazed in astonishment.

And then Nisos suddenly realized that there was another figure in their path, and one with which he was already acquainted. This second figure was nobody else but the eldest of the Three Fates, the powerful Atropos herself.

Then once more the boy faced her, the same frail woman, resting her back just as she had done before against the trunk of a spruce-fir that grew upon the very rock beneath which the sleeping Goat-foot lay. Unlike this goat-horned, goat-legged figure, however, the little old woman with her back to the tree was wide-awake; nor did the tree against which she was resting break the glare of the afternoon sun for her in the manner in which the rock did for the Being below her.

"O! I never thought — —" gasped Nisos the moment he met the eyes of this little old woman.

"No, you never thought, my boy, did you, that you and old Atropos would meet again so soon! In truth I never expected it myself. You see," she went on, keeping her eyes fixed on the boy and completely disregarding both Odysseus and Zeuks, "we Fates are not — I wish indeed we were! — the sole arbiters of destiny in this mad world. It was, for example, only in very vague shape that we Three foresaw all that's happening upon the earth today.

"But when this confusion ends, for confusion by its inherent nature cannot last, neither we three, nor the goddess Themis, whose image the Harpies broke, no, nor even the great Son of crooked-counselling Kronos, himself, will be the only arbiters of what happens. There will still remain, my dear boy, those two great Powers, and I am not talking of Eros or Dionysos, whom we all, plants and trees and beasts and birds, and fishes and reptiles and worms and insects and men and gods must obey, Necessity and Chance."

The eyes of Atropos seemed to hold behind them, when she had done speaking, so much more than the half-named body of a little, fleshless, shrivelled, skinny old woman, that Nisos continued to stare in petrified awe into their singular depths.

The sensation they gave him was that the sky above Ithaca and indeed above all the isles in all the bays and seas and straits and gulfs of the land of the Achaeans, together with the interiorly receding depths of all that land itself, the depths, in fact, of all the various solid elements that composed the rocks and sand and earth and soil of which that land was composed, had that pair of eyes as their eyes, and were even now, those remotenesses of sky beyond limit, and those staggering recessions of terrestrial matter beyond limit, gazing at him in a positively ghastly intensity while they informed him that the real deciders of his fate and of the fate of the old hero at his side, and of the fate of Eione, the ideal loveliness of whose perfect form had been for him the living background of the whole of this wild ride, were not the Fates nor the Gods nor the sublime obstinacy and cunning of Odysseus, but, as Atropos herself had just admitted, the inescapable pressure of pitiless Necessity and the motiveless antics of causeless Chance.

The tension, as they thus met once again, between the heart of Nisos and the eyes of Atropos was however soon brought to an end by an abrupt awakening movement in the goat-legged and goat-horned Personage lying in the shadow of that rock. He didn't wake quickly. He awoke slowly. But no sooner had he lifted a hand, not even to scratch his head but to grope with lecherous fingers amid the foliations of grey lichen that covered the base of the rock than an astonishing thing happened; and what was queerest about this thing was that it was felt by everybody and that it was inescapable.

Both the animals quite evidently felt it. Odysseus felt it. Nisos felt it. And Zeuks felt it. The fragile old figure beneath the spruce-fir on the top of the rock must at that moment have been occultly, covertly, and peremptorily summoned to some other significant parting of the ways for persons in whose destiny she was interested; for she promptly took advantage of this opportune distraction, and gathering her flimsy garments about her scrambled down from the rock and disappeared among the trees to seaward.

Nisos was amazed at what had begun to happen to him the very first moment that this goat-legged sleeper opened his eyes. He had been so hypnotized into a sort of philosophic acceptance of things he could only half follow, that, when he found himself shaking from head to foot in extreme panic-terror, but without the faintest notion of why the sudden fear had come upon him, he felt as if he were going mad. Was some appalling danger threatening them all, including the animals who had brought them here? And had the oldest and strongest of the Spinners of Destiny come to warn them, and had now gone to ward off from them the approaching danger?

Nisos felt certain he was not more affected by this sudden and inexplicable panic than were his companions. He could see that the horses were trembling; and indeed he experienced in the teeth of this weird terror a proud satisfaction that his own right arm which, while he was holding his colloquy with Atropos, he had kept stretched out, had not loosened or lessened the pressure of the hand with which he was supporting the great treasure-sack, propt on the back of Pegasos.

And it was clear to him that the wits of Odysseus were not in any more danger of being lost in this mysterious panic than his own. The old king calmly advanced towards the recumbent goat-man, dragging Arion with him. Nisos noticed too that he held the bridle with his left hand while he advanced, and that he gripped the Heraklean club firmly with his right.

“Hail to you,” the old king said, “whoever you may be — whether immortal or mortal, whether god or man! And I pray you, if you are a god, to pardon us for disturbing your noon-sleep before natural termination. I am Odysseus and I have come with Nisos Naubolides and with our good friend

Zeuks to do honour to the daughter of the great dead Prophet Teiresias whom many-voiced Rumour declares has been brought from Thebes to a dwelling here, hard by the sea. If, therefore, whether you are a god or a man, you will assist us in finding this House, I, Odysseus, son of Laertes, will of my free heart, give you whatever your soul desires of the treasure we carry with us."

The prostrate goat-man heard him to the end without stirring. Then he made a very quick movement. He rolled the greenish-black eye-balls of the enormous whites of his nymph-ravishing eyes, and without changing his position, or relaxing his clutch upon the lichen-tuft he was fondling, he took in everything. In fact from the look in those exploring eyes he did more than take in everything. You could have said he devoured, drank up, and erotically possessed everything; not only the old warrior with his bowsprit beard and full-bosomed club advancing upon him, but the half-winged Pegasos, the half-maned Arion, the grave, slender boy Nisos, and every bulge in the choreographic blur which the blazing sun created out of the bucolic features of Zeuks — except the great sack of treasure, across which those rolling eyes flitted without offering it the faintest attention.

Then the old king spoke again: "Are you prepared to show us the way to the house by the sea, whither these Thebans, if such they are, have brought the daughter of Teiresias?"

The goat-horned, goat-legged one suddenly leapt to his feet and with a rough and rude gesture pushed past Odysseus and seizing Zeuks by his elbows stared offensively and yet in some queer way possessively and almost paternally into his face. Over the wounded back of Pegasos, which, though still tender to the touch and not by any means healed, had been considerably soothed by its owner's spittle, it was still possible for Nisos to see Zeuks' expression, and it was an amazement to him to remark how quietly, and yet with a sort of comical expectation of more dramatic revelations to follow, he took the gross, yet almost cajoling stare of this horned and hairy Being.

“You are! — you are! And yet you cannot be!” blurted out the puzzled and bewildered God-Beast; and Nisos never forgot the mixture of earthy roguery, rustic guile, spontaneous magical power, along with the professional horned-ram propitiation of a cunning old shepherd, in the goat-legged creature’s tone.

But the capturer and dominator of Pegasos and Arion, the man who was more than a match for the Priest of the Mysteries, was once again completely master of the situation. With an easy assumption of authority — and yet our clever young Nisos didn’t miss the shade of something that resembled a curious spasm of play-acting in his tone — Zeuks freed himself from the God-Beast’s hold and turned to Odysseus.

“We are in the presence, O King,” he blurted out with an irresponsible chuckle, while the goat-horned creature leaned his chin upon the head of Pegasos and began whispering in one of the flying horse’s nervous and twitching ears, “of none other than the great god Pan himself. For some curious reason that I cannot explain to you, O king, this great and most benevolent deity has, ever since he first appeared to me on my farm, confused me with a lad he knew on the farm of farmer Dryops, whose favourite Nymph was Erikepaia, though we ignorant farm-labourers persisted in calling her Dryope or Dryopea, but who rejoiced to share Pan’s bed in the moss and ferns of this farmer Dryops’ Arcadian inheritance.

“Unlike the jealous and tyrannical Dryops, whose despotic arms Erikepaia joyfully exchanged for those of this famous god who fills the udders of Arcadian cattle with the richest milk and the hives of Arcadian bees with the sweetest honey, I have been proud, though she was loved by this kindly god, to have myself loved the lovely Erikepaia long and loyally, and long after she grew too old for a god's embraces I loved her. I loved her when she grew old with the oak of her adoption, which she and I together dug up from that Arcadian valley and planted here, here by the side of this rock, here where thou, O great Pan, whether thou knewest it or not, wast sleeping a moment ago.

"Her oak has fallen into dust and Erikepaia with it; but never once did the Nymph who had been loved by Pan or the farmer, my poor self, who loved the Nymph that had been loved by Pan, ever think of him save with true worship."

It was only when Zeuks had finished speaking that the last thing anyone of them expected happened.

The goat-legged Being swung away from Pegasos and approached Odysseus. Then with a movement so swift and yet so gentle that Nisos imagined he was lifting the hero's hand to his lips as a sign that he would himself be his guide to the house of the fugitives from Thebes he bit the king's hand with such sudden and vicious force that the old man dropped his club to the ground.

In an instant the god was upon the back of Arion, who with mildly startled up-tossed head tore his bridle from Odysseus, and, while what was left of his beautiful black mane was tossed across his rider's lean, goat-hairy shanks, set off at a gallop in the direction from which they had all just come; but as he rode away, the god of milk and butter and honey looked back over his shoulder at Nisos, as if deliberately wishing to include him also among the victims of his mischievous and shameless amorousness.

"Pegasos has told me," he cried, "that you've left at the palace a sweet little shepherdess called Eione who is just made to delight my simple taste. She'll suit me better, I fancy, than any prophetic daughter of Teiresias!"

Horse and rider, they were soon out of sight; but the shrewd Zeuks had not missed a swift instinctive move towards Pegasos made by Nisos the moment the goat-horned one flung out that word: “Eione”.

“No, no, my dear boy!” he cried sharply. “’Twould be crazy to try to catch them! And what could you do if you did catch them? All the while I lodged — and in this very place — with Erikepaia, she never once told me of any occasion during the time she was loved by Pan when he made her jealous of a mortal maid.”

He turned to Odysseus with a look of whimsical appeal, which, though it had something at once gravely conspiring and gaily mischievous, contained also an immediate and extremely practical warning. And then, while he kept one hand in kindly restraint on the boy’s shoulder, he boldly laid the other on the Club of Herakles which the king, having picked it up from the ground, had carefully balanced, too absorbed to give it more than a secondary place in his mind, on the unwounded portion of the back of Pegasos.

“Our young friend here, O great king,” protested Zeuks; “is impatient for our return so that he can protect his girl from the advances of this amorous goat-foot; but I tell him that, though, we can wound these immortal creatures and even draw ichor from their veins till they are too weak to move, we cannot plunge them as they can plunge us into that vast company of spirits beyond counting, such as have lately, the rumour runs, broken loose from Hades — into the company of those who can only fly like the flight of birds where no birds are and can only cry like the echoes of voices where no voices are, until the end of time.”

“Let us, O great Master,” begged Nisos, who for all Zeuks’ words could not help vividly visualizing the white soft body of Eione helplessly yielded up to those lean hairy shanks and to those gross bristly lips of the immortal

Goat-foot, “pray desperately to Atropos that fate may conquer both necessity and chance and bring us quick, quick, quick, to that House by the Sea whence without delay we can return home! O dear master, O great king, this, I swear, is what Pegasos wants, for I can feel him trembling and quivering under our hands!”

All the while the boy was making this appeal he was working hard with both his hands to get the great sack of treasure nearer the horse’s tail and further away from its shoulders.

“But, my friends,” groaned Odysseus, raising his bowsprit beard and drawing in his breath towards the four quarters of the horizon one by one. “How, in the name of Pallas Athene, are we to know in what direction this accurst place lies? If only we could hear the sea; that would be a surer help than any praying to any goddess of fate.”

For a moment they were all three silent. Then the two men became aware of unrestrained sobs breaking from the throat of Nisos. And for another moment, however intently they listened, that was the only sound.

Suddenly Odysseus murmured, as if thinking aloud: “I have felt this happen before, once, twice, three times before! There may be nothing in it; but, on the other hand, it may be — We must doubt everything — including doubt. Yes, there! There it is again! So be it. I can only try.” He lifted the club an inch or two, held it very lightly, and waited again. He held it as if he were testing its weight. He held it so that in its whole length it was removed from contact with the back of Pegasos. Then, still holding it lightly with his right hand, but grasping the horse’s bridle with his left, he began walking rapidly straight past the rock and into what looked like the thickest part of the fir-forest that completely surrounded them. Nisos, lifting his head now, thought silently: “He is making the club lead us! O Atropos, let us get back in time to save her!” The path by which they had come had vanished; and now indeed there was no path at all. But Odysseus led them forward without the faintest hesitation, nor was there any hesitation in the manner in which Pegasos followed, the treasure-sack propt on his rump, and Nisos keeping it from falling, while Zeuks with a large fern in his hand followed close behind, driving the flies from the raw on the horse's back whence Enorches had wrenched the wing.

Thus they steadily advanced, weaving their way in and out among the closely-growing fir-trees, and every now and then ascending and descending some small eminence usually of a circular shape and not unfrequently crowned with incredibly ancient stones of a kind totally different from any the island itself supplied, and in some cases, Nisos noticed as they passed, engraved with hieroglyphs not one letter of which he could recognize as Achaean or Hellenic.

And as they went on it was still the club of Herakles who led them; and Nisos often wondered whether he himself or Zeuks could have possibly caught, just through the palm of their hand, that subtle, illusive, delicate quiver, like the faint ripple of water seeking its level, by which the club conveyed its intimation of direction to the hand that had blinded Polyphemos.

Meanwhile within his "life-crack", as to himself the club called their refuge, the silky wings of Pyraust, the brown moth, were fluttering with a desperate desire to fly homewards in the track of Arion and Pan.

"You shan't! You shan't! You shan't!" shrilled the black fly in its highest-pitched voice. "I'd perish before I'd let you do anything so crazy! Don't you see, you sweet, delectable, adorable, little fool, that the trees are already throwing long shadows, and didn't you notice that on the crest of that last little hill we crossed the tree-trunks had a golden glow on their bark?"

The lovely little moth hurried to retort to this in an ironic assumption of pitiful weakness and naive innocence that not only made the fly feel a complete fool but removed from his proud heart every drop of that sweet metheglin of male superiority with which he had been intoxicating himself as he pictured their flight home together side by side in the “Wolf-Light” of the early dawn.

“Oh I know, I know,” cried the brown moth, “how lazy and luxurious it is of me to think of flying in the dark. But O it’s so nice, though I know it’s naughty of me to enjoy such a thing, to feel the great big strong black night holding me up on every side and whispering to me all the time: ‘Lean on me and you’ll be absolutely safe! Spread out your beautiful wings under me and you’ll see how soon you’ll learn to swim with me, ride with me, float with me, yes! you darling little moth, till I fill every nerve beneath your skin, and every pore in your skin, and every cavity in your lovely and trembling form with my calm and cool support!’

“Thus whispers the black night; and nobody can ever know,” continued the subtle and teasing moth, “all that the darkness of night means to me!”

The fly gave such a jerk of metaphysical excitement at this speech that the club’s consciousness of a shock in the “life-crack” of his honeysuckle-twisted or ivy-twisted bosom very nearly disturbed the whole piloting of their cortège.

“Why then, O most lovely and bewitching of self-deceivers, do you always try so desperately to burn yourself to death in any flame of light?”

The beautiful moth’s answer to this piece of logic had, however, to be postponed; for it was at that very second that they arrived at the end of the wood. There, before them, lay the salt waves with their islands and ships and rocky reefs and wide-stretching curving bays. And there, beyond all these, in far-away, vision-fulfilling, story-ending, mystery-resolving, resting-places for the imagination, the eyes of those three human beings were led further and yet further, to the vast horizons of the encircling sea.

And the great Club of Herakles ceased its rudder-like quiverings as impelled by an irresistible impulse Odysseus lifted the great weapon high above his head and shook it in the air as if he, a man among men, were taking it on himself to challenge that golden sun-path which, originating behind him, was now flowing across the darkening waters!

Yes! and to challenge the divine ether itself he lifted it up, the ether under which the sea-spaces before him extended beyond the ships, beyond the islands, beyond the main-land, beyond those far-away Asiatic mountains, on the Eastern verge of the world, where from the image of Niobe, the mother of mankind, fell no longer that ceaseless torrent of tears, and finally to challenge the very trident of Poseidon himself as he strove to dominate the multitudinous waves.

The two men, the now one-winged horse, the Heraklean club, the two insects, and our young friend Nisos, they were all silent; they were all gazing in front of them. What they saw as they gazed was the ruin of a building so colossal in its pre-historic enormity that the first impression Nisos had of it was that it ought to have sunk down by its own weight thousands of years ago to the very centre of the earth.

But what else did the boy see that made him even forget, as he looked, Eione’s danger from the shaggy lasciviousness of the Goat-foot from Arcadia? He distinctly saw, erect on a huge flat stone under a cyclopean arch, the figure of a young girl, a young girl of about the same age as Eione, though she may have been a little taller, and it seemed to him as if, with an outstretched arm, that figure was waving to him; not to the others, but to him — to him alone.

CHAPTER VI

"But you don't answer my question, Pontopereia. Why do you keep climbing the tower and looking inland like that? You're not up to some game with any of these farm-boys round here, are you? I've always told you I wouldn't stand for that sort of thing; so you'd better not begin it.

"I don't mean that you're not to climb the tower, child; so you needn't put on that sulky look. I know you like looking out over the bay and counting the sails and watching for foreign ships. I like doing that myself. Yes I'm always ready to play our old game of pretending we're waiting for the King of the Blameless Ethiopians; and that when his ship shows itself it will have a black sail, so that we shall know it.

"No, no! You're not to slip off like that without a word! You're much too fond of doing that; and I've noticed it's grown on you as a regular habit these Spring days. Of course I know all young girls get Spring-Fever. I used to get it myself. In fact, old as I am, I do still. The wily old Earth-Mother herself must have had it, or something uncommonly like it, when she left her daughter alone with those daffodil-pickers, a proper temptation for the King of Hades. Daffodil-pickers! She had to swallow a few Pomegranate-seeds before she learnt how close lie the borders of Heaven and Hell!

"But you weren't looking seaward, or counting ships, or pretending to be waiting for a black sail. You were staring at those fir-trees and at all those half-bare oaks and at that open clearing on the top of the ridge, where on fine days we can see the Rock of the Nymph of Dryops.

"Have you got into that crazy head of yours that just because I let Eione take you up there when this Moon was young you'll see that same chit of a dairy-wench waiting for you in the same place now this Moon is old?

"O yes! and another thing, Pontopereia, while I've got you to myself; for I don't know what Zenios would do if he heard of this little new game of yours. Don't you ever again — yes, you may well steal into the shadow of that Bust of Kadmos! — but you must listen to me now, though I can see how white your cheeks have gone and how those clumsy great legs of yours are shivering and shaking! — Don't you ever again, my girl, go into Zenios' underground treasury! I expect you've so often heard me laugh at the old fool about his pride and his miserliness and about all that nonsense of his being the rightful heir to the throne of Thebes, that you've begun to fancy you can play any of your wild-girl games upon the old stick-in-the-mud.

"But I can assure you, my fine girl, that though you may be a prophet's daughter, and though you may even have prophetic visions of your own, there's one thing you can't do, and that is meddle with Zenios' treasure-shelves! Why, my dear crazy child, if he found me — yes, me, my very, very self! — fumbling and fidgetting, and flopping, and flouncing from shelf to shelf in that treasury of his there'd be a rumpus that would bring Omphos, Kissos, and Sykos up from the fields!

"And do you think he'd put up with a child like you flibbertigibbetting down there? I don't like to try even to think of what he might do — yes! do to you and do to me too for not looking after you better! — for I've seen him in these furious moods, which is something you, my good child, have never seen, and I can assure you if you had seen him in one of them you'd never again take that silver key from its hook in his bedroom, never again go down those steps to that door."

It was clear that Pontopereia would be obedient. But it was absolutely certain also that had the inscrutable Atropos met the eyes of this lovely guardian of a clumsy girl at this particular second the woman's exultation over her victory would have sunk to the vanishing point.

"Where is Zenios? Is he coming home to supper?" enquired Pontopereia when she had recovered herself.

"O yes," replied Okyrhöe, glancing at the reflection of them both in the big polished shield hanging on the wall over their heads, the shield which Zenios always swore had belonged to Kadmos himself, "he'll be back all right for supper. In fact he's got to meet that funny old man Moros, your friend Eione's father or grandfather. I forget which it is! But he's a quaint old fellow; and he certainly knows how to flatter. Zenios thinks highly of him since he's ready to listen without end to endless talk about the great House of Kadmos, whence it came, and whither — —"

"Whither it'll go when you and I have escaped from it!" interrupted Pontopereia; and though the girl's eyes were fixed on the arched entrance to the room where they were talking, an entrance which in some incredible antiquity, had been carved out of ten yards of solid rock, Okyrhöe's eyes were still absorbed in the reflection of the two of them in that great polished shield. And so intense was the power of concentration with which Okyrhöe's self-interest had endowed her vision that it seemed to her a quite natural yielding to a quite natural impulse when she allowed the young girl to steal from her side and slip away in silence through that low deeply-cut arch into the open air, while she watched herself arrange her hair, arrange the veil that covered her hair, arrange what covered the veil that covered her hair, and, as she did so, permitted herself luxuriously and voluptuously to lie back in her chair and to tell herself, for the thousandth and one time, the thrilling story of her life up to date and all its drastic moves and dramatic crises.

It must have been her feminine suspicion that Pontopereia had taken advantage of Zenios' troublesome mania for being flattered to start an amorous affair with some farmer's son of the neighbourhood, or even to exalt this new friendship with Eione into a romantic attachment, that set her own mind running so recklessly upon her own youth.

Anyway she let herself recall the time when, being younger than Pontopereia was today, she had been a fellow-attendant along with Arsinöe among the crowd of spirited young girls from every part of the mainland at the court of King Priam in Ilium.

Her inspiration for these memories came from her own beautiful face; and as at this moment, with Zenios walking to meet his aged flatterer and Pontopereia remorsefully pretending to be looking for a black sail on water that was already too dark to reveal any sail, and with Nemertes, the stalwart mother of their three faithful servants, Omphos, Kissos, and Sykos, yes, with Nemertes, she told herself, now at work in the kitchen preparing a plentiful meal for the three lads and a no less plentiful, but rather more elegant one for Zenios and herself, there was no immediate necessity to leave this shield-mirror, she allowed the motions of her fingers, about her head, her hair, and her perfect throat, to follow the arbitrary motions of her memory.

And she remembered how her crafty mother from Crete, who had made her change her name from Genetyllis to Okyrhöe, had warned her against making friends with a wild strange girl at the same court whom everyone but the girl herself knew to be a bastard daughter of Hector.

But with Arsinöe she had insisted on making friends; and had proved her wisdom in this when the crash came and the city was taken, for she succeeded in making Andromache, Hector's widow, believe that it was she, and not Arsinöe, who had the right to call Hector father, and she had betrayed Arsinöe into the hands of Phoenician merchants bound for Ithaca, and while clinging herself to the ill-starred Andromache, she had succeeded at last in becoming the wife of the miser Zenios, and in aiding him in his flight from Thebes in company with Pontopereia.

It had only been when Zenios in his craving for masculine society had begun to exercise his hospitable influence on the susceptible Moros that Okyrhöe learnt that Arsinöe like herself was a refugee in Ithaca; and although this piece of news had at first been a considerable shock to Okyrhöe, she was now, as she airily, though by no means absent-mindedly, practised various expressions in profile, in three-quarters-face, and in full face, telling herself a fine story as to what she would do if by any strange chance she found herself confronting once again her old acquaintance, Arsinöe, the daughter of Hector the son of Priam….

"Okyrhöe! what do you think? Who do you suppose — —" The beautiful lady rose and swung round from her shield-mirror like an indignant sea-mew from the crest of a wave.

The shock of seeing Pontopereia so quickly again and in such an unaccountable whirl of excitement was as irritating as it was startling. The girl had left her at her shield-mirror. The girl now found her at her shield-mirror. There was something annoying in being thus caught practising seductive expressions and the effective manipulation of dramatic drapery.

"How often must I tell you, Pontopereia, that I won't have you calling me Okyrhöe! You must call me Mother."

"But you are not — —" the girl began; but seeing real anger in the woman's face she hurriedly broke off. "The King of Ithaca has come, mother! He's come with a heap of golden treasure to buy me from you and take me away with him!"

The excitement of Pontopereia was so overwhelming that it seemed to have loosened her hair, enlarged her breasts, increased her height, and transformed her whole being to such an extent that her figure seemed to fill the arched passage that led out into the air. As a growing girl the daughter of Teiresias was at the opposite pole of girlhood from the young Eione: for, while this latter's face was plain and homely, her limbs were those of a perfect dancer; but while Pontopereia's limbs were thick, heavy, awkward and unwieldy, her face was moulded with exquisite delicacy as if for the perfect expression of pure inspiration. It was a face that lent itself to be possessed by a power that, even as you watched it, seemed able to change human flesh and blood into some rarer essence, as though air, water, and fire had joined in revolt against the heavier and more substantial fourth element with which they are normally associated.

But though Okyrhöe had already recovered her composure and was now arranging her drapery round her shoulders with the absolute poise of a complete balance of personal being, as she begged the excited girl to tell her how large a bodyguard Odysseus had brought with him, and as she shifted her position from side to side in attempts to see if any of the royal attendants were visible between the outlet from this sequestered chamber and the curves of the sand-dunes descending to the edge of the sea, it was clear to Pontopereia that she had not yet decided upon her line of action.

"May I go and bring them in, Mother? And then may I run and tell Zenios who's come, and bring him back before he's gone too far? The only danger is that if I do catch up with him — you know what he is, Mother! — he very likely will just come back alone and send me on — miles and miles on very likely! — to tell old Moros that the king has suddenly come to supper and if he comes too there'll be one too many!"

The daughter of Teiresias certainly revealed her insight into Okyrhöe's nature by assuming that when the lovely lady finally decided in what direction her own chief private interests lay she wouldn't waste a second in making up her mind what she wanted done.

But what a girl of her age, however great her prophetic inspiration, naturally couldn't know, was the enormous though imponderable part played in the lives of all grown-up women by that curious sixth sense that can only be clumsily and crudely defined by the words social instinct. Nor could she know that this same "social instinct" resembles pure animal instinct much closer than it resembles anything rational or logical, and, as such, depends to a large extent on sight, sound, taste, smell and touch.

"Can he possibly remember me?" Okyrhöe thought. Then, having dismissed that idea as out of the question— "Never mind," she said to herself, "whether he does or not, I remember him perfectly well; and I remember that with him, where women are concerned, there are only two things, either simple lust, or simple affection. That being so — —" And her train of thought concluded with obscene images.

Meanwhile Pontopereia was wondering about the blood-stained ichor dripping from the left side of the one-winged horse, wondering about the implacably-pointed beard of Odysseus, pondering on the deeply cracked bosom of the club of Herakles, pondering on the jests and jokes and jibes and jabbering conjurations of the jiggering-juggering Zeuks, and finally seeing again the ever-vigilant Nisos with the gods alone knew what sort of precious treasure done up in a sack that reeked of mysterious far-away harbours.

But Okyrhöe had already had time to make up her mind. Like the smoke of a burning arsenal her astounding decision filled the room and went eddying forth in spiral circles over the whole of Ornax and over the dark waters of the whole bay.

"What I've got to do is to leave Nemertes to look after Zenios, take Pontopereia with me — by the gods if they want her they shall have us both! — go with them to the palace of Odysseus; and, once there, having got rid of the old man's old nurse, try my hand at being a combination of Kalypso and Penelope; and, as long as Athene leaves me in peace, that'll be pretty easy!"

"No, child," she commanded in the strong firm tone of a born feminine ruler, "No, child, I'll come with you to welcome them. Oh no! I can't possibly spare you to run after Zenios. Let him meet old Moros and bring him back. Nemertes must prepare a really royal meal and when Omphos, Kissos, and Sykos have washed and changed their clothes and had their own supper, they must wait at table! So come on, child, we must tell Nemertes what's in store for her. It's lucky we killed that old boar-pig last week; aye! What a piece of luck that is! Nemertes must have enough meat in the larder for three Odysseuses! Well, come along my dear!"

It is certain that the primeval dining-hall of Ornax had never seen such a satisfying feast as the one with which, only a few hours later, the three gratified guests along with their entertainers were delighting their souls.

What added an unexpected and quite special interest to this improvised banquet was the fact that, along with old Moros, Zenios had brought back to Ornax none other than Petraia's sister who after a distressing scene with the Latin Nymph Egeria had embarked frantically for home; and by the aid of a real and not pretended black sail had been brought to this very coast.

To the complete surprise of their hostess the heart and soul of the whole dinner was Zeuks. Nor was it only Okyrhöe who was astonished at the way this plain rustic Achaean dominated the situation and entertained them all.

Nisos was amazed at what he saw and heard. Zenios though he condescended to chuckle now and again, was obviously more interested in a flask of a special kind of wine that Moros had brought for him than in anything else; but the fact that the first Master that Ornax had had for a thousand years, had had indeed since men and Titans were almost indistinguishable in their hostility to the gods, was so abnormally thick-skinned, so self-centred, so toweringly conventional, did undoubtedly contribute to the banquet's success.

Zenios was indeed so magnificently stupid as to take it for granted that his being of the same blood as the famous Kadmos and possessing that potentate's Shield, Drinking-Horn, and Sceptre in the shape of a Thyrsus, were circumstances that did so much honour to any guest that chance might send him that no more was required.

And no more was required. Zenios' guests were the luckiest of guests. They were left to entertain themselves. Nor was the fact of Zenios being such an obsessed collector of objects made of gold detrimental to what might be called the pleasant negativeness of his hospitality. His visitors obscurely thought of themselves — so completely did the mania of the born collector dominate the atmosphere of his table — as if they too were rare and precious and had been brought there for that reason.

Nor was this feeling contradicted by the nature of the locality. Ornax was literally a House of Ruins; but it was not itself a ruin. It had come to be created out of a physical acme of desperate isolation in combination with a psychic acme of impervious conceit. But it had been created by a woman; and thus the newly arisen House of Ornax had advantages, qualities, amenities and conveniences, beyond most of the Kings' Houses in Hellas.

In the first place it was divided into five essential structures; the Mirror Room, where hung the Shield of Kadmos; the sleeping Chambers with little stone-passages and wooden doors connecting them; the Dining-Hall, prepared for the reception of about twenty guests with no less than three “guest-thrones”, as well as the permanent host-throne, ensconced in which the greatest of Collectors enjoyed his meat, his wine, and an experimental variety of baked bread and sweet-meat condiments on every night of the year; the underground treasure-chamber, entered by descending quite a long flight of stone steps, at the bottom of which was a low-arched chamber entirely surrounded by extensive shelves scooped out of solid rock and crowded with all manner of ancient vessels and platters and bowls and goblets, things that were by no means all Theban, far less all connected with Kadmos, but things that had been got together by Xenios himself, in his double role as an acquisitive collector and an implacable miser.

And finally there was the kitchen. This was so large, so ancient, so monumental, that a visitor’s first thought would be that only a goddess could possibly preside over such a place.

Quite apart from her creation of this ideal abode for herself and Zenios, Okyrhöe had made sure that outside the great Kitchen there was a House of Shelter for Nemertes and her sons. And it was within the entrance to this annexe that a little private chamber had been constructed for Pontopereia and for her alone.

Okyrhöe had wisely decided, when the three of them first took possession of this long-deserted House by the Sea, that the best part for herself to play was the double one of Zenios’ wife and the bastard daughter of Hector; for this was a role that left her entirely independent and free at any moment to leave both Zenios and Pontopereia for any other human “stepping-stone to higher things” that Fate or Chance might provide. Absolute freedom for herself had been the guiding principle of all her actions since she first heard of Ornax. She had heard of the place from a Tyrian pirate.

And she had scarcely heard of it before she persuaded Zenios to secure the services not only of the man and his ship but of the man's sister Nemertes, the murder of whose builder-husband she contrived on their way, for it can be imagined how soon she made the ship's master her accomplice; and indeed the man was well advised by his sister to weigh anchor and clear off while the going was good.

Old Moros had never seen in all his days on earth anything so memorable as what he saw at this banquet. He was a kind-hearted man, however. Kind-heartedness had indeed been his chief handicap in life. He always found it difficult not to identify his feelings with the feelings of every person, man, woman or child, whom he came across. Each personality old Moros encountered impinged upon the personality of old Moros more than in her ordinary, rough-and-ready rules for human existence Nature had altogether allowed for. Thus while he watched the famous King Odysseus with awe and reverence, and stole as many infatuated glances as he dared at their enthralling hostess, he couldn't help again and again and again, casting a sympathetic, protective, and even paternal look at the newly-landed sister of Petraia, who sat by his side, while their far-sighted hostess was thinking, "I must keep those two together till Moros gets so concerned about her that he fetches a cart to carry her home." For the obvious truth was that Petraia's sister was pregnant.

How far gone was her pregnancy old Moros was not experienced enough in the child-bearing of ladies to have the least idea; but he saw enough for his habitual sympathy to beset him. Most tenderly he warded off the excess of wine offered the woman by the tallest of the three sons of Nemertes. All the three were attired in some exquisitely-washed white stuff that somehow gave old Moros the feeling that he was surrounded by male Sirens in the depths of the sea, who were always wanting to refill both his own and his neighbour's wine-cup, the neighbour for whose sake, so as to keep her repeated refusals from being observed, for luckily the wine did not incommode his own stomach, he succeeded in keeping their two glasses on his side of her plate.

"For the third time!" cried Zeuks, rising to his feet and striking the black bull's horn, rimmed with massive silver, from which he was drinking, against the golden goblet that had been so carefully chosen by Okyrhöe for Odysseus, "I call upon you all to join with me in defeating the ultimate design of this Monster, Enorches, who has dared to wrench half the life from these two celestial Horses!

"What is it I heard you say in your heart just now, great king, that you want us all to do? I'll tell you! I'll tell you! I'll tell you now, and I'll tell you once and for all!

"Yes, yes! You can look at me with that everlasting look of yours, which says to the entire universe 'Stop this business of acceptance as if there were no such thing as choice. Come! come! Do something about it!' That's what your pointed beard, sticking out like the sword of a sword-fish is forever saying: 'For the sake of all the gods in the sky do something about it!'

"But when we ordinary people want 'to do something about it, we simply don't know what to try to do!' Listen, therefore, O great king, to the word of one of the humblest of your subjects, and stick your beard into me when I go wrong in what I say!

"What we all want in our hearts, men and women alike, is a peaceful and at the same time an active life. There are too many prophets and oracles too, who always tell us to crown some king, to obey some law, to follow some hero, to embrace some system, to accept some philosophy, to invade some country, to sack some city!

"Well then, O great King, well then, dear Lords and Ladies, what happens? We burn that city, we over-run that country, we change our name, our language, our manners, our dress, our habits. But what is the result? Are we any happier? Not a bit of it! Are we any richer? Not by a farthing! Are we any wiser? Ask our wives and children! Are we honester, nobler, braver, kinder, tenderer, more sympathetic, more long-suffering, more enduring, more unconquerable, more impregnable? We are not!

"And yet we have invaded Persia, sacked Ecbatana, gutted Syracuse, burnt Troy! And yet we have accepted the philosophy of Parmenides. We have offered sacrifice to the God of Israel. We have bowed our heads in the Temple of Baal. We have given our maidens to Pan and our boys to Moloch. And are we the happier for it? Are we the wiser for it?

"Not a jot! Our eyes still weep salt tears! Our slaves still sweat blood! Our women still bear abortions! Our grapes are still sour! Our hives still lack honey! Our figs still lack sweetness! Our fountains are still slow to run, and our streams still sink in the same sand and dry in the same desert!

"What therefore is the word for the unenlightened and the sign for the uninspired? What is the clue for the lost in the wilderness; and the secret of recovery for the heavy of heart? Is it what Enorches calls the Mystery of Love that will save us? Is it the holy ecstasy of Dionysos that will set us straight in the path of happiness?

"Never on your life, great King! Never on your lives, my lovely companions! The only thing that can set us on the path of happiness is to create carvers of joy in our own secret selves and moulders of delight in our own hidden souls. And we must do it by the countering and confounding of the most extreme contradictions.

“We can’t do it, I tell you, by trying to mingle these opposites in confused conglomeration! No! we must keep our lives in natural advances and retreats, in ebb and flow, in up and down, in pull devil and pull tailor, till the end of the only round we know in this crazy planetary game! Shall I tell you O great King, shall I tell you most sweet and beautiful ladies, what, in spite of this Priest of Orpheus with his Eros and his Dionysus, is the real secret of the whole of life, of the whole of experience, of the whole of existence, of the whole of everything?

“I mean of course the secret of it for each and every one of us? I mean the ultimate word that eventually, when we have all been dead for a hundred-thousand years, will still describe the idea, the feeling, the emotion for every single consciousness possessed of what we call life? I have decided to announce to you tonight a word of my own which at least expresses one aspect of the complicated meaning that some magic word must eventually possess, when in a hundred-thousand years it is invented. My poor word is a common and an extremely simple word. It is — do not smile, most grave King!

“Yes! I will boldly utter it! — It is the word ‘Prokleesis’. And now I must struggle to make clear some of the beautiful, terrible, stirring, satisfying, comforting, restoring, consoling, redeeming, creating meanings that I have put into this natural and simple word, Prokleesis! For I do here and now, O great King! I do here and now, most lovely ladies! I do here and now, Moros my old friend, Nisos my young friend, and you three, heroic sons of the lady Nemertes, who is the friend of all of us, as indeed this banquet, which is the grandest banquet I have ever enjoyed, proves up to the hilt, I do here and now proclaim, to all living creatures in all the innumerable worlds, that for each and every one of us, whether human, super-human, or sub-human, whether male or female, whether old or young, that the word Prokleesis whose simplest meaning is a ‘defiance’ or ‘challenge’ is the best clue to life we can have!

“Yes, Prokleesis is the word. We must ‘challenge’ life from our childhood to our old age! We must ‘defy’ life to quench our spirit and to beat us down! We must ‘challenge’ it, whatever it may be, to a fight to the finish! Don’t you see, O great King, don’t you see, my sweet friends, how the crafty and wicked Enorches is really advocating an escape into death in place of a battle with life? His Eros and his Dionysos are both different names for the same plunge into the same Nothingness.

“One is a plunge into it by way of love, and the other by way of drink. Whatever else to be alive upon earth, or above earth, or under earth, may mean to those who are landed in it or sunk in it or confronted by it, it is clear that it means a challenge to a battle! O my friends, my friends, we have not got the secret of life, I mean the secret of our experience of life for ourselves, till we’ve defied it to make us cry, ‘Hold! Enough!’ This challenge, this ‘Prokleesis,’ is the secret of life for us.

“As to what the secret of life is for life itself, who can answer such a question? We can only answer for ourselves. The animals and birds and fishes can only answer for themselves. Whatever it is that calls itself the cause of life, or imagines itself to be the cause of life, or is supposed to be the cause of life by the tribal tradition of this race or that race, or by the geographical tradition of Northern or Southern life, or of Eastern or Western life, or Middle-Eastern life, or of life at the bottom of the ocean, or of life among the Gods in the sky, or of life among the Titans in Tartaros, or of life among the ghosts of Hades — if Ghosts have any life and if there are any ghosts left there now; for the story runs that they have all escaped, even as this wise lady here has come back to her own from the Latin cavern of the Nymph Egeria!

“No, we have not the faintest idea as to how this world of colour and form, and of solid and watery and airy and fiery substance ever appeared before us or ever inspired its favourite champions with the overpowering suggestion that we ourselves are nothing but transitory and dreamlike portions of its evanescent mirage!

“Let us suppose that at this very moment there suddenly crowded into this beautiful dining-hall twenty murderous pirates, from an unknown land beyond Ultima Thule, and carrying ropes woven of a breakable hemp! And let us imagine these pirates bind each of us, men and women alike, with their ropes, and deliberately begin chopping us to bits with their sharp knives! Call up such a scene, O great King, thou who hast known in thy vast travels worse scenes than this! Call up such a scene, sweet ladies! Call up such a scene, brave men!

“Now be absolutely honest with yourselves, every one of you here and tell yourselves, not aloud to the rest of us, but in silence, each heart to heart alone, exactly how you would feel as you watched what was going on and saw your own turn coming nearer and nearer, and heard the shrieks and groans of each particular victim.”

As Zeuks spoke in this way it was very clear what the feelings of Omphos and Kissos and Sykos would have been under the conditions he described as from behind the chair of Zenios they listened with awestruck attention. It was also clear that the three young men’s interest in what Zeuks was saying displeased their mistress Okyrhöe; for she promptly gave them a peremptory signal to go and help their mother in the kitchen; but as they discreetly followed one another out of the hall they received from Zeuks just as if they had been relatives of Zenios, and not servants at all, an extremely friendly and fraternal smile of recognizance.

Zenios himself, still absorbed in what remained on his large antique Babylonian plate, evidently considered that this drunken babbling horse-stealing bastard from a remote farm at the other end of the island whose future destiny even Atropos, unless the old lady had Anangke, or Necessity at one elbow, and Tyche, or Chance, at the other, would have been puzzled to predict, though he might propitiate a poverty-stricken king like Odysseus by his antics, was not the sort of person to interest a rich frequenter of the Bazaars and Markets of Thebes!

But Zeuks had not failed to notice that although the old King was too absorbed in his own thoughts to pay much attention to what was going on round him, there had come a moment, the same moment no doubt when the speaker had caught that response in the faces of the three sons of Nemertes, at which the old hero's pointed beard had suddenly jerked itself up in an automatic call to battle.

It was as if the bones of his jaw had answered a physiological summons independently of his mind. And this automatic jerk of the well-trimmed beard of the blinder of Polyphemus in some profoundly subtle way so completely satisfied the kidnapper of Pegasos that he suddenly became, at least in the eyes of Nisos who was watching him carefully a completely different person.

That curious appearance of being unnaturally bloated, as if his outer skin, like a leather bottle whereof the contents had become, by reason of some sort of spiritual fermentation, too powerful to be contained in such a prison had been replaced by a singular toughening, at least that is what appeared to have occurred, of the actual flesh of his face; and the result of this was to make the expression of his face harder, firmer, and though no less humorous, much more formidable in the nature of its humour.

Nisos noticed, something else too, though if he'd tried to describe it to his brother or his parents or even to his friend Tis, he would probably have become tongue-tied and might even have retreated into that quite special silence which we associate with idiots; but what he would have wanted to explain about this more powerful humour in Zeuks' expressive countenance was that in its inherent nature it was not proud or vain or conceited, nor did it, like almost all so-called "prophets" and "thinkers", shut all doors but the one it came in by, and close all windows but the one it looked out of!

By this time all their eyes were fixed upon Zeuks. The large platter upon which Zenios had been concentrating was now as empty as if that insatiable collector of every possible species of plate that the artists among men have ever carved and moulded in precious metal had licked it clean that night of every stain it had acquired while the blameless Ethiopians of the Sun's Rising carried it beneath the earth to the blameless Ethiopians of the Sun's Setting!

Odysseus himself had allowed his wandering mind to return to the immediate situation; and he was now watching Zeuks with the sort of steady, quiet, amused, contemplative interest that the master of a Circus of performing animals would display in the unexpected arrival of a caravan of freshly-caught creatures from the Mountains of the Moon.

As for Okyrhöe, she had very quickly decided that Zeuks was a person who had to be treated on completely different lines from any of the other original personalities she had hitherto succeeded in dominating.

"I must take him," she told herself, "by a direct attack. It would be no good to try to get round him."

Old Moros was watching Zeuks very much as Tis would have done. Indeed Nisos, as he glanced at him to see how he received this unexpected oration from a plain farmer from Cuckoo-Hill, was struck by the almost exact parallel in the old man’s features to the way Tis would open his mouth wider and wider as his wonder increased at the eloquence to which he was listening.

“He can’t follow a word,” Nisos told himself. “It’s the man’s power of stringing the words together that strikes him as the marvel!”

As for the fugitive from the Cave of Egeria, Nisos was still young enough to feel an intense discomfort every time she caught his attention, a discomfort which so far he had managed to ward off by repeating mechanically a little prayer to Hera about birth that Petraia had taught him in his childhood; but since by this time he had come to regard Zeuks as his fellow-adventurer and even had begun to tell himself an extremely romantic story of their more and more intimate association as in the wake of their heroic king they would trace in the unrevealing face of the waters the grave of lost Atlantis, it annoyed him to notice that whenever the pregnant woman looked at Zeuks she gave a queer kind of involuntary shudder, as if something about this startling apparition of a neatly-attired farmer of middle height, moderate good looks, and respectfully conventional manner, abandoning himself to an obscure thaumaturgic incantation for the redemption of the world, gave her a weird shock and made her feel that she must escape such a spectacle or her pains might begin without warning.

Nisos himself as he leant forward with his elbows on the wine-spilt-board, dug the fingers of his right hand into a new loaf from Nemertes’ oven, while in his left hand he clutched tightly a small gourd. Little trickles of wine kept dripping from this latter object every time in his excitement he turned it upside-down; while fragments of sweet-smelling crust fell with almost equal frequency as he squeezed the loaf. The boy was in a queer mood; for although the immediate hoof-beat of each galloping moment of time thudded rough-shod, as you might say, over the fore-front of his consciousness, behind it there kept humming and drumming a troubled comparison, of which he felt heartily ashamed, and yet in which he was unable to stop indulging, a comparison between the daughter of Teiresias, who kept meeting his eyes and who was clearly studying him with interest, and his friend Eione, the youngest sister of Tis, the vision of whose exquisite limbs as she bent to re-arrange the folds of her dress had grown all the more vivid to him since his disturbing encounter with the goat-foot Pan.

But Eione's childish features were unquestionably plain and homely; whereas, as he was now at such close quarters with Pontopereia he could dwell for steadily increasing spaces of time upon her beautiful and subtly intellectual face.

Ironically enough those two troublesome hamperers of the well-governed order of Themis, namely Tyche and Anangke, or chance and necessity, prevented him, though it was only by means of the very edge of the supper-board from noting how totally devoid of lightness and grace were the awkward limbs with which Nature in the reckless scattering of her bounty had burdened the daughter of Teiresias.

Had the competent and capable Nemertes not been busy in her kitchen preparing a culminating dish of sweet-meats it is quite possible that she would have reacted to the words and behaviour of Zeuks in a manner that would have come nearer to the heart of the utterer than any of the rest.

As to Odysseus himself, that wily old hero had made it a rule long ago never to waste his energy in redundant reactions. He accepted the message of Zeuks at its purely practical and pragmatic face-value: and since only certain portions of it could fall in with his own purpose, his calm empirical mind had enough to do in isolating these from the rest without getting excited about anything else.

The moment he entered Okyrhöe's dining-hall, the shrewd old king saw that it was she and not the collector of images who was responsible for the transformation of the aboriginal Ornax into a contemporary palace far more luxurious than his own; and in his diplomatic brain there began to take shape, as he cast glance after glance at the changing expressions, the lively gestures, the rapid decisive commands, of the lady of the house, the embryo idea that if the soothsaying daughter of a dead prophet was likely to help the advancement of his adventure, this formidable woman, if by any possible compulsion or enticement he could sweep her into his scheme, might turn out an even more effective aid. He hadn't relinquished his faithful Heraklean club when he crossed the threshold of this complicated group of palatial erections. In fact from where he now sat, while the lady's airy revelations of her life in the city of Kadmos were interrupted by Zeuks' reverberating "prokleesis", he could see the familiar curves of his queer-looking weapon propped against the elbow of a small stone-seat cut in the wall, a seat that would be far too narrow for any contemporary hips, whether male or female.

No smile came to his lips as he realized the direction his thoughts were on the verge of taking, as in spite of himself he listened to Zeuks' description of the in-rush of the murderous crowd of imaginary pirates and projected himself, for the push of his practical imagination could hardly be described in any other way, into breaking his bonds, scattering the bodies of his enemies, and grasping his club by the middle!

But if Zeuks' outburst of "prokleesis" had made even the paramour of the Daughter of the Sun jerk up his trim beard, it can be well understood how it made the two insects inside it jump and cry out. With them, however, the situation was just opposite to what it had been earlier that day; for now it was the fly who was keen to leave their shelter and the moth who was all for restraining him.

"But, Pyraust darling, I must find out whether the King is sweating under his beard! I know him so well that I know that that is the great sign. If there's a drop of perspiration under his beard you may depend on it that he's going to do something serious and do it soon. Please don't hold me so tight, my sweet friend. I swear I won't go further than that fold of his chiton. Once there I can crawl perfectly well between a few grey hairs, and soon discover what I want to know.

"It'll only be like a microscopic thicket, and you know how good I am at threading my way through olive-branches and rose-bushes! Oh, I'll find the least drop of sweat if there is one to be found! You see he's still got that old nurse, Eurycleia, though she must be over a hundred years old, and you may depend on that old lady keeping him clean. You bet your life, my pretty one, I couldn't settle on Zeuks' chiton — you must remember, darling, that we house-flies are extremely sensitive to smells.

"We're not like carrion-flies or dung-flies who live on filth and naturally seek it out! — no! I couldn't settle on Zeuks' chiton, though he's a self-respecting, decently washed and well-dressed farmer, without being overpowered by the smell of his skin. But Eurycleia uses, though he's old now, the same unguents and essences that she used for him when he was a child; so that you needn't be afraid, dear heart, that your crazy Myos will faint from the old man's stench, and slip down under the fellow's shirt and be no more seen!

"Whatever happens, I can assure you, sweetest of Pyrausts, that I shall return safely to this heavenly shelter in the bosom of our Heraklean Club.

"No? You won't let go? You won't let me risk it? All right, I'm not going to break loose by force. So if you won't let me go, you won't let me go; and that's the end of it. Of course some would say I'm taking the opportunity of your prohibition to escape doing what I'm really scared stiff of doing.

"But I know you don't think like this; and yours is the only opinion I really value. As I have often confessed to you, there have been occasions in my peaceful life when I have had pleasure with exactly twenty-seven female flies. This I have never concealed from you. But when it becomes ——"

It was at this point that the Moth — who so many times had heard her friend quote the well-known lines from Beelzebelle, the Sappho of Flies, that begin:

"airy-fairy-flickit-with-Mary" and ends:

"wagatail-wispy-with-honeymoon-Jane", that there had been moments when she felt that if he didn't stop before one, two, three more ticks of the clock she would rush straight into the nearest fire — beat a tattoo with her free wing upon the wall of their retreat of so decisive a character that the fly yielded in every sense.

He left the topic of female flies. He gave up his exploration of the neck of Odysseus for a drop of perspiration. And he replied to the unspoken question that was behind all the moth had been saying, by assuring her that even if there had been no drop of sweat under the king's beard, and even if they all had to sleep where they were that night, they would without question be making their departure, if not by "Lykophos" or "Wolf's-light", certainly by the first streak of red in the sky….

By this time Zeuks had reached the climax of his singular outburst. He was still on his feet; but he was standing in a manner in which we can be absolutely certain no Grecian orator had ever stood before while addressing a crowd. One foot was on his chair and the other on the floor.

This sounds harmless and conventional enough; but it only does so because we have not yet realized that owing to Zeuks' lack of height and his chair's antique height, his upraised knee was on a level with his chin. Nor was this all; for Zeuks' incurable indifference to the decencies of human dignity combined with his flagrant and absolutely unashamed fondness for his own physical person from head to foot, resulted in a very quaint issue: for seeing his knee so extremely near his mouth, much nearer than human knees generally are to human lips he clutched it with his two hands and digging his chin into it and pressing his clenched teeth against it he began muttering and murmuring through his teeth, for his teeth being tightly clenched he wasn't biting his knee, a strange rhapsody of self-enjoyment.

To all but one of the company then present this curious chant of ecstatic self-possession was inarticulate; but to the club of Herakles it was not only wholly audible but wholly intelligible.

"At last," said the Club to himself, "I hear the language uttered, which, if I were the ruler of the world, I would cause to be the language of the world!"

What the club heard as articulate speech could not be set down in the syllables of any tongue that was spoken then on the surface of the earth or has been spoken since; but it consisted of a groaningly murmured, thickly muttered, grindingly hoarse, creakingly wooden, scrapingly rocky, clangingly metallic, and also, naturally enough considering that our friend was rhapsodizing into the hardness of his own knee, a satisfyingly onomatopaeic paean.

The drift of what Zeuks was chanting had undoubtedly to do with that same "prokleesis" whose secret he had tried to interpret; only this was an attempt to turn his own body into a drum or trumpet or clarionet, or whatever it might be, that like some vocal sea-shell or land-shell transformed the heavy material sounds of rock against rock, root against root, earth-mass against earth-mass, sea-sand against sea-sand, through which the sixth Pillar from its fixed abode in that old corridor at home was able to communicate with the club of Herakles.

"Enorches" — Zeuks chanted at last, in a deep, rich, resonant voice, lifting his head from his knee and clasping that symbol of eternal supplication with the fingers of both his hands— "Enorches is the unhappiest man on earth! Anyone who understood to the full the real nature of the unhappiness of Enorches would die of pity. But this much, my friends, it is permitted to me to tell you; and tell it you I must since the knowledge of it is of the very essence of the supreme 'prokleesis' you are making with me, or if you prefer, I am making with you, here tonight.

"Enorches is deliberately lying when he says that Eros and Dionysos together redeem the world. He implies that they do this, one or the other of them, or both together, as the salvation of mankind, by means of mystical love or mystical intoxication. He implies they do it so utterly and completely that ordinary self-control, ordinary kindness, ordinary decency, ordinary honesty, ordinary courtesy, ordinary generosity, are rendered totally and wholly unimportant when these two mystical ecstasies are at work; and that it is in fact as an alternative to the good, the true, and the beautiful, that these celestial manias and heavenly drugs fill the entire stage and obsess the whole nature of man's consciousness.

"Now the diabolical lie beneath all this is the implicit assumption that we love to the point of ecstasy and drink to the point of ecstasy in order that life shall go on in the universe indefinitely and without end. Now the real secret purpose and the real secret motive actuating Enorches is the extreme opposite of this.

“What he really hates with a hatred that is co-existent with his uttermost being and with the uttermost being of what he hates is nothing less than Life itself. His praise of Eros and Dionysos, that is to say his glorification of Love and Intoxication as Substitutes for all other forms of Worship, is really a grand and supreme indulgence in deliberate lying. The one secret aim and the one final intention of this crafty Priest of Orpheus is to destroy all Life utterly and forever!

“In the depths of his own being he is so scooped-out by despair, so bled white by abysmal unhappiness that he has only one desire left, the desire that Life once and for all and in every place under the sun and moon, and upon and within and below the earth, should be destroyed and brought to an end forever!

“Yes, what this Priest of the Mysteries aims at is that there shall no longer be any Mystery — in other words that there should no longer be any life. What he recognizes as the uttermost reality of his own destructive and negative nature is a fathomless, yawning void, an open mouth, a gulf, an abysmal hole; and this in-sucking shaft leads not to any kind of Being, but to that nameless opposite of all existence that can only be called Not-Being.

“Here, therefore, down in the depths of this priest’s nature, is something much deeper and much nearer an absolute than Death; for Death, after all, implies that something has lived or it could not have died; but in this man’s nature, when we go down to the very depths of it, we find that which can in reality have no ‘nature’ of any sort at all, for it is Nothingness Itself.

“Yes! What this self-styled Priest of Orpheus really feels, in his absolute and abysmal despair, is that it would have been infinitely better if there had never been any Life at all. But since life has appeared, what this Priest of the Mysteries would wish to see happen would be for the whole miserable mass of it to plunge headlong down and vanish in the Nothingness out of which it ought never to have emerged!"

While Zeuks let himself go in this sweeping diatribe they all watched him carefully in their different ways — Odysseus watched him as a steersman in dubious weather watches a distant horizon. Nisos watched him as an amorist might watch the eyes of one girl through the transparent body of another. The pregnant woman watched him as if he were a cock crowing on a dung-heap. Old Moros watched him as if he were a dog going too close to a trap that ought long ago to have been sprung. Zenios watched him as if he were an itinerant musician, spoiling an opportunity for a good stroke of business.

Okyrhöe watched him, thinking: "I must make them stay and I must give him something to lie on in the Mirror-Room." Pontoporeia watched him, thinking: "Yes, I agree with this absurd 'prokleesis' up to a point; but he doesn't make it personal enough, for it ought to be some way, some mood, some turn of the mind, some twist of the reason, that would help you when you wanted to make friends with a person."

And finally, while the club of Herakles, still leaning against the elbow of that narrow seat cut out of the pre-historic wall, watched him, thinking: "how annoying if he starts a vibration that brings me crashing down!" Zeuks felt as if an irresistible unseen power compelled him to fling back his head and to gaze out into the darkness through a half-open door; and though the lights about him made the darkness outside absolute, the same power that compelled him to lift his head forced him to treat that darkness as if it were the whole vast immeasurable bulk of the massed material of the thick-ribbed earth, ridge upon ridge, hill upon hill, mountain upon mountain, towering up in its enormity to a toppling height, high above the encircling ocean that encompasses all, forced him to treat it as if it were this, and at the same time forced him to plunge into it and with his soul gathered together to break through it, to cleave it, to wrench his way through it, until he reached a certain particular spot on the earth's surface.

What particular spot? Ah! That's the point! "That's what has been" — and it was Zeuks himself who flung this jaggedly-splintered shaft of rending interjection into the thick bulk of that darkness— "What has been led up to in all this" — for the spot he was being forced to visit was nothing less than a stone shed near-by with a massively-closed iron-barred door in which Pegasos had been imprisoned ever since Odysseus released him.

In this shed, tied by the neck, Pegasos was at that moment groaning piteously and twisting his head from side to side; for the rope that tied him crossed and re-crossed and chafed abominably that raw part of his shoulder from which the wing had been torn and from which even yet dark drops of blood, mingled with ichor, were trickling down.

Slowly therefore now, in spite of all the eyes that were upon him, Zeuks rose, and deliberately crossing the hall to the open door through which that unknown force had just drawn his soul into the palpable darkness, he resolutely, but still slowly and very quietly, left the company and went out. Once outside and alone in the air it was not nearly so dark, and it didn't take him long to discover the stone shed where in the haste of their arrival Pegasos had been tied up. It was still necessary, however, to get some kind of torch or lantern; and with this in view he made his way, led by the smell of the fragrant smoke to where Nemertes was already drying, after having cleaned and washed with the exquisite care and nicety exacted by Zenios of all who touched his possessions, the vast array of plates and dishes used at tonight's supper.

She certainly was a shrewd and intelligent woman, this mother of Omphos, Kissos, and Sykos; and now when Zeuks entered her domain to get a light so as to deal with Pegasos, and found her directing her three sons in the complicated task of piling up and putting away all this precious crockery, he was conscious of being delivered, merely by drawing her attention to his situation, from a whole load of tiresome responsibility.

She told him at once to fetch Pegasos out of that cold and dark shed and to bring him into the kitchen; and when he obeyed her and they had tied this mutilated and one-winged creature, who had once flown above the turrets of Arabia and the domes of China and the pyramids of Egypt and had distended its quivering nostrils in its flight to catch the enchanted odours that are wafted down on certain human midnights from the ghostly valleys of the moon, to one of the shadowy meat-hooks that broke the flickering fire-lit surface of those friendly walls, it was easy to see from the immortal animal's grateful eyes as they were turned first to one and then to another till they finally rested on the woman herself, that the prospect of a night behind the cyclopean pre-historic walls of Ornax after his windy lodging on the outskirts of Cuckoo-Hill was now wholly congenial to him.

Nemertes hesitated not to take entire possession of Zeuks at once and to tell him exactly what he had better do if he wished his one night in Ornax to be really a pleasant one.

"You will have to sleep in the porch of the Chamber of the Mirror so as to be a guard for the sleep of the Mistress. This will be the sleeping arrangement with which nothing must interfere; but if you, my Lord Zeuks, and you, my Lord Pegasos, agree to accept this arrangement, it is in my power to give you" — and she turned to Zeuks— "and you" — and she stroked the great free beautiful useless unhurt wing of her animal-visitor which now trailed across a third of the floor, "the peacefullest sleep you've ever had in your lives."

“Give us this?” enquired Zeuks in his most cheerful and humorous intonation.

“How will you give us this?” asked Pegasos with his appealing eyes.

And the woman answered by immediate action. She went to a great brazen receptacle in a corner of the kitchen and scooped up two handfuls of oats which she forthwith presented to the winged horse, who reverently swallowed them. Then she lifted the lid of a substantial chest made of sycamore wood from the main-land and brought out a small loaf. This she deliberately broke into four pieces, one big piece and three small pieces; and handing one of the small pieces to each of her sons who straightway began munching and masticating it with intense satisfaction, she gave the large piece to Zeuks who promptly kissed it and crammed it into his mouth, but allowed half of it to remain in one cheek, and half of it in the other, un-chewed and un-swallowed.

It was at this point that Zeuks noticed a hurried whispered conversation going on between Omphos, Kissos, and Sykos; and before he had made up his mind whether to ignore what he perceived or to boldly ask them what was the matter, Omphos, the eldest of the three, crossed the kitchen with obvious nervousness, while Pegasos, answering this respectful courtesy with equal consideration, did his best to move his unhurt wing out of the young man’s way.

When Omphos reached Zeuks he stood in front of him like an earnest-minded school-boy summoned for an oral examination; and Nemertes couldn’t help noting how quaint it was to see the two cheeks of this examiner of young men bulging so auspiciously for his own future enjoyment but rendering him practically inarticulate before an academic questioner.

But the question asked by Omphos was a simple one. “Could you tell us, my Lord Zeuks, exactly what you thought of when you say we must still practise ‘prokleesis’ though we were soon going to be cut to pieces by those pirates?”

What Zeuks desired to do at this point was first to use his tongue to push both halves of that delicious little loaf into one bulging cheek, and then with that same tongue to discourse so eloquently on the practice of “prokleesis” when you were watching people tortured or when you were being tortured yourself, that not only Omphos but his sympathetic brothers and possibly even their wise mother would decide to try how it worked in the ordinary vexations of every day.

But all he could blurt out at the moment was: “Of course nobody can bear more than a certain amount of pain; and if you’re watching its infliction on others there comes a point when you break out or go raving mad; but nothing helps anyone to endure what can be endured more than forcing yourself to feel in the way ‘prokleesis’ makes you feel: for when you feel like this it isn’t the cruel enemy or executioner or torturer or murderer you are defying; it is Life itself!

“And what are you defying Life to do? You are defying Life to make you stop fighting Life! You are defying Life to make you worship Death! You are defying Life to make you lose yourself in those Half-Deaths of mystical ecstasy, such as Enorches praises; he who this very day plucked out the wing that was the twin of this!”

Zeuks’ whole figure looked absurdly un-heroic and unprophetic as with his mouth full of half-munched bread he pulled out from under his belt a corner of his shirt and used it to dab up a small trickle of blood-stained ichor that was at the moment feeling its cautious way along the spine of the Flying Horse in evident fear of ending its career as a living stream in a pool on the kitchen-floor.

It is doubtful whether even the most perspicacious ghost among those who were rumoured to have recently escaped from the under-world under the guidance of Pontopereia's father, had such an one passed through Ornax, would have been drawn to Zeuks as a person naturally provocative of spiritual attention.

But whatever an enlightened fugitive in the train of Teiresias might have thought of this short, vulgarly-attired individual, with his thumbs in his belt, who now proceeded to rub his bleached and bloated physiognomy, making as he did so a grotesque purring sound in his gullet, against the arched neck of the wounded offspring of the Gorgon's blood, Zeuks himself had not experienced a more delicious sensation of well-being since the days when he lived so contentedly with the cast-off paramour of the goat-footed Pan.

The bread he was masticating was proving so delicious and he kept turning it round and round in his mouth so long that when he finally did gulp it down it was simply saliva that he swallowed, only faintly tinctured with a lingering taste of wheaten bread. But it conveyed to every cell, tissue, nerve, fibre, gland and sense-centre in his whole body all the long air-nourished, sun-perforated, dew-quickened, rain-soaked experiences that had filled with more than physical richness each grain of wheat that made up Nemertes' precious flour.

Zeuks felt sure as he rubbed his head against the neck of Pegasos that the animal was feeling from its digesting of those oats exactly what he was feeling himself from his long-munched bread. It was therefore something of a shock to him when he heard the voice of young Nisos addressing him from the doorway and saw the others all turn round to greet the excited boy.

Nisos brought the news that Odysseus had decided to start for home extremely early; actually, in fact, before that faint grey light that preludes the rising of the sun and in Ithaca was called “Lykophos” or “Wolf’s Light”. Between the three sons of Nemertes, as Nisos made his announcement, a swift glance of pleasure and surprise had passed; and it was clear to both Zeuks and the boy that whatever the feeling of Nemertes might be, as far as Omphos, Kissos and Sykos were concerned the fact that this visit was to end before dawn was an indescribable relief.

But Nemertes looked grave. Carefully brushing off from her clothes the smallest wisp of straw from the oats-bin and the least little wheat-bread crumb from the loaf she had just divided, she beckoned Nisos to her side. “Just a moment, my Lord Zeuks, if you don’t mind,” she said, and taking Nisos gently by the arm led him, avoiding the switching and quivering feathers of Pegasos’ extended wing, for the animal evidently realized that a move of some sort was in the air, to a shadowy recess behind her cooking-stove.

“You are a good and faithful servant to your king, or I couldn’t talk so straight to you,” she said in a low voice. “But you’re not the only loyal adherent in the world, any more than Odysseus is the only true and honest master. Now I beg you to follow me very carefully, my young friend, in what I’m going to say. My sons are too simple-minded and too uncultivated in their intellects to get the full force of what I want to say; but you have had a good education in the best school in this island even if you’ve never been on the main-land, and so I’ll talk to you as I would to my husband, the Builder of Towns, who went to a school in Crete. My place in life from now on, you must understand, is to serve Okyrhöe, who at the moment, though I shan’t be surprised if she eventually becomes the partner of a god, when no doubt she will herself release me from my service, who is, I say, at the moment the wife of this man Zenios who declares himself to be of the House of Kadmos.

“But the point, my dear Nisos, that I should find hard to make my sons understand is this. When at the death of my husband, the Builder of Towns, I undertook, largely for the sake of my sons, so that we could all continue together, the service of Okyrhöe, I swore to serve her faithfully and I swore it by the gods, especially by the great Themis, the goddess of Order and Justice.

“Now my three sons hate Okyrhöe; nor can I blame them for this. To Zenios they feel nothing at all; neither love nor hate, neither consideration nor contempt. They are, however, quite prepared to go on working for him, feeling that by so doing they are serving their mother. You follow what I mean? When I am faithful to Okyrhöe it is not for her sake, but the sake of the great goddess of Order and Justice and Right, by whom I swore. Now I will tell you something else. And this, Nisos my lad, is a serious warning, If my mistress bids me make up a bed for him over there” — and she nodded towards Zeuks— “at the entrance to the Chamber of the Mirror where she always sleeps herself, he would be wise to make some excuse. Let him tell her, for instance, that he never undresses and goes to bed before an early start like this. In fact he’d better tell her — —”

She was interrupted by a wild, excited, high-pitched, youthful voice from the other end of that spacious kitchen; and at once they instinctively moved apart, and quite separately advanced to meet the girl, who was Pontopereia herself.

“I’ve come,” she was saying, and it was to every living person in that steamy, shadowy, fire-lit place that she addressed herself. “I’ve come to tell you that what I’ve been praying to the gods for a whole year might happen has now happened. The spirit of my father Teiresias has come upon me and the prophetic power of Teiresias has taken possession of me, and I feel flooded by what I know, and I feel afloat on what I understand, and I feel afire with what I have grasped, and if you don't enter into my meaning and catch the spirit of my revelation I swear to you that something dreadful will happen, and happen soon, and happen to all of us! So listen! listen! listen! and don't move, any of you here, till I've told you what I know!"

"Say what you've got to say, child; and say it quietly and say it quickly. We are all listening."

These words were not spoken by Nemertes who had approached nearest to the excited young girl and had even laid a firm and calming hand on one of her gesticulating arms. They were spoken by Zeuks, who, coming alongside of Nemertes as a massive and sturdy barge might come alongside of a sailing-ship, laid his hand upon Nemertes' shoulder and did so in such an affectionate and genial a way that no sensible or kindly person could possibly have taken offence; nor indeed could anyone, who in the position of Nisos and Nemertes' three sons had been destined to be spectators of this encounter, have denied that the combined magnetism of two such friendly and massive personalities was the very thing to calm the girl's excited nerves.

But was it the thing best calculated to bring to birth from this virgin frame a prophetic message from the world of spirits, or at any rate from a world beyond the reach of our normal sensations? Evidently to Nisos it was not, for he began pacing up and down with a frown of nervous apprehension. What he measured with his anxious steps was a limited stretch of the stone floor of that ancient chamber, a floor that may well have belonged, like the stone walls of the place, to some prehistoric god of silence, for there was a curious absence of every kind of echo to the human voice and of every kind of resonance from the human tread.

But as he paced nervously up and down, avoiding the now motionless feathers of Pegasos' prostrate wing, he couldn't help glancing now and again at the almost pathetic contrast between the illuminated beauty of Pontopereia's face and the clumsy heaviness of her limbs and indeed of her whole body from the waist down.

"What is prompting me," he thought, "to be so absurdly critical as to demand that a girl should be this or that before I can let myself fall in love with her, or think of her in my mind as my particular choice? Well! that's how I am," he concluded, "and there's no use making a fuss about it! I only pray that that accurst Goat-foot has encountered Enorches and made such a Dionysian raid upon that scoundrel's oldest wine that by this time he can't distinguish a young virgin from an old midwife."

Meanwhile Pontopereia was announcing in a tone whose prophetic intensity was no less assured, though it was calmer than when she first entered the kitchen, that if they wished their ride to be a success they must not wait till morning; no! not even if by morning they meant an hour before "Wolf-Light". On the contrary they must start at once; and if they felt sleepy they must console themselves by thinking how sweet it would be to lay their heads on their own pillows when they got home!

As far as Nisos could judge from the acquiescent pose of Zeuks' neat and pliant figure, for the face of the advocate of "Prokleesis" was turned towards Pontopereia, the man seemed prepared to do whatever she proposed; and it was a surprise to the boy when in the silence that followed her declaration Zeuks swung round and exchanged a rapid series of signals and significant signs with Pegasos, an exchange in which the horse's trailing wing played less of a part than its quivering ears, and the man's expressive hands less of a part than his thrust-out and sucked-in thick lips.

“Do you really think they’ll get Odysseus to agree to such a thing at such an hour?” Nemertes remarked to Nisos when Zeuks followed Pontopereia out of the kitchen. “But though I’m only an old woman in an old kitchen and no prophetess I would advise you, sonny, to slip off, now you have the chance, and see our Master, yes! see Zenios himself, whom you’re sure to find in his treasure-room at the bottom of that flight of stairs — you saw those stairs, didn’t you, laddie, as you went into the dining-hall? — for what I fancy your old king has forgotten, and what I’m certain this queer fellow Zeuks has forgotten, is that great sack of treasure you unloaded up there in the porch. It was treasure, wasn’t it? I saw, by the way you lifted it, how heavy it was; and I also saw, for we old women notice things like that, that when Zenios came back with Moros the first thing he did was to get the old man to help him trundle that sack of yours down those stairs. He has a queer sort of mind, has our master Zenios; and though I don’t suggest for a second that he intends to rob anyone of whatever that sack contains, I know him by this time well enough to know that if six hours or even four hours are allowed by destiny to pass over a neighbourhood where our Master and any precious treasure are to be found, at the end of those hours, and generally long before they end, the master of whom we are speaking and the treasure of which we are speaking will have been brought into physical contact as if by the use of a magnet.”

Nisos looked at the old lady in admiration. “By the gods,” he cried, “I’d completely forgotten that curst sack! Why! You’re a soothsayer too, though you do work in this old kitchen! I certainly will do just what you say, and see what’s happened to that great golden mixing-bowl! I can tell your master, anyway, something about it — though whether the old king got it from his queen’s father or whether Alkinoos gave it him in the land of the Phaeakeans I forget at this moment; but if I see it and touch it I daresay I’ll remember what Eurycleia told me about it! Old as she is, her memory never fails her! Yes, I'll go straight down those steps and talk to Zenios!

"O I do thank you, lady, for putting it into my head! What I expect has been in our old king's mind all along is some sort of an idea, though it seems horrid to say so," — at this point Nisos lowered his voice; not so much in order that his hearer's three sons shouldn't hear, as from an instinctive courtesy — proof, thought Nemertes, as she listened to him, of how well he'd been brought up— "some sort of an idea," he threw out in a hurried whisper as he rushed off— "of paying some sort of ransom or tribute for Pontopereia!"

As Nisos hastened to the northern edge of the pre-historic semicircle of stone ruins that these unscrupulous explorers from Kadmean Thebes had modernized and made habitable, he said to himself: "Tribute? Ransom? I wonder I didn't say 'Offering'. What of course it will really be, if the old king leaves that treasure behind without a word, will be buying the girl from him as we buy slaves in the market."

It was when he was feeling his way down those steps, and though it was quite dark he could see a light between door and doorpost at the foot of the stairs, that he stopped short, with one foot on the third and the other on the fourth step, and the extended fingers of his left hand spread out against the wall, for he had a sudden inspiration. "I'll suggest to Odysseus," he thought, "that I ought to visit Tis's home along with old Moros, now I'm so near, and that it might be a good thing if I went into the Naiads' Cave on my way back to see if the ship-keel is still as it was."

Meanwhile if Nemertes could have observed what was going on in her master's chamber at the bottom of that staircase she would have felt, well! not, as people say, "completely justified", for Nemertes had seen too much of the treacheries of life ever to feel precisely that, but she would have felt that she had not been far wrong in her knowledge of the ways of her master, as a collector of pre-historic treasures.

Long before Nisos had begun to make his way down those steps Zenios had been sitting on a low, rough, oblong couch of fir-planks covered with several layers of sheep-skins, a couch which in his lonely moods he preferred to any other. He was holding in his hands the heaviest and most precious of that sack's marvels. This was an unusually large Mixing-Bowl; the sort of Mixing-Bowl that among the more civilized Achaean tribes was generally known as a "Depas".

This particular "Depas" was an enormous one. It had a flat stand at its base and a circular handle on each side of its circumference and it was made of solid gold. It was in fact made of gold so heavy, so massive, and so purged of every kind of alloy, that as Zenios caressed it it gave him the feeling that it was something so totally different from all other things in the world and so absolutely divided from all other things in the world that when he gave himself up wholly and entirely to the pure sensation of this feel of it, he himself became isolated from everything else on earth. The handling of real gold, massive gold, pure gold, solid gold, had become the one positive lust, the one supreme indulgence, the one ecstatic cult, the one ultimate paradise of Zenios' existence; and when he did so, as he was doing now, he grew so identified with the precious thing he held, that with no effort other than passive surrender to bliss he became what, save for a few blameless Ethiopeans both in the extreme East and in the extreme West, a man seldom becomes, namely a motionless orb of convulsed sunlight, or even starlight, for whom the mere alternation of inbreathing and outbreathing is not only a sufficient satisfaction for one life, but a sufficient satisfaction to justify an infinite series of lives.

But meanwhile, very cautiously, and inch by inch, Nisos was descending the stairs towards this absorbed gold-worshipper. Now the approach of the aboriginal wild creatures in the forests of the earth towards one another has been from the beginning the cause of innumerable invisible vibrations across various expanses of earth and air and such primeval vibrations, whether of attraction or repulsion, or of pure warning, have never completely vanished from the human scene all the way down the ages.

It must have been some such vibration, and of pure warning too, that caused young Nisos, before he had reached the fourth step in his stealthy descent towards that chink of light between door and door-post, to change his mind completely, and, avoiding with exquisite care the least shiver of disturbing sound, to ascend those steps twice as quickly as he had descended them, and, once clear of that quarter of the restored ruins of Ornax, to set off as fast as possible to find Odysseus.

Even Zeuks would not have been able to interpret for the benefit of any other person seated on that broad back all the thoughts of Pegasos as the two of them waited patiently for their start from Ornax on their homeward journey. The whole thing is conjectural of course, but it does seem unlikely that an immortal creature however wounded could feel quite as agitated, as did Okyrhöe for example, when she discovered that she was really going to perch herself on the still bleeding back of a one-winged unflying flier, “with this low peasant”, as she told herself “who out of vulgar blasphemy calls himself Zeuks”, in front of her, “and this silly old King-Hero who won’t be able to see more of me than my back”, behind her.

The whole thing was a surprise and a shock to this beautiful designer of elaborate schemes; for the last thing she expected was to have to make her plunge into the innermost circle of Odysseus’ life without the least preparation, indeed with what might almost be called a “hippodromic” leap.

However! If she had to do it she had to do it, and with a courage and recklessness that would have drawn from her cautious slow-moving husband a very straight look, she rushed to one of the innermost chests in the furthest corner of her Mirror-Room and dragged forth from it a garment that Zenios had never known she had bought, for she had managed the transaction in secret with a Phoenician Merchant during a mighty purchase of golden cups.

No sooner now had she dragged out this garment and wrapped her lovely body in it than in a flash all her annoyance disappeared! It was exactly suited to the occasion. Nothing on earth could have answered this unexpected situation better. Even though the immortal creature she rode on was wet with ichor and blood, and even though "with this on" the old hero could not even see how shapely her back was, the effect of her face looking forth from that feathery cloud of heavenly whiteness was beyond what even she herself had ever dreamed of!

She walked up and down in front of Kadmos' Mirror-Shield. She arranged herself, with this wonderful thing about her, first on a couch, then on a chair, then on the couch again, and once more on a chair. Okyrhöe had never in her whole life felt so inspired by her own beauty. And the remarkable thing about it was that her head, her critical, fastidious, detached, acquisitive, unscrupulous head, remained absolutely clear and cold.

Dramatizing herself and gesturing and posing in front of that shield of Kadmos there was absolutely nothing in the consciousness of Okyrhöe that had the faintest resemblance to the self-adoration, the self-intoxication, the self-worship of the unfortunate Narcissus. Okyrhöe's mind was as cold and hard and ruthless as one of those short sharp Latin swords that the Nymph

Egeria in her Italian cave would know more about than any Achaean woman.

Okyrhöe used her beauty purely, solely, and simply as a weapon. She fought with her beauty as if it were a sword. She sacked cities with her beauty. She dried up deep seas with her beauty. She blighted harvests, she devastated vineyards, she up-rooted forests with it. She was prepared to blacken shining stars and to put out burning suns with her beauty. Beauty for her was something wherewith to carve out empires or to drown continents.

The cloak she had extracted from the Phoenician's most sacred and secret caravan was made of the white skin of a huge pre-historic animal called a Podandrikon whose peculiarity was that round its waist it had shining scales and round its neck it had thick white feathers. Wrapped in the Podandrikon's skin the completely reassured Okyrhöe told herself with one last glance at the Shield of Kadmos that if this fond and foolish old king thought he would ever sail from Ithaca again he was mad.

With the face the gods had given her and in the cloak she had discovered for herself she would rule all Argos and all Boeotia and all Hellas from this old fool's rock-cave island palace! Thus thought Okyrhöe.

But the oldest of the Fates, as it used to be said at any special pinch concerning the goddess Athene, who now was so wrought up — and who can blame her — by the blind folly of her own people in the face of all this cosmic confusion that she had taken refuge with the blameless Ethiopians, "took other counsel". Yes, Atropos, the weakest, the oldest, but the wisest of the Moirai, or Fates, came, invisibly rushing, as she always did, to the crisis-spot and prompted Odysseus to make one of his own decisions independently of everyone. And such a decision he made; and it was so wholly material and practical, and so absolutely free from any general theory about the matter at issue, from any logical sequence of reasoning about the problem at stake, from any principle of action, from any "mystique" of action, from any philosophic metaphysic of action, that it could hardly be described as a decision at all.

Of course in his past there had been occasions, there had to be occasions, when he was forced to act according to some practical plan of action, when in fact to act at all implied a plan of action; but this was different, and the truth was that Odysseus behaved now like a skilful carpenter who has already taken the measure of the adjustments, of the shaping, the trimming, the nailing, the thickening, the thinning, the rounding off, the hammering, the polishing, which in this particular case he would be forced to employ.

Those who knew him intimately however — and of these there were perhaps now living only two persons, namely his nurse Eurycleia, whose extreme old age interfered with the expression of what she knew, and the goddess Athene, who had her own ethnological undertakings independent of any individual man or woman — would have been in a position to explain to us that there had been in this extraordinary man's life certain far-off but quite definite, concrete and material projects to the realization of which the whole complicated organism of his formidable identity was basically aimed.

Of these vast projects, like huge islands on immeasurable horizons, Eurycleia would probably have pointed to the taking of Troy, while Pallas Athene might conceivably have named the immense but misty and cloudy notion, like an old and battered world-sailor's fantasy, that at present loomed in the darkly-brooding background of his consciousness, the notion of sailing Westward, far past the Pillars of Herakles and the place where Atlas holds up the Sky, past even the shores of Ultima Thule where exiled Kronos awaits the day of his awakening, the notion in fact of steering his ship over the very waves of the very sea under which lie the drowned towers and temples and domes and palaces and streets of the sunken continent of Atlantis.

But what Odysseus decided upon now as his most prudent line of action was to accept Okyrhöe's astonishing offer to share with Zeuks and himself the wounded back of Pegasos on condition that her tender maternal arms should firmly encircle the awkwardly-moulded form of the prophetic orphan Pontopereia.

He was in fact wily enough to decide then and there to use to the limit the obviously possessive power of this beautiful woman so as to make sure that no sudden, wild, girlish impulse such as might very well spring up in a daughter of Teiresias should deprive him of her as an aid to the baffling of his enemies and the furtherance of his sailing.

"Oh, I'm so glad," cried this same eager girlish prophet, when she found Zeuks alone with Pegasos waiting for Okyrhöe and the old king, "to have a chance to ask you what you really meant by your terrifying story of those horrible pirates putting ropes round us all and deliberately chopping us to death one by one. I couldn't bear to see it done to anybody, however much I hated them; and it's certain I couldn't bear it myself. I should just go shrieking-mad, and struggle wildly and bang about till I was killed or killed somebody else!"

The girl's directness and simplicity had its effect. The expression upon the face of Zeuks would have suggested to anyone who had the particular kind of penetration that the great Theban prophet seems to have been not quite able to pass on to his progeny, that within the bloated mask of humorous relish for every conceivable aspect of human existence and of animal sensation that was Zeuks' nature there had been suddenly roused from sleep a small active insect-like second nature that was a drastically honest commentator upon all the man's impressions and was a pitiless exposure of all his own self-deceptions and all his own exaggerations and all his own boastings.

“I’ll tell you the whole thing, my dear Pontopereia,” Zeuks blurted out hurriedly. “I was glorying, you see, in my own mind over this idea of mine which I call Prokleesis or ‘defiance’. I’m proud of this idea, which has become very important to me and which is something I’m constantly trying to practise. But I’m a terrible one for seeing everything as comic and I suddenly saw my own life-method, my own life-philosophy, my own private and special defiance of life as a comic thing; and I thought: ‘How can I show up this prokleesis of mine as I love to show up all those other philosophic cure-alls that aim at dispending with Themis, treating old Auntie Atropos as a doting hag, discounting Necessity, and putting Chance to shame as a negligible wanton?’

“And I decided that the only way I could do this was by imagining a situation in which only a very few heroic human souls, and they probably already half-crazy, could possibly practise my philosophy of ‘prokleesis’, or defiance of the whole of existence, and so I conjured up the picture of those murderous pirates on the brink of chopping us all to death one after another, as much as to say: ‘Well! If you can defy life while watching your best friends chopped to bits and waiting your own turn, you have to be something more than a clowning antic like me, whose head’s been turned by a good idea!’”

The kidnapper of Pegasos with his hand on that Gorgonian Wonder’s solitary wing must have drained at that second the ambrosial dregs of true philosophic glory, for the awkward figure of the daughter of Teiresias hunched itself into a shapeless heap of girlish admiration before the knees that had bent so faithfully all those years serving the aged Nymph deserted by Pan.

When Okyrhöe in the Podandrikon's incomparable skin, and with her bold hand on Odysseus' shoulder, finally appeared, it was evident that neither her own loveliness nor the unique wonder wrapped round her had made the old hero forget his Heraklean club.

"We shall be off in a moment, pretty creature," murmured the fly to the moth from the deep life-crack in that self-conscious weapon, "and then we'll soon find out how far the great god Pan has been able to go with young Eione."

"It's all very well for you to say that," replied the moth, "but I wish you hadn't gone to sleep while the Sixth Pillar was talking to the club just now; for the Pillar had heard about our midwife's sister having quarrelled with her Egeria, and being now with old Moros, at the home of Tis and Eione, and being on the point of having a child."

"How you beautiful girls," jeered the teasing fly, "do adore thinking of the results of love-making! What interests me is whether the great god Pan will be able to go to the limit with young Eione."

The moth stared vaguely out of the belly of the club into the surrounding darkness. "Yes, I wonder," she pondered, "whether Eione is old enough to have a child."

CHAPTER VII

IT WAS A riderless Arion who met the four of them, that is to say the two women, Okyrhöe and Pontopereia, mounted between the two men, Zeuks and Odysseus, when they arrived at the palace-porch and dismounted from the wounded back of Pegasos at the entrance to the Corridor of the Pillars. There was still a little more of that weird before-dawn light called Lykophos to be got through ere the sun rose, for neither Pegasos' wounded shoulder nor his heavily-trailing solitary wing had interfered with the speed of his stride; and the darkness had only just broken when they got home.

The faithful Tis, however, was awaiting them, though since he had fastened Arion by a rope long enough to permit the animal to graze on the weeds in the Slaves' Burial-ground it was clear he was ready to wait patiently for some time. But it was from Arion's obvious restlessness and excited expectancy, to be seen in every turn of his finely-moulded head and every arching of his proud though mutilated neck, that Tis, who knew the instincts of animals as well as Odysseus knew the instincts of men, had guessed that some mysterious vibration existing between these two semi-godlike creatures had already begun to inform Arion of the near arrival of Pegasos.

When they actually did meet, their re-encounter would have delighted Nisos, and he would have observed with relief that each of them had now ceased to leave on the ground any trail of blood-stained ichor. The immediate witnesses of the scene however were too taken up with their own affairs to notice the condition of the pair of animals who were led off by

Tis. He led them quite quietly and naturally to a shed adjoining the one devoted to Babba.

Babba herself, whose private affairs were less absorbing than those of any of the persons dismounting from the back of Pegasos, instantaneously thrust her horns through the wooden partition separating the two horses from herself, and then, hurriedly withdrawing these finely curved objects from the neat apertures they had made, proceeded to arrange her beautifully flapping ears so as to catch every faintest overtone and undertone of the thoughts and feelings that these unusual visitors exchanged between themselves.

But satisfactory as it was to an amiable and easy-going cow like Babba to have the distraction, though she could only understand half of what she heard, of listening to something that did at least make her forget the passing discomfort of waiting with full udders the time of her milking, it was a mild satisfaction compared with the pleasure Okyrhöe derived from talking to Arsinöe. The woman listened to every word Arsinöe uttered, to every sigh Arsinöe sighed. Nor was there any shade of seduction, whether frightening or reassuring, whether cajoling or propitiating, that she did not practise on her sister-handmaid from Priam's court.

She had Arsinöe just now entirely to herself, for Odysseus had gone off with Zeuks to present that unusual cattle-dealer, as a queer specimen of an island farmer, to their old family-nurse, Eurycleia. Time and place and circumstance therefore all played into Okyrhöe's hands and she threw such a thrilling intensity into what she was doing that she would have taken Arsinöe completely by storm if the latter had not possessed her own secret loyalties: but even these were troubled and shaken; for the girl accepted without question — being all the while herself the hero's child — the grotesque lie that Okyrhöe was a daughter of Hector. "You have the very look of his eyes!" Arsinöe cried. As a matter of fact even while she was uttering this ridiculous cry, and very largely because of the honest vehemence with which she uttered it, this impassioned carver of the features she had idealized from childhood, in complete ignorance of her blood-relationship to their possessor, not only revealed their outlines in her own face but imagined she found them where in reality there wasn't a trace of them.

To meet a sister-member of that girlish band of devoted hero-worshippers from Ilium was in itself an event that brought with it almost unbearable emotion, but to meet a woman who called Hector father loosened, as we say, Arsinöe's knees and melted her reserved heart. It was therefore in the sobs of her compatriot upon her beautiful bosom, a bosom no longer entirely concealed under the skin of the Podandrikon, a creature whose name, owing to its association with some mysterious oriental court-fashion, must always, so its wearer had explained to Zeuks as on their ride the night-wind whistled through it, be pronounced with the stress on the syllable "dand", that Okyrhöe won her first victory in the palace of the king of Ithaca.

It must, however, be allowed that in the bold invader's second encounter with the defenders of this pillared rock-cave the victory was on the other side. The old Eurycleia, who had looked after the wounds, and recognized the scars, and protected the eccentricities, and cured the manias, of three generations, saw through the mask worn so becomingly by this beautiful adventuress at the first glance.

To every point Okyrhöe brought forward the old lady opposed a plain blunt doubt of its essential veracity.

"My rule has always been," she declared at one point, "to obtain the word of a prophet or a teacher known through the whole of Hellas for proof of a family's claim to be connected with this or that hero of the days of our grandparents; and I have never myself accepted the word of a ghost. Odysseus undoubtedly does believe that he met the ghost of Teiresias beyond the brink of Okeanos and made the ghost drink of the blood of the animal he was sacrificing. Moreover I know that Odysseus feels sure that he himself and none other went down into the Underworld ruled over by Aidoneus the brother of Zeus and Poseidon. Indeed everyone who lives near our dear Odysseus has heard him tell stories about the ghosts of the famous heroes and heroines that he encountered in that Kingdom of the Dead.

"But I have seen so much of life in my time, young lady, and if you'll let me cry, 'Go away!' or 'erre! erre!' to the bad omen, so much of death too, that when I hear people tell me that they are connected with the family of Peleus or Theseus or Kadmos or Priam my feeling is simply this: if you have this noble blood in your veins your friends may be the better for it and your enemies the worse for it, but for you yourself life will be the same to you as it is to the rest of us, and death will be no longer in coming, nor kinder in the way in which it comes, than it is to the rest of us; for as my grandmother used to say, and she goes back further than your precious Kadmos, 'the nearer to the First Man the stronger the hand; the nearer to the Last Man the shrewder the head!'

"Thus although it was with her sweetest and most cajoling smile that Okyrhöe bowed herself out of the presence of the king's nurse, her thoughts, as she got the Trojan captive to introduce her to Leipephile, the betrothed of Nisos' brother, and then persuaded that same Arsinöe to take her to a well-cushioned chamber in a low-roofed passage behind the royal throne in the dining-hall, where Pontopereia was talking eagerly to young Eione, were nothing less than murderous.

"O you wait, you wait, you wait, you wait! you croaking and creaking corpse! It won't be you who'll choose the death you'll die. It'll be your meek and obedient Okyrhöe; and it won't be the prettiest death in the world either; I can tell you that."

Meanwhile, hidden away in that chamber at the end of that low-roofed passage between the great dining-hall and the subterranean kitchens and sculleries, where the meals were prepared and washed up and where the floral wreaths and the symbols and all the ritualistic paraphernalia for festival days were kept, Tis's little sister Eione was recounting to Pontopereia her escape from the amorous attentions of the god Pan.

"But didn't you feel," Pontopereia had just dared to suggest, "so spell-bound under his touch that you longed to yield to him?"

The two young girls were sitting cross-legged on opposite piles of Cyprian cushions. Eione was seated on cushions whose prevailing colour was pale green, and Pontopereia on cushions whose prevailing colour was purple. Eione looked gravely and intently into her friend's eyes.

"No, my dear," she replied, "you'll probably laugh at me as absurdly ignorant, but to tell you the honest truth — —"

"You mean you've never really been made love to?"

Eione neither reddened nor stammered. She just frowned and rubbed the sole of one of her sandals with two of her knuckles as if the unravelling of this difficult question required her whole mental concentration.

"I'm not sure whether I have or not," she said simply. "A boy who lives near us pressed me once very tight against him, when neither of us had much on, and I felt something — the thing they all have, I suppose, that makes them men — pounding and throbbing and beating against me like a stick with the pulse of a heart. But it didn't make me want him to do anything; and it didn't frighten me or disturb me. I just noticed it; that's all, and wondered what I'd feel if he did anything else, and whether I ought to help him to do anything else. And then somebody came — and that was all."

Pontopereia gave the purple cushion beneath her a mighty tug with both her hands so that it rose up like a wave between her thighs. "No," she said. "I can't call that quite enough; and to tell you the truth, my sweet one, I've never myself got as far as that — I mean in real life, if you understand. What I've always done, since I was O! so little, is to tell myself stories of love-making when I'm alone in bed. Sometimes I wake up in the night — you know? — feeling very amorous and then I tell myself, O such weird and funny stories — not very nice stories always, I'm afraid! It depends on what I'm feeling that particular night. But do tell me, my Sweet, what you did when Arcadian Pan laid hands on you. And first, do tell me this. Did his thin hairy legs and goat's feet give you the shivers?"

At this point, to Pontopereia's complete astonishment, Eione burst out laughing. "Shivers?" she cried. "I should say not! I like goats very much. Goats are my favourite beasts, just as Crows are my favourite birds, and blue dragon-flies my favourite insects and eels my favourite fish! I begged Arcadian Pan to let me stroke his thin hairy legs and it wasn't he who made me sit on his queer knees, it was I myself who made him take me on them. And I kept making him lift up his goat-feet so that I could see them quite close and touch them, like I like touching the feet of real goats! Then I made him let me clean his goat's horns for him and polish them till they were lovely and smooth. Then I got him to teach me to make some real proper sounds with his pipe — yes! I played some real notes on Arcadian Pan's own flute!

"Yes, as I'm telling you, Ponty darling, everything between us was just as I liked it to be, in fact as I made it be. The truth is I never knew that great gods — for he is a great god, isn't he, Arcadian Pan? — ever let a person treat them, well! certainly not an ordinary farm-girl like me treat them, as he let me treat him!"

Pontopereia pulled out the uppermost one of her purple cushions from between her legs, and spreading it on her knees thumped it with her fists into smoothness.

"But what happened then, my dear? You aren't suggesting, are you, that having made friends with this astonishing Being in such a simple way you were separated from him by a mistake?"

Eione looked at her with a vague careless, idle, good-natured, but entirely childish and innocent look.

"I wish indeed, Ponty dear," she said, slowly, "that you could explain to me what happened for it's all so totally beyond my comprehension that I've been living in a sort of trance of confusion ever since. It's only your coming that's brought me back into my own real self again. Yes, on my soul! I've never had such queer feelings. It's just as if I'd been turned into somebody else; and somebody whose whole life goes by, without any move of her own, just as if she were a figure in another person's dream! I know it sounds all vague and sleepy and funny; but I swear to you, Ponty darling, it's true. Do you think I've fallen in love with Arcadian Pan? Ordinary girls like me can fall in love with an immortal god can't they? There's nothing impossible about it is there?

"Anyway, Ponty darling, I don't quite know what has happened to me and that's what's made me decide that, come what may, I must stick close to Arcadian Pan for a few more spring days and see what comes of it! One important thing has already come of it and that is our curiously complete agreement over this great cosmic Revolution. Mind you, some of us Island people still talk of the 'Minoan' or 'Cretan' revolution and others still talk of the ‘Argive’ revolution; but the only revolution that Arcadian Pan and I talk of is what we have come to call the ‘Cosmic’ Revolution, by which we mean a rustic pastoral revolution against a cruel, despotic, wicked, undemocratic, hieratic, privileged tyrannical Order of the Citizens of great Cities, which we — rustic shepherds and shepherdesses from the country — have joined together to break up forever!”

“But what will you put in its place?” enquired Pontopereia, giving her purple cushion a final caress with both her hands; hands which it must be confessed were not, like those of Eione, the hands of a born dancer.

“Anarchy! Anarchy! Anarchy!” cried the younger girl. “Don’t you see, Ponty darling, this revolution of ours, which is really a revolution of the older gods against the newer gods, of the great old giant-gods, animal-gods, dragon-gods, serpent-gods, and, above all, women-gods, for the older times were matriarchal times, and women, not men, however heroic such men might be, ruled Heaven and Earth, since at the Beginning of things it was Gaia, our real old mother the earth, who gave birth to Ouranos, this holy heaven of hermeneutical humbug, that priests make so much of, and not the other way round! Isn’t that a spry word, ‘hermeneutical’? He taught me that!

“Yes! the thing that has thrown Arcadian Pan and me together has nothing really to do with his ‘taking me’, as he tells me they call it in the Arcadian sheep-folds, or his treating me as wives are treated, and it has nothing to do with my feelings, one way or the other.

“What Arcadian Pan feels drawn to do, as far as his treatment of a plain ignorant girl like me is concerned, is to keep his hands off me and the thing that male creatures carry about with them out of me, until what you might call ‘the ice’ is broken between us; but, to break this ‘ice’ — which is of course my shyness and nervousness and pride and independence, and also, you needn't smile, my dear! my ignorance — the great thing is for Arcadian Pan and me, and don't 'ee ever think, Ponty my precious, that I don't know what an honour it is for a stupid little kid like me to go about with a great immortal god, especially one with the beautifully-thin hairy legs and the firmly-planted goat-feet of my favourite of all animals! — the great thing, I say, is for Arcadian Pan and me to have the same idea of a proper 'Cosmic Revolution' and the same idea of the kind of Anarchy we must set up in place of this confounded hieratic 'order'.

"What the old Dryad advised — and she told us that though her name 'Kleta' was given her by one of the Graces she was not displeased to bear a name that resembled Keto, the fair-cheeked sea-monster who became the wife of Phorkys, one of those honest 'old Men of the Sea' who cannot — and isn't that a significant thing in itself? — tell a lie about anything.

"That's what I said this morning to Arcadian Pan, and O! it pleased him so: and though he swore he couldn't be as honest as all that, being a shepherd busy with ewes and nanny-goats and rams, and as a player on the flute for country-girls to follow and as the cause of those sudden, nameless, deep, strange, inexplicable, mysterious, obsessing, panic-terrors which take possession of mortal men and make them scurry and scamper away like rats out of a barn, he liked honesty, he said. And so I told him that the 'old men of the sea,' that is to say the old gods of the sea, were the only 'honest' gods in the world because they lived in water, and water I told him is the one element in the world that cannot, in its inherent nature, play dramatic tricks upon us." "What about ships at sea?" thought Pontopereia; but she held her peace; and Eione went on. "Well! we shall want all the help we can get from the outspoken honesty of water if we are to make headway against Zeus, Poseidon, and Aidoneus, each of the three of them a superb master of lies! Yes, what Arcadian Pan and I feel is that these three Sons of Kronos are now trying to combine together, since one is the Ruler of the Sky, one of the Sea, and the other of whatever dark and dreadful world it is that lies beneath the Earth; and that what we revolutionists and rebels have to do is enlist against Zeus and Poseidon and Aidoneus all the subnormal and abnormal and supernormal creatures we can collect together!

"These three most powerful rulers among the Olympians have joined together to suppress with violence and magical force every rebel that is opposed to them and opposed to all the great Olympians who support them!

"Do you realize, Ponty dear, that fresh news has just reached this appalling priest Enorches from his fellow-priests of the Mysteries at Eleusis, informing him that Herakles, who has been guarding Mount Etna to keep that fire-breathing monster Typhon from breaking out, has been persuaded by Dionysos to yield himself up to an orgy of drink; and that while this has been going on, Eros, who had been chained with golden chains by Hephaistos or by some 'Son of Hephaistos', like the one who carved the letters 'U. H.' on the base of the pillar here, yes! chained to the arm of Aphrodite's throne in Cyprus, has broken his bonds and joined Dionysos, and together they have succeeded in throwing Herakles into what amounts to a mad trance of ecstasy, in which condition he has become so completely irresponsible that the monster Typhon has got entirely loose, has left Italy and Sicily altogether, and has gone, fire-breathing, ravaging, rampaging, to where, above the Garden of Hesperides, the Titan Atlas, whose punishment from the Olympians it has been to hold up the sky, is threatening to leave his job? What do you think of all this, Ponty dear? Arcadian Pan and I think that his departure will neither mean the end of the sky nor the end of the earth, but the end of the superiority of the sky over the earth.

"You see, Ponty dear, the garden of the Hesperides lies at the western verge of the entire world where the divine streams of Okeanos encircle the earth, and where once used to be — malediction on those who submerged it! is what Arcadian Pan and I say now — the beautiful sheep-grazed meadows of Lost Atlantis. I took Arcadian Pan to the oak-tree of the King's old Dryad who was such a friend of Laertes in his time, and the Dryad revealed to him certain secrets of the Future of which he, although an immortal, had heard nothing; 'I am about to die', the Dryad said to us, 'or I shouldn't know these things myself.' And it was after our talk with the Dryad that we decided to intercept Typhon."

Pontopereia's blank amazement at these astonishing words made her whirl the purple cushion in the air before sitting down on it with a thud.

"You — and Arcadian Pan," she gasped, "intercepting that fire-breathing monster!" As she stared dumbfounded at her young friend, she became aware that the childish innocence in Eione's expression had suddenly changed to something else; and at this point she realized that between herself and this new Eione there was a blank space she couldn't bridge. "How weird," she said to herself, "are the ways by which two minds touch each other and dodge each other!"

And indeed it struck Pontopereia now as if they were the gestures of a complete stranger, when Eione suddenly stood up, opened her mouth as if to speak, but, in place of speaking, yawned, put the back of her left hand with careless indifference against her mouth, and, when her yawn was finished, with a half-smile, as if just waking from a pleasant dream in which she and Arcadian Pan might have been riding Typhon like an obedient horse, stretched both her shapely arms with clenched fists high above her straw-coloured head.

“You see, Ponty dear,” she said emphatically as she let her arms fall to her sides. “Not only has this Echidna of Arima borne children to Typhon but the dragon, Ladon, who guards the apples of the Hesperides, is her brother; and there is a good chance that when Poseidon and Aidoneus come on the scene we shall have got Prometheus himself to stand up to them.”

Pontopereia looked past her friend into far-receding space. She suddenly felt sad and lonely. Had this rash young girl, without in the least comprehending what was happening to her, fallen in love with Arcadian Pan? Was all that rather hurried and very startling and yet not completely satisfactory account of these great cosmic events an outward and visible sign of a much more personal feeling? Was it actually possible that a simple country girl like this should be subject to vibrations of emotion belonging to a superhuman conflict between Gods and Titans?

Pontopereia experienced just then a very perceptible sense of humiliation. When she had hastened their departure from Ornax she had felt without doubt the spirit of her father descend upon her and the inspiration of her father possess her soul, and she had exulted so much in this and felt so proud of it that it had seemed to her, as she bowed down in intellectual response before the gnomic humility of Zeuks, that her place in the struggle of life was with the great seers and the illumined soothsayers and not with ordinary women and girls.

But in this rough, earthy, primitive, uncomfortable rock-palace of the royal house of Ithaca she felt reduced in stature and importance. Her prophetic power seemed to have deserted her. While she had been listening to what Eione had told her of this news from the priests of Eleusis about the monster Typhon escaping from under Aetna and thundering over sea and land, till he reached the Garden of the Hesperides and the place where Atlas holds up the sky as his punishment, she felt as if without a definite inspiration from her father she had no place in these events and no power of her own to obtain such a place.

She even began to feel a doubt in her mind whether the beautiful and formidable Okyrhöe herself would be able to deal with this rock-hewn palace to which she had insisted on being brought.

With an intellectual candour that went further than the emotional simplicity of her friend she decided that the prophetic power within her must depend on the special atmosphere of particular places. "I don't believe," she told herself, "it will sweep me away at all here. Well, if I'm not destined, after all, to be a prophetess, I'm not, and that's all there is to be said! But I wish Nisos was here."

This frank admission, so nakedly expressed, was a great relief to her; she felt as if in the midst of putting on the ritualistic robes for the worship of one of the greater Olympians she had suddenly snatched the things off and thrown them on the floor and rushing out into the open air danced on the grass the first dancing-steps she had learnt as a child.

Meanwhile since Nisos' brother had carried away the other virginal attendant it was natural that the two woman who had known Ilium and the Court of King Priam should drift off together. As may be imagined with one like Okyrhöe to deal with, it did not take Arsinöe very long to discover that this lovely creature who put on the skin of the fabulous "Podandrikon" to accompany her to the haunted area of Arima and who seemed to find that to talk about the importance of accentuating the syllable "dand" in this harsh word was the best way of keeping their Trojan emotion in its place, had the same will as herself to thwart, frustrate and bring to a disastrous and contemptible end, the one single aim of the old age of Odysseus, his desire to sail across the sunken towers of Atlantis into the Unknown West.

Over their bowed feminine heads as they moved through Arima, defying the dark influences of that sinister region, there moaned and wailed, just as over the drowned temples of Atlantis Odysseus might have heard his ship's rigging respond to the wind, the eternally monotonous dialogue between Echidna the mother of the Hound of Hell, and Eurybia the grandmother of Hekate.

But when, in the golden afternoon light, Okyrhöe was led by her new ally into the very presence of what looked like the absolute reality of the fully-armed Hector himself, her nerves did for an instant, for all their superhuman control, break into a choking gasp. For not only were Hector's lineaments represented in exact correspondence to the living truth but there was something about the curves of his broad low forehead that exactly resembled the shape of Arsinöe's head. She recovered quickly however; and they were returning in a deliberately loitering fashion; for Arsinöe had begun to explain to the visitor that Odysseus grew irritable if he had to speak to guests or even to catch sight of guests while dinner was preparing though she admitted that the old hero had come by this time to look upon his unaristocratic companion, Zeuks, as an intimate; but the two women's leisureliness at this moment received a shock that was as disturbing as it was startling.

By a grotesque piece of ill-luck they encountered the old Dryad Kleta; an encounter which brought them both down with a disagreeable jolt to the very things in Odysseus' life that they would have preferred to ignore just then, that is to say to the human pathos of his present situation, as an extremely old man without a wife, or a daughter, or a grand-daughter, whose only son had become an austere, inhuman, unsympathetic recluse and a devotee of some contemplative cult, about which, save that it had nothing to do with Dionysos or Eros, and was in no favour with Enorches, it was very hard to get any information.

The old Dryad stood in front of them for a perceptible number of pulse-beats, staring at them as if they were trespassers and intruders of an extremely suspicious kind; not necessarily outsiders to be crushed as we crush black-beetles but entities to beware of and to be guarded against.

The old lady already knew Arsinöe by sight and was fully aware she was Trojan; and her first thought was that Okyrhöe must have just arrived by sea from the same part of the country. It may be believed she did not miss the royal eccentricity of the fabulous Podandrikon skin; and her mind began vaguely flapping like an aged phantom albatross from one to another of all the far-off harbours of which she had ever heard, leaving, as it flew, a feather caught in the sea-weed of one promontory and a splash of white dropping upon the rocks of another.

“Take notice, proud visitor,” she murmured, and then, with a quick glance at Arsinöe, “but you’ve been warned already, that we have to guard our renowned Odysseus from every agitating shock until the moment comes when he has got his ship ready to hoist sail and to sail away whither none of us will ever know! But sail he must and sail he will — away — away — away; and our duty now is to make everything as easy for him as we can until that heaven-appointed moment. Therefore, proud one, from far off, the best thing I can say to you is to bid you go — go quickly — go quietly — go at once! If you came by sea, find a ship and be off!

“There are ships sailing from this side of our island and there are ships sailing from the other side of our island. You wouldn’t be here if you hadn’t gold to pay your way. Well, stranger, find a ship and pay the master of that ship to take you to the harbour nearest the place where you would be!”

Okyrhöe made an effort to look more than humanly lovely and her features had certainly never been as goddess-like as at that moment. The sun was still overhead, though his tremendous arsenal of refulgence had sunk sufficiently from the Zenith to pour itself into every curve and cranny of Okyrhöe's countenance.

There are faces that cannot endure exposure of this kind, but Okyrhöe's face could endure anything. Indeed it looked to Arsinöe as she glanced at her companion that the intense emotion in the old Dryad's voice stirred up in the beautiful wearer of the Podandrikon skin a quivering vibration of self-assertion that rushed like a sea-breath touched by fire through nerves and veins and muscles and fibres and cells.

But if this rush of abnormal magnetism affected the recipient of the old Dryad's words, it also affected the Dryad herself. It did more than affect her. Leaving them helplessly standing there — and where she left them they remained; for nothing else at that moment seemed possible — she rushed wildly, blindly, desperately into the centre of Arima. Midway between the two figures of Eurybia and Echidna she paused for a moment, staring at them both like one deprived of speech by reason of the intensity of the feeling that possessed her. Then she cried out in a resonant voice that rang from end to end of that haunted enclosure, "Goddesses! Goddesses! Goddesses! Goddesses! worshipped for fifty thousand years in Argos and Ionia and Crete and Achaia and Lakedaimon! There is a battle going on that will never be repeated if it is not won now!

"It is a battle to restore to us women the ruling position we held at the beginning of things! In the reign of Kronos we held it — and that age was the Age of Gold. But it is Zeus the son of Kronos who has taken it from us, partly by his thunderbolts and partly by the cunning and strength of his two sons, Hermes and Herakles. Goddesses! My goddesses! You who have been worshipped in Ithaca for fifty-thousand years, harken unto me now!

"Persephone, the Queen of Hades, has left her Lord Aidoneus, and is now roaming the world seeking for her mother Demeter. But Hermes, that cunning one, has gone to both Aidoneus and Poseidon, yes! both to the Lord of Hades and the Lord of the Sea, and has brought them to the Garden of the Hesperides near the place where Atlas, as a punishment from Zeus, holds up the sky. And from there the three Olympian brothers, Zeus, Lord of the Sky, Poseidon Lord of the Sea, and Aidoneus, Lord of the Underworld, have resolved to resist this attempt of us women, led by Persephone, to seize again the universal rule and power that we once possessed. The great Olympian goddesses are wavering and have hidden themselves away. Athene has gone to Ethiopia.

"Hera is still alone on Olympos, but in a state of distraction. She has sent Iris to Ethiopia with frantic messages to Athene to return! But Iris seems unable to discover where Athene is hiding. Dionysos and Eros together are doing what Aphrodite cannot do; for Hephaistos has caught her in Lemnos and is keeping her a prisoner there.

"But Dionysos and Eros have between them ensorcerized the powerful Herakles and laid him low with Desire and Drink, so that Typhon breathing fire and up-rooting mountains can now drag forth Briareos from Tartaros this time for the dethroning, not the throning of Zeus! O great Echidna, Mother of the Sphinx, the Chimera, the Hydra and the Nemean Lion, help us now! O great Eurybia, grandmother of Hekate and daughter of Gaia the Earth and Pontos the Sea, help us now!

"And harken unto me, ye two, for I have great news! Arcadian Pan himself, yes! Pan with the beautiful horns and the hairy legs of a real living goat, has revolted against his time-serving, treacherous, cunning, thieving, lying begetter, Hermes, and is now, even now, leading by their bridles those two godlike horses Pegasos and Arion, so cruelly mutilated by Enorches the Priest of the Mysteries.

"And why, O great Goddesses, is he leading them? He is leading them with the idea of offering them to you Eurybia, of wide rule, daughter of Gaia and Pontos! He is leading them with the idea of offering them to you Echidna, daughter of Phorkys and Keto! He is leading them with the idea of being himself their rider and your guide and helping you to intercept Typhon in his fire-breathing course from Sicily to the Garden of the Hesperides, and make use of him, as huntresses make use of savage dogs, to defeat the Son of Kronos even though he is supported by Aidoneus, the Lord of the Dead, and Poseidon the Lord of the Sea.

"And then, when this resounding victory is won, this victory to which Atropos the oldest of the Fates who is a woman like ourselves will contribute her aid, we shall welcome completely to our side the wavering Hera and the wandering — —"

She was interrupted by a long, melodious, vibrant, tremulous note of music which was so penetrating and far-reaching that it was impossible not to receive it into your inmost identity like a perfect draught of wine. Without any other declaration, or sign, or warning, or announcement, the two godlike horses entered that haunted enclosure, Arcadian Pan repeating from the flute he pressed to his bearded mouth that same meltingly sweet note over and over and over and over.

Pan himself was mounted on Pegasos, and the young girl Eione on Arion; and she certainly seemed to be riding Arion easily and naturally and as if entirely at her own volition.

"Lady Okyrhöe!" cried Eione, as they came even with the two women; and into this salutation the young girl threw exactly the right note of respect and courtesy.

As Eione later discussed what they managed to achieve with Arcadian Pan — for it was remarkable how quickly she felt completely at ease with the goat-foot god — they agreed that it was peculiarly and specially lucky for the success of their scheme that in former times, so rumour said, Echidna had been embraced by the monster Typhon and not only so, but, as one story declared, had given birth by him to the Hydra of Lerna, if not to the famous victim of the club of Herakles, the Nemean Lion itself! But whatever were the feelings, mortal or immortal, of the riders upon those divine horses, the impression they produced upon the two women was noticeable.

Never to the end of her days did Arsinöe forget what she then beheld. Okyrhöe took it all more lightly, for her whole life had been such a tissue of murderous tensions and such a chain of deep-plotted explosions that for life's events to jerk and bleed and jitter and squeal as you dragged them clinging to your scraping harrow over the rough and smooth of fate seemed natural enough.

But apparently those two strange Beings, Eurybia and Echidna who for years and years and years had sighed obscurely, darkly, obstinately, and in a sort of ghastly antiphonic ritual at each other in horrible isolation across the dedicated unholiness of their island Arima, now found themselves bound to move, just as if Atropos herself were in person directing the operation; and there was something about their having to move after so long that was almost geological, giving the impression that the places from which they moved were left raw and in some way not only bloody and excremental but scoriac, volcanic, and like what is left when an avalanche moves.

Echidna instinctively selected Pegasos as her horse and Pan as her companion, while Eurybia slid easily and inevitably upon the back of Arion.

Each of these formidable goddesses, however, had the good sense to allow her fellow-rider to hold the bridle-reins of the particular animal she rode; so that as Okyrhöe the pretended daughter of Hector saw them pass that hero’s carved image, and as Arsinöe, his real daughter, saw the hoof of one of the horses fling a clod of mud against the figure she had broken her heart to carve and bruised her flesh to arm, it was upon Eione and Pan that their attention was fixed rather than upon the two goddesses; and as they listened to that exquisitely magnetic flute-note from the pipe of Pan dying away in the distance long after both horses with their four riders had disappeared, the drift of their separate moods opened between them like a yawning gulf, the mood of the wearer of that weird Podandrikon growing as tense as the mood of a general in the midst of the bloodiest part of a battle, while the mood of the daughter of Hector fell into that sadness, proud and bitter and rejecting all sympathy, which had become her prevailing attitude to life.

Had the girl possessed any real friend, had Nisos, for instance, not been so much younger, or Leipephile not so extremely simple, she might have been drawn out of this embittered isolation, for it was so long after the Trojan War that the ancient rancours in most ordinary minds were beginning to lose their edge, if not to wear out. If only Eurycleia hadn’t been so old it might have been different; but of all people an ancient family-nurse, and one who had nursed, as Eurycleia had, three generations of the same breed, would be the last to have any sensitized imagination left over for sympathetic consideration of the feelings of an alien.

It wasn’t until those heart-breakingly sweet notes — or rather the last long-drawn-out unequalled note — of Pan’s flute had died away that either Arsinöe or Okyrhöe gave a thought to the old Dryad who was the prime instigator of this disturbing event.

When they did turn to her it was simultaneously and with an equal feeling of something like real awe. “Let us help you home to your oak, Dryad,” whispered Okyrhöe; and if Nisos had heard that whisper, to which Arsinöe added a less articulate murmur, he would have had a thrill of real pride at being a native of a Grecian isle rather than of a Trojan or a Theban plain, for clearly so great is the power of a Greek Nymph even in her extreme old age that formidable foreigners are subdued before her.

As they approached the skeleton oak-tree on the bark of which flourished a special kind of rich green moss, as if the tree were already horizontal rather than perpendicular, the Dryad’s supporters both recognized that it was possible to look through the interstices of the bark into the interior wood of the tree which was split into long splintery filaments between which there were already oozing out and crumbling upon the lichen-covered ground certain thick masses of a reddish-brown substance which was the clotted heart-stuff or dust-resolved liver, or conglomerated entrail-matter, of that fast-perishing old tree.

Suddenly the Dryad stood dead-still between them, and laid one withered hand on the sleeve of Okyrhöe and one on the sleeve of Arsinöe.

“Give my farewell to Odysseus, you two. My name-mother is one of the Graces and just at this moment I felt her passing over me, warning me of my end. Zeus, it seems has got one last thunder-bolt left, a very little one, but large enough to dispose of my oak and me. Lest either of you should feel the shock of my destruction, it is important that you should hasten away. Don’t stop running till you reach the entrance to the Hall of the Pillars. There you will be safe. Fare ye well. Let my memory be forgotten!”

So intense was the tone of her words that although all was silent round them Okyrhöe snatched at Arsinöe’s hand and together they fled like a pair of panic-stricken pigeons. They did not stop running till they reached the entrance to the corridor of the Pillars; and then, when they did stop at last with their hands still clasped tight, each of them could hear clearly the beating of her own heart as well as that of her companion. In fact as they stood there in a sort of trance there arose from the pair of them a kind of mathematical and mechanical and wholly impersonal heart-beating, which went on till, in one single blinding flash of lightning, followed by a rolling clap of thunder, the Nymph and the oak-tree, and the stretch of ground where the oak-tree's roots had been, were reduced simultaneously to black ashes.

"What I don't understand, dear nurse," Odysseus was saying at that moment, as together with his new friend Zeuks he watched Eurycleia's face as he explained his ideas for the calling of the whole people together to listen to his plan for sailing across the drowned continent Atlantis. "What I don't understand is your objection to my telling the people exactly what I intend to do. Why shouldn't I tell them, Nurse darling? I shall say that what I want for my sailing is the most necessary thing of all — namely 'othonia' or sail-cloth.

"And I'll call upon them all, upon the whole people of Ithaca to collect sail-cloth for me. What can Krateros Naubolides do to stop the people, my own people of Ithaca, that were my father's people before me, from collecting enough 'othonia' or sail-cloth for my purpose? And then, you see, Nurse darling, if they begin making the excuse that it's wrong for me, Odysseus the son of Laertes, to leave the rule of this Island to others, I've got this brilliant, eloquent, inspired young daughter of Teiresias to help me with them. Don't you see, Nurse, how she'll make all the difference at this open 'agora' and meeting-place of our people? I'll call on her, as we used to call on all those prophets of old; and, girl though she is, she'll do the trick for us, Nurse, my honey! Now do, for the sake of all the gods tell me what's weighing on your dear mind, for I know something is! Are you afraid that secretive scoundrel Enorches has got some new trick up his sleeve, some dirty, crafty, clever trick that I've never thought of, that he will play on me at the last moment?"

Eurycleia gazed intently at him, frowning. Then she suddenly shifted in her seat and stared out of the window. Then she addressed herself to Zeuks. "Did you hear anything, Master?" "I certainly did!" Zeuks answered; and in his turn addressed the King.

"I expect you must have heard it too, my Lord? It didn't sound as ordinary thunder does at this time of the year either! Something's going on."

The old Nurse rose, not without difficulty, and confronted the two men from her full height, one hand resting on the arm of her chair. Her stark gaunt figure towered imposingly over them in the afternoon sunlight which was now pouring into the chamber.

"I think you are right, Master Zeuks," she said quietly. "If I'm not greatly mistaken that wasn't ordinary lightning or ordinary thunder. That was a thunderbolt from — —"

It was then that there came a hurried step outside Eurycleia's chamber and with all her simple impulsiveness Leipephile burst in.

The tall beautiful stupid girl was panting like a hunted animal. "What on earth is it?" asked the old Nurse. "What's happened? Was that a thunderbolt?"

"They're in the Porch," stammered Leipephile, recovering her breath with difficulty.

"Who are in the Porch?" cried the Nurse. "For the god's sake tell us what's happened, girl!"

"The strange lady in that funny cloak and Arsinöe."

"Well — why shouldn't they be in the Porch? Are they hurt? What's happened?"

"They say that Zeus has thrown a thunderbolt from Mount Gargaros, where he is looking down on the Garden of the Hesperides and on Atlas holding up the sky, and on Poseidon coming up out of the Sea; and on Aidoneus coming up out of Hades. They've just met the old Dryad — —" Here Odysseus interrupted her. "Met Kleta the Dryad, do you say, girl? What on earth was she doing all that way from her tree?"

"It is the Dryad and her tree, O king," replied the betrothed of Nisos' brother; and she spoke with less timidity and shyness now that she was delivering, or being delivered of, her chief news. "Yes, both the Dryad and her tree together, that the Son of Kronos has destroyed with a thunderbolt. The Dryad told them that the thunderbolt he was going to use was a little one and the last he had where he then was. But they told me to tell you that they know why the son of Kronos was angry with the Dryad." At this point Leipephile paused in her tale and surveyed her audience with the self-satisfied expression that implies the presence of news in the wind that can't be blurted out in a few words, and can't possibly be divined or guessed at, even by the cleverest listener. Her three hearers, not missing this expression, patiently imitated Eurycleia who had now resumed her seat at the table.

"It was," Leipephile went on, with obviously deep satisfaction at having such an important tale to relate to headquarters, "it was the goat-foot god Pan who began it all by consorting with the girl Eione — though I don't think he meddled with her maidenhead. The god Pan and the girl Eione were riding on Pegasos and Arion. And when the Dryad saw this she persuaded the goddesses Eurybia and Echidna who have for so long ruled over that place—" and Leipephile made a vague gesture with her hand in the general direction of Arima— "that place — you know — where everybody's scared of going — and what the Dryad told them to do was this. She told them, that is she told Eurybia and Echidna and Eione and Pan, all four mounted on Pegasos and Arion, to intercept the Monster Typhon and by a little bribing and petting and cozening and cosseting and coaxing — and a few terrifying threats too perhaps! — to make use of him as a savage hunting-dog; and, thus well-prepared for any event, to approach the Garden of the Hesperides."

There was a long silence when the girl had finished. Then Odysseus enquired: "Could you tell me, dear child, could any of you tell me, do you think, where the daughter of Teiresias has got to this afternoon while all these unexpected events have been occurring?" Leipephile stared at him with her mouth open, while Eurycleia and Zeuks exchanged a look by which the former said to the latter:

"Here's a typical monarch! Having made all this fuss to get hold of this damned girl, he now has let her escape!" while the latter said to the former: "We had better find out exactly from the woman in that weird cloak what kind of trouble this Pontopereia has fallen into on a fine afternoon."

But before they ceased to look at each other there were more light steps outside the door and Pontopereia herself appeared.

"Where's Eione?" she asked; and then seeing Odysseus she added: "Pardon me, great King, but they told me down there such a mad story that I had to come and see for myself! They said Eione had gone off with the goat-foot god and with two mysterious goddesses who for twenty years or more have been arguing together in a haunted place near here you call Arima."

"They seem to have told you the truth, child," replied Odysseus. "But now that you're here the best thing you and I can do is to arrange a definite plan of campaign for ourselves at the 'agora' tomorrow. So sit you down here and have a sip of my wine. This is our Eurycleia. Yes, give her one of those cups you like using best yourself, Nurse.”

Unlike many men of genius, whether in thought or in action, Odysseus was always vividly aware of the feelings of women; and he now glanced from Pontopereia to Leipephile and back again to Pontopereia.

“This lady,” he explained to the latter, “is the betrothed of our young friend Nisos’ elder brother, who, quite naturally, takes the side of their father Krateros Naubolides in our little island-feud. The pleasantest thing for you, my dear child” — he was addressing Leipephile now— “will be to have a quiet supper by yourself tonight and to go to bed early; for in this way you’ll escape being torn between your loyalty to us and your affection for our opponents.”

The tall simple girl didn’t appear to object in the very least to being thus lightly dismissed from so momentous a Council of War; and after a nod from Eurycleia had confirmed the king’s word, and after the kindly-natured Zeuks had muttered something about her being sure not to forget to have a good supper, she went off at once.

Then at last the party round the old Nurse gathered closely together to plan, as Odysseus had declared it was essential they should do, the general outline of his appeal to the people. But Odysseus had still got at the back of his consciousness a rooted feeling that there was something in Eurycleia’s mind with regard to all that had happened and all that was happening which it was important for him to know.

But it was not until he and Zeuks had mapped out pretty definitely their plan of campaign for to-morrow’s meeting in the “agora”, and had decided to send the heralds at early dawn round the whole island to announce it, that in a single hurriedly pronounced word the old Nurse revealed what it was. Telemachos! Yes, it was his son; his son, who like a wooden dagger, with a handle at one end and a point at the other end, had got himself caught fast in the consciousness of the old nurse. Yes, it was the “eidolon” of his son Telemachos she had in her mind, teasing and perplexing her with misgivings of every sort.

It must have been approaching the hour for supper when Odysseus discovered what Eurycleia had in her mind. “One thing seems certain,” he said, “and that is that this appalling Enorches hasn’t made the faintest, no! not the very faintest impression on him! What does he think of that retreat of his, which this devil of a priest has certainly curtailed to pretty small quarters?”

“Another thing seems certain too,” added the old Nurse; and going to the door at the back of her room she opened it and called down the passage. Then with the servant who answered her call she held a brief conversation, in the middle of which, telling the girl to wait a moment, she returned to Odysseus. “It seems certain to me,” she told him gravely, “that your son really must, for all his philosophizing, feel lonely sometimes and want to get a glimpse of his Dad. I know I want to get a glimpse of him; and I think the Lady Penelope would feel that old Nurse Eurycleia ought to have this wish gratified. Do you mind if I send somebody — Tis, if he’s about just now — to bid him come to supper tonight? There’ll be as it is two women-guests and only one man-guest, so he will make up the table; and you at the head and your own Nurse at the foot will behold the board complete. So may I send Tis or somebody to bid him to come?”

Across Odysseus’ countenance flapped like the wings of a black crow a momentary shadow of serious discomfort; but he had the strength to blot it out so completely that it was as if it had never been there. He nodded with the crushing acceptance and finality of Zeus. “Send anyone you wish and tell them in the Kitchen to prepare supper for two men and two women in addition to thee and me."

The old lady went back to the waiting serving-girl with this message. "She says Tis is there and she will tell him to go," she reported to the King on her return; and so it was settled, and that very evening Telemachos came. Nor among those sitting round the table in the throne-room at the end of the corridor of Pillars was there one who regretted this sudden resolve of the old Nurse to see her last Infant of the House as a noble-looking middle-aged man of fifty, sitting side by side with Zeuks, and opposite Okyrhöe and Pontopereia.

And the best of it was that the routine of custom in that royal dwelling made the whole thing easy. For the people in the Kitchen were always wont to bring the dishes up to a table just behind the royal throne and leave them there: from which position Leipephile and Arsinöe and Tis himself carried them round and then stood behind the throne of Odysseus while all the guests ate and drank at their leisure.

As might have been expected Okyrhöe was deeply impressed by the handsomeness and dignity of Telemachos; and as for Pontopereia she couldn't resist permitting a passionate prayer to Athene to embody itself in words in her mind: a prayer that if she should be called upon to utter words of prophetic insight in the presence of this silent, austere, good-looking man, with such broad-shoulders and such an intensely abstracted look on his stern face, she might be true to herself, true to her inspiration, and true to the great goddess who would use her as a reed through which to pour forth the rhythmic waves of her message to the world.

Their meal that night was indeed only half through when, constrained by a sudden urge whose origin was wholly obscure to her, Pontopereia asked Telemachos a plain direct unequivocal question.

"What would you say, My Lord Telemachos, was the real heart of your teaching? I mean the sort of thing you would have to explain to any student of philosophy, whether a boy or a girl, who wished to be considered as your proper disciple?"

Telemachos glanced quickly and a little uneasily at his father as if to assure himself that the old man would not mind his launching out upon such a topic at such a time; but as he received no warning against it, and, in place of that, saw something resembling the flicker of a benevolent smile cross his progenitor's face, he addressed himself to Pontopereia with sincere pleasure.

And the truth was that the longer she listened to him the more did Pontopereia feel drawn to the man and thankful she had risked her question. "He's lonely;" she told herself, "he's lonely and unhappy. He's invented this philosophy of his to fill a void. His philosophy is his kingdom, his wife, his children, his weapons, his ships, his ploughs, his horses, his granaries." And indeed his words, when he spoke, almost humorously fulfilled her prediction.

"I would tell this imaginary disciple of mine, lady," he said, "to make philosophy a substitute for every kind of success he can possibly want — no! more than a substitute, a fulfilment! I would say: 'What do you really want from life?' You've probably never asked yourself! Few of us do when we're young. But anyone who has watched you will know you've wanted the satisfaction of your hunger, your thirst, your lust, your hunting spirit, your fighting spirit, your collecting mania, your athletic mania, your building mania, your passion to be beautiful, to be a great artist, to be desired by many. Well, and what have you already attained in regard to this desire of yours? You've got the rudiments, the embryonic beginnings of all of them. You've got a body and a soul. You are a human being. You are living on the earth with the ocean around the earth, and the sun and the moon above the earth, and the stars above the sun and the moon, and the eternal ether above the stars.

"Well! consider your situation. You are a separate individual. You are a lonely individual. And though you may have got parents and brothers and sisters your happiness depends upon your own feelings for life, not upon their feelings for life nor upon their feelings for you. Well! you are surrounded by things that are made of the four elements, made of earth, made of fire, made of water, made of air. Very good. You have the power of embracing these things: of seizing upon them and embracing them so closely that you become one with each one of them.

"But these things, although like yourself they are separate and individual, are made up, just as you are yourself, of the four elements. Very well then! It is clear that when you, a human being, embrace the earth, you are embracing something made of the same material that you are made of. That is to say that a person made of air, water, earth, fire, is embracing other objects or entities or beings, also made of earth, fire, water, air. Thus with your mind and all your senses, thus with your body and all your soul you become one with the whole earth and with the ocean that surrounds the earth, one with the sun and moon, and one with the stars, and one with the immeasurable divine ether that surrounds the stars. Your body and your soul by this embrace become one with the body and the soul of the divine ether and with all that it surrounds. Earth, ocean, sun, moon, stars, ether, they are now one living thing; and to this one living thing, you, a separate living thing, are now joined in an inseparable embrace.

"You, and these things, now become one, have now become a larger one, an immeasurable one, but you still have the power in yourself, the terrific inexhaustible power in yourself, to work upon; to influence, to direct, to drive, to move this New Enormity, this vast new world, this world which you have created by embracing what you have embraced. In one sense therefore you have thus created a new world by joining the old world. Yes, you have created a new earth and ocean and sun and moon and a new immeasurable divine ether.

"Nor do you stop with this; for you go on working upon, and driving, and forcing, and moving, and directing, and re-creating, this immeasurable earth-ocean-sun-moon-ether, moulding it nearer and nearer to the secret desire of your heart; that is to say moulding this newly created earth-ocean-sun-moon-ether, and compelling it to obey your will.

"Now you may naturally say that you are only one of the innumerable separate individual lives who are working and willing and re-creating and re-moulding this existent one or super-one made of earth-ocean-sun-moon-stars and immeasurable depths of divine ether; and you will be perfectly right in saying this. You are only one of the many wills who are driving this earth-ocean-sun-moon-stars and immeasurable depths of ether forward upon its way. Its way whither?

"Ah! that is the impenetrable secret of which you are yourself a living part and a partial creator. You, a secret agent, have an obscure purpose in your mind; and so have your innumerable fellow-agents driving the universe on its way; but on its way to what — ah! that remains an impenetrable secret!"

Having completed his discourse Telemachos gave Pontopereia a hurried smile and a friendly but rather stiff little bow and once again, as at the beginning of his words, turned his head and glanced hurriedly and a little apprehensively at his father. Pontopereia missed nothing of these two motions; and from the nature of his smile, and from the quality of that respectful little obeisance addressed to herself, she clearly took in, as it can be believed the sharp-witted Okyrhöe did also, more of the man’s own essential character than was revealed in the vague and obscure method of philosophizing he had been at such pains to advocate.

Telemachos had his father’s massive, clear-cut, majestic, and severe cast of features. Where the general outline of their faces differed, apart from the fact that the old hero had a beard while his son was clean-shaved, was that Odysseus’s features were rugged and rock-like while Telemachos’s were like smoothly polished marble. Of the two of them, the son was the handsomer, the father the more easy-going, humorous and informal.

As you looked at the two of them you could see the effect of the fact that the father’s life had been passed, and was still being passed, in a constant and lively stream of contact with friends and enemies, while the son’s was now being divided between solitary walks along the edge of the sea and meditations in a small chamber surrounded by deep recesses full of parchment-rolls, either inscribed by the careful fingers and the exquisitely prepared pigments of ancient Sumeria, or by the less careful and much more daring imagination of the artists of Crete.

Telemachos could have devoted the closing periods of his discourse to an eloquent analysis of the nature of the cosmos, and of the part played in that nature by the four elements, as well as by the souls of the living entities, who are, as he explained, urging and driving and steering forward the whole body of life, and he probably would have done so, had he not suddenly felt in the depths of his being an inexpressible longing to escape from the whole business; not only from the urging and driving and stirring, not only from the desperate willing and the heroic share, if only an infinitesimal share, in the creation of the future, but from the things in themselves; yes! from the ancient earth herself, mother of us all, from the sun and the moon and the stars and from the divine ether; — from it all, from it all, from it all!

Yes, at that moment with everything that was deepest in his nature he wanted to escape from the whole struggle of life. Life from the start had been to him more of an effort than a pleasure. The fact of his childhood and boyhood having been passed in the absence of his father and in the invasion of their rock-palace by those insolent suitors had inflicted a bruise, a discoloration, upon his whole nature from which it had never entirely recovered.

Something about the gesture with which he now put both his elbows on the table and rested his forehead on his hands was in no wise missed by Okyrhöe, who was not at all anxious that this meal, so luckily, dexterously, and crucially arranged, if only by pure chance, should break up without certain definite advantages for herself having been established.

"What," she enquired suddenly of Telemachos, "is your feeling about this curious ride of Eione with Arcadian Pan on the backs of Pegasos and Arion, and carrying with them Echidna and Eurybia? The whole idea of it, they tell me, was of the old Dryad's urging and it seems that she and her oak-tree have together paid the penalty. But why Zeus should have been angry if the object of the ride was to intercept Typhon I fail to see. Your father has explained — haven't you, my King? — what an event in the history of Ithaca it is, this departure from Arima, well! from our whole island, of these two strange Beings.

"But what, I confess, puzzles me still, my Lord Telemachos, is this; and upon this I would like to hear your opinion. Are we to assume from the fact that Arcadian Pan and the girl Eione have gone off together that between this sweet-natured young creature and the goat-foot god there is, from now on, an authentic love-affair?

"Under ordinary conditions I am not inquisitive; and I know your father, our venerated King here, would not wish any of us to ask impertinent questions in these personal matters; but this is a most extraordinary and unusual expedition including not only Arcadian Pan but two powerful goddesses, one of them Eurybia, daughter of Gaia and Pontos and sister of Phorkys and of Nereus, and the other Echidna, who is said to have given birth to the Hydra of Lerna by this very same Typhon whom they are intending to waylay.

"In the first place, my Lord Telemachos, what puzzles me is that the ancient Dame of whom I caught a glimpse just now, and with whom I had the honour of a brief conversation when your revered Father took me into her presence, I am speaking of course of your old family-nurse, should have allowed a girl as young as Eione to go off on this wild adventure alone with Arcadian Pan and those two terrifying Goddesses who no doubt ruled over Ithaca and Achaea and Argos and Boeotia and Lakedaimon in the primeval far-away times before our mother the Earth gave birth to the Gods or the Titans or even to the mortal or immortal nymphs.

"In Thebes where my youth was spent a girl as young as Eione would still be in the care of her parents. Are your customs in this Island of Ithaca completely different from those on the mainland?"

There was a general silence. With what was quite clearly the faintest possible flickering of a smile at the left corner of his crafty mouth and with what was a definite movement of his beard in the direction of the Corridor of the Pillars, Odysseus saved his son, whom these significant questions had obviously embarrassed a good deal, from having to be the interpreter of local custom, by making use of the most primitive and also the most royal of all forms of summons.

Loudly, vigorously, and several times, he clapped his hands. Had he been a King in Jerusalem, or a Pharaoh in Egypt, he could not have clapped his hands with quicker effect. All the four guests present at that table, Telemachos, Zeuks, Okyrhöe, Pontopereia; not to speak of the attendants, including Arsinöe, who were holding wine-jugs and water-bottles and bread-platters behind the backs of these four persons, became as alert as if they expected this startling and oriental summons to result in the appearance of a troop of Harpies.

But, after a deep silence, the husky, hoarse voice of the old Nurse Eurycleia was heard from the end of the long dark passage leading to the kitchen. "What do you want?" were the direct and downright words that reached their ears.

"Send up Tis," was the king's imperative answer; and when Tis arrived, clearly somewhat disturbed and uncomfortable, Odysseus told him with a rough, humorous, blunt emphasis upon the word maid, to explain to the Lady Okyrhöe from Thebes how it was that he allowed a maid as young as Eione to go off on such an adventurous excursion alone with Arcadian Pan and two such formidable goddesses as Eurybia and Echidna.

Tis came forward to the left of the king's chair upon the arm of which he boldly rested his hand as he spoke. It was as clear to Okyrhöe and Pontopereia as it was to Zeuks that he was accustomed to doing this, and although feeling awkward and uncomfortable was so thoroughly used to speaking his mind before Odysseus that he was by no means tonguetied in the king's presence or in the presence of any guests.

"My little sister," he said, "like the rest of us, has been brought up to take care of herself. We have never been people to be afraid of the gods and where there are a lot of sheep-folds there have always been occasional visits from the great god Pan who likes the company of mortal girls as much as he likes the company of mortal or immortal Nymphs. My little sister Eione has always looked after her maidenhead shrewdly enough as well as briskly and boldly among the lads of the farms round us. So at our end of the island, if you understand, we would never be worried or scared if a sister of ours made friends with Arcadian Pan. Us all do know, ye must understand, that ’tis natural for Arcadian Pan to want a maid like she, and us all do know too that if Arcadian Pan did take she’s maidenhead, and she did bear a child to he, that child would be, whether it were a he-child or a she-child, half a god and half of an ordinary person; and what we do feel at our end of this dumb little island is that when once a girl has got through her labour-pains and has laid her baby, whether that baby be a man-child or a god-child, a mortal child or an immortal child, safe on the steps of the altar, she’s done pretty well for herself and has got a very nice start in life.

“Life’s a hard game is what us do think at our end of this rocky isle, and if a girl like our Eione gets through the hard part of being had by a man and the still harder part of having a baby-man, what us do feel, at our end of this funny-shaped island, is that she hasn’t done so badly for herself.”

Having thus spoken Tis looked at his island’s king, seated in the throne of Laertes, and wondered in his insular heart how it was that in so simple a matter as Arcadian Pan’s attraction to Eione and her rural predisposition to his thin goatish shanks compared with the more human limbs of other possible lovers it should have been necessary to have called him from the scullery to set the mind of this strange Theban lady at rest. Did the woman think that compared with the great fashionable courts of the main-land the royal palace-cave of Ithaca was a poor thing, and its girls poor things and its herdsmen uneducated clowns? By Hades! I’d larn her to think poorly of Ithaca if I were Odysseus the son of——

His thoughts were interrupted by the sound of a crashing fall in the Corridor of the Pillars, the door leading into which had been left ajar.

“See what that was!” commanded the king; while Zeuks, who was beginning to grow sleepy after the well-cooked food and good wine, jerked himself up, and fumbling under his coat for his dagger sat sideways against the back of his chair, watching Tis descend the couple of steps, push open the door, and pass into the corridor. The door swung back and there was silence. Tis wore, for his indoor work in kitchen and scullery his softest sandals; so that the silence round that dining table at this moment was profound.

Then Telemachos deliberately got up. Having risen from his chair he crossed the room as noiselessly as he could. All the while he had been so intensely struggling to get his philosophical ideas into focus so that he might explain them to Pontopereia his eyes had been fixed on an ancient sword suspended from an iron nail in the wall. It was a sword of a completely different make from the sort used by Odysseus. It had been part of a collection of foreign weapons made long ago by the father of Penelope, who, like Zenios of Thebes, was a great picker-up of antiques.

Engraved upon the handle, as Telemachos remembered well from his childhood, was the word “Sidon”; but there had once been a travelling merchant at their table when Telemachos was a little boy who assured Penelope from certain metal-marks he knew that this unusual weapon must have been made in Ecbatana. Of this sword Telemachos now possessed himself; nor did he fail to note with a thrill of more natural and simple pride than he had allowed himself to feel for years — well! anyway since the death of his mother — how firmly and strongly and yet how lightly and easily, he found himself able to wield it.

Without looking at Zeuks, for he kept his eyes on his father with a quaint deprecatory half-smile, he managed somehow to convey to the humorous kidnapper of the divine horses that with two such broad-shouldered men as they were to guard that throne-room neither of the old king’s lady-guests, however attractive, was in any danger of violence to her chastity.

Pontopereia, however, in place of catching such whimsical thoughts from her host's son, fixed her beautiful eyes upon Zeuks who, although he had screwed his head round against the back of his chair in the hope of being able to follow the movements of Tis in the Corridor, was quite capable of giving her a wink.

Nor was the daughter of Teiresias unaware of all it meant just at that moment to get a wink from "Zeuks of Cuckoo-Hill", as the king's mother would certainly have called him, although in reality Cuckoo-Hill never came down as near to the actual harbour as was the man's dwelling.

But Zeuks' wink said all that was necessary between them at that particular beat of the pulse of time. It said quite unmistakably: "O no! I know you've not forgotten about the pirates strapping us to our chairs and chopping us to bits. And I know you've not forgotten the great word prokleesis."

But Zeuks and Pontopereia were not the only man and woman whose difference of sex was a cause of vivid feeling at that moment. Into the wine-fragrant air about her Okyrhöe was projecting all the seduction she could. In fact she was playing the unmitigated harlot at the expense of the old king. She had not missed his attraction to her specially rounded breasts; and thus, as she kept asking him certain simple and direct questions, questions which she selected for the absence from them of what couldn't be answered without an effort of thought — questions such as: "What was one of your earliest recollections, great King?" — she took care, in lifting her wine-glass to her lips, to reveal ever so little more of the rondure of one of these same breasts, whose perfect orb, culminating in a nipple as rosy as the wine at her lips, was never wholly revealed or wholly concealed, but was always, like the tip of a coral flagstaff in the heart of a milky isle, being partially glimpsed, to the most exquisite titillation of the old hero's amorous proclivities.

Telemachos meanwhile, with that remarkable sword in his hand from the collection of his maternal ancestor, continued to lean all his weight upon this rare weapon's gold-chased handle while he kept his attention absorbed in the effort to get its point firmly lodged in a convenient crack between two flag-stones. Pontopereia, having, so to say, settled her ethical account with Zeuks by a mental obeisance before the word prokleesis in exchange for a wink of recognition that if philosophy didn't bring the sexes together it wasn't of much use to mankind, had suddenly grown aware that by tilting herself a bit to one side and, though her chair was too heavy to be moved, by resting her weight on her left buttock, she could glimpse quite clearly at the end of the Corridor of Pillars the broad back of the spell-bound Tis.

"What on earth is the fellow staring at?" she asked herself. "Is someone lying dead at his feet? Has he killed some intruder — the first of Zeuks' pirates to enter the palace?"

Tis was undoubtedly — she could divine that much from the general pose of his figure — a trifle scared as well as intensely interested and arrested; and Pontopereia, herself stiff with nervous excitement, breathed quickly as she watched him. While all this was going on, little old Eurycleia, who, under all her weight of years, moved as lightly as Atropos, the oldest, smallest, but most to be feared and most to be relied upon of all the Fates, was now leaning against the door-post of the interior entrance to the dining-hall. Her expression as she leant there was one of concern but it was not an expression of alarm. Nor was it an expression of tremulous or jumpy nerves.

What her face showed was pure and simple annoyance. The old nurse felt indignant. Indeed you might say she felt extremely angry. For two, if not for three generations she had been compelled to behold her own peculiar and special world crumble down. She did not see it fall with a crash. She saw it disintegrate and crumble down. And she saw this happen without being able to lift a finger to stop it. What she was doing now was typical of the whole situation. She was simply standing with her back against the cold stones of the passage wall just as if they, these inanimate fragments of flint and quartz and these bits of chilly marble were arrogantly and in a new kind of contemptuous aristocratic haughtiness cold-shouldering her into an oblivious grave.

All this waiting lasted for a far less space of time than it takes to describe the emotions of the persons who were waiting; and when the waiting ended, the general relief that everybody felt, though great enough, was not as heavenly as it would have been had the thoughts and feelings involved gone on for as long as any chronicler, using those unwieldy hieroglyphs we call "words" to inscribe them, was bound to go on.

Whether it was a real son of Hephaistos who had carved the letters "U" for uios, and "H" for the aspirated vowel at the beginning of the name of the great god of fire, nobody could ever be absolutely sure, but that the Pillar on which those letters were engraved had had breathed into it some sort of sub-human or super-human consciousness was undeniable.

And at this particular veering between serious apprehension and immense relief it was given to the consciousness of the Pillar to note the difference between the attitudes to life and death of the three men in that dining-hall; how Odysseus never gave to either life or death a single thought, pondering only and solely on how best to carry out his immediate purpose, how Telemachos, although temperamentally longing to be quit of the whole business, kept forcing himself to retain, with regard to the meaning of life, and with regard to the question whether there was any life for the individual soul after its body was dead, a position of rigid agnosticism; and finally how Zeuks with his motto of Prokleesis or "defiance" and his practice of Terpsis or "enjoyment" held strongly to the annihilation of the soul with the death of the body.

Shamelessly chuckling, as he had seldom dared to do in the presence of Odysseus, and never before had done in the presence of lady-visitors to the palace, Tis came back into the dining-hall from the Corridor, and at the sight of him the whole company except Odysseus and Okyrhöe moved forward to learn what had caused that resounding crash. There was now no physical barrier between the king on his throne with his wine-cup in his hand and the low arch at the end of the Corridor of Pillars that led out into the olive-garden, out into the grave-yard of the slaves, and out into the darkness of night.

"It were thee wone club what fell, my King," explained Tis, as having mounted the two marble steps that led into the hall he advanced towards the foot of the throne; "and it did strike me silly old mind, as I did see the waves of darkness pouring in at far end, and these here lights of banquet pouring out at near end, that if us were all lying in the dirt, man-deep, under they olive-stumps outside thik arch, 'stead of meat-dazed and urine-dizzened inside these here luscious walls, that what made the old club fall was fear of summat happening to all on us when this night's over and we get the people's word at the 'agora'!

"To say the truth I felt durned funny, my king, just now, when I seed thee's girt club lying face-down on they stones near olive-branch what have come up bold and straight, as you might say, out of floor!"

The first thought of Odysseus, when he heard all this, was the entirely practical and personal one of making sure that his most useful weapon was in its usual place and ready to his hand when needed.

“You propped it up again exactly where it always used to be, I hope — I mean between those bits of white stone in the wall?”

“Sure I did, my King, sure I did! Club do now bide exactly where club always did bide; I reckon about five feet away from that there up-growing olive-shoot.”

And then, when Odysseus had nodded his obvious satisfaction at this statement, and when Telemachos had re-hung the antique sword picked up by his grand-dad upon its nail and resumed his seat, and when the combined voices of Tis and Eurycleia had died away in lively comment upon the club’s fall as the speakers withdrew into the kitchen, it was left to Zeuks to swing the conversation back to the extraordinary expedition which the dead Dryad had originated.

“I’ve heard from some quarter,” he told them all, “that the hundred-armed Monsters, Briareos, Kottos, and Gyes are now swimming about in the sunken cities of Atlantis, feeding upon the innumerable corpses of their drowned populations; and, do you know, the idea has crossed my mind that what the dead Dryad really hoped to bring about was that Typhon should join them down there. But how a fire-breathing creature like Typhon could live under water like those Monsters is as much beyond my comprehension as — —”

“As many other things, Master Zeuks!” murmured Okyrhöe with her silvery laugh. And it was during the general amusement that followed this sally that the Fly, having rejoined the Moth in their usual retreat, which was now safely propped up again, implored his lovely friend to listen intently. “For,” said he, “the Pillar is now telling the club what is happening down there.”

“You mean down in Atlantis?” enquired the Moth.

“Certainly I do,” replied the Fly. “For you mustn’t be so absurdly man-loving as to think that because the human population of a continent is drowned with that continent, nothing interesting can go on down there any more. There are the fish, my pretty one, there are the fish. Do try to realize that life doesn’t end, Pyraust darling, when the human race ends. There are philosophers in the world — I won’t at this moment emphasize their names or their species — who hold the view that it will only be when the tribes of mortal men are sunk into complete oblivion that the real drama of the Cosmos will properly begin.”

“But,” whispered the Moth anxiously, “and forgive my stupidity if this is a silly question, what I cannot see is how this drama of the future will be recorded if there’s nobody to record it.”

“Unrecorded things are as important as recorded things,” said the Fly.

“But who hears of them?” commented the Moth sadly.

CHAPTER VIII

"How many are they?"

"How many of what, my beautiful one? Are you speaking of sea-gulls or crows?"

"People of course!" answered the Moth irritably. "Did you think I meant flies?"

"You'd have to count me out if you did," replied her friend grimly. "For I don't, and I believe it is a peculiarity shared by most of my species, at any rate those of the male sex, at all like being included in any plural category. Yes, indeed, my lovely one, I believe you'll find, as your experience thickens and your years increase, that you'll seldom meet a male who isn't at heart, though under various circumstances he may not appear so, an ingrained individualist. When I was younger I used to flirt with the wanton notion that to be really ourselves we had to move about in circles. I also played with the spiritual thought, as I understand they call it, that only when there are two or three of us the wind can be cozened and coaxed and cajoled to carry us to particular places, to certain river-banks, for instance, and to certain ponds full of special sorts of rushes, where we can find those extra delicate morsels of refreshment which our exacting senses crave.

"But after all the horrors I've seen, and after all the dangers from which I've been saved only by my constant and obsequious flattery of the goddess of Chance, I have learnt the supreme lesson of my life, that there is only one thing upon which a Fly can depend, namely himself."

"Do look what a lot of people there are! There must be more than a thousand! A thousand warriors who are skilled with the spear, not counting women and children!”

It was clear to the fly that his emotional friend was so hopelessly impressed by the number of the listeners that no appeal to reason was possible. So, giving it up, he confined himself to gazing out of the club’s “life-crack” at that awe-inspired mass of islanders and to endeavouring to follow the words of the orator. This shepherd of the people was none other than Nisos’ Father, Krateros Naubolides, who, mounted on an extremely old-fashioned and extremely shaky platform that had been erected by democratic settlers in Ithaca some sixty odd years ago, with the glittering marble Temple of Athene to its West and the deep blue water of the bay to its East, was explaining in a rough homely directness of speech, whose lack of intellectual subtlety and manifest honesty of feeling made his argument formidable, how bad for them it would be to use up all their precious sail-cloth, this divine “othonia” that took such expense to grow, such trouble to weave, and such art to prepare, for the ill-advised and indeed the absolutely crazy purpose of seeing off their aged and infirm king, in times when all experienced rulers were needed at home, on a wild fantastic voyage of his own eccentric fancy.

“It is our King’s actual presence,” Krateros bluntly and crudely shouted, “that we need at this juncture of our Island’s life, not some fabulous glory from a mad adventure undertaken in a demented old warrior’s last days!”

It was clear to the attentive fly that these rough and rude words uttered by a farmer, whose local breed was a good deal more purely local and insular than was that of Odysseus, was making a deep impression upon those among the islanders, both men and women, who were near enough to hear him; for they kept turning their heads to look at one another, and a considerable number of them actually clashed their brazen-pointed spears together in more than ordinary agreement.

Indeed the speaker himself, as the fly could catch in the tone of his voice, took it to be an indication that they were prepared, if this doting old hero went on insisting on his mad scheme, to rise in arms and dethrone both him and his philosophy-besotted son in favour of the more sensible if more insular stock of the House of Naubolides itself.

It was evident to Pontopereia that Odysseus was watching the assembly with inexhaustible attention, and was making, the girl decided, some special calculation with regard, not only to numbers and weapons, but to the quality and significance of the various farming families who were gathered here today, even if some were only represented by a male spearman whose relatives were all on the mainland. He had not dared to change the place of meeting and the girl could clearly see what were the chief impediments to this sort of democratic assembly in an "agora" that was at once old-fashioned in an unseemly, ramshackle, slovenly way, and modernistic in a cold, remote, indifferent way. For one thing, she noticed that however forcibly Odysseus had just now pressed his demand upon them for contributions of sail-cloth as if he were exacting the payment of tribute, it was only those quite near who could catch what he meant because of the purer language he used.

She noticed too that although Krateros Naubolides made himself heard, the agitation he created by the rough boldness of his rejection of the old king's claim was so great that little groups of men from nearby positions kept hurrying to further-off vantage-grounds where they would ardently enlarge on what had been said.

No sooner had the Father of our young friend Nisos Naubolides swung himself down from the platform of his Ithacan "agora", an erection that was really much too high to be a suitable speaking-place, than there ensued a rushing to and fro that made of the whole assembly a confusing if not a confounding hubbub of human bodies and human voices.

When “Government by Discussion”, as you might call the flexible and casual manner in which the Ithacan natives had settled their affairs half a century ago, was working well, the population of the island was much smaller, and the half-circle of stone-seats for listeners had a much less extended circumference.

The result of this increase in numbers was that many of the most eloquent speakers took care to avoid the grotesquely elevated wooden erection on the speaking-rock and made their speeches from the ground, which meant that they often had to stand a good deal too near their antagonists, who frequently were a closely-packed crowd of angry and excited spearmen.

There had been no political meeting in this Ithacan “agora” for several years, nor had it been observed by any official person, or indeed by anybody, official or otherwise, before this meeting began that a couple of rungs in the wooden steps ascending the speaking-rock were missing. This gap in the ascent to the platform of oratory had been treated as negligible by Krateros. The old King too in his introductory talk, where he had briefly and succinctly suggested the possibility of every householder on the Island delivering a certain quantity of “othonia”, had totally disregarded the shaky rostrum.

On this particular occasion it was before the handsome Father of our friend Nisos had reached the middle of his blunt and rude speech that the bulk of those who were listening to him became aware of the presence of the Priest of the Orphic Mysteries among the elders who stood at the foot of that dilapidated old-fashioned wooden erection on the summit of the speaking-rock.

The moment he was caught sight of, especially by the women, who were freely sprinkled among the men throughout the whole assembly, it was clear to the shrewd weather-eye of the watchful Odysseus that there was a palpable quickening of pulses. These manifestations of feeling in crowds are very queer phenomena. But of course this man possessed psychic powers of an unusually rare kind and he was insatiable in his quest for human converts of every age up and down the island; and, while a bogey-man to some, he was a redeeming angel to others.

Thus there now appeared over that whole assembly of men and women something resembling a many-coloured wind-blown ripple moving rapidly over a wide expanse of water, a ripple that was grey when it reached our horizon but had been a deep blue-green when it left the shore.

Had Nisos Naubolides arrived at the "agora" just then, he would have plunged at once into a veritable vortex of bewildering psychic problems, the chief of which would have been the extremely complicated question as to just what constituted an important enough crisis in the general stream of events, whether a waterfall, a cataract, a tributary, a marsh, a lake, or a "delta" of several river-estuaries, to justify an interference in the situation by the little old lady he had known as Atropos, and by what subtle understandings of the forces of earth and air and water and fire messages were duly despatched to the said little old lady, so that she could draw certain hints indicating in detail the issues involved and not failing to make clear at what exact point, if care was not taken, the wanton Goddess of pure Chance, whose name is Tyche, might snatch the occasion out of wiser hands.

But queerly enough it was neither blind Chance nor the oldest of the Fates who was now the disturber of the normal stream of natural events — this stream that flowed and eddied and circled and delayed and hastened across that old "agora". It was none other than the young girl, Pontopereia.

It was some while before Enorches fully realized that his most formidable opponent at this crucial pause in events was the awkward and ungainly damsel who was now shuffling so absent-mindedly up and down between Odysseus, who was leaning on his club, and Okyrhöe, who had accompanied them to this confused scene for some mysterious purpose of her own. As she shuffled back and forth in this odd manner Pontopereia couldn't help noticing a great many things that she had no wish to notice.

This business of "noticing" was the very last thing she wanted to be engaged in at that particular juncture. Her entire purpose as she shuffled to and fro was indeed the extreme opposite of noticing anything. What she desired just then was to make her mind as near a blank as she possibly could so as to offer it as a pure, clean, unfurnished sanctuary, of which, free from every distraction, encumbrance, or rival, her father's prophetic spirit might take complete possession.

But so astonishing were the forms and colours forced upon her senses by the spectacle before her that she struggled in vain to defend her attention from them. The sun just then was in mid-sky and was blazing down with such tremendous noon-day glare upon land and sea that it was difficult for her not to feel that she must yield up her whole being to the dazzling white opacity of Athene's Temple on the one hand, and to the dazzling blue opacity of the gleaming salt water on the other.

She had never seen bluer salt water in all her life. It seemed at one moment to lift her up to a yet bluer sky-zenith in the air above, and at another moment, just as if it were some vast, hard, smooth, magnetic precious stone, to draw her down to a petrifying abyss of demonic blueness in some enchanting but dangerous dimension of existence below Tartaros itself.

It was indeed, though nobody but herself knew it, a real crisis in the life of the daughter of Teiresias, this appearance of hers before the Ithacan assembly of which Odysseus made so much. Her real antagonist in the whole thing was not the father of her new friend Nisos but the Priest of the Mysteries who was even now preparing to take a terrific advantage of the old King's calm and unruffled assurance.

"How absolutely alone," she said to herself, "we all are! That old hero with his projecting chin and his sharp beard sticking out from it like the horn of a fabulous beast, what is he thinking and feeling now? I shall never know. Nobody will ever know. And that red and green gnat over there, sunning itself on that half-budded greenish-yellow willow-leaf, I would bet anything it is now, at this very moment of time, wondering whether its fate is destined to come by the violence of another insect not much bigger than itself, or by the sudden downfall of a rotten branch dislodged by a gust of wind, or by being snapped up between the upper half and the lower half of the beak of a bird.

"And has it perhaps just decided," the girl thought, "that it would be pleasanter to be trampled out of existence while it was asleep under a leaf than to perish in the disgustingly foul air of the crop of a feathery glutton? It's gone anyway; and wherever it's gone it's just as absolutely alone, in a multitudinous world without end in any direction, as I am, or as this old king is, or as Mummy Okyrhöe is, or any one of these men waving their spears and whispering to their wives and to the wives of their friends! Alone, alone, alone!

"And the same applies," thought Pontopereia, "to whatever grub that little hole contains!" And she struck with the side of her sandal a decaying fragment of tree-root that was half-covered by dark-green moss but had blotches of grey lichen on it here and there, and it was between two of these grey patches that the daughter of Teiresias detected a small orifice that was obviously the entrance to the dwelling of some grub-like creature.

"Are you at home, master?" she muttered; and then, digging her heel into the rubble beside that piece of decayed wood, she swung her whole body round, smiling to herself with a muttered exclamation. "Why," she told herself, "I am doing just what I said a minute ago I mustn't do! I'm noticing things! Only these things aren't exactly what I meant. I meant marble roofs and dazzling waves! But I must, I must get into the right mood for father's spirit!"

She straightened herself, clasped her hands behind her, stared at her sandals, and tried to imagine she was walking upon empty air. "If I can't make my mind a blank," she said to herself, "I must anyway get myself into the mood of being angry with this confounded Krateros who wants to make a fool of the old king by not letting him sail. I know exactly what the old man feels. He doesn't want to slide into an ordinary, conventional, tiresome, commonplace old age. I can follow that like a map!

"Heaven and earth! If I had a chance to sail in a ship over the drowned cities of Atlantis, wouldn't I snatch at it!"

She shuffled on, after that, with her head bent, repeating the word "Atlantis" over and over again. What she obscurely felt in her deepest consciousness was that, since this word contained the concentrated desire of the old hero who had appealed to her for aid at this crisis of his life, the best way of emptying her mind so as to make it a medium for the spirit of the dead prophet was to dissolve this actual word into a sacred mist, or even, and her eyes grew larger when she thought of this, into a sort of nectar such as would help to banish every emotion from her mind save the will to prophesy.

"Atlantis! Atlantis." Atlantis! And from the lovely head balanced on the ungainly little body, all the whole teeming mass of that portentous gathering, with its hosts of sullen-sultry spearmen and its agitated mothers and excited children in their blood-bright gaily-coloured clothes, and beneath them those blue waters that drew her down, and above them those white walls that lifted her up, were wholly and absolutely banished.

And it was at that very moment, for at such times strange vibrations can pass between the oldest and the youngest among us, that Odysseus beckoned Pontopereia to his side.

Leaning with his right hand on his club, from the crack in whose breast both the moth and the fly were now gazing with absorbed interest at everything within the circuit of their vision, Odysseus told the daughter of Teiresias to use his left hand in place of the broken rung of that rotten ladder; "and make the devils, my brave girl," he muttered, "give me a good pile of sound 'othonia' instead of all this false flattery about 'wise old rulers'."

With this physical help and moral stimulus Pontopereia did manage in spite of her awkward legs and heavy thighs to get to her feet on that absurd wooden erection. But, once mounted there, a tragedy took place that was completely unknown to every consciousness in the whole world except the girl's own, a tragedy the mere existence of which justified up to the hilt what she had been feeling all that morning about the abysmal loneliness of every creature born into what we call "life".

For Pontopereia, as she gazed at those shining spears, and at that blue sea-pavement, that kept drawing her down, and at those white walls that kept lifting her up, was suddenly seized by a fit of appalling shyness. This convulsion of shyness paralysed her mouth as if with a ghost-fish's monstrous fins. It pressed against her throat as if with a bilge-smelling flattened-out whale-bone snout.

And finally it brought the thousand-times despairing ship-wrecked eye of a girl's frustrated life-hope to fix itself upon her! Yes, it brought it closer and closer and closer to the self within the self, to the Pontopereia within Pontopereia, to the living, shrinking soul inside the innermost sheath of her calyx-like identity, so that nothing less than what was all she was should be exposed to this searching, reducing, unsympathetic, sardonic eye, the eye of a shyness that at that moment had gone stark mad.

The poor girl was helpless. What had suddenly come over her could no more be struggled against than she could have regained her right arm if somebody had cut it off. And now quite independently of that fit of grotesque sub-human shyness, as if she had been a sparrow imagining itself a swan, she felt a natural, normal, overpowering human shame. She wanted nothing but to be allowed to hide her head and cry piteously. She could not even remember now, with the tears running down her cheeks and tasting salt on her lips and blotting out her sight, how she managed to slide down from that ridiculous wooden platform. But she did remember how the beard of Odysseus tickled her chin as the old king bent over her and tried to comfort her as she wept on the ground.

It was at that moment that the Priest of the Mysteries, who, like a holy and consecrated wolf, had been waiting for his chance to spring, snatched at his opportunity. And such was the power of this man's demonic personality that although the collapse of Teiresias' daughter had been followed by quite a lot of shouting and rushing hither and thither, accompanied by the angry brandishing of many spears in male hands and much high-pitched expostulation from female throats, the moment it was realized who it was who was now pulling himself up to the top of that shaky erection and using such obstinate determination in treading upon each broken rung and in clinging to each wretched bit of balustrade there was another of those queer gasps of mass-attention where the actual crowd itself seems to create for itself a unified Being with ears and eyes that can take things in, and get shocks of feeling from taking things in, just as ordinary personalities can.

Quite a considerable crowd of these islanders with spears, whose number had so impressed the moth that she had whispered the startling syllables “a thousand”, were close enough to the speech-rock to see what a teasing thing it was to mount that platform. Pontopereia had only managed it by the help of the old king.

It was the complete absence of anything traditional or romantic about that wholly silly erection that took the heart out of its ascent and may even have been the cause of the girl’s collapse when she had ascended it. One of the prices that had to be paid for the Trojan War by the Island of Ithaca was that there was neither time nor money to obliterate the finger-prints of the flagrant bad taste left by the rich citizens of that particular epoch.

It was lucky that most of the work of that bad time was not done in materials that by their own nature were especially lasting. It should also be noted that since then, the general taste of the islanders had improved so much that had any of the younger men, even the eldest son of Krateros Naubolides for instance, been called upon to speak they would have certainly spoken from among the old traditional stone-seats and not approached that fatal erection of ill-chosen wood. It was just because these preposterous platforms had already become laughing-stocks, that, when the Priest of the Mysteries in his struggle to ascend was observed to be hanging by one arm from the balustrade with his “chlaines”, or professional philosophic cloak, flapping in the wind about his rump, till the wood-work broke and deposited him on his back on the ground, quite a number of the men in the crowd gave a vent to a rude burst of laughter.

The sound of this must have reached the priest's ears for he leapt to his feet in one of his fits of blind rage, fits that always endowed him with superhuman strength and were therefore an advantage to him rather than anything else. At this moment what he did was to seize the actual main floor of the platform with both his hands and to shake it for a while, as if he were a besotted giant capable of shaking a king's palace to dust and ashes.

Then with one grand shattering, heaving spasm what he did was to bring the whole erection crashing to the ground in pieces. This done the astonishing man completely regained his self-control, in fact more than his self-control, for he became a supernaturally competent commander with all the resources of an exceptionally brilliant orator at the absolute disposal of a perfect strategist.

He coolly kicked aside the relics of the dilapidated platform he had demolished, and advancing to the front of the marble eminence on which the thing had been erected, he made just the right gesture and uttered just the right appeal to the crowd to command total attention. Indeed he did much more: for he allowed no second to pass, no pulse-beat to intervene, between this beginning of things and the torrential flow of burning words that followed it.

"Let no wind," he cried, "O people of sacred Ithaca, fill any ship's sail that leaves your consecrated coasts! Keep this feeble, doting, maudlin, crazy, despotic, degenerate old man on his throne till old age makes him drop from it like a rotten apple and drop straight into his grave! Meanwhile let him stay where he is! Let him keep the throne warm for your brave Krateros who is a strong, sensible, natural man like any other man, and all the better for not being an herald-trumpeted, bard-celebrated, minstrel-sung, lick-spittle old legend-maker who doesn’t think his cup of glory is full enough in just being accepted by you islanders as your king, doesn’t in fact think that to be king at all over a crew of miserly farmers and poor fishermen, such as he considers you to be, is worthy of a deathless, immortal hero, like himself!

“What he wants to do by this mad voyage of his over the drowned cities of Atlantis is to win for himself a name beyond that of any of our famous men, a name beyond the name of Agamemnon, beyond the name of Achilles, beyond the name of Diomed, and of course far beyond the names of any of your most glorious Trojan enemies, such as Priam or Hector or Aeneas or Paris!

“O my friends, my friends, it is only yesterday we all heard, through the mediumship of earth and air and fire and water of the drowning of Atlantis. These murderous gods always like their news to reach us drop by drop, as it suits their god-almightynesses’ cunning craftiness, and not for our interest really at all! But there’s one little, obvious, simple, human interpretation of their trick of revealing their own murderous behaviour in connection with these hints from earth and air and water and fire that may not yet have occurred to you — I mean the double-dyed craftiness of suggesting that what they have done purely and solely to protect themselves was done in the interest of a faithful steering of human history, as it takes place on this old earth, and in the interest of progress on this old earth, or anywhere else in space.

“And now I would like to say something to you about this drowning of Atlantis of which we hear so much. I would like at this moment, my dear friends, humbly, patiently, submissively, and with all due respect where respect is due, to suggest to you that these curst Olympian rulers of ours recently made a great discovery. They discovered, never mind how, perhaps through earth or air or water or fire, or perhaps through some treacherous group of Atlanteans themselves, for there are traitors in every country, that some great Atlantean philosopher, who may now at this moment, for all we know, be wandering over the earth under a completely different name, anyway my suggestion is that somehow or other they found out that an Atlantic philosopher had got the secret of some new magnetic stone that can influence unborn embryos and that is probably called the 'Embryo Stone', and whose power — I am only humbly suggesting this to you, though, I confess, in my own philosophical researches I have discovered some very peculiar and very powerful magnetic stones that can change the sex of an embryo.

"The Atlantean philosopher's stone may have the power of making the embryo bi-sexual. In which case, as you can well imagine, you warriors of Ithaca, the influence, the renown, the glory and the power of this Sage of Atlantis, not to mention his wealth, would be very great indeed! And naturally enough the high Olympians would hate him. They have always been extremely touchy and sensitive on such points; as they may well be! For doesn't their authority with all of us ordinary mortals largely depend on their power over birth, and over the various issues of birth? — yes! extremely touchy they have always been about this whole problem of birth and sex; and if I may whisper this in your ears, you brave men and beautiful women of Ithaca, it is by the cunning trick of keeping sex, and birth, the issue of sex, completely under their control, that these Olympian gods retain their power over us.

"But they can be defied now and again for all that; and very successfully defied. You have only to visit the "Herm" of the great Goddess Themis, within a mile of where we are now, and as you can believe from my devotion to Eros and Dionysos I'm no fanatic champion of propriety and decency, to see the havoc done to her image by the hands of the chaotic Harpies; and yet upon the traditional order maintained by Themis the basic rule of these Olympians is declared by their champions to depend.

"Whereas I say it depends only on two things — on the Thunder-bolts of Zeus and on the plagues sent by the Queen of Heaven. O my friends! if you would listen to me and boldly defy all these false gods; if you would turn to the only deities and divinities in the whole pantheon of godlike creatures who really have the power of giving us new life — not just murdering us with thunder-bolts and with plagues and famines — but transporting us by mystic ecstasies and paradisic trances into Dimensions of Being, where what here we are deluded into calling reality is seen in its true light, and where nothing, I say again to you, my friends, where nothing is the secret of all the Mysteries beneath and above the Sun and the Moon, beneath and above the divine ether, except the mind that half-creates what it enjoys, except the mind that half-annihilates what it cannot enjoy!"

When Enorches had finished speaking he showed in the presence of that enormous crowd and in the presence, and before the steady eyes and pointed beard, of the unalterable old king, the same perfectly cool brain and perfectly poised intelligence that he had shown when he began speaking.

But neither the old king, who now held the awkward form of the daughter of Teiresias firmly by the waist while he slowly and indifferently swung the club of Herakles to and fro with his free hand, nor the agitated crowd of spear-waving men and excited women had time to note this serenity in their orator, for the attention of every person in that oldest portion of the "agora", including king and crowd and prophet's daughter, was suddenly and startlingly switched to a completely new occurrence.

This abrupt jerk to the particular set of nerves in them all that responded to dramatic events included in its field of operations, as may be easily supposed, both the moth and the fly who just then were peering out of the life-crack of the club of Herakles with concentrated interest. It also included the club itself who in following the rush of events at this particular crisis had the advantage of its vibratory contact with the Sixth Pillar in the Corridor of Pillars. This contact, based on a long series of experiences so homely and natural that they might almost be called domestic, was in its way as much of a philosophical discovery as any conceivable one made by the Atlantean sage, and neither the moth, whose silky wings quivered with the agitation of its emotion, nor the fly, whose great black head bulged with the intensity of its rumination, could do more than quietly accept such a verdict when they heard the club murmur aloud to itself what it had just caught from the massive Being that bore the signature of a son of Hephaistos, namely the words: “Hear therefore what the sage saith, “When the messenger flies or gallops, or drives, or runs, hope nothing, fear nothing, expect nothing, talk of nothing, till he’s standing on the ground at your gate.”

This messenger was indeed running at a speed that made some of the women who watched him fear he would fall dead the moment he delivered his message. And what was his message? This question, which was pulsing and heart-beating in that whole vast mass of people, did not disturb Odysseus in the slightest degree.

His plan of using the Prophet’s daughter as a shaft of irresistible power resembling the shaft that originally separated the Heavens from the Earth had completely failed. Well! That had failed. That was over and done with. That was finished, closed, shut, settled, rounded off; but in its frustration, in its defeat, in its absolute overness, it left the great battlefield of creation and destruction open for something fresh from the root up!

Yes! the field was free for something that had not so far crossed the mind of any living creature, whether that creature were a god or a man or a beast or a bird or a fish or a reptile or a worm or an insect! Yes, the greatest gift the Earth had given to Odysseus at his birth was his power of accepting a crushing disaster and of starting freshly again, as the phrase runs, "from scratch".

Another great gift from the universal mother of men, who by many among us is called Nature rather than the Earth, of which this old hero was possessed, was the power of detaching himself from the agitations, confusions, emotions, desperations, terrors and exultations that might be absorbing and upsetting his immediate companions and not only of keeping his own spirit in the midst of the craziest hurly-burly and hullabaloo absolutely calm and unmoved, but of being capable under these conditions of so isolating his mind that he could go on coolly planning for the future, and calmly pondering on the future, and amusing himself by imagining what he would like best to happen in the future, with as much serenity as if he'd had nothing but lonely forests and untraversed seas around him for hundreds and hundreds of miles.

It had become clear to everybody now that behind the man who was running so fast, and who now was near enough to be recognizable as no other than our young friend Nisos, there was another man, quite different in appearance, attired in a manner wholly foreign to Ithaca and even to the main-land of Hellas, who clearly was finding it difficult to keep up with the younger man. Suddenly this first runner— "And it is Nisos!" thought Pontopereia, unable to stop herself from squeezing the king's arm in her excitement, "and he's coming straight to us!" — turned, saw how far off the other was, and stood still, so as to be overtaken.

It was indeed one of those curious occasions when the innate natures of the spectators at an important event reveal themselves to themselves, if not to anyone else, with what sometimes are quite surprising results.

“Can you see Enorches any longer?” enquired the moth of the fly. “I feel so dreadfully sure that the dear man may be wanting someone like me to make him happy about his beautiful speech and tell him how rich and clear his noble voice sounded.”

“May the Great Hornet sting your confounded Enorches!” responded the fly crossly. “Why can’t you, you little priest worshipper, look at the drama of life from a scientific distance?”

There was something so infinitely unpleasant to the moth, and so blighting and bleaching and blistering and blasting to her whole life-instinct, about this appalling “scientific distance” to which the fly was alluding, that she found it hard to be even polite to him.

“Well, my pretty?” he went on teasingly, for the difference of sex between them put her seriousness into one ballot-box and his into another, “why don’t you answer my plain question about a rational view of life taken from an astronomical scientific distance?”

This was too much for the moth, and she lost every silken flake of her natural sweet and obedient temper. “Why,” she screamed at him, “don’t I look at life from the view-point of the furthest star in the firmament? I’ll tell you why! I’ll tell you why! I’ll tell you why! Because I happen to be a Living Being on the Earth!”

The Fly sighed heavily. “How impossible it is,” he thought, “to exchange rational ideas with a female! And yet they are clever. It would be absurd to deny it. They are extremely clever. They may even be called wise. But their wisdom follows a completely different track from our wisdom. It skips about from point to point, matching things. We look at life as a whole.”

“You know exactly where the world comes to an end then?” shrieked the moth, making the fly feel as though she had read his thoughts. “What if it has trailing edges that lead to completely different ends? What if there’s a jumping-off place, from which a person can leap into another world altogether?”

“Listen, pretty fool!” protested the Fly sternly: and once more there came to their ears the voice of the Sixth Pillar conversing gravely with the club of Herakles; on whose head Odysseus was leaning rather heavily at that moment as he watched Nisos approach with that fantastically attired foreigner.

“The Sage avers that if the difference between one man and another with regard to their bodies is so great that it passeth understanding, considering that all have a head and a neck and shoulders and trunk and arms and legs and hands and feet and eyes and ears, the difference between them in regard to their minds is so great that it bars any approach to an attempt to understand it.”

“You heard that, sweetheart?” commented the Fly with satisfaction. “And if we can say as much as that about the difference in body and mind between creatures of the same species, what about the difference when you consider varieties of species? I tell you, little one, there’s no more good in my hoping that out of the various tribes of Flies one will arise destined to conquer the world than in these people here thinking that some Hellenic or Achaian or Bœotian tribe will conquer the world. I tell you, darling little idiot, no species and no portion of a species will ever conquer the world. It’s one of the tricks of Nature to put such ideas into people’s heads so as to make great wars arise between race and race and between species and species. Such wars between one swarm and another swarm are deliberately worked up by Nature so as to thin out earth’s population. Will you never learn, you lovely little goose-girl, that if a moth of your tribe wants her folks to rule the world there is only one thing for her to do?"

"And what may that be?" responded the moth in a voice so faint with sarcasm that it was hardly audible.

"Tell yourself a story about it happening," said the fly, "and die before you get to the last chapter."

"I sometimes think," whispered the moth, "that that's what I've done."

When Nisos and his oddly-attired companion reached Odysseus, Pontopereia took care to move aside and to be as inconspicuous a figure in that crowded landscape as was possible for a girl with her strikingly beautiful and intellectual face. Hardly conscious of what she was doing, however, when Nisos did begin to speak she kept on moving nearer and nearer to the old king; but since her reputed mother or at any rate her official guardian, Okyrhöe, also moved nearer, her interest must have seemed to Nisos entirely natural.

One thing about this new encounter of these two young people certainly showed the daughter of Teiresias in a dignified and admirable light, namely the fact that in her excited interest in what Nisos was telling the old King she forgot completely the shame and humiliation she had herself suffered so short a time before. In fact she forgot, as apparently Odysseus himself had forgotten, what a central dramatic part in turning the tide of popular feeling she had been brought there to play. And now it was all over and done with, as utterly as was the life of the old Dryad and her tree, both of them reduced to dust and ashes.

"It was when I had only just left the Cave of the Naiads that I first saw it." And here Nisos made a rather formal and yet quite a dramatic pause; and Pontopereia couldn't help noticing that the presence of the ornately-dressed, portentous-looking stranger who so punctiliously kept one of his brocaded knees on the ground while he watched the face of Odysseus with obsequious impassivity, did have the effect of stiffening just a little the unconventional naturalness of speech which the direct frankness of their master usually evoked in those who were closest to him.

And the girl also noticed that the spontaneous island-schoolboy attitude to all the fantastic ceremonials and the symbolic rituals of Persians, Libyans, Phoenicians, Babylonians and Assyrians, which she had marked in most Achaian and Hellenic lads, an attitude partly humorous, and partly fascinated and even a little awed, had resulted in this case in the way in which, though he did not kneel, Nisos stood respectfully before the king with his head bare and his hands clasped behind his back.

"I knew at once," the boy went on, "that it was a foreign boat. I knew that by its build and by its curious-looking sail. I knew also that it couldn't have come from very far away, for it was too small to have crossed such a formidable mass of water as that great Western Ocean in which we are told the gods have drowned the land of Atlantis. Well, O King, I climbed down to the sea's edge so as to direct them, by waving and shouting, to the estuary where they could lower their sail, fasten up their vessel, and land on our shore. It took a long time to do this for them. I had to scramble over a lot of steep rocks, didn't I, Euanthos?" And Pontopereia noticed that, instead of turning and giving a responsive smile to the speaker, this palatial individual, with one knee still on the gravelly ground and his submissively reverential gaze still fixed on the king, who by this time was crouching like a somnolent steersman on a rough lichen-covered ledge with the club between his knees, replied to the lad's appeal by making a solemn little bow, a bow which, in the relative position to which chance had brought them, might have been directed to the four staring eyes of the pair of fascinated insects.

"But when they were safely landed — when you were landed, Euanthos!" and Pontopereia, not to mention Okyrhöe, who kept edging nearer and nearer, noted a repetition of the same quaint performance— "I soon heard the great news. Thou, O King," — and it was clear to both those observant ladies that this boy-messenger completely misread the relaxed attitude of the old hero he was addressing, taking his drowsy abstraction as a sign of nonchalant indifference, when all the while it was really an instinctive animal withdrawal into cover, under the mask of which the wily old warrior watched the course of events, noting with shrewd precision the particular direction in which, under the pressure of numberless conflicting entities, the tide of destiny was moving.

"Thou, O King, art about to be visited by a famous royal Princess from the land of the Phaiakians whose parents and brothers enabled you to sail for home in a ship full of rich gifts."

"And what, my young friend," enquired Odysseus, throwing into his tone, the two ladies decided, a deliberate weariness and tedium, "do those of her court who are with her say is the name by which she is known to her own people and by which she wishes to be known to those other lands whither her ship carries her; for among all men who live by bread there are none to whom their parents do not give names, whether they be rich or poor, slaves or free, tillers of the earth, or wielders of royal sceptres."

"The name," cried Nisos, in a high-pitched excited voice, "of this visitor to the shores of Ithaca is none other than Nausikaa, the daughter of Arete who was the daughter of Rhexenor, and of Alkinoos who was the son of Nausithoos."

Neither Okyrhöe nor Pontopereia missed the rather startling swallowing sound, as if he had been munching a too big mouthful of bread and having retained it till it was in an almost liquid form in his mouth had sucked it down in one terrific gulp, which the old man emitted as the word “Nausikaa” reached his ears.

But Nisos had a still greater shock in store for his king. “From a couch of purple at the bottom of their boat,” he went on, “they helped to land the most noble figure of a man I have ever seen or could ever imagine. His hair was white with age and his shoulders were extremely bent, but the grandeur of his features and the beauty of his form, even in old age, were more like those of a god than of a human creature. I looked at him with awe and reverence, O king, and still more was I reduced to wordless amazement when the stately and distinguished Euanthos here” — and once again the two ladies were fascinated to watch this perfect courtier on his bended knee make that same masquerade-like inclination of his head without turning so much as the point of his beak-like nose in the direction of the person whose flattery he was acknowledging— “and I was impressed, O my King, to notice how superior to any of our modern Hellenic or Argive or Pelasgic or Danaan ways were the — —”

“By Kronos, boy, you don’t mean to say the man at the bottom of the boat was Ajax?”

At the utterance of this name both the ladies gasped audibly, and the elder one, with a shiver that ran clean through her, flung her arms protectively about the younger.

This time it was the turn of Nisos to nod assent while his gaze remained fixed on a different person from the one to whom he was responding. And at the receipt of this assent Odysseus rose from his seat abruptly.

“Ajax again!” he muttered. “It must have been a dream then that I saw him among the dead when the spirit of Achilles questioned me and went off with long strides among the rest in his joy that I could assure him his son had won glory! Ajax again! Well, well, well, well! He had Poseidon as his enemy among the Olympians, even as I have! And it may be that as I found help from Circe and Calypso and Leucothea, so he has found it from some great goddess at the bottom of the Sea! Poseidon must have overturned his ship in no ordinary way; not by just a wave out of the deep: very likely by flinging a mountain upon it, as the grandfather of Nausikaa prophesied the sea-god might do one day over their only good harbourage to stop their giving convoy and ships to the enemies of the Olympians.

"And very likely by doing that very thing Poseidon ruined his own abominable and murderous intention. The great wave, or the great mountain, whichever it was may have had the opposite effect to what was intended. It may have enshrouded Ajax in forests and ferns and mosses and vast leafy chasms and yawning flowery abysses and huge cracks and crevices in the green thick rondure of the earth.

"Well, well, well! So we've got Ajax on our hands again! What twists and turns of fate!— 'Turns' do I say? What enormous, sweeping, astral curves this destiny of ours indulges in! Ajax! Well, well! We must all be as gentle and hospitable to him as we can — eh, ladies, my dears? — eh, Nisos, my lad? And to this purpose" — and at this point the old King swung directly round upon Euanthos, who had risen to his feet and with his hands clasped behind him and his shoulders squared was staring at some particular oblong of nothingness beyond which his preposterous politeness had erected its own private horizon— "to this purpose we are indeed — don't you think so, Ladies? — incredibly lucky to have a real live Herald from the land of the Phaiakians actually here with us in our midst! He will explain to us, primitive islanders and settlers and farmers and fishermen as we are here in Ithaca, to what a stately tradition on the main-land of Hellas our ancestors look back.

“Yes, he will soon find, O my most gallant Hetairoi, that our old Achaian and Danaan ritual of life is as poetical as any he can discover in the most courtly cities of the orient. The first lesson he is destined to receive as to our power to show ourselves worthy of his respect will be the hospitality we shall now show to this noble princess, of whose coming he is the herald, and also the manner in which we shall entertain my ancient friend and once beloved rival, Ajax the son of Telamon!”

Odysseus leant forward as he spoke and as he did so he clasped with both hands the head of his club, pressing it against the pit of his stomach. It may be well believed how, as he did this, out of what the club itself always referred to as its “life-crack” and which was a slit in its gullet reaching as far down as its lungs and containing, as all its friends well knew, a sort of nomadic camp for two adventurous insect-friends of quite different species, there now issued a fine controversy.

Yes, out of the “life-crack” of the club there emerged and dissolved like recurrent waves of smoke into the hot afternoon air quite a bitter dialogue. It is curious how the voices of any living things as they strike air, or earth, or water, or fire, go through a change in their nature the perceiving of which, especially when such sounds happen to be solitary sounds, is a remarkable experience for the human person who perceives it.

Yes, it is when other sounds are absent and when the earth feels as if it were surrounded by an aura possessed of a singularly penetrating fragrance like nothing else in the world, that this change occurs. The sound may have been a cry of wild delight. It may have been a shriek of anger, it may have been a wail of sorrow, it may have been a whistle, a call, an appeal. It matters not what the sound was or what it conveyed. The sound has been changed.

And this change has come about by the thing having drawn out of the element into which it rose or fell, and into which it dispersed itself, something akin to its own nature and yet something that no creature alive could apprehend through its sense of hearing. Into what has it been changed? Into a presence. Yes, there is no doubt or question about that. It has become a presence. What the listener is aware of now is the inexplicable and unaccountable effect upon him of a presence; not a human presence nor a godlike presence nor a titanic presence, and totally different from any conceivable animal presence.

But the point is that the effect of this presence is the etherealizing in some mysterious way of the material element, whatever it may have been, into which the sound has plunged. If into the flames of a bonfire, those flames become the purged and dancing spirits of all the leaves they are devouring! If into the air above the peaks of a mountain, that air becomes a particular region of pure space made of a more rarefied substance than the ordinary air which surrounds the earth.

If into water, that water becomes a pool of such perfect translucence that a consecration of all the places on earth where water springs up seems indicated by its mere existence on this planet.

And finally if into earth, every grain of sand, or atom of rock or speck of mud, or dab of clay, or chip of quartz, or crumb of dung, or grit of granite, or mite of mould, which that sound reaches becomes suddenly possessed by something akin to the mystery of consciousness, though it is not the consciousness of a man or a beast or even of a vegetable.

It was when the voice of Odysseus died away with the sound of the name of the father of Ajax that the moth enquired of the fly: “Why does the King go on so long about Ajax? Isn’t the important person who has arrived not this half-drowned half-witted doting old hero from the Siege of Troy, but this great living Princess Nausikaa from the land of the Phaiakians?”

The philosophical contempt in the voice of the fly cannot be expressed in rational words. “Have you no idea, you funny little perfection of a darling, silly, little girl, as to the way we men take these things? Don’t you see that he’s making all this fuss about Ajax simply to cover up his feelings about Nausikaa? Have you forgotten, little stupid, all we were taught at school about men hiding up their strongest feelings, and about there having been a passionate romance between our King and some great Phaiakian princess? Why, you little ignorant silly, it’s one of the great love-stories of the entire world! Of course he has to make a lot of fuss about this old crazy Ajax! Why, you lovely, delicious, heavenly, little idiot, what on earth are you thinking about? Ajax defying the lightning is a simple proposition.

“There is Ajax. There is the lightning! There is an Ajax in every single living creature on earth and when that creature is in the mood of defying the Great Gods, it may be on behalf of the Little Gods, or it may be in anger on its own account. I tell you, you little silky-soft priest-worshipper, there isn’t a fisherman in all the coasts of Ithaca who hasn’t heard about Ajax and the Lightning. The toughest, roughest, homeliest, rudest fisherman you could find in this whole island has heard of Ajax defying the Lightning.

“I tell you, child, I know what I’m talking about. Being as fond of rotten fish as anybody in the world, I used to go out with certain special boats, whose owners used to start earlier in the morning than the others and weren’t as fussy as the others about cleaning out the bottom of their skiffs. Yes! I swear to you, you unscientific, irrational, unphilosophical, little lovely, I heard the most savage and most primitive of these sailors, yes! the very rudest of them, cry out to some companion: ‘Why, you’re as upset by a storm as Ajax defying the Lightning!’

"But when it comes to our king's meetings with Princess Nausikaa of that land, it's a very different story! Of course he keeps the essence of it to himself. Look at him now! He's as ready to fall into a fit of reverie and fantasia as any youth in his beatified adolescence!"

The words of the wise fly had much truth in them just then; but the whole scene up there, from the place where Odysseus held his Heraklian weapon to the place where excitedly whispering groups were gathered on the furthest outskirts of that island-agora, was so confused and chaotic that it had become difficult to concentrate on any particular member of the heterogeneous crowd that was surging about in agitated waves of bewildered excitement.

As for the priest Enorches, he had become so invisible that he might have sunk into the earth after his tremendous oration.

"And now," cried Odysseus, raising his voice above its accustomed pitch, "the thing for us to do is to go and greet this heroic rival of mine out of my ancient past, thus risen like a ghost to keep my pride in its proper place but also to make it clear to my enemies that it is essential that the people of Ithaca should provide their king with sail-cloth!"

While his words died away in that incredible sunshine he instinctively began leading them down the slope at the foot of which lay his rock-hewn palace.

But Nisos had a further announcement to make. "It was while we were leading Ajax as carefully as we could towards the palace that we met Zeuks, O King, and it was to tell you how Zeuks had taken it on himself to be the guide and interpreter to my Lord Ajax that I ran to meet you. My friend Euanthos here objected very strongly to my leaving our Lord Ajax under the care of Zeuks. It seemed to him that Zeuks was not well-dressed enough, well-mannered enough, distinguished enough, or nearly aristocratic enough, to be able to explain our life in Ithaca to a hero of the ancient tradition and one who possesses the lofty habits of the past and those godlike ways of living and thinking that are now lost to the world.”

Odysseus had inadvertently taken Pontopereia by the arm as he began to descend the hill, and this protective gesture of his had naturally brought Okyrhöe to his other side, that is to his right, where he prodded the ground with his club of Herakles. It was therefore, across the club’s self-styled “life-crack” that the craftiest woman in Hellas murmured her seductive words to the craftiest man in Hellas, and what she said was as nectar to the moth and as gall to the fly.

“All the Achaian world will be waiting with eagerness, my Lord King,” she murmured, “to hear the result of this encounter between you and the Lady Nausikaa. We forget sometimes how quickly news travels in these modern days. It’s the quality of the sails the ships carry, I expect: O, and of course it’s also because there are so many more merchant-sailors nowadays! Merchants are the great news-carriers and scandal-bearers. No doubt they always have been. But we mustn’t forget all these modern improvements in the masts and sails and benches and keels of ships, and even in the sleeping-places below the benches.

“It is wonderful to think of all the improvements we have lived to see of which our fathers never dreamed! Yes, I have followed pretty closely the history of Phaiakia from merchant-sailors’ narratives of what has been going on there, for in the history of any country what you pick up from travelling merchants is always nearer the truth than the speeches of official rulers and their ambassadors.”

“It was at this point that the fly became convinced that if Okyrhöe went on for one single sentence more in this manner Odysseus would revolt against her influence. But the clever woman now made it manifest that she could practise a quite different strategy, and as soon as she began in this clear, definite, and concrete manner, to aim at convincing him, she had the king at her mercy.

"What I have been leading up to," she now remarked in a most emphatic manner, "is this. I have been, as I tell you, O King, following rather carefully the events in Phaiakia; and I have noticed that when Alkinoos died his throne was occupied first by one, and then by another, of the favourite sons of the widowed queen. But both these sons died before their mother — at least that is what my merchant-sailors have told me; though I fully admit they may have had, in each case, their own peculiar business-reasons for lying — and so when finally the mother herself died the only surviving child of Alkinoos was Nausikaa.

"She married twice and both her husbands died childless, a situation that set going various shameful rumours among the people, rumours that Nausikaa poisoned them both with the hope of sailing for Ithaca when they were dead and being wedded to thyself! Of course you will know, O great King, much better than a mere stranger and traveller like myself, how to treat such ignoble tales: but you must at least remember in excuse for such tales that you have, as few heroes ever have, become a legend during your life-time, and since many of us in our youth have read — and have written too, I'll be bound! — passionate love-lyrics about you and this daughter of Alkinoos, it is inevitable that when we hear of you two meeting again all manner of disturbingly romantic thoughts rush into our human-too-human heads!

"From a perfectly practical and sensible point of view the coming to Ithaca of this experienced and beautiful woman was indeed most cleverly planned. She too without any doubt has been collecting news from merchant-ships about Ithaca, just as I have about Phaiakia; and having found out that Penelope has been long dead and that you have never taken a second wife she naturally thinks of marrying you and of having those children by you which she clearly could not have by any other husband. It is a tragic and a touching hope; but I can imagine it proving a good deal of a nuisance and embarrassment to you."

Neither the fly nor the moth as they listened to these words could see the effect upon the king of this treacherous warning, though they couldn't help noticing how the beard of Odysseus kept giving curious little forward jerks. But then the king's beard had for some time clearly been trying to isolate itself from the rest of his appearance. Apparently its desire was to become a sort of advanced Body-guard, which, if it were not propitiated, or, as the school-boy mates of Nisos would say, "sucked up to", its owner would have to treat as an independent personality, or simply to cut it off.

As a matter of fact the old man's imperviousness at this moment had no connection with these ambitions of his beard. It was in accord with his whole character that, while he accepted every material detail of what Okyrhöe suggested, he disregarded, or postponed for later consideration, the lady's psychic interpretation of the same.

What did cross his mind at that moment was a definite regret that owing to his penuriousness, or to his poverty, or to a mixture of them both, he had for years contented himself with getting on without any more effective cook in his excavated cave of a kitchen than the family's ancient Nurse Eurycleia, who though she knew well enough what to prepare for his own meals, and even better how to restrict the appetites of Arsinöe and Leipephile, would lack both the physical strength and the culinary experience to cook for a visitor like the Princess Nausikaa.

"Nisos!"

"I am here, my lord the King!"

"Run down this hill as fast as you ran up just now. Make it as clear as you can to Eurycleia what kind of guests we shall have tonight. Explain to her that Ajax will be as old as I am and probably as fussy about his food. I take it, lad, that if you start now you'll get home before either of them have time to arrive, especially if our friend Zeuks, who's such a babbler, is the one you've left with Ajax. You will have time to get there first, sonny, won't you?"

Nisos didn't look at the sky above the slope on which they had paused nor at the tops of the trees at the foot of the hill. He looked at his own sandals and he looked at his own hands. And then he said: "Yes, I think I can, my King. I'll have a good try at it anyway." And with one quick glance at Pontopereia he set off at top speed.

But while Nisos was running at top speed down the wooded slope between the "agora" and the palace, dodging sharp-edged rocks and thick clumps of impenetrable island-bushes, and squeezing his way between close-growing fir-trees whose lower branches were spiky and dead from lack of sun, and as he ran was being sexually and emotionally almost pulled in half; for his feelings were tugged at in one direction by what might be called the golden cord of Eione's supple limbs and lovely gestures and in another direction by the silver cord of Pontopereia's expressive face, the middle-aged Zeuks was guiding the senile Ajax through the deserted but still haunted region that was called "Arima".

The heraldic master of ceremony from the land of Phaiakia would certainly have described our friend Zeuks as an egregious and unconscionable rogue; but it is certain that as this same Zeuks slowly and carefully — though chuckling very often as he did so over private quips of his own — escorted the old, bent, white-headed Ajax, by the nearest way he could think of, to the rock-hewn House of Odysseus, he had some startling shocks.

The nearest way that was familiar to Zeuks was the unfrequented path through that haunted region that from Time unknown had been, and to Time unknown would always be, called Arima, and which really seemed, now it was deserted by Eurybia and Echidna, almost more ghostly in its loneliness than when those two phantasmagoric Beings disputed in their dreadful dialogue who first, who last, had broken loose from Erebos.

“You are taking me a little, just a little, too fast!” murmured the aged Ajax as they passed the spot where Echidna used to be.

Zeuks stopped at once to give the old man a chance to get his breath and to look round. He himself also looked round; and in doing so he noticed a blaze of golden light not far in front of them. It was a peculiar blaze. It was like nothing that Zeuks had ever seen before. He stared at it in positive amazement. Then suddenly, though entirely without any rational cause, he associated this fiery marvel with the presence of the aged warrior at his side.

Nor was he mistaken. Ajax, though much taller and broader-shouldered than any of the other Greeks in the Trojan war, was now terribly bent. There was indeed something impressively pitiful, even you might say, grotesquely pitiful, about the way his white head — for his hair instead of having become grey like the hair of Odysseus, had become as white as hoar-frost — or rather about the way his bent spine, curved like a great bow, had come to bring down his white head towards his feet, which were now encased, as he stood looking up under his deeply wrinkled and majestically moulded forehead, in massive almost coal-black sandals.

Ajax took longer than his guide in discovering that mysterious blaze of golden flame isolated in this haunted place.

“What in the name of Hermes is that light over there?” gurgled the old man, in a voice the significance of which Zeuks had been trying for the last couple of hours, in fact ever since he had first helped him from the ship to the shore, to catch and understand. It wasn’t that he couldn’t understand the meaning of the old hero’s words. The difficulty was not there. He couldn’t understand the mental and psychological frame of mind, the temper of mood, the drift of feeling, that was giving the very simplest of the groans, cries, sighs, ejaculations, murmurs, whispers, repetitions, interruptions, protestations, that issued from that long, narrow, pointed, friable, brittle-looking jaw whose dominant peculiarity was its extreme sensitiveness to emotion, whether that emotion was one of attraction or repulsion, of satisfied complacency or furious irritation.

The longer Zeuks pondered upon the psychic implications of the old warrior’s tone the more he became convinced that the picturesque apophthegm, purporting to give a characteristic idea of the man, that had already, long ere his death, spread throughout all Hellas, was substantially correct. You had only, Zeuks told himself, to observe for half an hour, as you followed the man, the twitchings, quiverings, tightenings, relaxings, compressions, releases, explosions, of his mouth, his lips, his jaws, to realize that the muscles which set these objects working were themselves set in motion by the drift of his whole spirit.

It became clear in fact that when Ajax in a fit of blind rage “defied the lightning” he was not in any mood of metaphysical rebellion, not, for instance, obeying Zeuks’ own precept of philosophic prokleesis, but was quite simply giving way to a natural fit of violent human fury. But whether his mood at this moment was normal or abnormal the febrile nerves of his malleable mouth were now twitching like something subjected to an extreme emotional stress.

"It's an extraordinary light!" he cried. "I must go and see what it is! It's like that dream I've always had since my childhood! And do you know what started that dream?"

At this Zeuks felt more interested than he had expected to feel in the outbursts of this white-haired hero.

"I would greatly like to know," he answered.

The tall, thin, bent figure swung round, using its left heel in its black sandal as a pivot.

"My father whose name was — —" The old warrior suffered from some impediment in his throat, an impediment which his attendants usually mistook for phlegm, but which was in reality the fragment of a golden arrow-head which the exceptional adaptability of the man's flesh and blood had appropriated to themselves and rendered innocuous, and it was now as he struggled with his father's name that a sound like a suppressed lion's roar burst from him.

"Telamon", interjected Zeuks patiently. "Telamon", the man repeated,— "who was king of Salamis, used to tell me of a rock on that Island near the village of Cychreus through which there was a bottomless hole.

"To this hole every infant born in Salamis was brought; and into this hole, whether it was a boy or girl, it looked, and sometimes saw nothing but impenetrable darkness, and sometimes saw a dazzling light; and its parents knew by its cries of joy when it saw the light and by its cries of sorrow when it saw the darkness. And once when I told my father — Telamon that is, and it's a good sign you've heard of him — when I told my father that I always dreamed of meeting a laughing man at the bottom of that hole he said it would be a son of the great god Pan I should meet and that when I met him I should die.

“He said — Telamon I mean, and it’s a good sign you’ve heard of him — that the light in that hole came from a dancing-lawn of the Nymphs on the other side of the earth and that among the Nymphs the most beautiful of all was Maia who was the mother of Hermes, who himself was the father of the great god Pan. And now when it’s such a good sign for me that you said ‘Telamon’, and when there is that light over there, I must go and see it.”

Zeuks never forgot how Ajax looked, as once more, with that weird gurgling sound in his throat that resembled the suppressed roar of a half-dead lion, he cried that he must go to that light. What made the man look so specially grotesque — and yet he was the noblest-looking human being Zeuks had ever seen — was the manner in which, while his tall thin majestic figure was bent almost double, his snow-white hair and ivory-white forehead not so far away from his jet-black sandals, his head was twisted sideways in order that he might fix upon Zeuks the intense stare of his yellowish-green eyes, a stare that had about it just then a golden effect, as if that fragment of solid gold that had incorporated itself among the native elements of his throat had the power of emitting gold-dust rays, even as the terrible Typhon breathed forth fire and smoke!

Zeuks, who had no more idea than Ajax himself what it really was that burned so grandly in the sun’s afternoon rays, moved with him now in the direction of the tree-carved Hector standing there in heroic isolation. But little did he guess for all his cleverness what was on the point of happening.

They had moved together about fifty paces from the point where they had, so to speak, stopped to get their breath, and had joined issue on the matter of the prophetic words of Telamon of Salamis.

Suddenly Ajax began swaying backwards and forwards as if he had been sprinkled with a handful of the holy dust from that Cychrean hole, and each time he swayed, first to the East and then to the West, just as if he were indulging in some ancestral and primordial ritual, he managed to accentuate into a grotesque distortion of his whole gaunt frame the way his white skull bent sideways to stare at Zeuks while it came bowing down from the mystery of the East to the mystery of the West.

And then with one single movement of his whole body the old warrior became as motionless as the Stone of Sisyphos, had Sisyphos been suddenly saved from the undying cruelty of Zeus. And from that motionlessness, just as if some primordial vein of gold in that Cychrean hole had really uttered a cry, there rang out a challenge so startling, that any daring wanderer passing through that deserted Arima, where Eurybia and Echidna no longer kept up their reciprocal incantation, would have said to himself: “By the gods, I must get nearer to this! Something really exciting is happening in this queer place! Hush! I must creep nearer!”

And nearer such an one would have crept. And he would have been rewarded.

“A power tells me, you laughing one, that you are my dream come true! Yes, by the earth our mother, you are no servant of Odysseus! You are no farmer of Ithaca! I, Ajax, the son of Telamon, know you for what you are! You are a true son of the great god Pan! You are the son of Pan, who is the son of Hermes, who is the son of Zeus, who is the son of Kronos!”

Certainly if the person who called himself Zeuks had all along known his parentage he couldn’t have acted differently. His fate it was just then to lead the desperately old Ajax to his fantastic end; and that is what he unhesitatingly did though without the faintest idea that death was hurrying there too. Straight up to that carved image of Hector of Troy he led the greatest Achaian. Full upon that figure shone the slanting afternoon sun in a blaze of burning light and all the artistry of Hector’s own daughter flamed forth in her father’s majestic person.

“Watch your sandals as you walk, my Lord Ajax. There are snakes in the grass.”

It was because the Trojan hero heard this instruction and obeyed it to the letter that they reached the carved tree before he lifted up his eyes to see what it was that burned before him with such a flame.

“Hector!” he cried with a ringing battle-cry; and then almost querulously as he rolled over at the feet of the son of Priam, “so its you and neither the one nor the other of us who at the end has the arms of Achilles!”

CHAPTER IX

BY THE TIME the body of the white-haired son of Telamon lay still, and Zeuks, “the laughing man”, had satisfied himself that this long, lean, fleshless form, whose mighty muscles had once hurled back from the hulls and bulwarks of the Achaian ships troop after troop of Trojans and Trojan allies, was really and truly dead, the sun had begun to fall horizontally upon the golden armour of Achilles, hanging now so easily and naturally on the ash-tree carved to resemble Hector. The Image of Hector, thus blazing in its blinding splendour, seemed to be exulting over the body of Ajax, as if it had stricken down that mighty son of Telamon not from the broken towers of a darkened Ilium but from the battlements of some new aerial Troy that were now emerging victorious.

And at this moment there came over Zeuks an unusual craving to get to the bottom of the old familiar mystery of his own birth. Those particular words which Ajax had evidently uttered under the direct impact and pressure of some sudden inspiration had sunk like a lump of adamant into the mind of Zeuks. He repeated them to himself— “The son of Pan, the son of Hermes, the son of Zeus, the son of Kronos” — and he even carried this liturgical genealogy a step further, and murmured the words: “the son of Gaia and Ouranos.”

Murmuring these words like a ritualistic chant he knelt over the body before him and thrusting his arms beneath it lifted it sufficiently high as to be able to prop it up with its back against the shins and knees and thighs of the graven image of the greatest of the Trojans, still blazing like fire in the armour of Achilles.

In carving Hector’s image out of that tree-trunk his unrecognized daughter had thought more of making the man’s face resemble its original than of making his form as muscular as it actually was. So that now, when the real muscles of the tall emaciated son of Telamon were thus contrasted with the supple and pliant elegance of that sunlit golden “eidolon” of his famous enemy, there would have been plenty of excuse for Zeuks had he cried out: “Gods in Heaven! No wonder Troy was taken and destroyed if one leader was like this and the other like that!”

But the mind of Zeuks was at that moment far too full of its own private speculations to do more than place on the ground behind him his own personal weapon, which was a thick, short, double-edged dagger with a sharp point, and lifting both hands to the bowed sun-illumined white head above him that now hung down with a distinct droop towards the direction from which they had just come, that is to say towards the rocky coast where the Naiads had their cave, he began to tilt it up and thrust it back a little, so that it should be kept in an upright position by resting it against the heart of the inmost wood of the carved tree where it was supported on one side by Hector’s left knee and on the other side by his right knee; and once having got it in that position Zeuks was as careful as a woman in the considerate manner in which he closed its eyes.

The afternoon sun was now projecting such a blaze of light that the armour of Achilles reflected it from every curve, whether convex or concave. In fact the incredible and miraculous gleaming of this armour which the cajoleries of the sea-goddess had extracted from the smithy of the fire-god, was so dazzling that whether it flamed back from the closed eyes of the son of Telamon or from the golden greaves of the son of Priam it compelled Zeuks to bend down till his own head was as deeply sunk forward between the knees of the dead Ajax as the head of Ajax was sunk backwards between the knees of the image of Hector.

Thus were the three figures united, one a corpse, one a work of art, and one a living creature; and this uniting of life with death, and of life and death with a graven image of human imagination had a curious and singular effect: for there came into the already confused and naturally chaotic mind of Zeuks one of the most powerful impressions of his whole life. In embracing those dead limbs and in drawing into the depths of his being the bitter smell of the old hero's scrotum, and the salt, sharp taste of the perspiration-soaked hairs of his motionless thighs, Zeuks completely forgot the dead man's announcement as to his own paternity. What filled his mind now was a sudden doubt about the wisdom of his proudly proclaimed "Prokleesis" as the best of all possible war-cries for the struggle of living creatures with the mystery of life.

But was it really the best? Was this challenging and this defying of life the wisest attitude for living creatures? Zeuks had long ago found out by bitter experience that some sort of habitual life-philosophy was absolutely essential for him. But was this mood of defiance and challenge the best he could find? He began to mutter all sorts of alternatives to himself as he buried his head between the thighs of Ajax.

By degrees he felt as if he were embracing both life and death, though like a bird swimming under water he had to rise to the surface every few minutes to get a breath of air. "By the waters of the Styx," he said, "whatever essence of living I make up my mind to embrace, it must be capable of being reduced to a simple surge of will-power and a simple clutch of enjoyment! And I must make it such a habit that I can summon it up at any moment and use it under any conditions!

“And since I’ve got to live out my destiny, whether I challenge it and defy it or simply submit to it, it seems silly to go on making this ‘prokleesis’ of mine the essence of the whole thing. No! I can now see well what the right word for my life-struggle is — not the word ‘prokleesis’, ‘defiance’, but the word Lanthanomai, or ‘I forget’, followed by the still simpler word, Terpomai or ‘I enjoy’. For by the Styx, its a question if we can enjoy anything till we’ve forgotten almost everything!

“That’s what’s the matter with Odysseus”; and at the thought of the man who had won this golden armour from the sinews and bones that here lay dead, only to lose it all again to this graven tree-trunk that would never be able to know anything of these human rivalries, Zeuks lifted up his head from between those withered but still mighty thighs. “It is,” he told himself, “as if I were embracing this corpse beneath that famous tree outside the great wall of Ilium; and as if I had been given by the gods the power to suck and draw and drain from the lapsing semen of this dead body such magnetic force into the peristaltic channel of my spirit that a fresh and a new insight into the whole of life radiates through me.”

Zeuks was not exaggerating what he felt; and indeed if the young daughter of Teiresias had been present at this moment she would have learnt as much, and perhaps more, from the motions of the man’s arms and legs just then, as she had ever learnt from his discarded clue-word “prokleesis”, or was ever likely to learn from his new clue-words, “lanthanomai” and “Terpomai”. But then Pontopereia, being, for all her prophetic gift, a natural girl, she would instinctively put less confidence in the creative impulse of a clue-word than in the simplest bodily movement.

But it was with more than his out-flung arms that this queer son of Arcadian soil proceeded now to encircle in one and the same embrace both the dead man’s neck and the base of that ash-tree out of which Hector’s shin-bones had been so exquisitely carved. It was not indeed until the moment when he saw Ajax fall at the feet of that graven image wearing the armour of Achilles, that something in him such as had never before come to the surface of the "laughing man" rose up, and dominated his whole nature. And it was on the strength of this "something" that he now pressed against his ribs in the same desperate embrace both the dead man and the carved tree.

"Why should I laugh at life rather than challenge it or defy it when all I've really got to do is just to enjoy it?" This was. what he was telling himself as he hugged the tree and the gold and the flesh and the bone together. And the very form of his. countenance became changed as he did so. The physiognomy of Zeuks has been, as we have seen, designed and dedicated, devoted and destined for the ribald reduction of everything in. existence to a monstrous jest.

But something had risen just then out of the depths of his being that was neither solemn nor comical; something that found its account in quite a different direction from that of either defiance or mockery. And the advantage of this direction was its freedom from the necessity of any effort except the effort of will. It needed absolutely no mental effort at all; not even the mental effort of realizing just exactly what it was he was defying, or towards what particular thing he was directing his mockery. "To will," Zeuks told himself, "is simply to do a little more vigorously what we are already doing spontaneously. These efforts naturally occur when we grow consciously aware of some exercise in ourselves of the life-energy which moves in every offspring of the ancient earth. All we have to do is to use our will to intensify this."

Nor was the expression upon the face of Zeuks that accompanied this revelation lost on the air. It was on the contrary inwardly digested. It was one of the luckiest moments in the philosophical life of the creature that always so proudly called itself “the Worm of Arima” that just when the adventurous consciousness of the son of Arcadian Pan had dived deep enough among the mysteries of the multiverse to discover a clue-word, or rather a clue-act, that was more intimate and more effective than “defy” or “mock”, the protruding, perspiring, and palpitating proboscis of the Worm of Arima happened to be above-board rather than in any of its convoluted labyrinths below. For since the illumination upon the countenance of Zeuks at this second of time communicated itself by the usual aerial vibration to everything within reach, it was natural enough that the Worm of Arima, being so near to it, carried away into its underground world when it returned there, though the form of its own visage was so much simpler, a celestial exultation worthy of the noblest zodiacal sign.

“These motions of the will,” said Zeuks to himself, “are motions of the life-energy within us, sometimes enduring and patient, sometimes violent and desperate. But, whatever these motions of the life-energy are, if they’re to give us that thrill of enjoyment we need, we’ve got to acquire the trick of forcing ourselves to forget the particular afflictions that spoil such enjoyment.”

And it was at this point in what might have been called his pearl-diving in the ensorcerized earth-mould of Arima that Zeuks felt himself to be, at one and the same time, a god, a man, a beast, a bird, a fish, a worm and an insect. And in his heart he cried out: “O gods, O men, O beasts, O birds, O fish, O frogs, O ferns and funguses, I, Zeuks, have you all in me, and I, Zeuks, am within you all! But, O Maia, mother of Hermes and grandmother of Pan, teach me to forget! Teach me, O youthful Maia, the heavenly tracks and heavenlier side-tracks of the sacred art of forgetting! Don’t let me ever, O Maia most holy, O Maia most blessed, O Maia eternally youthful, don’t let me forget how to forget!

“Yes, to forget the disgusts! Yes! to forget the horrors! yes! to forget the loathings! Mother of Hermes, hear the prayer of thy great-grand-son Zeuks, and grant unto him, and that not too late, the power of forgetting the madness, the loathsomeness, and the horror! I should require,” thus did the thoughts of Zeuks run on, “I who am a god, a man, a beast; a bird, a fish, a frog, a worm, an insect, I who have suffered such horrors from the sky, my begetter, from the earth, my mother, from the elements, my aunts, from Space my grandmother, from Time my grandfather, I should require a draught of forgetfulness so obliterating that it could turn every hell that all my separate natures necessitate into every paradise that all my separate natures crave! Mother of Hermes” — thus did the heart of Zeuks still jerk forth its desperate prayer to the multiverse around it— “cannot you see that for a manifold creature such as I am, a creature who is a god, a man, an insect, a frog, a newt, an ass, a camel, a bear, a monkey, an elephant, if I am really to drink a draught of pure Lethe, if I am really to obtain the power of forcing myself to forget the horrors, it can only be done by my own will to forget!

“O thou ‘still youthful Maia’, cannot you see that what I need is to strengthen my will to forget till it is ten thousand times more powerful than any god as yet discovered by us whether in earth or in air or in fire or in water? If I had this power, O thou ‘still youthful’ great-grandmother of mine, I could enjoy sight, sound, touch, taste and smell, each one of them separately or all together, and in the pleasure of satisfying hunger and thirst, and in the pleasure of satisfying lust and desire, and in the pleasure of diving into earth and air and water and fire, and through them and out the other side, if there is another side, I beseech thee, O Maia, thou Nymph forever young, let me learn the greatest of all the arts, the art of forgetting!"

By one of those pure caprices and casual happenings that occur under the dispensation of Tyche the great goddess of chance such as we mortals call "a stroke of luck" when they suit us and "the cruel irony of things" when they don't, it happened that when Zeuks began heaving up the body of Ajax, with a view to carrying it to the Corridor of the Pillars, there occurred a faint but unmistakable flicker at the outer corner of the dead man's left eyelid.

This incident was solely and simply due to the sudden jerk to the corpse's head when Zeuks lifted up that long, lean, painfully muscular body preparatory to making the effort, which was not at all an easy one, of balancing it on his shoulder. But this negligible and unimportant accident made, for a special reason, a most agitating impression on the mind of Zeuks.

What it did for him was to set going a peculiarly morbid infirmity of his imagination; namely the fantastic illusion that his own automatic blinkings and pulse-beats and heart-throbs and blood-circulations, yes! and even the naturally drawn breathings from his lungs might suddenly be intensified to a degree beyond bearing and he might be driven so wild by all these reiterative pulsings, pumpings and poundings that he'd be sent raving through Arima like a naked madman!

His face was contracted into a desperately grim scowl as he staggered off from the Hector-Tree with the body of Ajax on his back. "And so," he told himself, "it has now come to the point; and the question is, can the great-grand-son of immortal Maia keep his 'will to forget' intact when his whole taut skin drums from within to the tune of 'remember!'

Staggering along for a dozen strides at a time, every few seconds Zeuks had to stop to take breath. His shoulders were broad enough; but his legs were short; and the corpse he carried was so tall that its toes, for he carried it face downwards, kept tapping against his own heels.

But it was the horrible feeling that at any moment this repetitive pounding and pulsing and blinking might split his skin that was spoiling that moment for him rather than any effort of carrying Ajax. And it was at his tenth stop that he made a really desperate attempt to deal with this insane attack. He planted his feet firmly in a patch of damp and mossy soil, not far from the spot where Eurybia used to exercise her curious sedentary witchcraft, and where she used to argue with Echidna from twilight to twilight as to whether this breaking loose out of Tartaros, about which all the Attic world was now talking, was due to feminine wiles or to titanic straining.

Having got the heel of one sandal hidden in that soft wet moss and the under-curve of the other sandal covering something brittle below that wet moss that might easily have turned out to be the ivory-white thigh-bone of a still-born child, Zeuks now took up his own consciousness, as if it were a massive plummet of lead sharpened at the end, and drove it down deep into the earth.

Had either of his youthful acquaintances, Nisos or Pontopereia, been at his side at that moment they would have had, in the case of the former a male inspiration, and in the case of the latter a female inspiration, simply from Zeuks' visage. It was literally distorted, contorted, convulsed with pure exultation when at last he hauled up into the light the mental self he had let down into the abyss. What pleased him so much was the supreme success of his supreme effort; for his horrid, loathsome, disgusting mental illness, revolting in itself and attended by the wildest and maddest terrors, had actually been left behind in the depths of the earth like an after-birth at the bottom of a weedy garden.

This was a relief so incredible that it confused him by its very beatitude. “Never again,” he told himself, “never once again shall I have those horrors!”

And Zeuks remembered how when he was farming in the vicinity of Cuckoo-Hill he once heard Enorches, the Priest of the Mysteries, curse a rash young neighbour who had tried to seduce the neophyte-priestess Spartika, the daughter of Nosodea, and the sister of Leipephile; and how the pompously perverse and the necrophiliastically censorious tone of the man in his assumption of priestly authority had for long haunted him because it jumped with his own peculiar mental malady: “May your crime exude from every pore of your body like stinking pus! May it burst from every inch of your skin like gangrenous necrosis! May it reek from your body like putrid decomposition! May it cross every sight you see with a streak of fœtid blood! May it infect every sound you hear with an explosion of foul wind! May it taint everything you touch with vile and viscous glutinosity! May all you taste have the tang of brine and all you smell have a reek of the mortuary! May your consciousness of yourself become a consciousness of empty eye-sockets and rattling cross-bones! May the clock-strokes of annihilation record the hours of all your nights and the dust-motes of disillusion drift over the minutes of all your days!”

Zeuks could not only remember the shock he got from this curse, he remembered also the intensity of the particular prayer about his own fate which was his reaction to it. He had prayed to Arcadian Pan that he might become the supreme lord of the Island of Ithaca, dwelling, as Odysseus the son of Laertes did, and as Agelaos the son of Krateros Naubolides hoped one day to do, above the Corridor of the Pillars. “Why do I think of that prayer at this particular moment?" he asked himself as he staggered and shuffled under the weight of the tall corpse he was carrying, up the much-trodden path across the burying-ground of the slaves that led into the olive-garden.

But Zeuks the son of Arcadian Pan didn't hasten to leave the graves of the old slaves in order to reach the cradles of the young olives. On the contrary he moved more slowly than ever. He was clutching the dead man's wrists so tightly with both his hands that the warrior's toes still in heavy silver-clamped sandals tapped against his own bare heels causing him pain. In this slaves' cemetery Zeuks was on fairly familiar ground, for several of the farmers of Cuckoo Hill who were too poor to possess cemeteries of their own brought the bodies of their dead slaves to this spot.

Zeuks in his previous visits to the place however had never noticed that one of these graves and this a very deep one had not been filled up but was gaping wide-open. Now what, in the name of Persephoneia, the Queen of all the Dead, was the explanation of this? There were no inscriptions here at all and there had been none for centuries; so that the identity or identities of the occupant or occupants of this deep hole in the earth could only be revealed by such as had lowered him or her into this deep and narrow sepulchre or had recently robbed this nameless sanctuary of its inmate.

By this time the sun had already gone down below the horizon and night was rapidly approaching. "What in the name of Aidoneus and Persephoneia will our old man do with this other old man?" Zeuks now asked himself in perplexity. "He must be-entertaining the Princess by this time in the Dining-Hall and if that incredible old Eurycleia weren't the woman she is our old king would be in a fine fix! But that's just what this amazing old woman must have been doing again tonight, saving him from the shame of failing in any of his kingly duties! But what in the name of Aidoneus would the old man feel at this overpowering moment, when he’s not only got the Phaiakians on his hands, along with that crazy Herald of theirs, but has had to confront this Princess of all Princesses, if I were to appear before him with the corpse of Ajax!”

Very carefully and very slowly Zeuks lifted the long lean body, all bone and muscle and sinew, from his shoulder and laid it on its back on the indescribable rubble and litter that surrounded that gaping hole. Then, with his eyes on a smashed pot that looked as if it might have been the first piece of pottery ever made by the hand of man, his thoughts turned to Okyrhöe, “I hate that woman. I know she’s up to some game. Yes, I hate her! Oh, why is it that in this world there’s always somebody we have to wish in Hades? It’s not a matter of war or revenge or rivalry or just family against family, or tribe against tribe, or race against race. Those things are all part of the game, part of the way things are, part of the price we have to pay for being alive at all.

“Krateros Naubolides wants to keep the king here, so that without any trouble he can slip into his shoes when he dies. Odysseus on the contrary naturally wants before he dies to make such a thunderous commotion and such a roaring rumpus that his personality will go resounding on, like the beating of brazen swords upon brazen shields, till it’s heard over both the horizons of the world; heard where the blameless Ethiopians at the Gates of the West cry their farewell to the burning sun on his nightly journey, and heard where the blameless Ethiopians at the Gates of the East cry their welcome to the burning sun as he rises for a new day!

“No, what’s wrong isn’t our having enemies, it’s our having friends like this woman Okyrhöe! The old man will never be able to be happy again with Nausikaa while that cunning bitch is about. It’s a wicked shame.”

Staring with a frown at those smashed bits of discarded pottery Zeuks was now absolutely astonished to find himself sobbing. What in Hades' name did this mean? Was he not exultantly happy? Had he not shuffled off the coil of his worst horrors and left their scurf and their scum at the bottom of the abyss? "For what then — by all the Harpies" — he said to himself, "am I a grown man blubbing like a baby?"

He sucked in both his lips at this point which gave him an extremely odd expression, an expression which would certainly have interested his great-grandmother Maia if from some Valley of Eternal Youth she could have seen it; and with this expression — which was a mixture of fussy punctiliousness, touchy querulousness, and irritable contrariness, mingled together by a sort of impish gravity — fixed upon his features like an actor's mask, he placed his hands under the armpits of the dead man and lowered him down feet foremost into the open grave till he was standing erect in it.

Then Zeuks set himself to fill up the grave with the rubble that lay several inches deep in every direction. This was an easy task and Zeuks accomplished it in quick time, using both his extremities. What he didn't kick down into that hole from the litter around it he threw down into it with his hands.

And when he had finished his job he stamped heavily and obstinately on the rubble round the top of the corpse's head, leaving, however, for the benefit of his own private and secret knowledge and information, but only just recognizable even by himself, the little bronze spike on the top of the small bull's-hide head-piece that continued to surmount, even after all the knocking about that that warrior-body had undergone, the snow-white head of the dead chieftain.

With his lips still sucked into his mouth in that odd way Zeuks spent several minutes covering and revealing, revealing and once more covering, that little bronze spike, to conceal which finally, and it was almost dark by now, he made use of a cracked oyster-shell.

All this accomplished, he made the special ritual gesture practised for a thousand years at ceremonies where the dead had been buried rather than burnt, and when this had been done he moved cautiously through the olive-garden and bent his head in the darkness lower than he need have done before passing beneath the arch into the corridor of pillars. He felt in some odd way humbled; and every sort of pride, whether human or godlike, seemed to have been drained out of him simply by the fact of having lived all these hours with Ajax, who, whether alive or dead, was so natural and so true to his essential self, that he made any other persons seem vacillating and wayward.

"Didn't somebody tell me," Zeuks said to himself, as he emerged from under the low-bowed arch into the corridor of pillars, "that there was an olive-stump inside here ready to discuss the newest and the most difficult problems in philosophy? But I smell meat! The old king must be already at dinner. Hades! But I mustn't make a sound or I'll have them all rushing out!" His sandals were of tougher leather than those worn by his neighbours on Cuckoo-Hill and he suddenly became fearful of their creaking. He felt better when he had slipped them off and was holding them in his left hand; but he felt better still when he had extricated with some difficulty from the lining of his outer vest or "chiton" his two-edged dagger, whose small bronze handle was covered with a particular kind of cloth specially adapted to soak up blood without letting it drip.

But the odd thing with Zeuks just then, as inhaling the rich waftures from Eurycleia's ancestral cooking he stared wildly at the Club of Herakles propped up between its two projecting quartz-stones, was the fact that his irresolution at that critical moment connected itself with a feeling that went beyond humility.

"What has happened," he cried out from the depths of his heart with a wordless, soundless cry, "what has happened to you, O Maia, the Nymph who gave birth to Hermes, the begetter of Pan? You were not one, O Maia my own, O Maia, my more than Mother! You were not one of those tragic mortal ones who die, as the old Dryad here must have died along with her aged oak! Of the fate of the Nymph of Master Dryops I know something; and of the fate of the Nymph who bore Pan to Hermes I have heard much: but whither, I implore you to answer me, whither, O whither, have you fled, immortal mother of my father's father, you for whose sake the lyre was first strung? Are you still being visited by the son of Kronos in some hidden cave in Arcady? Or perhaps at this very moment, beyond the reach of us all, caught by the rising flood in some royal chamber in Atlantis, your far-floating, filmy-textured, chestnut-coloured hair is washing backwards and forwards, while stiff-finned fish and scaly-tailed sea-snakes press their snouts against your cold breasts?

"Have I prayed in vain to you all my life as an immortal, and have you all the time been cold and dead as Atlantis itself? Surely you are immortal among the Nymphs, oh mother of my father's father? Don't they say that the great earth-mother bore you at the beginning of all things, before she was over-shadowed by Ouranos or knew what it was to have connexion with any elemental power beyond herself? Aren't you, along with all the Nymphs of the Mountains and the Springs and the Lakes and the Seas, different altogether in the hierarchies of the gods from a pathetic old creature like the family-Dryad of this place who has now perished with her oak?"

He must have been himself at that moment, poor Zeuks, a somewhat pathetic figure, with one hand clutching that double-edged weapon under his “chiton” and with the other pressing his sandals against his ribs. At any rate the easily moved moth murmured to her friend the fly: “I do so, so wish, my dear friend, that we knew whence this fellow Zeuks originally came. I don’t mean just now, for, of course, we know that well enough! I mean at the beginning of his life. Do, for Heaven’s sake, Myos, wake up, ‘and see’, as rude boys learn to say at school, ‘what the cat has brought in’! I’m afraid you ate far too much of that beautifully-cooked bread-sauce! I warned you against it. Oh how I did warn you against it! For the same thing has happened to you before. It shows how we cannot be trusted not to fall into the sin of gluttony when we are safe at home and in no danger of being swallowed up alive by voracious insectivorous monsters. Listen to me, Myos, my only friend! Listen to me, most learned of revered teachers! I hate to speak of such tragic things: but don’t you remember how often we’ve seen dead flies, lying mute and silent, never to hum, never to buzz, never to murmur again? And where, I ask you, have we seen them?

“On plates and under plates! On tables and under tables! On window sills and under window sills! You flies are far too sensitive and intellectual and highly-strung to take risks with your food. It’s different altogether with us. We’re made for risks like that! If we don’t take risks every day of our lives we very quickly degenerate. I oughtn’t to scold you, my precious wise one” — here the beautiful moth showed signs of emotion, for her right wing quivered and her left antenna groped freebly in a whiff of steam-infected air from the hall within— “because I have myself been yielding so weakly to my admiration for your learning that I have not yet, though I heard his inspired speech, flown to enquire how the noble Priest of the Mysteries has borne up after his exhausting oration.

"But, O thou wisest of flies, I do feel such shame when I think" — It was then that there broke in upon their conversation the voice of their living and moving tent, namely the Club of Herakles, who when in the company of his special and most privileged associates always called himself "Dokeesis" a name which in that dark Nemean Forest, where he was brought up, has the meaning of "seeming", because there are so many shadows there that it is often hard to distinguish between appearance and reality.

"It is I who am speaking to you, again, Sixth Pillar, yes it is I, the Slayer of the Nemean Lion, and I want to know whether I heard you correctly, Sixth Pillar, when you spoke of receiving the news that the great Goddess Hera the Queen of Heaven, had suddenly left Olympos empty of her divine presence and had gone to Gargaros, the summit of Ida, with the intention of persuading the Son of Kronos, by the help of Desire, and by the help of Sleep after the satisfaction of Desire, to yield up his third portion of Power over the Kingdoms of this World to his two Brothers Aidoneus and Poseidon?

"And if I heard you correctly, O illustrious Sixth Pillar, who bear on your pedestal the signature of a son of Hephaistos, I would like to ask you if you could tell me what in your opinion was the secret purpose of the wife of Zeus in thus betraying her husband, the Ruler of the Upper Air, and through the air of the whole surface of the earth?"

There was no need for the little shame-faced silky-winged Pyraust to prod her friend the fly to listen to this dialogue whose reverberation shook the corridor. Indeed the fly's big eyes had begun to bulge to such an extent that the anxious moth-girl feared they might fall out of his head leaving two bloody apertures through which she would be staring into her friend's "frontal lobe", the last thing she wished to do.

“In my opinion,” the two insects now heard the Sixth Pillar say, “the goddess Hera must have welcomed the return, completely unknown to her husband, of the Messenger she sent, namely the seven-coloured Iris, to find Pallas Athene among the blameless Ethiopians. In my opinion Pallas Athene must have assured her that if they worked together now and got the help, both of Persephone from Hades, and of Thetis from the Sea, they would be able to take the domination of the world out of the possession of men and hand it over into the possession of women where it ought to have been from the beginning.”

After this there was dead silence in the corridor; until the shame-faced moth took upon herself to fling a question upon that wine-scented air towards the lusty olive-sprout that had dared to grow up between a couple of flagstones.

“Can you tell me, Olive-Branch, whether it will be the lady Okyrhöe or the lady Nausikaa who will win the love of Odysseus?” There was such a long silence after this dramatic question that the fly came near to spreading its gauzy wings and taking upon itself the role of Messenger from the Insects to the Olympians.

Well did the moth know what was in her friend’s mind; and she couldn’t help wondering what she herself would feel if she accompanied the fly through the flashes of light that wavered down from the hall above, and with rainbow colours flashing from point to point in his wings and mysterious gleams glorifying the lustrous brown of her wings, they were both to flicker up those stone steps and confront the revellers with the startling and momentous news that henceforth the world was to be ruled by women.

But the olive-shoot’s wise answer brought back everybody’s wits to the practical situation with which they were now faced. “The king will choose neither of those two women," announced the sagacious olive-shoot. "But you may be sure," he added with sturdy cynicism, "the King will use all the power he may have over both these ladies to be in a position to hoist sail without delay and explore the unknown West beyond Lost Atlantis."

Once more the boldness and rashness of the turn their talk so soon took brought down upon them all the same uneasy silence. But this time it was not from among any of them in the corridor that the interruption to their colloquy came; and it was Zeuks who was the first to be aware of it.

Zeuks was still standing against the wall clutching his formidable double-edged dagger in one hand and his sandals in the other; but he now imperceptibly moved his head so that his right ear might be directed towards the stairs that led down into the corridor from the dining-hall.

Zeuks heard steps descending those stairs, very, very slow and cautious steps, and very light steps, but with no vacillation or hesitation about their purpose. Somebody — a light-footed boy or girl — was coming as a spy or anyway as a scout. Zeuks listened intently to the faintest sound made by this explorer and he soon heard the hurried gasping breaths that the light-footed young person in his excitement was unable to suppress.

Listening with the divining rod, as you might call it, of his auditory intelligence Zeuks was soon rewarded for his concentrated attention by recognizing a particular click between two of these irrepressible gasps that identified the prowler without further question. He was Nisos Naubolides.

And then there occurred one of those curious moments, or rather seconds, in the experience of persons suddenly encountering each other in this particular dimension of our multiverse, persons familiar to each other and yet on the alert in regard to each other's immediate intentions. At such a second of time there is liable to happen an electric explosion between the life energy of the one and the life energy of the other, an explosion over which and upon which the consciousness of neither of the persons has the slightest influence or effect. What you might call the two kinds of life-levin or of life-lightning in these persons, thus confronting each other, must be far more different than the persons themselves are different and far more antagonistic.

Nisos, for instance, had always felt for Zeuks a friendly attraction and Zeuks had certainly felt for Nisos a protective affection. And yet no sooner did the lad descending those steps in the twilight catch sight of the familiar figure of Zeuks than he performed, or the life-lightning that was using him performed, some surprising acts. In the first place he put his fingers to his lips in the universal sign which means: “Hush! This little business is entirely between ourselves!” Then, though he was some seven or eight steps above the corridor, he made a wild leap like a young lion and landed on the corridor floor at least a yard beyond the Sixth Pillar; and then with a second and still more leonine leap he grasped Zeuks by the throat.

It was lucky for him that the impersonal life-lightning which seized upon Zeuks at that same instant confined itself, as if Zeuks had really been an animal, to physical contact. What Zeuks actually did was to thrust back, with a blind instinctive jerk, deep into the thick wool of the under-shirt out of which he’d drawn it, that dangerous two-edged dagger; and then with the whole strength of both his arms he tore one of Nisos’ hands from his throat and treating this captured hand as a hawk might treat a butcher-bird he squeezed it into his capacious mouth and pressed his teeth against it, not really hard enough to draw blood, but hard enough to give Nisos the feeling that those doglike teeth were drawing blood.

Thus had the situation between these two resolved itself into one of those purely physical encounters which carry with them so large a current of earth-life that they seem to satisfy both the creatures involved with a sort of absolute satisfaction. And what happened then was so much what we can imagine any benevolent fate would have intended to happen that it is hard to believe that it was brought about by pure chance.

Feeling through every throb the one hand which was still on Zeuks' throat that he had only to press these fleshy sinews with a viciously increasing purpose to stop the man's breath for ever, Nisos suddenly thought: "But I am going to be a prophet; and all Prophets have the power of an absolute control over their rage. I shall therefore show this funny fellow Zeuks that I am letting him live when I could easily kill him and being a good friend to him when I could easily be the deadliest enemy."

And on his side Zeuks was now saying to himself, as he kept his dog-like teeth firmly pressed against his antagonist's hand: "What is the use of being the great-grandson of the ever-youthful Nymph Maia, even if in the end, for all the gods in my blood, I have to sleep the perpetual sleep of death, what, I ask you, is the use of it all if I can't detach my consciousness from my body far enough to be able to put up with a leaping, scrabbling, jumping, skipping, dancing kid like this without wanting to bite his head off?"

"Come up quietly with me, Zeuks, old friend," gasped Nisos. "The old man will be damned glad to see you. But, for the sake of all we both love best in the world, what has happened to Ajax?"

"Surely I'll come with you, my dear boy," replied Zeuks. "Ajax, did you say? Why, Ajax is wholly, entirely, absolutely, and altogether out of it. Ajax is in fact not only dead but buried. I found him dead and I buried him myself. But let us go now and let us go quietly as you and I know well how to go. But tell me this before we start and tell it me in your lowest and least heraldic voice. How are things with the old man over his wine? Have either of those ladies got him yet in her toils?"

Nisos gave him as well as he could a lively but rather a school-boyish description of what he had seen; and as the older man listened he nodded many times and muttered varying rather cynical commentaries. Then did the two of them thread their way between the first, second, third and fourth Pillars, Zeuks leaning on the arm of Nisos as if he had been much older than he actually was.

"No, my dear friend," Zeuks said with a rapid downward glance towards the base of the Sixth Pillar as they passed that philosophic interpreter of elemental vibrations, "no! my impression from all you've told me about our old man's behaviour with those two women is that the Princess Nausikaa is shocked at the physical change in him. I don't want to mislead you. Sonny, for your impressions are vivid and you have described them mighty well; but my own feeling about it is that Nausikaa finds it hard to recognise in our old king the handsome hero with whom she fell in love when he suddenly appeared from out of the shadows of the rocks while she and her maidens were playing ball by the sea-shore. I don't think myself he is in the faintest danger of being seduced by the Okyrhöe woman. My idea is that the kind of flattery he uses in her case, you know the sort of thing I mean, that exaggerated praise of everything about her, is due to a mounting and intensifying irritation with the way she treats him."

"Yes! yes! yes!" murmured Nisos in a still lower voice as they drew near to the thick oaken brazen-barred door at the top of the steps, "yes! yes! I've noticed that about him too! He gets rid of his bottled-up rage just as some old people do of their bottled-up misery by the simple process of inventing exaggerated and fantastical fables. But I tell you, Zeuks, my friend, things are about as ticklish up there as they can possibly be. It's like balancing yourself on a tight-rope — no! not like balancing yourself, like watching them balance themselves! No! I haven't got it quite right even yet! It's like watching them dancing upon thin ice dangerously slippery and liable to break and let them into the water!"

"Well, Son, we'll soon be" — but Nisos couldn't catch the dying out of that sentence; for they were now standing before the massive brazen-fitted time-darkened door, the other side of which was that palace dining-hall which had already been for numberless generations, and would be for many more to come, a centre of intrigue and plotting, not only for Ithaca, but for the whole of Hellas.

This black-oak door with its four panels and bronze frame opened to them now at the first pressure of Zeuks' hand. It would have needed one of the minutest of all the dust-motes that danced so solemnly in that spear-shaft of a torch-ray across the head of the lady Okyrhöe, across the head of the lady Nausikaa, across the head of Odysseus himself, to thread that twisted path, beyond the cunning of the tiniest mite of sea-spray left by the sun in his descent, the twisted path to the heart of the old king.

It was clear at once to both Zeuks and Nisos that Odysseus was not so much drunk from the fumes of wine as drunk from the opposing sorceries of those two formidable women.

"You'd have thought," said Nisos to himself, "that Circe and Calypso between them would have made him harder to beguile; but of course — Nausikaa — —"

He closed the brazen-framed door behind Zeuks and himself and made a hurried obeisance to the old bearded figure on the throne-seat at the table, but although the king looked searchingly into each of their faces as they came forward it struck them both that he understood nothing of what he saw save only that some terrible crisis of a fatal choice was upon him.

As to this choice it was abundantly clear to both Nisos and Zeuks that until some unexpected ray of light penetrated that bearded head the old king was simply incapable of choosing between his new temptress and his ancient flame. There was indeed to each of them something almost sickeningly painful in the sight of this tremendous hero of the greatest war ever experienced by the human race being lured to this unseemly turnstile of sexual cross-purpose.

Nisos and Zeuks were able to approach the table in whispered colloquy with each other, were able indeed to receive a wine-glass from Eurycleia and have it filled by Arsinöe, and finally were able to enter into an extremely punctilious argument with the Herald without attracting more notice from Odysseus than a vague, obscure, and taking-everything-for-granted nod.

“Yes, you will be interested to hear,” said the Herald, “that your humble servant has been permitted to approach your King of Kings and Lord of Lords with a request for permission to visit in person the Royal Treasury and to see with my own eyes and touch with my own hands certain pieces of golden armour that actually belonged to Achilles the son of Peleus and which your King of Kings and Lord of Lords won from Ajax in a public competition presided over by the Olympians. This permission I hope presently to take advantage of, but this beautiful lady-in-waiting, who tells me she will escort me to the Treasury, begs me to await the moment when her lovely duty of dispensing wine to the King’s visitors is over for tonight.”

Zeuks looked at Nisos with a cold shiver of apprehension when Ajax was mentioned; and Arsinöe hastened to fill up the young man’s glass the moment he had allowed himself in his embarrassment to empty it at one gulp.

“You haven’t yet made it quite clear to me, sweet lady,” they heard Okyrhöe say to Nausikaa, “what exactly is the change you are so struck by in my darling hero here, since you beheld him, after his escape from that accurst Bitch-Nymph, washed up naked on your shores. O what a shock to your chaste and virginal feelings that occasion must have been! A naked man coming forth out of the wild waves and advancing straight towards you! No wonder this romantic and bewitching story had already become a sailor’s ditty in the docks of every port when I was a little girl!

“Little did I dream it would ever be my lot to be allowed by fate to succeed you in the affections of our little-girl-loving hero! O you must satisfy my childish curiosity, sweet Auntie Nausikaa; for my parents, you know, never allowed me to forget that I was descended from Nausithoos the father of Alkinoos who wedded your dear mother, Arete.

“O yes! it is indeed as if one of those impossible dreams in a young girl’s life had come true that the very same hero of my childhood should actually have become now that I’m grown up and can realize all it means, yes, should actually have become, in spite of his old age, my lover and my beloved!

“O sweet Auntie Nausikaa, you must forgive my emotion in meeting you; for you must realize how the sight of you calls up every glimpse and feature of my earliest visions of life, now so wonderfully satisfied, with him as my lover” — At this point Okyrhöe actually leant across the table and touched the stem of the wine-glass out of which Odysseus was drinking. “Yes,” she told him, “your little girl is confessing all our happiness to her Auntie Nausikaa!”

It was at this point that Zeuks looked at Nisos, and Nisos looked at Zeuks; and never, in all the history of love has such savage derision been excited by such palpable humbug.

“We Phaiakians,” began the Herald, his natural ritualistic assurance evidently emphasized by the long unnatural suppression which he had endured while his Phaiakian princess struggled to ward off without losing her temper the diabolical jibes of the weird woman from Thebes.

"We Phaiakians are more ready to enter into technical arguments on matters of science and on the navigation of oceangoing ships than any other race, and we find it very hard to argue on these important subjects with barbarians. That is one of the reasons why it is such a deep satisfaction to us to have the privilege of talking with real Hellenic gentlemen like yourselves."

"My own feeling is," said Nisos, trying to make himself a little more comfortable by leaning sideways against the table, "my own feeling is that it is better to work out our own personal system of philosophy as well as our system of navigation in private meditation than to offer them both for public discussion."

"Heaven and earth!" cried Zeuks. "What about impulsive fellows like me? I couldn't tell you by day or by night what I was going to do next!" Thus speaking, the great-grandson of the Nymph Maia hesitated not to take to himself a curious chair that stood empty, with its back to one of the richly carved alcoves of that stately hall, a chair that was actually formed out of the figure of a monstrously swollen dwarf from whose head a stag's antlers protruded and whose feet were elongated into tree-roots.

There was something about this chair so perfectly adapted to the personality of Zeuks that Odysseus seemed to accept him and the chair as if they had been one thing and not two things. In fact whenever Odysseus glanced in their direction he gave to this fantastical flesh-turned-into-wood man in a chair a half-humorous nod, a nod that seemed to say: "We are all in the same box; and if we don't grow horns and roots we grow fins and scales."

The easy way in which Zeuks was now enjoying life in that horned and rooted man-chair with which he had identified himself gave our friend Nisos an opportunity to take in more of the general situation than he had as yet had leisure to grasp. He noticed that more than half the seats round the table were empty but that the plates of their recent occupiers were still half full of untouched nuts and fruits and that their wine-glasses too were still only half empty.

It soon began to be clear to the young man that the cause of this desertion of the table was the simple fact that the three chief officers of Nausikaa's crew had been persuaded by Eurycleia, along with the half-a-dozen sailors who had navigated their ship, to join our old friend Tis and the Trojan captive Arsinöe in a wine-drinking revel parallel with the one that was now ebbing feebly to its close in this dilatory teasing of Nausikaa by the crafty Okyrhöe. Gay and lively were the cries and the laughter that kept reaching that quiet hall from the echoing passage leading down to the underground kitchen and wash-house.

As Nisos watched all that was going on he soon was made to feel decidedly uncomfortable by the absence of the familiar form of the beautiful Leipephile, who, quite naturally, was away somewhere with her betrothed, the elder son of Krateros Naubolides. Little physical things, too, as so often happens on such drastic occasions, were worrying Nisos now, and these were the more annoying and irritating because of Zeuks' excessive and exaggerated delight in identifying himself with that grotesque chair and its horns and roots.

Nisos himself, who had no chair and had begun to feel a fool as he stood alone by the side of the table like a child who has crept down from its nursery, had just got one of his bare knees into some sort of a kneeling position upon the edge of a high four-legged footstool, a position he endeavoured to render more secure by pressing his hand in the side of the table. He was unlucky in both these supports; for the footstool had once been covered by some sort of ancient rug, and an unpleasant knot left in its weaving chafed his knee to distraction, while at the precise spot where he pressed his hand on the table's edge there happened to be two or three brass nails that hadn't been properly hammered into the wood and one of these nails behaved as if it were trying to bite at the fleshy part at the base of his thumb.

Had Tis's little sister been present in this dining-hall just now instead of being carried on a crazy rampage on the back of Pegasos along with Arcadian Pan and that pair of appalling Phantoms, whose eternally-whispered wrangle seemed destined to be transferred from Arima to the drowned towers of Atlantis, she would no doubt have drifted to Nisos' aid.

Pontopereia, the daughter of Teiresias, who was present, was far too shy to speak to a soul except the punctilious Herald to whom she finally confessed her longing to climb up to one of the high windows under the roof of this great chamber and persuaded him to help her in this achievement.

While our friend Nisos was contending with knots in rugs and nails in boards there were other personalities in that hall, quite apart from the Herald and Pontopereia, who seemed to feel that the moment had come for the old little lady Atropos to draw near and give destiny a new turn. Among these other personalities were individual hairs in the beard of Odysseus: for though, like the branch of a tree, a beard, whether of a goat or a man, has its own general individual being, its separate hairs like the leaves on such a branch have identities of their own. Thus the king's beard in its general personality was not surprised to hear its separate hairs disputing.

“A spiritual impression has reached me,” began one of its smallest hairs, addressing itself to one of the largest; “that before darkness covers the earth today you and I and every other hair in this beard may be homeless.”

“May I be permitted to enquire,” returned the big hair to the little hair, “upon what authority you base this somewhat startling prediction?”

“There’s not the least reason why you should put on that patronizing tone just because you are a little older and a little thicker than I am,” retorted the other. “The important question is whether we shall or shall not both be thrown into a bonfire of rubbish and there burnt up into invisible nothingness!” And as he spoke the smallest hair made a faintly fluttering motion, like a minute dandelion-seed, or some still more simply constructed airborne vehicle, towards the smouldering fire in the centre of the room that still contained a few red embers and a few wisps of grey smoke, and as he made this gesture he shuddered visibly through the whole length of his being; “burnt to nothingness,” he concluded. “Go,” said the biggest hair in the king’s beard to an extremely active though almost invisible insect, “go and discover for the benefit of all of us whether there is still enough life in those smouldering embers to reduce even the scurf on the navel of a woodlouse to nothingness.” The resonance of so commanding a word plunged all the hairs into silence.

“I would dearly like to see myself, Odysseus,” began Nausikaa suddenly, “some of those golden pieces of armour, just a single shin-piece perhaps, or one of the lighter sort of thigh-pieces, if your treasury is handy, of the armour of Achilles, which by the adjudication of the Olympian gods was bestowed on you in preference to Ajax, the son of Telamon.”

The bowsprit-shaped beard of the king was raised with a jerk at this demand. “Tell somebody, tell Arsinöe,” the old man commanded, “to bring up here to show, to show to the Princess any of those pieces she finds herself strong enough to carry!"

"Yes, my lord the King, certainly, my lord the King," replied the stentorian Herald, scrambling back not only to the floor of the hall from the high window-ledge whither he had helped the daughter of Teiresias to find an uninterrupted refuge for her shy and unwordly mind, but to the reality of his own role in life from which he had been snatched by a sudden amorous illusion, "I will certainly see that the lady Arsinöe brings up at once all that in her heart the Princess covets to behold."

It was then that young Nisos as he leant so uncomfortably against the table was led by the King's command and the Herald's reply to imagine that here indeed was the voice of Atropos herself. "It's I who will be the herald to Arsinöe!" he told himself as he hurried off. He found the Trojan captive helping Eurycleia in the task of washing the most precious of the vessels that had just been used; and taking her aside out of the riotous revelry of Nausikaa's officers and men he explained to her just what the Princess had said; nor did he hesitate to make his own comment upon Nausikaa's request.

"Don't you think, my friend, that what she really wants is to re-establish something of her old link with the old man? Don't you think that in this subtle battle between these two — and I confess, my dear, it's a surprise to me that this complete stranger from Thebes, of whom we know nothing except what she herself tells us, should presume to make such a bold move as to try at once to link her life with his in sexual love so as to forestall any natural return of the old romantic attraction between Odysseus and Nausikaa — don't you think that it's our business to help Nausikaa all we can and to put as many spikes as we possibly can in the wily path of this confounded sorceress?"

Was it Atropos again who now inspired the Trojan captive with a lie worthy of the old Odysseus himself?

"I have already, Nisos Naubolides, thought of this very thing. In fact I have been spending all the twilight hours of this long and heavy evening, while these sailors of the Princess have been making such a barbaric rumpus, in carrying out to a particular tree, yes, Nisos Naubolides, to a special ash-tree in our ghostly Arima here which for years I have been carving into a faint resemblance to Hector of Troy himself, one after another of these golden pieces of the armour that once belonged to Achilles."

Nisos stared at the woman for a second in absolute wonder, even with awe. How clever girls were! How they anticipated everything that could possibly happen, and long before it happened too! So this was the explanation of a premonition he had had for some while that something was going to happen here at home that would turn out to be more serious than any crazy excursions upon which Arcadian Pan might embark with poor little Eione, Tis's small sister!

"Listen, you wise one!" he cried, pulling her close to him by her shoulders and putting his eager lips to her right ear, "can't you think of some trick you and I might play upon this damned woman from Syracuse — no! from Thebes it was! And, by the gods I shall hate the very name of Thebes from now on! Yes, I shall always think of Thebes in future as a filthy city of rats, with walls of stinking rottenness, and towers and domes that are just heaps of dung!

"But tell me, Arsinöe, O please, please tell me, Arsinöe, how we can play some effective trick upon this scriggling and wriggling worm of a woman! You were so clever, Arsinöe, so divinely clever, in making an image of carved wood out of a living tree and hanging the armour of Achilles on it!

Surely you can think of some device, some trick, some stab in the dark, by which you and I together could save the old man from this curst Theban Sorceress! Do, do, I beg and beseech you, Arsinöe, put your good Trojan wits alongside of my poor rocky-island ones and see what we can do! Never mind your coming from Troy. In a thing like this we are at one. Your grand old Priam would agree with me I know; and as for the noble Hector himself, why, he wouldn't hesitate for a second! I know it, I am sure of it, my sweet Arsinöe! Ithaca and Ilium can hold together as well as any civilized pair against this dock-yard Brothel Bitch from the slave-markets of the Orient! Think, think, think, all-wise one! I swear to you that you and I, if we can only put our heads properly together, can forget all that old Helen-of-Troy business and show this confounded Theban witch that she shan't meddle with us in our gratitude to these Phaiakian sea-farers and to their brave Princess Nausikaa.

"For the gods' sake think, my wise one, think out a cunning scheme that'll save our old man from this infernal witch!" Nisos then became silent for a while, holding Arsinöe by the shoulders and pressing her gently against one of the walls of that long narrow down-descending passage, illuminated here and there by richly-oiled and richly-ensconced torches, and echoing at intervals, as the door at the bottom of it opened to let someone in or out, to the excited voices of the Phaiakian sailors, who, in Eurycleia's subterranean kitchen, were enjoying her sagacious hospitality. Then, bending his head down gravely and seriously he touched Arsinöe's forehead with his lips. And it was at this moment that the thought first flashed through his mind that he was the kind of boy who could only be really happy if he had as his wife a woman a lot older than himself.

"For don't you see, Arsinöe, my darling friend," he went on, "don't you see, here there has suddenly come by the very will of Atropos herself, the grandest chance that the old man is ever likely to have to realize his desire to sail over the great Western ocean, under the waves of which Atlantis lies and to discover what unknown lands and continents and peoples and cities and fields of rich grain exist beyond those furthest horizons of water! For don't you see, Arsinöe darling, if this Princess Nausikaa can only be brought to see our old man as she saw him once when she loved him at first sight, why then, my lovely Trojan, let the armour of Achilles be left on your Image of Hector! Odysseus will be the Captain of Nausikaa's ship; and together they will sail into the fabulous memory of all the men who come after us — and, O my dear! may the old little goddess of Fate, Atropos herself, see to it that I am with him in this venture!"

Nisos was again silent, holding her by her shoulders against that wall. And then suddenly, freeing herself from him and throwing his hands back, she held herself erect and closed her eyes.

"I think," she said, speaking clearly and very rapidly, "that it's his beard that puts her off. What I would do if I were you is to make someone you happen to know, someone who wouldn't suffer the punishment you would have to suffer for such a thing in case it turned out badly, cut off with a sharp sword, or a polished knife, or a pair of shears, this teasing and intrusive and conceited and aggressive beard of the old man! Yes, Nisos Naubolides, that is what you must do! I see the doing of it clearly in the curious darkness into which at this moment the mental effort of trying to do exactly what is required has thrown around me. The thing to do is to cut off his beard!

"But one thing I know. The moment that beard of his has been cut off Nausikaa will see him as she saw him at the very first, when, while she was playing ball with her companions, he came straight to her out of the sea. Yes, Nisos Naubolides, that is the only way this witch-woman from Thebes who is already succeeding in enlarging the gulf between these former lovers, can be defeated. I swear to you I am right. I see it as if it were being done at this very moment. The love-light will come into Nausikaa's eyes the second that beard is gone. No, it is not your king's age that keeps them apart, now that they are together again. It is the beard. And Okyrhöe knows it very well and plays upon it. I have been watching her. She doesn't come between them herself if she can help it. She is too wise for that. She leaves it to the beard."

It was at this point — and, whether she was one of Hector's many illegitimate daughters or not, she certainly had a particular kind of intense and absorbed gravity, especially when there was a frown between her eyebrows, which anyone who had ever seen Hector would have recognized as his — that she opened her eyes and laid her fingers upon the young man's sleeve.

"Have you anyone in your mind, Nisos Naubolides," she asked him, "who would be the best person of all persons to do this bold and dangerous thing, whether a man or a woman, whether old or young? I mean," she went on earnestly, after a pause to let a couple of Nausikaa's ship's officers pass down the passage, and Nisos couldn't help admiring the way she instinctively let her fingers slip from his sleeve to his hand and let her head droop towards her shoulder— "I mean the actual cutting it off?" And when she saw he hadn't missed her gesture as the men passed, "Lovers, not conspirators, eh?" she added.

"Well, my beautiful one," he said, while his mind rushed off to the dining-hall and to the animal-shaped chair in which he had left Zeuks, "I think I do know the right one for the handling of this little job. But don't you think we ought to have two strings to our bow in so ticklish a thing? Why don't you go down to the kitchen and drop a few tentative hints in our old lady's ear? She's hand and glove with Odysseus, who treats her as if she were his Grandmother. She knows his mind, I should say, better than anyone else on this earth; and we may be sure she has as little love for Okyrhöe as we have: though I admit it's possible she's less friendly to Nausikaa than we are! However — the immediate business for us is to outwit this bitch from Thebes.

"Besides I think we're agreed, my sweet Trojan, that it would be sheer madness in the old king not to snatch at the heavenly chance of a perfect ship and perfect sailors?"

Arsinöe smiled; and having exchanged a kiss that was at once so friendly and so free from passion that they might have been brother and sister, she went down to the kitchen, while he went up to the dining-hall. He found Odysseus still sipping his wine and still keeping up a curious kind of cerebral dalliance with both the women; while from one end of the table to the other end of the table the two oldest of the Phaiakian ship's officers argued pedantically, technically and very loudly upon certain nice and difficult problems connected with the art of navigation.

Nisos slipped as noiselessly and as respectfully as he could to Zeuks' grotesque chair, and kneeling down before it muttered what was really a sort of extempore prayer, graver than casual listeners might have supposed, to Zeuks and Zeuks' chair, as if they were one creature or one sacred Image. To emphasize and enhance this anthropomorphic and fetish-worshipping gesture, which was one part humorous, two parts entirely serious, and only one part theatrical, he pressed his elbows against the arms of the chair and clasped his fingers in supplication; and then, afraid lest his queer friend should think he was making fun of him, he twisted his head round, as if to make sure that his performance was not missed by those at the table.

Meanwhile, having made sure that Zeuks was not in a trance of any sort, but sufficiently attentive, he whispered to him a realistic and rather grossly-worded summary of his talk with Arsinöe, feeling all the while that what he was kneeling before was neither a chair nor a man but a multiformed malleable monster ready to embrace whatever creature sank into its lap with such a transfiguring power of metamorphosis that it and the creature received into it were transformed into a new and monstrous identity.

Zeuks made no comment upon his friend's whispered monologue murmur save a constant murmur of the same words: "Go on. I understand. Go on. I follow you. Go on, Nisos Naubolides."

This completely passive acceptance of our young friend's startling revelation of what might have been described as "the Plot of the King's Beard" reduced a little the enormity of the sacrilege involved. It was only after they had gone on like this for some time, Nisos explaining, predicting, conjecturing, anticipating, enlarging, revising, and Zeuks listening and indicating that he missed nothing of what he heard, that there was a quite unlooked-for if not especially momentous interruption to the wine-sipping at the high table.

No less a person than the midwife came up the steps from the corridor, holding by the hand her now pregnant sister.

"I have brought to you, O king," she hurriedly announced, offering one of the empty table-chairs to her companion who sank into it with a groan of ineffable relief, "our well-known family prophetess, because they told me that there has come to you from Thebes the daughter of the great prophet Teiresias; and I wanted my sister, who is in the state you now witness, to exchange a few thoughts with her."

Round went the fine cranium and bowsprit beard of the old king as he looked for Pontopereia at the spot where she had recently been; but it was from quite a different quarter that her clear and unperturbed voice reached them. Tired of watching the deep and subtle struggle between the two ladies, the clumsy little wide-eyed creature, whose intellectual grasp of the whole state of the world at that juncture reduced — and how little either of those clever ones knew it! — both Okyrhöe and Nausikaa to a pathetically ordinary level of active, lively, beautiful, ambitious, practical women whose response to life completely shut out all the more cosmic reactions of the human mind, had boldly climbed into the high recess of one of the windows.

Having persuaded, and not without rousing some rather pathetic erotic illusions in that official breast, the pompous Herald to help her with his powerful arms and shoulders, the girl had succeeded in scrambling up into what was one of the most elevated of all that spacious hall's high window-ledges. From this vantage-ground she could not only amuse herself by watching the tricks of Okyrhöe and the shrewd hit-backs of Nausikaa, but she could see between the stalks of the creepers the blackened square of ground which was all that was left of the old Dryad and her oak-tree, after Zeus' angry thunderbolt.

"Something decisive for good and something heavy with the opposite of good are both on the verge of happening." Thus did Pontopereia murmur to herself the prophetic inspiration which came to her straight from that blackened spot in the forest where the old Dryad had perished.

"Something decisive for good, though it is also heavy with the opposite of good, is on the verge of happening," and as Pontopereia tried in these crude words, which she repeated twice over to herself in silence, to express what a breath of wind was now uttering in her ears and uttering a good deal more often than twice, she was suddenly arrested and fascinated by something else. It was a peculiarity of hers to make much of all the chance-shapes and accidental formations that presented themselves whether out-of-doors or in-doors; and what she saw now struck her as a real omen. The Dryad's blackened square of earth, which one general darkness of night had already made part of itself was scrawled over by a thin streak of light from the aperture at which she herself crouched, a streak of light with which chance or destiny was now inscribing, according to the lettering of a language not wholly different from hers, the fitful outlines of a disturbing "N"! Did this "N", the girl wondered, refer to Nisos or to Nausikaa, or possibly even to Nosodea the mother of Leipephile?

"It is in accordance with the ancient custom of our Grecian islands," the Midwife was now saying — indeed she had been uttering sentence after sentence ever since she first appeared but in such a loud, pontifical, assured, self-confident voice, that it was as if she were addressing a crowd of people outside who had no connection with Odysseus or with these two women or with Zeuks or with Nisos.

Odysseus, who had not taken the faintest notice of what the midwife was saying, now suddenly addressed the pregnant woman herself. "Your pains have not begun yet, have they, my dear?" The question was a foolish one and an extremely masculine one; for it was obvious that the pregnant woman's sister whose profession it was to deal with such cases would not have left her quite unassisted while she harangued the world; but there was clearly something about the exhausted creature that appealed to the old king.

Nausikaa rose from her seat. "Where's that old nurse of yours," she enquired; "the one you introduced me to a while ago? Hasn't she got a room in the palace where a poor woman like this can rest in peace and wait her hour?"

Odysseus put down his wine-glass and looked round the room. “Nisos!” he cried. “Please go down to the kitchen and bring Eurycleia up here. I want to talk to her.”

Nisos leaned forward and whispered to the occupant of that grotesque chair, while the chair itself, as he did so, seemed to be perceptibly projecting its roots into the floor and its stag-like horns towards the roof.

“Shall I do what he says?” he whispered to Zeuks, “or shall I pretend not to hear him?”

It was Zeuks himself, however, who at that moment pretended not to hear Nisos; for in his own mind Zeuks was thinking, “Why is it that it gives me no great thrill to know I am the son of Arcadian Pan? Is it because it doesn’t make me immortal and independent of death? In such great matters we men are like animals and do not understand what is going on. If it did make me independent of death it would still be impossible for me to feel independent of it. And what benefit do I get from being the son of a god, I should like to know, when I feel exactly like everybody else?”

These thoughts so dominated Zeuks that they gave him the sensation that he was lost in them and that his personality had disappeared and that it was the chair he sat in that thought these thoughts and that he was merely the name for the language the chair used. The chair, in fact, thought in Zeuks instead of in Greek!

It was indeed the fact that Nisos had actually knelt down with both his elbows propped on the arms of this singular chair where tree-root-legs and hooded covering of stag-horn seemed so much more alive than the man who was sitting in it, that rendered both himself and Zeuks so lost to all that was going on that it wasn’t until quite a crowd of Nisos’ relations were standing round them, nor until the Midwife herself had commenced a formal supplication imploring the goddess Athene to return to them in Ithaca that the spell was broken.

Roused at length from his trance Nisos was amazed to see quite close to him not only Nosodea, the mother of Leipephile, but Leipephile's elder sister Spartika, the priestess of Athene, as well as the old man Damnos Geraios. His amazement indeed had hardly reached its peak when lo! standing alone behind the lot of them, but with the half-protective, half-mocking gaze he knew so fatally well fixed steadily upon himself he saw his own mother!

Pandea looked just as calm, just as confident and self contained and just as serenely poised, as if she had been in her own house. That she was in the presence of the king did not apparently disturb her; nor, though her shrewd gaze was fixed on her son, did she seem at all concerned when without taking the least notice of any of the new-comers Odysseus repeated his command that the young man should hasten to the kitchen and fetch Eurycleia.

When at length Nisos did remove his elbows and release his fingers from the clasp of entranced prayer, and stiffly and painfully lifted, as if his limbs had been in peril of growing as inanimate as the wood-work above them, first one knee and then the other from the floor, he found that the wave-length of excitement was still concentrated on the almost stellar arena where the old warrior's beard with Zodiacal precision was pointed first towards Okyrhöe and then towards Nausikaa.

It certainly was not pointing towards Zeuks or towards this enigmatic chair; though the words by which Nisos had been ordered to fetch Eurycleia were still echoing in the boy's head. No; that bowsprit beard had turned away from them all and was now quivering like a moonlit spear-head over broken water towards the towering figure of the white-robed Spartika.

"Has the old man forgotten," Nisos thought, "that he has told me to fetch Eurycleia; or is he getting blind and doesn't see me at all and fancies that I've already gone down there? Or do the wisest old men, even when they're as wily as he is, when between two ladies like those two and a jug of wine such as he's got there, grow queer in the head? O gods above and gods below!" the boy's thoughts ran on as he pretended to be too absorbed in the condition of his friend Zeuks to make any response either to his mother's questioning concern or to the echo in his ears of the king's unobeyed command, "What on earth", he wondered, turning his gaze with such a rapid jerk that he made it impossible to meet his mother's eye, "What on earth is Spartika up to?"

It was evident to everyone there, except perhaps to Zeuks, who had fallen into one of his deepest gulfs of egoistic self-questioning, that the king was amazed by this apparition of Spartika in her white robes, chanting rather than repeating her religious message to them all.

Nisos had acquired the habit, shared by most of his friends and relations, of thinking nothing of Spartika. To disparage her religion, to question her devotion, to minimize her gifts, to underrate her sincerity, to make sport of the grave intensity she always put into her worship of Athene had been the general custom ever since this girl grew up, among everybody who knew her.

It is indeed one of life's mysteries how this can happen with certain particular young people; and it happens to young men as often as it does to young women. The Goddess herself, however, had encouraged this young priestess of hers from the very start; and it had in recent years become a familiar joke in the Temple that if you wanted to catch a glimpse of the Goddess of Wisdom you would have to cast yourself down in front of the small side-chapel altar which it was Spartika’s duty to decorate with fresh flowers.

If on the contrary you wanted to avoid any risk of encountering the formidable Goddess the thing to do was to say your prayers at her High Altar on the day when the Priest of the Mysteries of Eros and Dionysos was paying his perfunctory and conventional visit to the centre of the island’s traditional worship.

As Nisos turned at this moment towards Spartika, praying that his mother wouldn’t see through his pretence that he hadn’t seen her, and that Odysseus wouldn’t see through his pretence that he hadn’t heard his command, he was relieved of one of his nervous fears by noticing that the pregnant fugitive from Italy had gone to sleep in the chair wherein her sister had ensconced her and that, though the poor lady’s snores made old Damnos Geraios grin like a water-sprite, nobody else appeared to bother about her at all. Her midwife-sister was apparently absorbed in listening to Spartika’s speech; but whenever the impassioned priestess paused to take breath the midwife would interpolate some high-pitched moralizing of her own. Nisos however found himself in a very short time heartily wishing that the midwife would hold her tongue; for it began to strike him more and more strongly that Spartika had been grossly underrated.

“O Great Goddess of Wisdom,” prayed the white-robed figure, “send to thy faithful and devoted worshippers the power to hold fast amid all troubles and tribulations and against all enemies and traitors, and against all chances and accidents, and against all famines and pestilences and elemental disasters, that imperishable gift of pure reason which alone can assauge and mitigate and allay all the ills that our human mortality brings with it! Return, return, O greatest of all Goddesses, thou who wast born of the divine head of the son of Kronos, thou who hast merely to shake the tassels of thy glorious, equitable, thrice-holy Aegis, and all the howling, ravening, raving, blood-drinking, bone-cracking, flesh-devouring minions of mischief who serve the bigots, the dogmatists, the maniacs, the fanatics, the inquisitors who dominate this maddest of all possible worlds are scouted and routed into headlong flight!

“Here in this ancient hall while our world-famous king is entertaining two beautiful princesses and while Pontopereia the daughter of Teiresias — yes, my sweet child, I see that you’re listening to me from your perch like a sea-swallow blown inland before its time in that high window seat! — here, I say, in this old hall, while our king is entertaining his beautiful visitors, have you, his faithful people, forgotten — hast thou our wily sovereign thyself forgotten — the noble, the heroic, the pure, the devoted, the religious-hearted Telemachos, son of Odysseus, son of Laertes.

“What, I ask you, is wrong with all you people, that you are dividing yourselves now into these accurst divisions, some of you wanting Odysseus to rot like a wounded stag till he lies dead in his bed and makes way for Krateros Naubolides, or for Agelaos, son of Krateros Naubolides, the betrothed of my own sister Leipephile, and some wanting him to catch the ears of the whole world with his voyage across the drowned Atlantis to unknown shores beyond the Ultimate Horizons, but none of you, no! not even thou thyself, O King! thou infinitely heroic and infinitely wise lord of adventure by land and sea! — have even so much as considered the claim of this noble, this calm, this beautiful, this dignified, this profoundly intellectual, this spiritual-soul’d, pure-minded only son of Odysseus and Penelope!

“Why, I ask you, my friends, why, I ask you, my sisters and parents and neighbours, why, I ask you, my wily, secretive, many-natured, much-experienced, much-enduring, invincible Odysseus, have you narrowed down this ridiculous dispute to whether an old man is to risk mixing his bones with the bones of the lost populations of drowned Atlantis or is to be allowed to walk in the forests in sunshine and moonlight to listen to the winds and the waves, to survey the motions of the stars and risings and settings of the sun and the moon until he is buried by the side of his faithful wife, when all the while, only a few leagues away, there abides in the deep contemplation of the secret wisdom of the Great Goddess whose shining temple we have among us, the only son of this heroic king and his noble wife?

"I know well that Telemachos seeks no kingship and no kingdom. I know well that Telemachos has his courts and his palaces, his lands and his waters, his armies and his fleets in the high invisible world of the ancient philosophers and thinkers of the human race. I know very well that all you servants of our old heroic king, and thou O King thyself, I know would be with thy servants in this, would have difficulty in persuading Telemachos to add to the intellectual labours of his philosophical life by undertaking the more active and practical burdens of kingship.

"I know very well too that he has great respect for my sister's betrothed suitor, Agelaos Naubolides. But he is a much older man than my sister's Agelaos and if our old and much-enduring adventurer — I speak with all respect, most noble king! — were never to return from this incredible voyage upon which he has fixed his heart, his soul and his unusual brain — according to the natural ways of life it seems quite likely that my young friend Agelaos would not have to wait so very long for his turn at the game of Kingship. Therefore let us all, let every one of us, I say, be prepared for the future in the strength of our great Goddess Athene!"

Here the tall girl bent her head, smiled at her mother, Nosodea, who was taking the whole thing with the utmost matter-of-fact placidity and had just moved to the side of the pregnant woman who was now awake again, and quietly accepted the chair which the declamatory Midwife, talking quite hilariously now, dragged to her side.

And then, to Nisos' relief, Odysseus, who himself had risen from his seat and moved up close to the pregnant woman's side, once more requested him, but quite gently and apparently taking for granted that his earlier orders had been unheard, to hasten at once to the kitchen and fetch Eurycleia.

"And tell her, my boy," the old king added, "that I'd be glad if she could make up a bed for this woman so that her child can be born, even if the birth is delayed for a day or two, somewhere within these walls."

Lifting his head and straightening his shoulders while he whispered a hasty assurance to Zeuks that he'd be back in a pulse-beat, Nisos was just starting on this quest when Odysseus made a sign that he would like a private word with him before he left the hall. When he obeyed this sign and was standing so close to the old man that he could smell the wine he'd been drinking and even feel his own chin tickled by the foremost hairs of that still undaunted and still defiant beard, the old man took advantage of the Midwife's formidable back being momentarily bent over her sister to whisper to his young emissary that it was extremely likely that the father of this expected infant was none other than that king of the Latins whose defeat by Aeneas and his Trojan followers had, it seemed, led to the founding in Italy of a New Troy upon a group of Seven Hills, not without the aid of the most famous of all cave-nymphs and not without the help of human infants nourished by the dugs of wolves!

"So you can tell our nurse, my boy, if you find her in a difficult mood, that this baby, if a bed is made for its mother here, may turn out to be the heir to all the riches of the Italian Peninsula!" It was at that moment that

Nisos became aware that his own mother, Pandea, was cautiously, slowly, obstinately, threading her way towards him, for, drawn as women always are, by the twin-shadows of birth and death, the wife of the rival claimant to their island-throne had naturally an extra magnet tugging at her bosom in addition to the loadstone weighted by both birth and death.

But so quickly had it got about among the neighbours that the most romantic as well as the most human of all the old king's adventurous lady-loves had suddenly arrived along with Ajax, son of Telamon, regarded by all the world as dead, that popular curiosity, most of all in the women, had already crowded the corridor and the steps with people and was now filling the dining-hall.

Pandea had always been one of the most neighbourly and gossip-loving of ladies and this made her present passage through the crowd to reach her son Nisos by no means rapid. She was in fact caught by the belt and by the folds of her gown at every step.

At any moment now Nisos could have hurried off, thus obeying the king, escaping from his mother, and precluding any untimely labour-pains for the woman here; but he suddenly felt himself powerfully seized by the left wrist. It was Odysseus. "Where," cried the old man in a husky, agitated voice, "where, in the name of all the gods, is Ajax?"

All Nisos could do in reply to this, for in his intense desire to outwit Okyrhöe, and in his new and sudden alliance with Arsinöe, he had forgotten Ajax altogether, was to blurt out all he knew.

"Zeuks told me just now," he cried, "that he had found him dead and had buried him with his own hands." The one word "Where?", which the old king uttered on hearing this in a very curious tone, left a queer and complicated impression on the mind and nerves of Nisos. The boy could see that to the old man at this moment the idea of being confronted once again by his ancient comrade in arms of those long years of the Trojan War had touched something in his soul that was deeper and more essential and more important to him than all his romantic feeling for Nausikaa and all his libidinous feeling, or emotional feeling, or companionable intellectual feeling, for Okyrhöe.

The figure of Ajax, as the old man recalled it now, acted like a magic talisman upon him, restoring to him a whole existence of thoughts and sensations, of undertones and overtones of feeling, of desperations and ecstasies, so utterly remote from all he was experiencing at this moment that to plunge into them, and swim about in them, and inhale great draughts of their encircling atmosphere, was a startling shock.

Odysseus was indeed so affected by this sudden mental vision of Ajax that the one single view of himself and his whole life that he could endure, and that struck him as ground firm enough to fall back upon at a crisis, was the view of himself that accompanied his present resolution to sail across the ocean that had drowned Atlantis. This intention, this purpose did alone, the old man felt at that moment, justify his existence as nothing had done since in rivalry with the rest of the Greek leaders he entered Ilium in the Wooden Horse.

Escaping from his king therefore, with almost as much relief as he escaped from his mother, for he felt a sudden longing to be plotting and planning with Arsinöe again, Nisos pushed his way hurriedly through the crowd and was soon pleading passionately and eagerly the cause of the unborn babe, who might turn out to be the inheritor of the longest-descended racial tradition in Italy. “Well, if he’s set his heart on it,” the old lady finally conceded, “there’s nothing to be gained by thwarting his wishes. O you men! you men! He has no notion, nor, I expect, have you, closer though you are than he is to the womb out of which you all come, how near to her pains this woman is, but if — —”

Nisos interrupted her. “It was her sister, the midwife, Granny dear, who brought her to Odysseus, not I. I can’t remember ever seeing her. But I daresay I may have seen her when I was little, and before she went to Italy. She lived with the Nymph in the Cave, Granny. You know about that Nymph in the Cave in Italy, don’t you?”

But the old lady’s contradictory mood wasn’t soothed away by this. “I’ve known too many caves and too many Nymphs already!” she cried. “You and your Nymphs! What I would like to see, Nisos Naubolides, would be no more nymphs and no more caves but a well-built Palace in a well-built City with a well-trained army to protect it from pirates and murderers and thieves, and with well-trained servants to send on the King’s business, without having to have recourse to —— But what am I doing, chattering here with a baby like you when an old woman’s proper work’s up yonder? Here! give me my cloak, girl; and you were best come with me too, foreigner though you be, for us can never tell with these cave-nymphs! This wench may be dropping a monster with horns and tail before we’ve got her to bed!”

As may be conjectured these words were addressed to the alert Arsinöe, who with a quick glance at Nisos helped the old woman into the garment she required and assisted her up the passage to the hall. Before he followed them thither, however, our young friend couldn’t resist a word with his old comrade Tis whom he found naked to the waist working furiously between oven and wash-trough on his left and red ashes under a great cauldron on his right.

Dragging about with them across the floor their own foreign blankets, which they had brought up from the ship lest they should be stolen, were half-a-dozen sailors who had been so freely and hilariously partaking of the old nurse's hospitality that, now the feast was over, they found it hard to keep awake.

Nisos persuaded Tis to put on his tunic again and leave his wash-tub. Then in a voice too low for those of the foreigners who were not asleep to catch his words he tried to make clear to his friend the pressing necessity for cutting off the beard of Odysseus so that Nausikaa should see him as he was when she first set eyes on him. To his surprise he found that this daring stroke met with obstinate and determined resistance from Tis.

"I don't like it: I don't like it: I don't like it," he kept repeating. "It's an insult to the old man — an insult that I'd never consent to see practised on my old grand-dad Moros, an insult that you'll never persuade me to help you to carry through."

"But don't you see, old friend," pleaded Nisos, considerably disturbed by this unexpected opposition, "don't you see it's essential that Princess Nausikaa should recognize in our king the man she loved the moment she saw him coming out of the sea?"

But Tis shook his head. "You young folk always exaggerate and overrate the effect of any mortal thing that strikes you as romantic. How do you know that cutting off our king's beard will make him look young again? There are other signs of old age than the greyness or the whiteness of our hair. Odysseus had nothing like those deep lines at the side of his mouth, for instance, or those other lines, deeper still, in the centre of his forehead when he first met his princess. No, no! You know very well he hadn't! He couldn't have had.

"No, you're making a great mistake if you think our old hero's beard has anything to do with it! In fact, if anybody tried to meddle with our king's beard when his servant Tis was around that person had better take care! It wouldn’t be that man’s beard that would come off. It would be his head!”

“But don’t you see, Tis, old friend, it will only be in the interest of our king, and for the sake of the happiness of our king, and in order that our king may have all the honour and glory he wants, that his beard will be cut off. Better lose a beard, than a kingdom! Better lose a beard than the enchanting Love of your proud youth! O Tis, Tis, don’t be an obstinate Tis, a reactionary Tis, an antiquarian Tis! The world has to move on. Life has to move on. Customs have to change. Habits have to change. There was a time for beards. That time is past. Beards have to be — —”

But Nisos stopped suddenly. He was shocked at the expression he saw on Tis’s face. He felt in the marrow of his bones a lively shudder of fear. “Then it is really and truly possible,” he told himself, “for old Tis to give me such a clap across the ear-hole that my head will roll from my neck and go bouncing into — —”

But his thoughts were interrupted, and Tis’s attention was turned by a sudden loud uproar which descended the passage from the hall above; and they both became aware of shrill cries and resounding tramplings and even of the sound of bronze striking against bronze and iron striking against iron.

The foreign sailors leapt to their feet and drew from their belts their double-edged knives; while Nisos couldn’t help noticing, even in the distraction of that uproar, how carefully these men folded up the blankets on which they’d been lying and tucked them under their arms.

Both Tis and he were out of the kitchen and up the passage and forcing their way into the hall before either of them had time even to imagine what had happened. But it was soon plain enough to them both. There, confronting the king who was leaning forward across the back of the throne on which he had been seated, was Nisos’ brother Agelaos, the eldest son of Krateros and Pandea, and close to him was none other than Leipephile the young man’s betrothed, while, facing the pair of them, on one side of Odysseus was Nausikaa and on the other were Okyrhöe and Pontopereia.

The uproar that had reached the kitchen came from two opposing groups of angry armed men, one of whom was shouting abuse of the House of Odysseus and the other abuse of the House of Naubolides. Matters might have got worse at any minute and serious blood-shed might doubtless have ensued, if an event had not occurred so unexpected by both parties that they turned, as if by mutual consent, from their furious confrontation of each other; and both sides gazed with awe-struck amazement at what they saw.

And what they saw was indeed a sufficient wonder to quell the wildest altercation. Walking quite gently, slowly, carefully and quietly, his wounded wing evidently grown again, and its roots completely healed, while the long feathery tips of both wings were folded against the animal’s sides like those of a colossal moth, there came up through the crowd, from the corridor of the pillars, the winged horse Pegasos. On his back, seated there with the utmost ease, and evidently in a mood of radiant high spirits, was the young girl Eione, Tis’s little sister, who the moment she caught sight of her brother by the side of Nisos kissed one of her hands to them both while with the other she waved in the air an extraordinary-looking object which she was clasping in triumph.

Pegasos bore her straight up to the old king, the two contending groups of people automatically separating to let them pass. When they reached the throne, across the back of which Odysseus, with great practical shrewdness, was already leaning forward above its empty seat, his body wedged between the chair’s back, across which he leaned, and the massive table which protected his rear, Pegasos stopped, and lowering his head, consented to enjoy the natural equine satisfaction of munching a couple of large lettuce-leaves which the old King lost no time in snatching from the table behind him and placing on the seat of the throne for the god-like creature's special delectation.

At that moment all the uproar ceased and so eager and anxious were both parties to catch every word of the dialogue between Eione and the king that in the silence which fell upon the whole company the sound of Pegasos munching the lettuce-leaves was audible from the door of the steps to the corridor to the door of the passage to the kitchen.

But everybody in the place was soon conscious of an absolutely different sound, a sound that closely accompanied the winged horse's munching of lettuce-leaves. This came from the mysterious object which Eione was now showing to Odysseus across the horse's bowed head. It was a sound like the sound of the wind. And the sound in this object was not limited to the sound of the North Wind or of the South Wind or of the East Wind or the West Wind. It was just the wind. It was all the winds together. And it was so powerful that it made many people at the back of the hall, who were unable to see that the sound was caused by what the girl was showing to the king, look up at the windows beneath the roof at one of which Pontopereia had been recently sitting and through which they supposed this wild rush of wind must be entering the hall.

The real power of it could only have been appreciated at that moment however by some observer who could read human thoughts; for this roaring, sighing, crying, wailing, laughing, lamenting, groaning, shrieking sound was so startlingly an embodiment of the real wind that it produced upon those who were nearest to the object out of which it came the identical effect that the hearing of such a wind, had it been real, would naturally have evoked. It made Odysseus feel more strongly than he had ever felt before his absolute determination to sail over the waters into which Atlantis had gone down. It carried Nausikaa back to her girlhood upon an irresistible rush of the wings of memory.

She had a hundred times recalled that day when she and her playmates were disporting themselves at their game of ball, in relaxation from washing their clothes, when the godlike stranger suddenly appeared among them and clasped her knees in a passionate appeal for help. O how well she remembered how he had followed up the impression he made upon her by uttering the hope that when she met her true mate, he and she together would soon find out how such a true union between lovers could be lucky to their friends and unlucky to their foes; and how they themselves would alone know what it really meant.

It brought to Pontopereia the feeling that she was gloriously giving herself up to a thrilling and convincing rush of prophetic inspiration. It raced through the mind of Nisos with the impossible romantic wish that somehow, somewhere, he would be triumphantly justified in possessing both Eione and Pontopereia as his Loves!

To Okyrhöe this sound of the wind, issuing forth from Eione's gift to Odysseus, brought a sense of deep, abysmal, desolate loneliness. She found herself identifying her own inmost being with this mysterious wind that had suddenly appeared, only the river Styx knew from whence, and which was associated with this ghostly "Arima" that sooner or later she would have to face if she remained with Odysseus.

While the wind of day and the wind of night were thus working upon various living creatures in various different ways, Eione was explaining in meticulous detail precisely how this extraordinary instrument worked; how it could be stopped, how intensified, how diminished, how directed, how reduced, and how expanded at the will of the wearer. Thus there was no special start or spasm of astonishment in that dining-hall when finally, just before Pegasos had lifted his head from the last lettuce-stalk left on the seat of the throne, Odysseus took the thing from the girl’s hands and raising it carefully in both his own fixed it on his head.

Once on his head, though it had a certain vague resemblance to a brazen helmet from which hung long twisting snakes, it looked much more like a complicated, convoluted sea-shell, a sea-shell that might have been worn by the sea-god Triton, or even by some greater deity of the salt deep. After a few more less solemn directions from Eione as to its use, the old king removed it from his head and half-turning round placed it beside his wine-cup on the table. He then, in the face of the whole company, gratefully, respectfully, and devotedly kissed both Eione’s hands, caressed the head of Pegasos, and instructed Tis, who was staring awestruck at his sister, to take the bridle of the winged horse and lead him, if his girl-rider saw fit, to a more restful feast in the royal stable adjoining the cow-stall of Babba.

When Tis had led away his sister and Pegasos the old king summoned Nisos, who had engaged Pontopereia in a whispered conversation behind the backs of Nausikaa and Okyrhöe, and told him to fetch Zeuks. This command he had no difficulty in obeying, for the son of Arcadian Pan had fallen into such a deep sleep in that queer-backed and queer-legged chair that it was easier to get him awake and to escort him, a bit dazed but no longer muttering in his sleep about “Ajax and the Lightning”, to where the king and his two ladies were once more seated at the table with their heads close together, than it would have been to explain to him all that had happened since he had fallen asleep.

But if it had been difficult to arouse the great-grandson of “still youthful Maia” from his trance in a chair that had both roots and horns, Odysseus did not seem to have the least difficulty in seating him on the throne now calmly and resolutely vacated.

“Fetch me, child,” he said to Nisos, laying a caressing hand on the boy’s head and drawing up for himself, to the acute vexation of Okyrhöe, an empty chair to the side of Nausikaa, “my club of Herakles, the weapon called ‘Dokeesis,’ from the entrance porch.”

There wasn’t a person in that hall that night who didn’t hear these momentous words; nor was there one who didn’t catch their significance. This was in fact a declaration that, armed as he would be when Nisos brought “Dokeesis”, and possessed as he now was of the Helmet of the Winds, the oldest and weakest and frailest, but far, O far the wisest, of the Fates, Atropos herself, the great-aunt of all the heavenly powers, had decided in an uncontroverted decree that, whatever the issue, Odysseus, King of Ithaca, was to sail over the towers of Lost Atlantis before he perished after the manner of men.

So intense had been the fascination and expectation throughout that great hall that when Nisos in a shorter time than seemed possible returned with the Club of Herakles and placed it in Odysseus’ hands there occurred once more that curious kind of hush that is in truth when it falls upon any mixed crowd of men and women the most mysterious force for the working of miracles that exists in this solar dimension of the multiverse.

“Listen, wise Fly,” murmured the Moth, as they peered together out of the life-crack of their wheel-less conveyance, “I think the Sixth Pillar is talking to our All-in-All.”

The Fly did listen: and it heard the Pillar tell the club that Poseidon and Aidoneus had decided to break the covenant they once made with Zeus over Atlantis when they allowed him to drown it under the western ocean as a punishment for its refusal to believe he existed. They promised him they would let it stay drowned and that no man should ever cross the place of its drowning. This solemn covenant they have now decided to tear to shreds; and, if it comes to a fight, they say that Two are stronger than One.

“I am wondering,” murmured the Moth, “whether it isn’t my duty to leave you tonight and fly at my best speed to the Priest of Eros, lest, my duty neglected, some world-disaster may overtake us.”

“If you feel like that, you’d better go to him,” hissed the Fly, in jealous rage. “And leave you alone in here?” “Where I am,” replied the Fly in his metaphysical pride, “there is always Eternity.”

The moth groaned. “I must, but O! it’s so hard, learn to love Eternity;” and she stroked with her left antenna one of the fly’s wings.

But the fly said to himself. “What shall I do if the King takes us down into Atlantis itself? There must be millions of dead flies down there.”

Meanwhile Nisos was walking round and round the great table thinking out very carefully just what he would say to Eione to persuade her to go with them. In his heart he was so indescribably relieved at the disappearance not only of his own relations, such as his brother and his brother’s betrothed, together with Pandea, his mother, and Nosodea, along with Spartika and the midwife, but of almost all the disputants and contenders of the general public of Ithaca, that he could only listen with amused and sympathetic satisfaction while the King explained to Zeuks that he had decided to put him into full, absolute, and complete charge of the Palace, the Temple, the chief Harbour, the lesser harbours, and all the caves, shrines, sanctuaries, and sacred places of the Island of Ithaca to guard, to hold and to sustain intact, until he, its only lawful sovereign and ruler, should return from his Voyage across the drowned Atlantis; “and take from you again the rights and privileges he now makes over to you and leaves unchallenged in your possession”.

At this point Odysseus laid his hand upon the strange object brought to him by Eione. “The Princess Nausikaa, here present,” he went on, “has consented to accept my company and that of my armour-bearer and Hetairos, Nisos Naubolides, together with my friend Okyrhöe the Theban and together with Pontopereia the daughter of Teiresias. At the moment I cannot tell you whether Eione, the sister of my Herdsman Tis, will also come with us; but I have the Princess’s permission to invite her to do so, and my impression is she will do so. Just as I make thee, Zeuks, my vice-regent and sole representative among men, so, among women I leave my old Nurse Eurycleia in absolute and unchallenged control. I must add that there has just come into my possession the Helmet of Proteus, wearing which it will be possible for me to visit drowned Atlantis beneath the very waters that drowned her.”

It was then that Nausikaa rose to her feet and said: “What my Lord Odysseus has told you is the truth.”

CHAPTER X

"WELL," SAID NISOS to Akron, the Master of the ship "Teras", "she's got through that anyway!"

"O she's a sly old bird, our good black ship, when matters get really serious," replied Akron, "and there's another thing about her which I wonder if you've noticed; I mean about her motion?"

"I may have noticed it and again I may not. Different eyes notice different things."

"They sure do; and they are also blind to different things. I was blind myself just now when the Pillars of Herakles vanished over the Eastern Horizon."

"Why, so they have! And I'd been watching so steadily to see them go! It's no use. You'll never make a sailor of me."

"I used to say that very thing once myself! But it passes, Nisos, it passes!"

Nisos looked at him gravely. "I take it you don't feel the slightest sensation of nervousness, or strangeness, not to speak of simple terror, when from this old black ship of yours you can see no sign or hint or trace of land? Don't you feel any fear, master, when with nothing between you and this black abyss but a few scrabbled bits of wood, if you don't mind my saying so, and a few shaky planks blown by the wind and tossed on the wave, you give yourself up to whatever fate awaits you?"

"Well, I wouldn't deny, my dear lad," replied Akron, the ship's master, "that sometimes, now and then, I have that feeling, just as we all have when a spear or an arrow comes too close to our head! I get it, for instance, when

I see the spouting of a whale, or catch sight of one of those great sharks, or one of those terrifying Hekatoncheiroi, such as Briareos must have looked when he smuggled down in the throne of the heavenly father and spread out on all sides his appalling suckers, each one of which would be capable of squeezing to death a man like you or me.

"But I really think I've got over those first sensations of what you might call pure elemental panic. I think I've come to be more or less reconciled to there being, as you say, Nisos, so much water under us and so much air above us! But such a lot of water and such an immensity of empty air does make a person feel small."

"I don't think," Nisos went on in a meditative tone, "that its exactly the mass of water, or the infinity of air, that makes us feel small. I think it is the ceasing of accustomed labour and the idleness that leaves the mind free to follow its fancies."

The ship's master watched his young passenger with a shrewd eye as he talked in this way. He thought Nisos was trying to make him believe that he was analysing his feelings with the utmost calm, like an experienced traveller recording his reactions when the most dangerous and agitating moments of what he was going through had arrived and passed.

"The kid would like me to think," he told himself, "that he accepts these monstrous enormities of air and water without one single natural shiver."

Their ship was named the "Teras" or the "Prodigy" and its master with whom Nisos had already made friends was a man called Akron who came from Lilaia, a town in Phokis, and was of a reserved and reticent but of a decidedly philosophical turn of mind. Akron came, like Tis, of farming stock, and although his father had kept an Inn in the main street of Lilaia, he had a great-uncle, of about the same age as old Moros, who continued running the family farm.

The second officer, whose name was Thon, had quite a different temperament from Akron and a very different bringing-up. He came of an old military family in Phrygia with a long and turbulent history. The “Teras” had two decks below the top one on which Nisos was standing as he talked with Akron. It was from the upper one of these that the four long oars projected that kept the “Teras” moving when the wind failed.

The mast was fixed in the keel of the vessel and reached up through both the two lower decks to where, on the top-deck, quite close to the spot on which our friend was now talking with Akron, the huge sail, made of the same sort of cloth that Odysseus had tried so desperately to obtain in Ithaca, was now carrying the “Teras” over the waves in a style that must have delighted every true sailor’s heart on board.

The way the vessel was behaving at this moment in a wind almost straight from the South-East, was certainly especially pleasing to the two men who just then were supervising the “protonoi” or “forestays”, the “kaloi” or “halliards”, and the “huperoi” or “braces”. These men were a pair of brothers, whose names, Pontos and Proros, were enough in themselves to suggest seafaring ability, but whose home-harbour, Skandeia in Kythera, was known over all Hellas to breed the best deck-hands in the world.

As he listened attentively and politely, though it must be confessed just a little cynically, to our friend Nisos’ rather prolonged but eloquent discourse on what particular feelings, whether enjoyable or the reverse, were aroused in him by air and water, Akron remained, according to the custom then prevalent in that best of all sea-going Hellenic circles, quietly, though not unsympathetically, detached from the chatter that was proceeding so happily between Pontos and Proros.

Both the brothers from Kythera were small in regard to their bodily form but they were smaller still in regard to the size of their skulls. Indeed so diminutive were these Kytharean craniums that the most studious and experienced of phrenologists would have been puzzled to say where there was room for any sort of bump of worship or for any sort of bump of mathematics or for any sort of bump of metaphysics in these quaint little rondures that resembled a couple of oak-apples as they kept bobbing up and down, rallying each other and making sport of the entire universe.

The oarsmen in the second deck, above sea-level, were not at that moment using their long, thick, heavy oars, which were the largest oars to be seen at that epoch in any harbour in the world, but had pulled them out of the water and were holding them across their knees while they themselves leant back in their seats, talking, or throwing "astragaloi", the special kind of dice that sailors preferred, or just settling themselves to sleep. There were four of these oarsmen, a couple for each side of the "Teras" as she breasted the waves, Klytos and Teknon on her starboard side, and Euros and Halios on her port side.

All these four men came from the immediate vicinity of the palace of Nausikaa's parents and their families were personally well-known to her. It was down on the third deck that the passengers' cabins were situated; and the present possessors of these cabins had to be selected without any exhausting consideration of personal feelings. One of them for instance was shared between Nausikaa and Okyrhöe; and another between Pontopereia and Eione; while a third was given up entirely to Odysseus.

The most striking thing about the "Teras" however was not the number of her decks nor the number of her cabins. It was her Figure-Head. If the beard of Odysseus, which already had played its part in one of the queerest palace-plots ever revealed by a chronicler, bore, as has already been noted, a strong resemblance to a ship's bowsprit, the real bowsprit of the "Teras', had no sooner entered the harbours of the world than it was recognized as the most striking of all figure-heads known to civilization. It represented a unique creature whose form and shape had been invented by the Ruler of Lost Atlantis who had concluded the work by placing on the creature's scaly neck his or her own head with all its striking features.

The name of this Ruler was unknown and the peculiarity of its unusual head was that it was hard to imagine it as the head of any mortal or immortal man, and still harder to accept it as the head of a god or head of the horribly scaly neck to which it was and is attached. This mysterious Being, whose extraordinary features were not those of a man or a god or a beast or a monster, was the author of a long poem about the beginning and the end of everything, a poem which still remains the greatest oracle of man's destiny existing upon the earth.

The unfortunate thing about this tremendous hieroglyph is that by reason of the drowning of the continent that produced it, and by reason of its being chained with golden chains to the altar of the Hundred and Twenty-Five Gods of that sunken continent, only those who were permitted to read it before the waves covered the altar to which it was bound know anything of its secret; and among these only the Seven Wise Men of Italy have so much as begun to penetrate its contents; and these have only revealed the fact that it is landscape superimposed upon landscape rather than rhythm upon rhythm that is the method of its message.

Since, however, when any of these Seven Wise Men perish the remaining ones appoint successors there is still a hope that in spite of the punishment inflicted by Zeus, the wisdom of Atlantis-will never be entirely lost.

While Nisos was struggling to be as prophetic as he could in his talk to the Master of the "Teras", Pontopereia, the daughter of a prophet, was doing the same sort of thing, only with more subtlety, in regard to Eione, as the two girls sipped the well-made red wine, mixed with plenty of pure spring-water, with which Nausikaa's stores provided them, not to mention nibbling a few particularly well-spiced biscuits from Arabia, a taste for which the princess inherited from her mother.

"Oh don't say that, darling Eione! I know so well the feeling you have that drives you to say it; but we women really must learn to slip under or slip over these crude urges of Nature that lift us off our feet and force us to utter things like that! The great thing is, I know I'm right in that anyway, the great thing is always to have two lives going; one of them the life we share with our friends, and the other the life we enjoy with our own mind and with our own senses.

"To keep this secret second life going, even while we are living the other to the full, is the supreme trick of existence for girls such as you and I."

Eione lifted up her shapely legs from the couch where hitherto the two girls had been lying face to face, each pair of bare feet resting motionless against the neck of the owner of the other pair. But the easy nonchalance of that chaste yet familiar position was completely broken up by this provocative movement on the part of Tis's sister. Their position blotted out from the daughter of Teiresias all view of her companion's face. All she could see of her now was a couple of white shins and the extremely intimate shadows and outlines between them.

"When you talk of the life we 'share with our friends'," enquired a girlish voice from behind these uplifted knees, "do you mean our lovers?"

"Certainly I do," replied Pontopereia almost sharply, "if we have such idiots; but what was in my mind was nothing as sexual as that."

"Would you advocate living this double life even after marriage?"

"Most certainly I would! Don't you see, my sweet, it is only after the actual moment of union has been consummated by the loss of our virginity that men, and women, can make love, as people call it, on equal terms. But does the ecstasy of such embraces so absorb us both as to completely blot out and obliterate our separate identities? Don't you suppose, my lovely one, that we still go on — I won't say thinking thoughts that have have no connection with the passionate pleasure we're enjoying, but thinking such a thought as— 'oh how utterly and entirely this heavenly, this divine sensation beats all other sensations I've ever known!'"

"But," came the voice from behind the upraised legs, that is to say from behind the whole of Eione from the waist down, "but doesn't what you're now saying, my friend, reduce the passion of love to an extremity of purely selfish sensation?"

Pontopereia at this drew up her own legs with an abrupt jerk; but straightened her back as she did so, and leaned forward, sitting on her heels, and resting the palms of both her hands upon the uplifted knees of the girl before her.

"I confess, my dear," she said, "that I'm talking of something of which I've had no experience. But surely if this ecstasy of love's embrace, of which such a lot is made, is as transporting and enthralling as we're always being told it is, neither of the parties concerned can possibly have the detachment of consciousness left inside them to say anything to themselves around or about or above or beneath the absolutely absorbing sensation they are caught up in and which is blinding them to all else?"

A sudden outburst of silvery laughter came from the girlish face upon which, with her hands on the young creature's knees, Pontopereia now gazed with unpretended admiration.

"Aren't you confusing," were the words that issued from that radiant but extremely simple countenance, "what we feel when we're imagining a love-ecstasy in some hot exciting trance of deliciousness when alone by ourselves with what we feel in our first real love-night?"

"You mean, Eione darling, that when we're in the act of making love we think more of our lover and more of his feelings than of our own?"

"The gods forbid!" cried the excited girl. "Did I hear you utter the word 'more'? Of course we think 'more' of his feelings for us than of ours for him! Isn't it the delicious heat of his feelings for us that rouses ours and that alone has the power to arouse ours?" Pontopereia perceived that she had indeed entered a sphere of philosophic analysis where more intimate experience than had yet been hers was required if she were to see the thing in proper perspective.

So with a view to changing the subject she changed her physical position and sliding both her own feet to the floor she edged herself along the side of the bed, till bending down above her friend she was able to smooth the girl's fair hair from her forehead.

"You haven't half told me, you know, what happened after you rode off with Arcadian Pan and with Eurybia and Echidna. Where on earth did those two leave you? What happened to the horse with the flowing mane? Did Pan himself go down under the waves when you got to the place where the land of Atlantis had been drowned?"

Before beginning any answer to all this Eione thrust her friend's hand away. "Don't do that! It makes me nervous! It's what Thrasonika our school-teacher used to do."

Pontopereia hurriedly withdrew her hand. She had received such a shock that, hardly aware of what she was doing, she licked the longest finger of the hand that had not been to blame and with it gently stroked the erring hand as if to cure it of its impetuosity.

"I can tell you of course," went on Eione, seized by a sudden gust of confidential school-girlishness, "because you weren't at school in Ithaca.

But it was because of Thrasonica going on stroking her hair that Amaryllis Leporides drowned herself."

Pontopereia's face expressed all the astonishment she felt, though by no means all the moral indignation she felt. Eione nodded vigorously. "Nobody but the three youngest of us know," she repeated; throwing into her tone the implication that in Ithaca a girl's sophistication decreased rather than increased as she grew up.

And indeed this was a view of insular as compared with continental education which struck Pontopereia as entirely correct.

"Nisos told me," announced Pontopereia, standing on her feet now, and sufficiently disturbed by the rebuff Eione had given her to hit back — woman versus woman — by dragging in Nisos, "that the great Epic Poem about the Beginning of All Things by the Ruler of Atlantis brings in the little island where Arcadian Pan must have given you the Helmet of Proteus and told Pegasos to carry you to Odysseus! But Nisos tells me this little island, which he says is called 'Wone' and must be pronounced so as to rhyme with 'tone' is really the top of the tallest of the mountains of drowned Atlantis, a mountain which used to be called Kunthorax and whose foot-hills rose from a vast fir-forest which was only a couple of days' ride from the great city of Gom which was — and I suppose still is, only it's under the water — the capital of Atlantis."

Eione had listened to all this with her eyes tightly shut and her whole face quiescent, as if, though perhaps not actually asleep, the treatment of this crucial subject by her philosophic friend had a somnolent effect upon her. But she was compelled to open her eyes, and open them pretty wide too, when Pontopereia seized the pole, with which they regulated the sky-light to the deck above, the sky-light from which came most of their air and, when they hadn't lit their oil-lamp, all their light, and opening it wider than they had ever done before, shouted in a shrill voice: “Is Nisos Naubolides up there? If he is, for the sake of all the gods tell him to come down here for a moment!”

So loudly did the youthful voice of the daughter of Teiresias ring through the whole interior of the “Teras” that it crossed the mind of Odysseus as he swung himself backwards and forwards in his cabin that it was possible that one of these two young creatures might have tried to put an end to the life of the other; and vaguely endeavouring to allow this imaginary supposition its full weight the old adventurer caused his hammock of small cords to swing rhythmically backwards and forwards to a sort of musical argument in favour of the advantage of being alive compared with the advantage of being dead.

The four oarsmen who while so fresh a wind filled the great sail were able to take their pleasure with their special dice or “astragaloi”, and had just decided that until supper-time they would make the game more lively by making it less individualistic, turning it in fact into a battle between the starboard and larboard oarsmen of the “Teras”, with Teknon and Klytos on the starboard side, and Euros and Halios on the larboard or port side; and it was this new and more communal game that was broken up by Pontopereia’s cry.

Having put its violent lid upon the dicing of these astragoloi-players the girl’s quivering cry rang from end to end of the top-most deck where Proros and Pontos, who were managing the ropes which held the great bulging sail upon whose one, taut, open curve their speed and safety of their speed entirely depended, repeated the cry at once, and not content with repeating it, they both imitated it, and did this so successfully that the first officer, Thon, who by general consent rather than by professional succession had become the outlookman of the “Teras”, ransacked the sea’s surface with his eyes in search of some broken-winged siren before he made it known to Akron the ship's master, that the young man to whom that same skipper was courteously listening was wanted below.

"Better go down at once, my boy! There's some serious trouble among your women-folk! I pray it's between those young ones, and not between those older ones! Down with you, my son! Down with you! No! no! Don't wait a second, lad! These troubles inside the ship are far more serious than anything that goes on in the City of Gom or at the top of Kunthorax; or on the Island of Wone. Oh, you'll settle this trouble, my lad, whatever it is! You've got the look of an ambassador. Down with you now; and quick about it!"

But it was several minutes before Nisos, buoyed up by feeling that it was especially exciting to be called upon to decide a quarrel between the daughter of Teiresias and the sister of Tis, managed to reach even the second deck of the "Teras"; and it was perhaps just because he kept telling himself that it was so quaint that a son of Krateros and Pandea should be the one destined by Atropos to hold these uncertain scales that he didn't clamber down the ship's first ladder with more headlong speed.

The ladder from the second deck to the third deck was at the stern of the vessel, whereas the one he had just descended was near the prow and the astonishing neck, scaled, feathered, wrinkled, infundibular, that belonged to the figure-head of the "Teras", the figure-head which so far he had only seen from the rear but which Akron assured him, when seen from the front, represented the most intellectual visage ever carved out of any substance upon earth by flint or stone or bronze or iron and was the face of "the unknown ruler" of Atlantis. Thus in order to reach the ladder to the lowest deck of the "Teras" where were the three cabins occupied at present by Nausikaa and Okyrhöe, by Eione and Pontopereia, and by Odysseus himself, Nisos had to step over the big round oars, either of Teknon and Klytos on the starboard side, or of Euros and Halios on the port side; and he selected the latter.

He did this, as we so often say, “for a trivial reason” but as we all, especially those of us who are historians, know only too well, reasons like this always appear to everybody trivial before the result is revealed, and the event which is the result monumentalized, made clear to all. His “trivial reason” was that the oarsman Euros had that deep indentation behind his skull and above his neck, which certain experiences had taught our young prophet was an infallible sign of refinement and of quite special sensitivity.

Greeting Euros therefore with diffidence and respect and half-turning to address the man’s up-tilted face as he paused, before stepping over the oar of Halios he continued to see, even while glancing into the man’s eyes, that particular indentation at the back of his head which he held in such high regard, while behind it as if it were a symbol of all that was delicate and vulnerable in humanity, as opposed to all that was inhuman in Nature, rolled the enormous weight of waters. But it is dangerous, as his hero Odysseus could have told him, to philosophize too minutely when you are acting with a rush: and his pause at that second made him trip up so blindly over Halios’ oar that down he came with a crash, sprawling absurdly on the carefully scrubbed deck, and uttering a blasphemous curse on the vindictive ways of Poseidon.

Halios lowered his great oar with rapid effectiveness as well as with exquisite nicety and helped Nisos to his feet while all their six eyes, joined now by the four eyes of Teknon and Klytos on the starboard side, turned simultaneously seaward, totally forgetting Pontopereia’s wild cry.

And what they saw was indeed a sufficient marvel to justify any creature’s obliviousness to all else. For on one side a flaming red sun sank behind the horizon; and on the other a pale full moon rose above the horizon.

What was indeed curious in this sudden possession by the sinking Sun and the rising Moon of the entire consciousness of four middle-aged men and one young man was the fact that each of the two celestial luminaries was only visible through one of the oar-holes on one of the two sides of the ship.

In each case the bulk of the hole was filled by its particular oar; and, since each of the heavenly bodies was of a circular shape, the golden segment of the moon, which encircled the oar of Euros on one side, and the blood-red segment of the sun which encircled the oar of Teknon on the other side, produced, when the eyes of all five men moved from one to the other, a visual effect so strange that it was doubtful if any of them would ever, though he lived as long as the Ithacan palace Dryad, see such a sight again. Each of the five men received the startlingness of this queer vision in a different way. Euros, for instance, felt pure annoyance over the advantage that the deck-hands who dealt with the ropes and the sail had over themselves in regard to what they could see, and this feeling was increased when first on one side and then on the other the oar-holes were not only lined and inlaid with bloody sickles and golden crescents but crossed and re-crossed by the obstinate and greedy flight of a small sea-bird, for whose feather-covered cranium these creaking orifices were associated neither with the sun nor with the moon, but purely and solely with the fragments of terrestial garbage which the oarsmen got rid of through them. As for Nisos, he played with the crazy and fantastic fancy that the whole universe was the body of the giant Atlas, that great Titan whom the Son of Saturn compelled to hold up the sky lest it fall upon the earth.

And Nisos imagined himself following his hero Odysseus in a winged ship that had the power of forcing its way through the body of the earth, as well as through the body of the sun, as well as through the body of the moon; but in his present fancy these three bodies were one body, the body that is to say of the entire universe, which was simply the body of Titan Atlas. His pet hawk was with him; and in his fancy he and his hawk kept flying through the whole body of Atlas and out on the other side: that is to say — into the void and back again into Atlas.

It was not long, however, before this Atlas fancy of our youthful prophet developed into a much bolder imagination; the idea namely, that he himself was a universe-devouring dragon who lived on the elements and fed on earth and fire and water as he hurled himself through the air from one universe to another, devouring each one in turn, while, out of his excrement, vast-trailing protoplasmic embryos of new universes were eternally coagulated afresh.

The queer trance into which all five men on the rowing-deck of the “Teras” had fallen may have been caused by the fact that in their awareness that the ship was sailing mid-way between sinking sun and rising moon each man felt he was being pitilessly pulled in opposite directions by two sanguinary opponents and that the end of it could only be that he would be torn into two halves. He could already feel himself becoming both these two half-selves which were now feebly drifting in opposite directions, their ragged edges raw and bloody while the flesh nearest those edges grew more and more gangrened. Was it perhaps that the screams of this sea-hawk, a bird that might easily have seemed to a prophetess, like that Nymph in the Italian cave, to be the return of a creature that had for hundreds of thousands of years been visiting and re-visiting the earth, stirred up in Nisos a desire to plunge deeper and deeper into the mystery of matter?

At any rate one thing was certainly clear, namely that the wood-work of the “Teras” herself was slowly being aroused to a sort of semi-human consciousness. Whether this would have a good effect on those who were voyaging in her, who could say?

But Nisos now set himself to scramble down to that lowest deck of all, from whence Pontopereia’s cry had ascended. It occurred to him, as he now rushed down, to wonder whether his delay in obeying her cry had hurt the feelings of the daughter of Teiresias, and as he climbed down the ladder, feeling slightly uncomfortable in his mind from remorse at not obeying her more quickly and slightly uncomfortable in his body from his crashing fall he cursed himself as a prize fool. “Where in the name of all the Harpies and Gorgons is the girl?” he muttered as he entered their cabin and found Tis’s sister asleep on their couch and not a sign of the other one. “Has she,” he thought, and as this fear shot through him he felt a queer sensation that he knew was different from any other feeling he had ever had before, “has she climbed up the ladder and thrown herself into the sea? And did she do this,” and he addressed his remark not to himself but to the sleeping figure of Eione, “because of something you said to her?”

He stood staring at the sleeping girl in the bed with what he pretended to himself was a look of fierce dramatic reproach. The sleeping girl would have been gratified however to observe that this fierce look was directed solely at her face and that upon her incredibly well-moulded limbs, as fully exposed to his view as her extremely rustic and almost grotesquely simple features, the look that was drawn out of him was of quite a different kind.

Different or not, all that Pontopereia knew about Nisos’ expression when she crept up silently behind him from her hiding-place among the hampers and nets and wicker cases and javelin-holders and quivers made of twisted root-fibres full of feathered arrows, which Odysseus had piled up outside his cabin and which — for the lowest deck of the "Teras" was anything but spacious — did more than just impinge upon the cabin of the two girls — all indeed that Pontopereia could possibly know of the feelings of Nisos as he stood staring at her enemy-friend and incorrigible rival was the simple fact that he did stand thus staring. And so when she spoke to him and he swung round to face her as if she had pricked him with one of Odysseus's darts, the look that was exchanged between them was one of those looks that young men and young maids exchange now and again and that are as the primeval Welsh Prose Epic expresses it, "like the colour of lightning upon a sword-blade".

But it was at this moment that Odysseus himself appeared on the scene, emerging from his solitary cabin with bare feet, and entirely naked save for the blanket he had wrapped round him and the extraordinary Helmet of Proteus which he had just clapped on his head.

"I want one of you," he whispered hoarsely, "to come here a second!"

"What in the name of Aidoneus," thought Nisos, "is in the king's mind?"

But Eione, who had already leapt from her couch so quickly that the imprint left by her head on the pillow contained a twisted couple of tiny fair hairs held together by an infinitesimal flake of cinder-dust that must have adhered to them when she was recently heating water for her bath, had not lived all her life with old Morus for nothing. She would naturally divine the sort of thing that the practical cunning of a wily old man would urge him to do at a crisis like this. She had therefore, in reading the mind of Odysseus, an advantage over both the daughter of a prophet and the young aspirant to be himself a prophet.

She therefore without a moment's hesitation, and as if it were a dedicated dagger for some pontifical killing, offered her slender wrist to the old king; who proceeded at once, and with no more hesitation than she had shown, to make use of this small wrist. He led her after an imperative gesture to Pontopereia and Nisos to remain quiescent, to the drawn curtain that covered the threshold of the cabin occupied by Nausikaa and Okyrhöe; and the moment he got her there he made a mute sign to her to remain absolutely still, and then, drawing the curtain aside with an imperceptibly gentle movement he set himself to listen to what was going on between the two women.

"O for heaven's sake don't make me have to go over it all again, Princess," Okyrhöe was saying. "I'm only telling you for the hundredth time that this whole mad voyage of this crazy old king is ridiculous; and that you who pretend to be his friend, instead of helping him, are driving him faster to his ruin and destruction! Why, my good, silly woman, before we started on this crazy voyage I talked to several of the sailors who are running this ship and I soon found out how hopeless the whole thing is. They told me that the very figure-head of this ship is enough to damn the whole business by showing the ship's destiny. They told me that the face of that Being at the prow is enough alone to prove to whom the vessel belongs! It belongs to the Ruler of Atlantis; for the face that looks out from that dreadful neck is the face of that Ruler himself!

"They all know that; yes! all the sailors on this ship know it. And they know too that it was because of the blasphemous inventions and impious intentions of this wicked magician that the divine Son of Kronos who wields the thunder plunged the whole continent of Atlantis into the depths of the ocean. You pretend that this ship is of your land and has inherited from the skill and the craft of your people its power of prevailing over disaster and of holding onto its strength. All this is false — in fact a lie! The 'Teras' with its officers and the best of its crew was a pirate-ship long before it fell into the skilled hands of your people and was converted into a vessel of the shape and style of your land.

"And now, my foolish woman, you must see how ridiculous it is to encourage Odysseus in this madness of his, when the truth is — —"

At this point Nausikaa boldly interrupted her. "Come, come, my dear lady, why on earth should a couple of presentable females like you and me scold each other like a pair of fish-wives in the old 'Net-Alley' of the Piraeus?"

But once started in her torrent of vituperation it was impossible to silence Okyrhöe. "When I began", the woman went on, "talking to these people just now I soon realized into what a desperate and tragic business you had, with all your good intentions, betrayed this unfortunate old king. Don't you see bow infinitely pathetic it is to watch this aged impulsive fool dressing himself up in this comical head-dress they call the Helmet of Proteus?

"What about all his fellow-countrymen who are now going to be led into such terrible peril by the pure chance that you came here with this ship? I'm not saying these things to you to torment you or to get any advantage over you. Do please, I beg you, lady, stop this vulgar abuse, and let us decide together how we can best help our mutual hero in this grand final adventure of his unequalled life!"

The two of them continued their word-battle for quite a number of minutes, though neither of them was unoccupied while their desperate dispute went on. They were both arranging their hair, their head-dresses, their robes, their jewels, and even smoothing out the creases in their soft leather sandals, to make which final adjustment they were forced to display to each other and of course, though unknown to themselves, to their three watchers, for, though the daughter of Teiresias still held herself proudly aloof, Nisos as it well may be believed, was unable to resist the temptation of joining in this espionage, the most intimate beauty of their figures.

Matters on board the “Teras” were further complicated at this critical point by the emergence from the ship’s hold, which was reached by a short ladder of no more than three rungs from the cabin occupied by Odysseus, of the two black Lybian cooks staggering under their first instalment of food and drink for everyone on board; and as this plenteous repast was to be swallowed in what was now the cabin of Odysseus it can be imagined with what rapidity these two imperious ladies of fashion hastened to complete their toilet.

Along with the two black Libyans there came up also from the hold of the good ship “Teras”, or “Prodigy”, a couple of Assyrian boys of about thirteen whose business it was to act as general scavengers and excrement-disposers for both crew and passengers. On every deck of the ship there were containers for excremental liquids and containers for excremental solids which it was the duty of these Assyrian boys to empty into the sea; and for this purpose, each day of every voyage, they went the round of the ship at sunset.

Thus it was no haphazard or random coincidence but by one of those inevitable concentrations of the normal and natural forces of life that keep the world on the move that the whole crowd of human creatures, from the Old Odysseus to the young excrement disposers, who were divided from the waters of drowning by the planks of the “Teras” or “Prodigy”, were gathered together when a clamorous shout went up, a shout that came from the throats of the general crowd and not from any professional group or any especially nervous group, a shout that was soon repeated still louder and by this time came from the deck upon which any boat-load of people coming from any direction at all would of necessity scramble on board.

Nisos was at Odysseus' side when the divine animal, Pegasos, flying with quite a company of people on his broad back, reached the "Teras" and therefore our young man had a unique opportunity of noting how the old king reacted to this impact. But he was so anxious to catch all the king's feelings that he couldn't help exaggerating much that he observed.

He exaggerated for instance many flickering changes of expression on the countenance of Odysseus. He exaggerated certain jerky and feverish gestures made by the King. The truth was that no one alive really understood the King except Eurycleia his old nurse. It was one of the results of Odysseus' abnormal self-control that he could feel deep down in his blood and bones reactions quite different from those which he felt in his more superficial nerves or along the surface of his skin, and more different still from those expressed in his face.

The scene on the "Teras'" top deck when Pegasos arrived was indeed something that might have reduced to a wild state of hysterical excitement any traveller less self-controlled and less artful than Odysseus. The human creatures whom Pegasos now shook from his broad back and from between his wide-stretched wings were obviously so confused by the whole experience that, as the saying goes, they hardly "knew their heads from their tails".

For the last couple of days a frantic longing to cling together like a frightened swarm of insects must have possessed them. But in spite of this they preserved their poise and endurance. Chief among these brave voyagers upon the winged horse was Zeuks the son of Arcadian Pan and along with him was none other than Spartika the Priestess of Athene's Temple, and in addition to these and holding herself with proud dignity a little apart from the rest was none other than Arsinöe the bastard daughter of Hector, who in her childhood had been befriended by Andromache, Hector's wife.

Nisos was astonished to see that it was not Zeuks but Spartika who held the proudest position on the back of the winged horse, nearest, that is to say, to his head, and he was still more surprised when instead of descending, as Zeuks and Arsinöe very speedily did, Spartika remained seated, and indeed began to caress the mane of Pegasos and to give that arching neck whose curves resembled a torrent of water released from rocks and roots and flowing at ease down a smooth declivity, a series of reassuring and yet authoritative pats.

Our friend Nisos, who still retained at the back of his consciousness an obstinate determination to be a real prophet before he died, and who was still alert to catch the most intimate ways of the mental rulers of our race, was deeply struck by the manner in which Spartika kept them all standing where they were, as if she had thrown a spell over each of them, while she delivered what evidently was a long-prepared and legally-involved discourse on the precise attitude she intended to take between the run-away goddess of that formidable "aegis", whose very "tassels" could bring new life to the half-dead, and that Priest of the Mysteries who had so successfully usurped the position of Telemachos.

And suddenly Nisos noticed, and he felt that he had really made a step forward in his private self-education in the art of prophesying by having resisted Spartika's priestess-spell sufficiently to be able to notice such a thing at all, that while with one hand she caressed Pegasos, preparatory to giving him the recognizable signal that would make him shake out his eagle wings and gather up his equine hooves beneath him, with the other hand she was active in helping some quite carefully shrouded human figure to edge itself off the horse's back on to the deck where the others were now standing.

Nisos alone among all the onlookers was therefore spared the shock of surprise when two startling events occurred simultaneously: Pegasos suddenly spread his wings and rose into the air with Spartika leaning forward, and clinging to his mane with both hands. And like a living bundle of villainously dirty rags the figure of Enorches rolled upon the deck, and after a minute or two of absolutely solitary twisting and turning, rose to its feet, took up its wrappings and conveyed them to the rail of the ship.

Here, with what struck Nisos as a deadly curse upon the whole gamut of existence, this destructive Priest of the Mysteries flung his bundle of filthy rags into the water; and then, leaning over the edge himself, just as if he were hugging the thought of following his garments — and how had he managed to make them heavy enough to sink? — he plunged his thought, if nothing else, after what he had thrown.

And while the Priest of Eros and Dionysos was staring blindly after his own imaginary corpse, that corpse of living thought which he evidently pretended to himself he could see sinking down and down and down, till it found the slit at the bottom of the ocean which led to the slit at the bottom of the world which led to the slit at the bottom of the universe, Odysseus, whose outward nerves, equally with the imperturbable recesses of his being, were totally unaffected by any of these mental horrors, addressed a quiet request to Zeuks that he relate to him what had actually happened in Ithaca since the "Teras" set sail.

Nisos never forgot the scene that followed this natural demand. All the living persons on board save Akron the Master of the ship were gathered round the mast from which that pair of perfect sailors, Pontos and Proros from Skandeia in Kythara, had wisely lowered all but a small fold of the great sail.

Thus the “Teras”, or “Prodigy”, was running lightly, easily, freely, but comparatively slowly before a gentle and cool easterly wind; while the full moon, which was now moving with that motionless movement which is unlike any other movement in the universe, over, under, and straight through cloud after cloud, after cloud, after cloud, flooded the whole of what was visible, as well as — at least that was what came suddenly into Nisos’ head — the whole of what was invisible, with an enchantment that separated the real life of each separate living thing from the life imagined as its life by all other living things.

Nisos noted very definitely the extraordinary manner in which this flood of moonlight, which was as spiritual and mental as it was physical and emotional, held everybody at that crisis under such a spell that when the quiet voice of Odysseus called upon Zeuks to speak there came a strangely universal sigh from all present. The thoughts and feelings of Odysseus himself as he made this quiet request were more direct and simple, as they were more massively impenetrable and impervious to influence of any sort or kind, than his young follower Nisos could have believed possible.

Odysseus was prepared to humour and indulge to the limit all those who needed humouring and indulging if they were to be useful to him in the fulfilment of his purpose. He was also prepared to obliterate totally from his consideration, leaving them to go their way just as they liked, as he intended to go his way just as he liked, all those persons, creatures, tendencies, and forces, over whom or over which he had no control.

Unlike Zeuks as a man, and unlike Pegasos as an animal, there was, in spite of all the rumours to the contrary, no trustworthy evidence that any seed save that from the loins of Laertes was responsible for his begetting.

What separated him from other mortal men was the adamantine weight and solid mass of what might be called Being, or Existence, or Entity, thickening out his Personality, which he put behind the purpose, whatever purpose it might be, upon which at the moment he was engaged.

The real essence of the man’s shrewdness, for it was more like the measured sagacity of some huge sea-lion than it was like the wily cunning of a fox or the crafty vigilance of a hungry hyaena or the distracted desperation of a solitary wolf, had a super-animal obstinacy in it which had the power of keeping intact, like some monumental idol, the achievement towards which he kept advancing.

He had done precisely that with the taking and looting of Troy. The sack of this royal city must have occupied the attention of his whole essential Being and this perfectly calm yet terrific preoccupation, nourished on the very marrow of his bones, was the thing that made it possible for him to indulge in the most outrageous lies and monstrous deceptions, without, as the saying is, turning a hair.

And now it was the same with this voyage above the waters under which lay the lost Atlantis. Odysseus had the power of “jollying along” every mortal person and thing, whether divine, or human, whether animal, vegetable or mineral, that could possibly, by any imaginable twist or turn of coaxing, cajoling, cozening, condensing, dilating, liquifying, vaporizing, euhemerizing, metamorphosing be made use of to help forward his individual purpose.

What would have needed the genius of Pontopereia’s progenitor himself, yes! even of the great Teiresias, to unravel, was the convoluted connection between the definite, concrete, actual, realistic achievement at which Odysseus was aiming and the glory, honour and fame he would get by this achievement.

It seems to the present chronicler, though it is only too likely that both Homer and Hesiod would take a different view, that the grape-juice of the glory of achieving, and the fir-tree sap of having achieved, when the achievement has been accomplished, are so inextricably intermingled that not all the Sirens, Harpies, Gorgons and Erinyes in the whole cosmos could unravel them.

To capture Troy, to return to Ithaca while Penelope still lived, to plunge down among the sunken temples and altars and streets and markets of drowned Atlantis, each one of these triumphs of the individual will over all that opposes it, had become so completely all that was, all that is, all that shall be for evermore, to the man Odysseus, that to separate these events from this man would be like separating the moon from its light or the water from the waves.

Thus it was when Odysseus required of Zeuks that he should speak, Zeuks himself seemed conscious of some special quality in the moonlight as well as conscious of the abnormally dramatic weight of what he had to tell, for it struck Nisos who was watching Zeuks closely that this latter gave a sort of half-shrug of his broad shoulders and although he didn't remove his hands from his sides he opened them wide, with their palms exposed and their fingers widely extended, as if he were commencing to disclaim all possible responsibility for all conceivable events in this mad world.

And it was at that precise second that an infinitesimal and entirely haphazard thing occurred such as had happened to Nisos from his earliest childhood. The fact that he was watching Zeuks so closely sharpened his powers of observation to an abnormal extent. And the result of this was that his attention was caught and held by the fact that a small sea-swallow, swooping and swerving along this particular deck, had let fall upon the deck's well-scrubbed surface a little clot of bird's dung from which protruded not only the featherless stalk of a tiny feather but the clipt edge of a human toe-nail.

Nor did this extra discovery prevent Nisos in his moon-induced mania for minute observation, from noticing that Zeuks himself, as he straightened his shoulders to draw his breath before answering, laid bare upon his own chest a peculiar tuft of especially black hairs. “Is the sky going to fall when Zeuks answers?” thought Nisos: and certainly the general sigh that rose from the whole company just then struck him as curiously connected with all those aspects of human bodies of which human consciousness especially dislikes being reminded.

It was almost as if the unseemly parts of every corporeal frame in that whole company joined in that general sigh; joined in it indeed so pitifully that it seemed as if that sigh proceeded not so much from the lips of those gathered there as from those disparaged parts of their human bodies of which we only seem to grow fully aware when we are seized by an intense longing to escape from our bodies altogether!

It was a weird thought to come into a youthful head just then, but Nisos welcomed it, and indeed was proud of it, telling himself that his mother would have regarded it as an absolute proof that he was destined one day to be a prophet. Yes, he told himself, this great sigh from all these people came from every single one of the out-of-the-way hairs in their secret orifices of excretion and copulation, and from the ignoble hairs under their arms, whether male or female, and from every crushed, deformed, twisted, and squeezed-sideways toe-nail in that crowd, whether belonging to a male or a female.

Nor did the effect of the moon’s motionless motion, through those indifferent clouds, affect only human beings. It was especially potent where small, disregarded, insignificant material objects were concerned, objects such as pieces of burnt wood, broken shells, wisps of wool, flakes of foam, strips of sea-weed, frayed bits of cordage, and even certain infinitesimal scoriac fragments risen to the surface of the water and carried in circles over leagues and leagues of salt waves from the burning craters of the great mountain Kunthorax which towered above the city of Gom, the capital of drowned Atlantis.

Yes, this curious universal sigh rose not only from the less honourable portions of the bodies of the people upon the deck of the “Teras”, but from a host of derelict scraps and bits of scraps that winds and tides and sea-gull beaks had helped chance to collect at this particular moment and upon this particular deck. To the mind of our youthful prophet Nisos this heavy undulant sigh was drawn from every mortal thing there present that had, or could ever presume to claim that it had, suffered from the arrogance of immortal gods or the recklessness of mortal men.

A deep and spontaneous sigh like this was, he decided, clearly and unquestionably due to an obscure craving in existence itself to escape from every physical and every mental effort that was forever “having to be made” that it might remain what it was and not perish utterly in the abyss. All the animal, all the vegetable, all the mineral offscourings, castaways, shreds, patches, scrapings, splinters, parings, drift and flotsam, together with all the human abortions, misfits and degenerates and all the infected members of each particular corpus of corruption, seemed to Nisos just then as he tried desperately to unravel the psychic knot of that half-circle of suspended life and reluctant death under that intent moon as she passed those casual clouds, to be asking to be heard.

The universe seemed to be giving them some final pitiful chance that their breath should be audible and some broken syllable of their desire should be expressed, which, if Odysseus would only ask it or Zeuks would only answer it, might redeem all. But Odysseus was now repeating his question and Zeuks was now beginning to laugh.

Yes, it was with a laugh he commenced his answer, and with a laugh he finished his answer; and there were many there who must have thought that Odysseus would be overwhelmed by his answer. Zeuks told how it was soon after the "Teras" had sailed that the whole thing happened. Led by Krateros Naubolides, Nisos' father, and by Agelaos Naubolides, Nisos' brother, the enormous faction among the warriors of Ithaca who were opposed to the House of Odysseus swept down in a resolute mass upon the king's palace, ransacked it, scoured it out, gutted it, scraped it clean of every trace and vestige of the House of Odysseus, till from the Corridor of Pillars to the innermost caverns of its washing-chambers, sculleries, pantries, and kitchens, it became a primitive, antiquarian annex to the prosperous barns and picturesque enclosures and to all the long-reverberating rural and insular traditions of the autochthonous House of Naubolides.

"And Eurycleia?" enquired Odysseus, fixing upon the narrator a long, deep, quiet, steady look, not in the least degree an excited or emotional look, and not at all what could be called an inscrutable look. What it really was was a patient ritualistic look, like the look of a priest who has uttered the same words so many times that his emotional reaction to them has the modified, qualified, calmly reverential feeling such as is really the reaction to their destiny of many generations of a closely knit nation, gravely, but not solemnly, honouring their past, guarding their present as something sacred, and facing their future with a massively unruffled assurance.

Zeuks clearly found it difficult to tell the truth as to just how Eurycleia perished; but after a good many noises in his throat that were too like the sounds in an ox-stall to be called laughing and too like the sounds in a cowshed to be called crying, he explained that when the old nurse saw Leipephile by her betrothed's side among the foremost intruders she was unable to restrain her indignation and burst out in a rhapsody of vituperation. She abandoned herself indeed to such "shame-crying" and to flinging such "momon" or reproach upon Leipephile that Leipephile, who is, as we all know, a mightily big and powerful wench, lost her temper completely and struck her such a blow over the head with a large marble mixing-bowl or "depas" which she snatched from a side table that the old lady fell down and died instantaneously.

"In the confusion that followed, I fancy I began myself to behave in a wild and excited way and I think I must have drunk quite a lot too, for there was a great deal of wine floating round and I remember that the more adventurous of the intruders soon struck me as being a good deal more intoxicated than I was myself.

"Our Trojan Arsinöe here will bear witness to the truth of what I am narrating to you, O king; for in my tipsy folly I well remember thinking that it was my first duty to you to keep a tight hold on all your captives from the old Trojan War: and it was in the spirit of this sense of duty, O King, that I found myself clinging so closely to the maiden Arsinöe when we took our places on the back of the flying horse. It was your wise and cool-headed herdsman Tis, the brother of the maiden Eione who I understand is with you on board this ship, who insisted on our making use of Pegasos to follow you all this way across the sea.

"I tried to persuade him to accompany us rather than enter the service of the House of Naubolides but he maintained that his duty was first and foremost to the cow Babba, and that Babba's shed and hay-loft and her field of meadow-grass were, taken together, enough of a kingdom for any man to guard and fight for. He also said that if it was the will of Atropos that Krateros Naubolides should rule in Ithaca while its King was sailing where no mortal had ever sailed before, it might well be her will also that when you returned you would find your cow Babba as ready to give you as good milk and as perfect cream as she did before you sailed away.

"'The land,' said Master Tis, 'is my mother and my father and my grandmother and my grandfather. The grass growing on the land is my cow's salvation and the milk from the udders of my cow is my redemption. The bread, made of the wheat which grows on my land, is, as I munch it, the only heaven I need, and furthermore,' said Tis, the grandson of Moros, 'the sweetness of the bread I munch increases as it nears the crust. My bread needs neither honey nor sugar to make it sweet but it needs land as good as my land to make bread as good as my bread; and it needs a cow as good as my cow to keep me from following my King across drowned Atlantis.'"

It was at this point, just as if the mention of the name "Atlantis" had softened some tension in the minds of all, that as Enorches, the Priest of the Mysteries, left the side of the ship and began to pace up and down within the limited space left between the mast with its reduced sail and the half-circle of listeners to this weird scene while his chiton, or body-shirt, having become ruffled in his violent disposal of his rags, his nakedness, unknown to himself, was startlingly exposed in quite a flagrant fashion.

This shameless sight combined with its exhibitor's complete unconsciousness evoked a loud and profane chuckle from Euros which communicated itself to Pontos and from him extended to Klytos and Teknon. Whether Odysseus saw what they were laughing at or not this was one of those occasions when the root cause of all his triumphant endurances had a perfect chance to show itself. His senses might be stirred by the mischievous and provocative smile that Okyrhöe was now directing towards him: his anger might be roused by the thought of the murder of his old nurse Eurycleia, the one person in the world who had known him in the intimate sense in which our father or our mother knows us, or our mate knows us, and by the fact that the blow that killed her was struck by the woman who herself had been waiting at his table since she was a child: but as neither of these things seemed able to change by a jot or a tittle the obstinate bulk of his intention, so no burst of bawdy laughter, even though directed at the privy parts of his worst enemy, could distract him just then from the moon that covered the waters and from the waters that covered Atlantis.

"How did you come, my good friend," he now calmly enquired of Zeuks, indicating the grotesque figure of Enorches, "to bring this confounded fellow with you on the back of Pegasos?"

"I don't wonder, O great King," replied Zeuks, "at your asking how it was that he came with us! Well, I can soon tell you how that happened. Your herdsman Tis, the brother of Eione here — I'm right in that, aren't I, Eione? — was the sole cause of the whole business. None of us would be here now if it weren't for him; and you saw just now how submissively the horse obeyed the priestess Spartika — all owing to wise treatment he received in Tis's stable. Herdsman Tis must have learnt from that old cow Babba he so dotes on some secret language that all animals, whether mortal or immortal, make use of when alone with each other.

"It must have been painful to Tis to prepare Pegasos for leaving his stable so soon; but I can tell you, my King, you've got nobody in your palace-cave, nobody in your whole rock-bound island, more devoted to you and your best interests than this man Tis.

"Well! just as we were coming out of those stables and sheds of yours, that this Tis looks after so well — and only, as far as I can see, for the advantage of that one solitary old cow — lo! and behold! there came rushing up to us this egregious fellow who calls himself a priest of Orpheus and who sure is the most treacherous and teasing and tantalizing and tricky human being I have ever encountered in the whole of my life. Ye gods! and if he didn't go so far as to demand permission to sit alongside of us on Pegasos' back!

"For the moment, my lord, I can assure you I was flabbergasted by this request. I only knew the fellow as your enemy, and the enemy of my young friend Nisos here, and the enemy of your son Telemachos. Why then, you naturally ask, did I allow this arch-liar, this dangerous and tricky traitor, to have a seat with us on the back of Pegasos? I'll tell you exactly why, O my King, and you must decide for yourself whether I was right or wrong. This Priest-fellow, this Enorches-man, fell on his knees before me and tapped the earth with his forehead seven successive times! As he did so he swore an oath; and he even went so far as to presume to add to this oath certain terrible and dreadful words after the manner of the immortal gods: for the words he added had to do with the River Styx.

"It was this oath of his, this oath by the Styx that he was planning no harm to you, my King, that caused me to hesitate. And then I suddenly decided to put my dilemma — as to whether to refuse his request or to allow him to join us — before your herdsman Tis and allow him to decide. And, when I put the matter to him, shall I tell you how he answered me, O great King?

"He said quite quietly: 'Set him before me, my lord Zeuks, and let me ask him something.'

"So I did, and set the man before him. And your herdsman Tis said to Enorches: 'May I ask you one question, O great Master of the Mysteries?' And when Enorches nodded, for I could see he regarded Tis as not grand enough, nor famous enough, nor learned enough, nor royal enough, to have any part or lot in these high matters, this was the question Tis put to him:

"'If your will, Master, was done about Eros and Dionysos, it would mean, wouldn't it, that your will would also be done about the Mysteries?'

"You should have seen the look the priest gave him. But he answered quick enough; and not sharply or angrily either: 'It would also be done about the Mysteries.' And it was then that the extraordinary thing happened that led to the Priest of the Mysteries to be marching up and down the deck of this ship as he is doing now in the eyes of all! Your herdsman Tis called upon the cow Babba.

"At the sound of his voice the cow Babba came straight from her stall and advanced among us, thrusting her cool wet nose into our bosoms, till we had, each one of us, pressed our lips against her upper lip with a noisy kiss.

"'Drop your token now, Babbawatty, my Holy of Holies,' said Tis in a low voice but a voice of the greatest authority I've ever heard since the day when I heard my grandfather addressing my father, and neither of them was an animal like Babba or a man like Tis; for indeed they both were and are immortal gods.

"At this command the cow turned towards us again as if she were going to repeat her recent nuzzling of us one by one. She did indeed move from one to another of us as before, but did no more nuzzling; and at that moment, O great King, there was one of those perceptible arrests, pauses, hushes, and sudden silences, as when the wing of a bird of omen touches the place where we are destined to rest in our final sleep. And it was after that weird pause that Babba stopped in front of Enorches, lifted her tail, straddled her legs and dropped on the ground the largest black-green cow-turd I've ever seen in my life.

"And, in the same pulse of time at which that huge dropping fell, Tis strode up to Enorches and said to him:

"'Master, you are holding something back from us. What is it?'

"And for answer the Priest of the Mysteries cried aloud in the hearing of them all: 'What I am holding back can only be revealed when, once more, as formerly they confronted each other in Arima, Eurybia confronts Echidna above the sunken City of Gom!'

"Having uttered these words he begged to be helped up upon the back of Pegasos and there was none among us who found it in him to refuse."

Zeuks was silent: while Nisos, watching Odysseus with the closest interest felt as if the old warrior's attitude to all these upheavals was not so much abysmally super-human as it was fathomlessly sub-human. Odysseus by this time had seated himself on a coil of ropes at the foot of the mast where the brothers Pontos and Proros, as they turned from the "protonoi" or "forestays" to the "kaloi" or "halliards," were clearly obeying a sequence of silent signs from Akron, the Teras' master, who with one hand against the mast was staring at the moon-lit horizon in front of the ship.

From the expression upon his face Akron might have been saying to himself: "The chief thing when you are master of a ship is to keep your ship afloat and your eye on the water in front of her. And there is great danger you may forget both these objectives if you listen for a single second to the song of a siren outside the ship or to the voice of a Prophet inside the ship."

And it now suddenly struck Nisos, as he moved as near as he dared to the King's extemporized throne, that the way the old man was now watching the objects and persons round him was exactly the way the winged horse watched the objects and persons round him before he proceeded to obey Spartika and carry her back to Ithaca.

Yes, the old king had at this very moment the same expression as the winged horse before he rose into the air. And Nisos told himself that a sea-lion, setting off, or a whale setting off, or even a sea-serpent starting to cross the ocean would have a look not very different from this aged adventurer's as he contemplated the universe from that heap of ropes.

Nisos was too honest with himself not to admit to himself that along with this sub-human look in Odysseus' eyes there was a distinctly normal human look there also. It annoyed our young friend to have to admit this but he was simply forced to do so.

"It must be," he thought, "that in the look of a normal man there is something parallel to the expression in the face of a sea-lion or a sea-serpent." It annoyed him to have to confess this; but he held rigidly to the idea that a prophet had to be honest with himself and he was resolved that when he reached mature years he would be a prophet: yes! a prophet of something, though he could not yet say in any clear terms, or indeed in any terms at all, of exactly what. And it was obvious to him that whatever elements of heroic endurance Odysseus possessed, they were in a really absolute sense human ones and normal ones.

The time taken by our future prophet to reach the conclusion that Odysseus was absolutely human had been so lengthy that most of the crowd, including the deck-hands, had entirely scattered, and there was nobody left but a small group of ordinary human beings, who were anything but professional, and Nisos' friend Zeuks, whose personal obliquities were human enough in spite of his ancestry.

Nisos meanwhile moved nearer and nearer to Odysseus. What he felt at that moment he would have been extremely puzzled to put into words. There was in his feeling, mixed with many very different emotions, a definite protective instinct towards Odysseus. Watching him seated there with that absurd Helmet of Proteus on his head, and holding his Club of Herakles propped up between his knees, more like the staff of an aged beggar than the most formidable weapon in the whole Grecian hemisphere, that hemisphere out of which the ship Teras was now swiftly moving as she advanced into the unknown West, Nisos felt as if the old hero were some precious relic, being carried, for the purpose of using it as a charm, into some completely different universe.

Nisos himself was vividly conscious, as if it had been a magnetic hand laid upon his shoulder, of the intense pressure of the presence of Akron, the Sea-Captain, as the man with his hand on the mast stared with what might have been called a cool and competent stare, but with what at the same time was a desperate and frantic stare, at the moonlit water in front of them.

Pontopereia and Eione had evidently found some way of smoothing out their rather intricate knot of contrariety; for the two girls were now pacing arm-in-arm from one end of the deck to the other, talking eagerly and rapidly. Nausikaa and Okyrhöe also had discovered a way, perhaps the best of all possible ways, of bringing to an end, at least for a time, their convoluted rivalry: for Nausikaa had stretched herself out upon the arching back of the ship’s tremendous figure-head, with her arms round the lower part of its scaly neck, and from this point of vantage she was watching with dreamy fascination the churned-up flakes of white and yellow-brown foam which followed one another to left and right as the proudly-cleaving neck, below the cosmogonic countenance of that sublime Being who had neither the face of a beast nor of a man nor of a god, cut its way through the water.

As for Okyrhöe, she had bent down gracefully in front of Odysseus and had snatched at a piece of sail-cloth that in some way had got itself entangled with the coil of ropes upon which the old man was seated. Spreading this piece of sail-cloth under the mast Okyrhöe plunged into the particular activity which had, since she was first grown up, been the ecstasy of her life, that is to say the arranging of her limbs in a manner to provoke intolerable desire.

Meanwhile the Club of Herakles, one of whose personal names was “Dokeesis”, or “That which Seems”, and another was Prosdokia or “Expectation” and who had the power of thinking and feeling not only with what it called its “life-crack”, within which the Moth and the Fly had taken sanctuary but with every portion of its polished surface, contemplated Okyrhöe who now lay at the feet of Akron, the Master of the ship, though he took no more notice of her than if she had been a captive from some island-citadel, a captive whom Odysseus, the Sacker of Cities, had carelessly carried off as they sailed West. But it was not Akron’s attention Okyrhöe wished to catch, as, lightly and gracefully — but O so deliberately! — she threw back her head upon her soft white arm and drew up her limbs beneath her. And it was then, and not till then, that Odysseus heard, as long ago, in that dark Nemaean Forest, he had heard it, the voice of his Club of Herakles. The Club was in the midst of a hurried and agitated dialogue with the Sixth Pillar of that Corridor in Ithaca so well known to most of them there.

It was not Odysseus’ nature, nor was it a habit of his in accordance with his nature, to enter lightly, casually, carelessly, easily, into a conversation with his most powerful weapon. Ever since he first heard that voice in the Nemaean Forest there had come moments when it was impossible not to hear the voice of the Club without a certain awe; and equally impossible not to reply to the voice without an inward submission to the burden of its utterance.

At this particular moment, seated on that coil of rope and turning his gaze first to the wide path of the moon on the water and then to a strange and shadowy Enormity that had suddenly appeared in front of them and that Nisos took to be a foreign ship with two colossal masts, but which might well have been a portion of the vast cranium of the Titan-Giant, Atlas, Odysseus was careful not to glance at Okyrhöe's seductive pose of slumber, nor at Nausikaa's slender limbs and passionate arms entwined about the scaly neck of the mysterious Ruler of Atlantis.

Okyrhöe's closed eyes above her rounded elbow might rest forever in sleepless provocation: Nausikaa's open eyes might be down-turned to the reflection of the moon and down-turned to depths below the reflection of the moon, and down-turned to depths below all reflection: it remained that Odysseus, the son of Laertes, calmly awaited what seemed like the imminent destruction of the ship "Teras" or "Prodigy" by her collison with an island, or with a monster of the deep, or with the head of the Giant Atlas, or with another and much larger vessel.

Odysseus and Nisos, as well as Akron, became aware at this crucial moment of agitated and extremely jerky words being exchanged between Pontos and Proros as they tugged at the outstretched sail of the "Teras". And, simultaneously with this dialogue between Pontos and Proros, Akron, the ship's master, gave expression to a long deep-drawn weirdly hopeless whistle and clapt his other hand upon the mast, to which he now seemed to be clinging, as if expectant of some terrific shock.

Meanwhile the Club of Herakles whose private and personal name was either "Dokeesis", "Seeming", or "Prosdokia", "Expectation", translated the startling news he was getting from the Sixth Pillar for the benefit of the aged but absolutely normal human brain that now bent low above it. And the words from the Sixth Pillar that the Club of Herakles now repeated for the benefit of his King were terribly simple.

"The ship 'Teras' at this moment is running into extreme danger. The moon is full. And as she shines upon the water and as the water reflects her, the spirit of the Being at the ship's bow is stirred within that Being as it remembers all the long nights it watched from the summit of the mountain Kunthorax the moon as a crescent, sharpening her horns of inversion, and rounding her horns of reversion, in creating and uncreating herself as the orb she is; and this stirring of whatever it may be of the spirit of this Being that still clings to its image is full of peril for the ship 'Teras', and indeed in a moment or two she may be shattered to pieces upon the Island of Wone."

It was naturally only a weird murmuring that Nisos caught of all this; but there was something about the reverberation of the syllable "Wone" that struck his imagination as well as his ear; nor could he help being interested as well as faintly amused as he watched that familiar crack, in the very throat, as it were, of the great weapon the king was clutching, to see a beautiful moth flutter forth and fly straight to the troubled forehead of Enorches, who was now squatting on the deck, and, apparently absorbed in thought, was tearing into pieces a considerable handful of the particular kind of seaweed that has so many of those slippery little bladders growing out of it, which look as if they might explode at a touch.

Arrived at the forehead of Enorches which was such a prominent feature that it seemed to overhang the rest of the man's face like a menacing avalanche, the moth fluttered restlessly up and down as if asking for permission to enter this recondite citadel of metaphysical mystery. Getting no apparent response it flew straight back to the club of Herakles.

And now at last our young would-be prophet was rewarded for the trouble he had taken on first catching the finger-nails of the Harpies at work on the Image of the Goddess of Order, the trouble to memorize a few words of the language of Insects.

"Moan for the Island of Wone!" was what Nisos heard. But the Fly heard more. So much did it hear that it straightway flew to the ear of Nisos to inform him and to force him to understand. This took some time. But when he did understand Nisos felt it to be his duty as a loyal adherent of the House of Odysseus to let that hero, who was already on his feet with one hand upon the shoulder of Akron and the other on the broad head of "Dokeesis", know what he had learnt.

"When he sees," the Fly had buzzed: and Nisos knew that it was of Enorches he was speaking, "that terrible pair from Arima, facing each other and arguing about the drowned city of Gom, he will reveal his secret."

But it now came to pass that both Okyrhöe and Nausikaa sprang to their feet, while Akron, the master of the ship, uttering his commands to the brothers Pontos and Proros as if a great wave were at that moment hanging above their heads, joined with them to pull down the body of the sail, till it slapped the deck, as though it were slapping the back of some martial "hetairos", or comrade-in-arms, at the start of a dangerous crisis.

It can be imagined how the brown moth awaited in their moving citadel within the "life-crack" of the club of Herakles the return of her friend the Fly. She had slipped out of his clutches to flutter to the help of Enorches so swiftly and unexpectedly, that he hadn't been able to stop her. On his return therefore she greeted him with a protesting cry; pointing out how unfair it was that after scolding her for supporting the Priest of the Mysteries he yet should hasten to display just the same sort of partisan activity on behalf of those who were opposed to the Priest.

But the moth soon found that this particular moment was too tense with opposing currents of feeling to allow for their usual verbal dispute. "Hush, sweet fool!" cried the fly. And then, when she tried again: "Hold your tongue you flapperty twitter-thighs! Don’t you see, little fool, that your friend the Priest is going to prick his own bubble?”

And indeed it was then that Nisos saw the Priest of the Mysteries leap up from the deck, throw away the seaweed with which he had been playing, and point with a pair of long bony arms at the flat, level, rocky Island that had suddenly risen out of the salt deep in front of them and now extended itself before the prow of the “Teras”.

“There they are!” cried the Priest hoarsely. “But it’s only another big ship with two tall masts!” screamed Okyrhöe. “It must be another ship! It shall be another ship! Those two things sticking up there, I say those two things there, shan’t be anything else than two thick ugly Cretan masts!”

But Odysseus had suddenly swung round and was now addressing a quiet figure whose head, emerging from the ladder leading to the lower deck, had been followed by a pair of easily-shrugged shoulders and an active mobile body, clad, for this special occasion it would almost seem, in the most conventional attire.

“Zeuks! Zeuks! My good friend! Do you mind coming here for a second!” cried the old hero; and in all this whirligig of a phantasmagoric pandemonium Nisos was so hit by the old man’s calm that while Zeuks hurried to their side he began scolding himself for the agitation he felt and for the fit of trembling that had seized him.

“Pray to Atropos, you immeasurable ass,” he muttered to himself. “Pray that you may never forget what you now see, or, by the gods! that it may be the last thing you do see, before we’re all drowned! … just a feeble old man with a pointed beard and this ‘Jack-O-Lanthorn’ on his head reducing the howling chaos of a wilderness of waters to something comparatively unimportant!”

“Can you catch,” the king was now asking Zeuks, “what this priest of Orpheus is saying as he watches us strike this island?”

And Zeuks answered: “He is confessing to you and to Eros and to Dionysos and to all those he has drawn after him that he has only used his praise of Love and Drink and his Priesthood of Orpheus and of the Mysteries to conceal his advocacy of universal Death. Life ought never, he says, to have started; and the sooner it sinks back into Nothingness the better for us all!”

CHAPTER XI

FOR ALL HIS good seamanship the skipper of the “Teras” or “Prodigy” was at heart, much more than his second-in-command and much more than any of his crew, whether their business was with oar or with sail, a born carpenter.

Thus it was his, Akron’s, crouching back that was the first object to arrest the attention of our friend Nisos when, not without having to overcome several physical and even a few mental impediments, he reached the bottom of the hold and was separated from the bottom of the sea by nothing but salt water and a double layer of inch-thick planks.

“More ‘Kolla’ I tell you! I must have a lot more ‘Kolla!’” was the cry that issued from beneath that hunched-over spine. “Glue! More glue!” was in fact the word that in hoarsely groaned accents emerged from that massive head and hooked nose. These were bent so low between the pair of formidable hands now at work squeezing the stuff into place, that the image presented by the red flames beneath the cauldron of melting glue as they flickered over the kneeling man and over the group of dark-skinned boys who were helping him was really like that of a huge Raven, who, with its beak and claws working together, was engaged in the construction of the Gods alone knew what sort of impregnable nest.

“O it’s you, is it?” Akron cried, straightening his back, though still remaining on his knees. “What I want now is one of those bronze hammers to smash this damned spike of rock! No! No! Heavier, much heavier than that! Go in there, where they are, Nisos, will you, and bring me the heaviest you can find!”

Nisos looked round him in some bewilderment; for the intense blackness of the shadows, and the red flickerings from the fire under the cauldron that was keeping the glue fluid, made up between them such an Hephaistian Smithy, as might well have been started by an insane as well as a lame god of fire at the bottom of the ocean!

But one of the black Libyan boys was quick to see his confusion and led him at once to the recess referred to as "in there" out of which he was soon able to extract the sort of long-handled hammer that was the instrument needed. Armed with this he returned to the bent figure of Akron, handed him the huge hammer, and watched eagerly to see what he would do.

The effect of what he saw at that moment lodged itself in his brain so deeply that always, after that, when he found himself in a place where there was anything to remind him of black protruding shadows and cavities full of whirling tongues of scarlet fire, all the impressions of that moment rushed back upon him.

It was the presence of that burning fire under the cauldron of melted glue in connection with the bottom of the ocean that hit him so hard. The element of fire, though taking up only so small a space compared with the terrific mass of water that surrounded it, drew into itself and flung out of itself, as it whirled its bloody circles round and round, an essence of existence that was at once absolute and unique.

But the master of the "Teras" straightened his back, took the long-handed hammer in his hand, and struck that up-thrusting point of rock one — two — three — terrific blows. At the first blow that rough projection of time-crumpled, space-naked rock shivered and cracked. At the second blow a fragment was whirled away. At the third blow the whole piece of rock went crashing off and was sent hurtling through the air to one of the pitch-black corners of the hold. Then there came bursting out of the hole made by that pointed rock a violent spout of sea-water; and down above this jet of brine Akron crouched again, squeezing into that jagged rent handful after handful of “kolla”, or semi-solid glue, snatched out of the cauldron. From a pile of carefully selected narrow slips of wood one of the black Libyan boys now handed Akron several freshly smoothed and rounded-off pieces of wood, by the aid of which, squeezed in with the malleable “kolla” or glue, this dangerous rent in the keel of the “Teras” was soon mended.

But they were now confronted by the yet more difficult business of getting the ship well away from the dangerous edges of the small island of Wone while they still kept within reach of it. Akron himself hurried to the oarsmen’s deck; for he had already decided that for this particularly ticklish and hazardous undertaking of getting the “Teras” clear of Wone and yet circumnavigating the island till they were well to the west of it, they would be better and safer in the hands of their oarsmen than of the men who manipulated their great sail.

One special advantage which this choice of Akron’s possessed Nisos realized to the full directly the two of them were on the oarsmen deck along with the four rowers. The crucial direction and management of the whole manoeuvre was now free from the presence of Nausikaa and Okyrhöe as well as of Eione and Pontopereia.

Zeuks however was still there, having deposited Arsinöe in the cabin of Odysseus, doubtless under the vague idea inherited from his immortal begetter, Arcadian Pan, that the only conceivable relation between a captive lady and a great sacker of cities was the sharing of a night’s sleep. Fortunately for the “Teras” and for them all the sharply-pointed rock that had pierced the keel was at the extreme end of a little promontory; so that at the first strong pull of the four long oars the ship swung clear of the island and was in deep water.

Ordering the four men to go on with an evenly-timed spell of steady rowing, Akron now ran up the ladder to the top-deck followed hurriedly by Nisos; and, once on that deck, instead of approaching the group near the mast where Odysseus was watching events with the detachment of an alert sea-lion, he strode quickly to the ship's stern to join the helmsman. He didn't presume himself to touch the "Teras's" helm, as the business of steering a ship as big as she was was no light task, and required a man not only with a special training but with special endowments.

But it had been to Akron himself, who had spent a day and a night in his younger days voyaging to Kephallenia to find Eumolpos and persuade him to join them, that the "Teras" owed her incomparable steersman. It was fascinating to Nisos to see the reverential respect with which the Master of the "Teras" followed now every faintest movement of the rudder by an expert in that difficult art.

The rudder was made of a young fir-trunk, peeled smooth and white; and, by its exquisite pressure upon the carefully squared and polished piece of wood directing the ship's course beneath the water, it caused the "Teras" to obey the firm unswerving hands of Eumolpos of Kephallenia with a perfection that was indeed awe-inspiring.

Nisos edged himself as far back into the stern as he possibly could, so far indeed that the round pole of the rudder pressed against his left thigh. But from this position he was able to get an unforgettable view of the whole spectacle. The moon was obviously full that night and its lustre flooded everything with a liquid luminosity that had nothing ghostly or spectral about it and yet was decidedly unearthly.

The Island of Wone, when once they had got the "Teras" off that sharp-jutting rock, by no means towered above them. Its structure was indeed that of a flat table-land raised only three or four feet above the surface of the sea; and the single mast of the “Teras” rose so high into the air as to quite out-top the two weird Divinities from Arima, Eurybia and Echidna, who, as they had done from time immeasurable, were still arguing with each other in a tireless monotonous dialogue.

The object upon which Nisos finally fixed his attention was the neck of the terrific Figure-Head of the “Teras”, which he had been assured he must regard as terminating in the actual head and features of its super-human designer.

These monumental features were at this very moment, so he had been solemnly told, no different from what they had been a hundred-thousand years ago and no different from what they would be a hundred-thousand years hence. “Had this supreme enemy of the everlasting gods,” he asked himself, “been able to invent a way of surviving beneath a volume of water half-a-mile deep?”

And what had happened to that fire-breathing monster Typhon? Had he been, as it had been said, “intercepted”, on his way to join the infernal foes of the gods who live forever? Nisos had been hearing, ever since he first came on board, extraordinary stories about this super-human Being whose features — and the legend ran that the Personage Itself had carved its own features — were neither divine nor human, neither of any conceivable Past or conceivable Future, but totally outside and beyond all we have heard, seen, remembered, imagined, dreamed, feared or hoped!

“It seems strange,” he said to himself, “that I, Nisos, the son of Pandea the wife of Krateros Naubolides, should be squatting by this helmsman, staring at the curving neck of this creature beyond all creatures, created by this creator beyond all creators, whose dragon-swan neck ends in some ultimate vision, the vision of a Being that is both more Divine and more Titanic than anything we know, that is in fact outside all we know. And isn’t it an unusually queer chance," Nisos now asked himself, "that I should know not one single person, except I suppose the men of the ship, who has ever seen the mysterious face with which the Figure-Head of the 'Teras' terminates?

"When this ship first entered the harbour of Ithaca was there not one single soul who saw her? When she was anchored in the harbour of Ithaca did no barge or boat or canoe or raft pass in front of her? Did no swimmer, swimming round her, look up at that face? Why haven't I asked this question of Odysseus, of Zeuks, of Princess Nausikaa herself to whom the ship belongs? There is certainly something queer about all this."

Nisos shuffled his uncomfortable body a little further still to the rear, until his back was pressed against the actual jet-black cross-bar of the ship's stern, in which position every time Eumolpos of Kephallenia gave the rudder the particular push that swung the "Teras" prow to the North our friend's thigh received something of a shock.

At one point indeed Eumolpos became aware of some sort of obstacle at the extreme reach of his helm's thrust, and turning his head for, as a man of good stock in Kephallenia, he was naturally courteous, he murmured an apology.

"O that's all right!" cried our friend. "It's only that I'm so unused to a ship. All I can do is to follow the master around."

But his word with the helmsman gave him the required incentive to put to Akron the question that was seething in his mind.

"By the way, Master, I suppose you've often examined the face of your ship's figure-head? Does it look like the face of a great philosopher, or like the face of a great poet, or like the face of a great scientist?"

Akron didn't even turn his head. "If I answered him properly you might never be able, aye, Eumolpos, to steer a ship again, all your days? But come along, Nisos! You said just now you were following me around! Well, I've got a bit of a job for you now."

Nisos disengaged himself from his cramped observation-post at the extreme stern of the "Teras" and followed Akron forward.

"No, seriously, my dear boy," the skipper said quietly, as they approached Odysseus, "it would never have done to start on all that business just then. The truth of it is that there's something funny about the whole thing." He grasped Nisos by the arm and they stood side by side for a minute, both of them watching, while he spoke, the wild half-naked figure of Enorches, the Priest, who was clearly haranguing the old king about something; something that made it necessary for Odysseus to sit down again on his coiled ropes.

"He wants me," said Akron, "to put the Island of Wone well behind us before night. His hope is that a cloud may cover up this confounded Moon before dawn and leave us free to get a good vision of the special stars by which he wants us to sail or to row — whichever may be necessary — due West. No, my dear boy, we of the 'Teras' have a natural instinct against talking about that matter of which you enquired just now; I mean about the face of our Figure-Head. The truth of it is there has been 'borne in upon us', as one of us called it the other night, an absolute conviction that only someone who in everything else was so simple, so much of an innocent that people felt they must treat him as if he were a vegetable or an animal or a fish of some kind or an inanimate thing, would be able to face that face without 'getting', as we say, 'the horrors'.

"If you were such an animal-like innocent I'd let you, if we had our anchor out, swim backwards and forward in front of our bows till you could look face to face at this enemy of the Olympians; but you my dear boy are anything but an innocent! On the contrary in most things you're a damned lot cleverer than I am or any of the rest of us who run this old ship."

"What kind of horrors would come upon anyone who wasn't an innocent, and who dared to face the face?"

"Do you want a straight answer, lad?"

"Of course."

"Well, as it happens, I, who now am talking with you, can tell you of one case."

"O quick, quick, captain! Tell me, before that face, scaring the gulls, gets round the next rock!"

The master didn't turn his eyes away from their steadily advancing mast, with all its ropes in order, though without a sail, but as he spoke it was clear to Nisos that ninety per cent of his consciousness was at that moment in his words.

"It was the officer I had before we got Thuon. Poor old Thuon can't bear even to look at the thing's neck from this side after what he's been told. The man's name was Teterix and he came from Zante and it was while I let them cast anchor for a while to catch some fish that this randy fool of a Zanteman began playing his games and swimming round the prow. I'd told him he weren't to do it, but he wanted to show off to the others; so as he swam he not only stared at the face but made faces at the face: and, in no time at all, there he was, climbing up on deck and dancing about in front of us with all his fingers pointing at his head. And such was the power of the horror on him that he forced us to see him as he saw himself and as he felt himself; that is to say with no human head at all, but with a raw bleeding neck out of which three bloated worms hung down who swayed to and fro and kept turning and twisting round.

"After this had gone on for several minutes the unfortunate Zante-man uttered one last piercing shriek, ran to the side of the ship and dived into the sea. So strong was the wretch's conviction that for a neck he had nothing but a gaping bloody hole with three bloated worms hanging out of it that it infected most of us who watched his dive; so that what we saw when he disappeared — and nothing of him ever reappeared — was a pool of blood on the water, with what looked like a blur of red worms squirming about within it."

"And you really and truly saw all that?"

"I really and truly saw all that," replied Akron.

Then it was that they both saw Odysseus beckoning to them and when they reached him they were, for the twentieth time that eventful evening, impressed to the depths of their souls by the old wanderer's self-control.

The excited priest of Orpheus, now entirely naked, was waving his long thin white arms, on which there was not a single black hair and which the moon seemed determined to turn to ivory. The madman was calling upon the whole universe to join him in his desperate incantation to Nothingness!

Not all the words of the priest's incantation reached Nisos; but those that did so sounded to him somewhat like this:

"Nothing! O Nothing! Thou god of all gods, thou creator of Silence!
God of all gods, and creator of Silence, thy daughter!
Nothing! O holy Nothing! O sacred Nothing, and Silence!
Swallow, great Nothing, all else but thyself and thy daughter!
Swallow air, swallow water, swallow fire, swallow earth and her children!
Swallow land, swallow sea, swallow all that in land and sea dwelleth!
Let the whole world be empty of all but thyself and thy daughter

Empty of all but thyself and thy daughter and darling!
Let nothing move in the height or the depth or the length or the breadth,
Save only thyself, great Nothing, thyself and thy daughter,
Only thyself and Silence, thy daughter and darling.
Let nothing sound in the earth or the air or the water or fire;
Let the whole world be empty of all but thyself and thy daughter,
All but thyself and Silence thy daughter and darling."

Nisos expected that Odysseus would react in some definite way to this nihilistic incantation; but he behaved as if he had not heard a word of what the Priest had been chanting, and as soon as Enorches realized that he was totally alone in his worship of Non-Existence he clung to the mast and became absolutely silent and still.

Meanwhile Odysseus had begun a long geological rigmarole on the chemical constituents of various kinds of scoriae substance; and he did this, Nisos decided, so as to reduce Enorches to the Nothingness he worshipped.

"It is an up-thrusting, up-pointing rock," Odysseus concluded, "a rock of black basalt, or of some blue-black adamantine stone, Master Akron. Have you heard what I've been saying in all this breaking of waves and splashing of water?"

Akron, followed closely by Nisos, who gave a grave little bow when he met the king's glance, declared that he'd heard perfectly every word.

"How well he lies!" thought Nisos. "I couldn't have done better myself. But no! He must have heard. What an ear he's got!"

"Yes, O great King," said Akron firmly. "You've said that we shall soon reach an up-pointing black rock, about a dozen feet inland from the island's edge, and that it is to this rock that you wish me to make fast the ship with our newest and strongest length of rope; for it is from there when this curst moonlight — have mercy on me, Selene! — is driven from the heaven by the sun, that you wish, my king, to make your first experimental dive with the Helmet of Proteus. Have I got your command clear, my lord Odysseus?" And the king murmured that he had. It struck Nisos however that the royal voice had grown perceptibly weaker since Pegasos had come and gone; but as the old man, after haying risen to his feet for some minutes, had now re-seated himself on his pile of ropes, this change of tone may have been without any special significance.

"But how," thought Nisos, "how can the old man endure all this?" And then, as in obedience to a whisper from Akron he picked up the blanket that the Priest of Orpheus had dropped and wrapt it round the fellow's shoulders, he noticed that Enorches gave him a very queer look. All the same the priest wrapped the thing round himself with obvious relief and crouched down again, this time with his back to the mast.

"Stay and watch him for a while, will you, son?" whispered Akron. "I've got to go down now to the oarsmen to talk to them about this rock to which we have to tie up the ship for the night. And keep an eye, sonny, will you" — here Akron moved close enough to add this in an extremely low whisper — "on Zeuks, while I'm down below? He seems to think that as long as he's embracing that girl he's keeping her from some mischief she naturally will be up to the moment he lets her go! But it's much more about himself than about that poor worried-looking waif from Troy that I'm concerned.

"You know the man a lot better than I do; in fact, as far as I can see, you're the only one aboard our old 'Teras' who knows anything about him at all. He's a funny-looking fellow right enough; and he's got a look as if at any moment he might break out into a roar of laughter that would burst his skin! I don't like the look of him and I don't trust him. So keep an eye on him, son, will you? They'll be calling us down before very long to the old man's cabin for supper. I pray we'll be reaching this confounded rock he talks about before that's ready. But maybe not! Anyway I'm off now. I'll be seeing you later. At supper, if not before! I won't ask you now how you suppose the old man knew about this same 'pointed rock' to which we're to moor the 'Teras'? He can't have been here before, can he? Well! See you soon again, son! But keep your wits about you. I leave the old man, so to say, in your care. See you soon!"

Both pairs of ladies, Pontopereia and Eione in their cabin, and Nausikaa and Okyrhöe in theirs, were, in a leisurely, negligent, nonchalant way, preparing for the passengers' supper in the much larger cabin dedicated to the comfort of Odysseus.

"What do you really feel, Eione darling, when you see that queer-looking individual Zeuks, holding that grave, sweet Trojan woman on his knee?"

Pontopereia held her own not very shapely left leg balanced across the knee of her other while she carefully adjusted her left sandal so that a particular wrinkle in its leather shouldn't hurt a bunion from which she was suffering.

Eione screwed up her forehead, but gave her friend a very straight look.

"It wouldn't suit you, my beautiful one, to feel as I feel," Eione replied, "for you're a clever girl from a big city and are born with an intellect of your own; and if a man began fooling about with you you'd either want him to come to the point, take your maidenhead, as they call it, and have done with it, or to let you alone and come back to listening while you explained your philosophy to him.

"But country girls like me are quite different. We've lived so close to animals that we've sort of turned into animals. We're fond of our own human flesh just as animals are. And we're particularly fond of our own flesh when men are enjoying it, I mean feeling it with any part of their bodies. I know what I'm talking about, Ponty darling, for I've had an experience that doesn't happen to every girl in the world I can assure you! I mean I've been, as they call it, 'made love to' — not much 'making' and not much 'love' in it, but never mind that! — by no other than the most lecherous Being in the whole wide world, the great Arcadian god Pan, his own self!

"And do you know what happened? We just simply made friends. I begged him not to meddle with my virginity, for, as I told him frankly, I didn't want to be bothered with the consequence of that sort of thing yet! I wanted to enjoy my life before starting to be a mother and all that sort of business. Arcadian Pan fully understood what I said to him; and he fully agreed with my point of view. I told him it wasn't fair that our mother the Earth should just use us as procreating nest-eggs for her own purposes. And he agreed.

"He said that in the act of copulation a woman got more pleasure than a man the moment the pain was over and sometimes even while the pain was going on. But he said he'd make a bargain with me that he'd agree not to meddle with my virginity if in return I'd let him hold me on his knees and enjoy the feeling of my thighs pressed against his thighs and the pleasure of stroking my breasts. He said that the pleasure to male flesh of having female flesh pressed against it was greater than the most delicious taste to the tongue or the palate or the most exciting bathing in water, rushing through air, burrowing in earth-mould, or brandishing blazing fire.

"He said that to deny to masculine flesh its greatest possible thrill, namely the ecstasy of being pressed against feminine flesh, was the most cruel and wicked perversion in the whole universe, and that the whole idea of refusing our human flesh to each other, when the meeting of these two sorts of flesh, the male and the female, gave to each the greatest thrill of pleasure possible to all organic beings in the whole universe was a wicked and cruel denial to life of what life had come into existence to enjoy.

"'Life,' said Arcadian Pan to me, 'life is lured and attracted out of the inert and inanimate elements into its earliest existence by the promise of the indescribable ecstasy of sexual pleasure! And so, when we have lured life out of the inanimate, to go and deny to it,' thus spoke Arcadian Pan to me, 'its prerogative and privilege and proprietary right, is an abominable treachery to the mysterious pressure, whatever it may be, that brought life into existence!'

"And I must tell you this also, Ponty, my true and only friend. When Arcadian Pan had taught me the ineffable, the unfathomable, the infinite pleasure that comes from male flesh pressing female flesh against itself — and, mind you, this has nothing at all to do with 'taking maidenheads', as they call it, or de-virginating virgins — he and I became excellent friends. I found his society extremely agreeable; and it seemed to me that he found mine the same! At any rate the result of our daily contact was that I got genuinely fond of him and sincerely attached to him as a friend; and I believe he felt exactly the same about me! That he was an immortal god and I a silly little mortal girl, doomed to perish in a few years, seemed to make no difference to him or to me! I can only tell you, Ponty dear, that if it weren't for meeting you, and your being so sweet to me, I should miss his company so much that there's no telling what silly things I might do. And what is more, I believe, though it seems conceited and vain to say so, that he misses me, though not of course as much as I miss him!"

At this point Pontopereia, as she lowered her not very shapely leg to the floor of that lowest deck of the "Teras" and endured with a little laugh the twitching pain she got from the contact of her sandal with her bunion, believed she beheld by the feeble flame of a flickering wick floating in oil, a real, actual, round pearl of a wet tear rolling down her friend's plain, simple, and the extreme opposite of what could be called a clever face and sliding from her retreating chin to the white hollow between her girlish breasts.

A very different dialogue was proceeding meanwhile in the cabin of the two older women. There was no inclination between those two to make the relation between male and female flesh the subject of discourse. Their talk was actuated by, and revolved round, and obstinately and viciously returned to, the intense heart-gnawing jealousy they felt with regard to each other and the old wanderer with whom they were sailing.

"You have no idea then, is that what you want me to believe, as to what you will do with me, when you and this ugly, badly built ship of yours have lured Odysseus to his death?"

"Do with you? I don't understand! I presume you'll stay here on board with us until you're tired of us? We shall, of course, when we've seen all we want to see of the ocean that swallowed up Atlantis, sail back to the land of my Fathers. If you think we're going to visit Ithaca just for the sake of ending where we began you're challenging the very mill-wheel of disappointment.

"And if you are playing with the crazy idea that you can persuade me to enter the harbour of the city of Thebes on your behalf you must be losing your head. What you ought to be asking yourself all this while is what you will do when we return to my country. I shall have no particular authority there; and if I had I doubt whether, from what I now am learning about you from personal contact, I should be particularly anxious to — What was that? The first call for dinner was it? Or was it a call for us to gather on the top deck again, before something — heaven knows what! — begins to happen?

"No, no! thanks all the same! You go on dressing; and be quick about it and stop talking! I can manage with this curst necklace if you leave me alone. Yes, you're welcome to all the hot water in that pro-cho-os over there. I've got all I want."

Meanwhile on the top deck the same sound of the same bell that had disturbed Nausikaa and Okyrhöe reached the ears of Odysseus. He had left his club propt against the bulwarks and had already begun to move, slowly and cautiously, as he always did when on board ship, from his seat of coiled ropes to the ladder leading to the oarsmen's deck.

Over the face of the priest Enorches as he lay naked in a couple of blankets, for some kindly sailor had brought him a second one, now that the only light in the sky and on the water was moonlight, there floated an unquestionable smile of pure comfort and relief. Most onlookers would have supposed this look to have been purely due to a draught of rich Cyprian wine which another kindly sailor had brought him; but our old acquaintance the Fly who was now in a position to observe these things at close quarters knew well enough that it was his friend the brown-winged Moth, who by deliberately fanning with her wings the wine-moistened lips of the Priest of the Mysteries, had drawn from him this genial token of well-being.

As to the Moth herself, she had no sooner returned to her friend in their familiar refuge than she was compelled to listen to one of those cosmic conversations between the Sixth Pillar and the Club of Herakles which the Fly's scientific mind always found so fascinating and illuminating.

"You must have noticed already, my dear old friend," the Sixth Pillar was saying, "how strongly and emphatically the four elements are joining in this multiversial revolt against the authority of the Olympians? Of course there are voices abroad and I can hear them in this corridor who declare that what is now going on is a world-wide revolt of women against men rather than of men against gods or of Titans against Olympians; but with my own personal nearness to the Four Supreme Elements I cannot share these eccentric opinions.

“To me it is clear that what is happening in the multiverse at the present moment is a revolt against Zeus the Son of Kronos by every other power in the wide world! The best proof of this is the definite news that Hera and Athene who have always worked hand in hand are now encouraging Poseidon and Aidoneus to join with Zeus in some final desperate act of authority and retribution.

“What I am most conscious of now,” went on the Sixth Pillar, “is the mental awareness of what is going on by each of the Four Elements. Take the earth, to begin with, my good friend. I assure you I cannot imagine anything clearer or more definite than the vibration of sympathy with the rebels in this cosmogonic revolt which I feel — yes! at this very second as I talk to you I feel it — emanating from the earth! The vibrations I feel, you must understand, my friend, are not spoken words. They are more like the deep, dim rumblings of an earthquake! They are thick and dense and dark, and convey to me something of what animals must feel when they fall and strike their foreheads upon the ground. On the contrary the vibrations I get out of the air are like a mighty rushing wind which seems in the fanning and flapping of its vast feathers to have completely surrounded me and to be carrying me into a boundless void.

“And then what I get out of the heart of the hot black fire of the darkened sun as he travels beneath the earth, and what I get out of the heart of the cold white fire of the ghostly moon as she rides through the clouds, are two infinite throbbings that are like thunder in my own heart!

"And strangest of all is the vibration that emanates from the massed volume of all the waters of the ocean, a vibration that is in many ways more important for us in this corridor of the rock-palace of the Island of Ithaca than all the other three; for it is a vibration from an element that resembles air made palpable, air thickened out into a tidal momentum encircling the earth, grey, fathomless, immeasurable, salt with all the tears ever shed, cold and ultimate as a universal grave."

The monotone of the Sixth Pillar's discourse as he thus informed his friend the Club of Herakles, to whom Atropos had given the name of "Expectation" and who had always had the name of "Dokeesis" or "Seeming", how the Four sublime elements of earth, air, fire and water responded to this world-wide revolt against the gods had scarcely died down, before there came, reverberating up from the depths of the "Teras", the second call for supper.

It was the custom on board this particular ship for the white crew and their black helpers to enjoy their evening meal in a haphazard manner, casually, and irregularly, and in no particular order, slipping down by twos and threes to the kitchen in the hold when opportunity offered, and lingering with a friend over a flask of wine down there when the wind was in their sail and the ship was moving quietly.

At the moment therefore when the second call for the supper went forth on this particular evening our young friend Nisos, who was to have a berth that night with the master of the ship so as to give the only remaining one-man cabin to Zeuks, was already wondering whether to obey the call alone or to beg Zeuks and Arsinöe, the latter looking half-asleep as she reposed partly on the knees of the son of Pan and partly against the base of the ship's figure-head, to accompany him.

If Arsinöe was half-asleep, Zeuks, as far as Nisos could tell, was entirely so, for his eyes were tightly closed and his face had the expression, already familiar to Nisos, that it always assumed when the man was asleep, an expression as if he were some whimsical creator of the world who had dozed off in the act of trying to suppress his amusement at his creation.

Pontos and Proros were playing some private game of their own at the foot of the mast, a game that was clearly one rather of skill than of chance; for they threw no dice, and seemed to be moving little bits of wood from one position to another across some geometrical figure scrawled on the deck.

Nisos had the boldness at this moment, so quietly and silently was the "Teras" being rowed along that rocky coast of the Island of Wone in that unearthly moonlight, to sink down himself upon the old king's seat of coiled ropes, as he watched in a sort of trance across the slowly changing rocky edges of Wone those two weird figures from Arima, whose unearthly and unending disputation with each other the wind must now be carrying back towards those old Eastern lands they were so steadily leaving as they sailed through the moonlight towards the unknown West.

It was a moment in his life, so our friend told himself, as he tried to arrange his limbs on his pile of ropes as comfortably as the king always did, that until his death he would remember.

"I don't believe I will go down to dinner at all tonight," he thought, answering, as he fancied, some call out of the moonlight that was more imperative for him than even the second call to the most important meal of the day, and in a flash of interior penetration he recognized that he still couldn't decide whether it was Pontopereia or Eione he would like best to have for his wife.

"I don't even know to which of them I am the more attracted! In fact, as I watch Arsinöe now, who is ever so much older than they are, I really think I would feel more at ease and more content if it were she rather than either of those young girls who was to be my mate. And she's not only older; she's a Trojan too! Of course I'd be thrilled to make love to either of those girls and overjoyed to sleep with either of them; but I'd be scared of being fixed up for good with that stupid little face of Eione's or with that heavy little body of Pontopereia's. I simply can't understand it! But there it is: it's the truth. What I feel now is that something — someone — a Presence of some kind — is calling to me out of this moonlight and out of this night-wind and out of these waves, though I'm damned if I know what kind of a Presence it is!

"Come! Tell me, you Unknown! Are you a living girl, you Mystery of the Night? Or are you a boy like me, alone and puzzled and not quite knowing what you want, but not wanting to go back to your mother, and hating your father and brother and your brother's girl? Are you a boy like me, you Mystery of the Night, serving one of the greatest heroes the world has ever seen and a hero who has seen more of the world than any other human being who has ever been born? Are you a lonely girl who-want me for your mate? Or are you a lonely boy who want me for your 'Hetairos' or friend? Speak you Mystery of the Night! Speak and tell me which of the two you are!"

But there was no answer and the Moon grew steadily larger and larger and larger. And as Nisos settled himself deeper and deeper in the centre of that pile of ropes he began to feel as if it were the Moon herself, Selene the Moon-Goddess, who had selected him, as according to the rumours he was always hearing she had long ago selected Arcadian Pan and as she had lately selected, so the angelic scandal-mongers swore, the Carian shepherd Endymion of Mount Latmos.

He allowed himself to dally with this idea of having really attracted the attention of the Moon-Goddess on this night of all nights when her circle of white magic was full to the brim, until the inhuman murmur from Eurybia and Echidna, neither of whom seemed even remotely affected by their voyage through the air from Arima to Wone, reached such a point in their choreographic accompaniment to his fancy, as if — pair of ancestral Titanesses as they were! — they were about to vary the monotony of their immemorial argument by hopping up and down in the fury of their repartees!

It was at this point that Nisos fancying he saw Arsinöe, still in the arms of the now soundly sleeping Zeuks, throw him an understanding if not a companionable smile, replied to her by kissing his hand.

“I can’t help liking this Trojan girl,” he said to himself; and then, as his gaze returned to Eurybia and Echidna, and from them wandered back to the coast of Wone, and from thence to the moonlight on the ocean, there rushed through his mind like jaggedly forked lightning a startling philosophical speculation.

“Does everything come round in circles and repeat itself? Was there, when people first invented boats and ships, some boy like me ten thousand years ago who lay on a ship’s deck, such as ships were in those days, with only one deck, and only a couple of oarsmen, and a sail made of the skins of seals and wild goats, and said to himself, just as I am saying now: ‘I don’t want to go back to mother and father. I want to serve my King. I want to make love to that girl I saw on that wharf where we moored yesterday!’

“And will there be a boy like me ten thousand years hence who will lie on a much grander deck than this and say to himself: ‘I don’t want to go back to my mother and father! I want to sail round all the known West to the Isles of the Blest!' That boy who was like me; and this boy who will be like me, shall we three meet in the kingdom of Aidoneus?"

Nisos had only just begun to turn his mind away from thinking about boys like himself ten thousand years before and ten thousand years after, when he saw Arsinöe open her beautiful eyes very wide indeed and give a start that would have waked from sleep anyone in the world save the son of Arcadian Pan who was holding her on his knee.

At the same time Nisos felt himself touched on the shoulder. He twisted his head round, and there before him in the moonlight stood the figure of Odysseus!

"Hush!" whispered the old hero while his bowsprit beard tickled Nisos' chin: "get up as quietly as you can, my boy, and take a step with me!"

It was a comfort to Nisos to notice when he was on his feet that his friend Arsinöe had been shrewd enough to shut her eyes and pretend to surrender herself to what certainly looked like a sleep as deep as Zeuks' own.

"I won't take you with me just now further than the ladder, my boy," said Odysseus still speaking very quietly. "I came to fetch 'Expectation', my most valued weapon, with which, as you know, Herakles killed the Nemean lion. But I also came to tell you what my intention is. I have already told Akron, who is at this moment informing the oarsmen what I have in mind, and I have already told Eumolpos the helmsman. My intention is this. My son Telemachos received, when he visited the yellow-haired Menelaos, as a guest-gift from Helen herself, a little phial of Nepenthe which was given to her by the King of Egypt.

"When even a few drops of this divine Nepenthe, the enemy of all suffering, are dropped into wine, the wine into which the Nepenthe has been poured, takes away all thoughts that bring anxiety or pain or fear or doubt or suspicion or grief or envy or hatred or terror; and in place of these a beatific happiness fills our souls to the brim.

"A little of this precious Nepenthe goes a very long way; and I have brought some of it with me to this ship. Now what I propose to do is to put a few drops of this divine drug into the wine which our four Ladies, together with Nausikaa's official Herald, will presently be drinking in my cabin. You and I, however — and for heaven's sake, child, don't you go and get caught by the fragrance of the wine or lured into letting the least drop of it touch your tongue! — as soon as we see that the four ladies and Nausikaa's Herald have fallen asleep and are deep sunk in this blessed Elysium of happy visions, having taken good care — and don't you forget that part of it, my son! — to eat enough to last us, if need be, for a whole night and day, we, I say, will leave that lower deck and come up here, to be ready for, well, for whatever fate may bring!"

They had by this time reached the ladder which descended to the deck of the rowers, and it was not until Odysseus was half-way down that the necessity of asking him a most drastic and necessary question forced Nisos to make the old man turn round and lift up his head towards him. Never did the lad, through all the rest of his mortal days, forget the impression he received at that second as the unearthly luminosity of that night's omniscient moonlight poured down upon that old upturned face with that crazy "Helmet of Proteus" twisted about it, whereof the absurdly trailing "thusanoi", or "tassels" looked in that silvery gleaming as if they were the "tassels" of Athene's "aegis" transformed into long, slenderly-coiling, silvery worms.

"Do you wish me, my king," Nisos enquired, getting the words out with a gasping rush of breath, "to inform Zeuks of your intention? Is he to share your Nepenthe with the Herald and the four ladies? Or shall I tell him of your intention and recommend him to bring down the Trojan maid Arsinöe to wait on the four ladies and to share their supper and the sleep-giving wine?"

"You have done well in thinking as you have," answered the voice of the king from the white face above that moonlit beard. "Bring them both down to my cabin. We'll let them both sleep the sleep of Nepenthe. After all it was the gift of Helen."

A couple of minutes later, Nisos was standing close to what clearly had become an extremely agitating game of contending figurines above whose "Pessoi", or "inanimate men-at-arms", Pontos and Proros were now bending in intense concentration.

But Nisos was too occupied just then in obeying Odysseus to feel the faintest desire to "pessenize". "Arsinöe!" he called out in a clear though not a loud voice. The girl heard him at once. "What's the matter?" she asked, disengaging herself from the knees of the son of Pan and rising to her feet.

"You must wake him now," our friend answered, "for the king wants him at their supper."

And then he added hurriedly, catching a rather pathetic look of bewilderment on her face, "And you too, Arsinöe my dear, I expect they'll all be glad to have you down there; for if I'm not mistaken there'll be more good wine than good manners at this precious supper of theirs!"

The girl bent down over Zeuks and shook him by the right shoulder. His body was squeezed between the metallic base of the famous figure-head which was at that point wrought into a number of shell-curved, beautifully carved dragon-scales, and the narrowing rondure of the rail of the ship's prow. Zeuks opened his left eye, gave both the girl and Nisos a glance that partook of the nature of a humorous wink and closed it again.

"Do wake him for heaven's sake, my dear!" repeated Nisos. "I'd do it myself," he went on, "only if I touched him he might fly into a passion and start hitting me; and that would probably set me off too and there'd be a fine row!"

Nisos felt deep in his soul that he wouldn't mind at all if there was a murderous row; but as he stared ahead he realized that the "Teras" had actually now reached the point at which not so far inland arose that nameless sharp-pointed rock to which their ship was to be roped. It certainly was a curiously shaped rock, like a tall lean man with a fantastically long neck and an unnaturally large head; and our friend began wondering just from where upon the "Teras" the rope would have to be conveyed to that figure and attached to it.

His speculations about the securing of their vessel were broken up by some change in the wind that brought to his ears — and apparently to Arsinöe's too, for she let Zeuks' head sink down again — what was unmistakably the culminating point of the unending dispute between Eurybia and Echidna.

Both Nisos and Arsinöe soon realized from the weird words they heard that Eurybia had finished her murmured contention that the reeling and rocking of the cosmos that was now the chief topic of what might be called the elemental gossip of the universe was due to a revolt of the whole Feminine Half of the world against the eternal Male; and that Echidna was now defending her notion of what was happening, which certainly was a startling and terrifying one, and entirely different from that of her sister phantom of this Arima in the midst of the ocean.

The gist of Echidna's view of what was occurring was that it was a grand revolt of the Titans, and, with the Titans of all those Giants and Dragons and Super-Animals and Super-Birds and Super-Fishes and Super-Reptiles and ancient long-forgotten insular divinities, such as Eurybia and herself, who, in comparison with the proud Olympians, must seem to some— “indeed” thought Nisos, “they seem to me” — hideous monsters and wicked antiquities — in universal conspiracy against the thunder-wielding All-Father, Zeus.

But what was probably to our friend Nisos’ ears, and certainly to those of Arsinöe, who was doing her best to disturb the sleepy head of the unconscionable son of Pan, the most alarming part of this victory-chant of the Antediluvians was that it concluded with a phantasmagoric wail of prediction, prophesying— “falsely, O falsely! let us pray!” cried the look that was being at that second exchanged between our young armour-bearer of the King of Ithaca and the daughter of Hector — that the revolt of the Titans and the Monsters was destined to prevail!

And as the prophetic hiss of Echidna, the Snake-Goddess, floated away on the moonlight, it came with a considerable shock into Nisos’ mind that it was no other than Arcadian Pan himself, the rustic god who had the horns and legs of a goat, who had carried off from Arima these two weird Beings who were like the ghosts of forgotten island Deities and had carried off Tis’s little sister Eione as well, Eione, who was now safe in the king’s cabin and would be shortly drinking the wine that contained Helen’s Egyptian Nepenthe, carried them all off together on those two immortal horses.

“Whither now, then,” the lad asked himself, “had Arcadian Pan gone? Had he dived down under the waters into the streets and temples and markets and shops and brothels of the metropolis of Atlantis? Impossible! Impossible! Who could imagine the goat-god of Arcadia playing on his flute in the fish-frequented streets of that drowned city? Impossible! Impossible! He must have made that other divine horse, the one whose mane was up-rooted by this naked wretch lying here now, dead-drunk in his blankets, under the ship's bulwark, carry him over sea and land home to his sheep-folds!"

As these thoughts crowded, like a swarm of small gnats, into our young friend's head he noticed that Akron, the ship's captain, was approaching them. This fact reached his intelligence indirectly but very quickly; for he saw all those little bits of wood that Pontos and Proros had been using as toy soldiers in their game of "Pesseia" disappear with a scraping and scuffling sound into the capacious folds of their tunics.

The unavoidable though quite faint sound made by these stalwart sailors as they disposed of so many handfuls of toy-soldiers made it clear to Nisos that the natural human passion for playing games was stronger than any intellectual interest in drowned cities or in the past or future of scientific civilizations. Pontos and Proros were ready for anything; but they did not want to see their precious "Pessoi" or draughtsmen cast into the sea.

"Well, my excellent land-lubbers!" exclaimed Akron in his most genial manner. "You'll soon have a chance to watch a little real seamanship, not un-combined, I hope, with a little unprofessional commonsense! You've already noticed, Nisos, my dear boy, that we've reached that rock — —" Akron lifted his arm and pointed eagerly— "that the king calls the Atlas Rock because, so he informs us, only none of us on this old ship can corroborate his words, it resembles the giant Titan whose head, and shoulders too, you and I must have seen from this very deck beyond the Pillars of Herakles before the 'Teras' made for the open sea; and the king swears it does actually resemble the Titan Atlas whom the All-Father punishes forever by making him hold up the sky.

"The king says that the Titan, though no weakling, lacks the broad shoulders and muscular neck that would render his task agreeable. The king says his shoulders slope like a woman's just as do those of this damned rock to which we've now got to tie up our grand old sea-eagle!"

